NECKER, James, nĕk'-er, a celebrated French financier, who went to Paris at an early age, obtained employment in a banking-house, in which he rose to a partnership, and, in 13 years, having made a number of successful speculations, retired from business with a large fortune. He commenced his political career by becoming a member of the council of Two Hundred at Geneva. He was afterwards appointed minister of the republic of Geneva at Paris, where, by degrees, he rose to the highest employments. In 1765 he was appointed syndic of the French East-India Company; in 1775 director of the royal treasury; and was twice director-general of the finances of France. But the Revolution, which all his efforts were unable to check, obliged him to retire to Switzerland. Necker wrote three volumes on the finances of France, a book on the influence of religious opinions, and other works. He married the daughter of a Protestant clergyman, by whom he had a daughter, Madame de Staël Holstein, the wife of the Swedish ambassador. She afterwards became celebrated by the name of Madame de Staël. B. at Geneva, 1734; D. in Switzerland, 1804.

NEDENAES, ned'-en-ais, a district of Norway, inclosed by the districts of Bradsberg, Stavanger, and Maudal, and on the S.E. by the Skagar-rack. Area, 4,266 square miles. Desc. Mountainous. Pop. 55,000.

NEEDHAM, Marchamont, need'-ham, an English writer, who, during the civil war, distinguished himself by his political pamphlets, first against the parliament, and afterwards against the king; so that, at the Restoration, he obtained his pardon with difficulty. B. at Burford, Oxfordshire, 1620; D. 1678.

NEEDHAM, John Turberville, a learned English naturalist, who was educated at Douay, where he entered into orders as a Roman Catholic divine. His superiors appointed him professor of philosophy in the English college at Lisbon. He afterwards became travelling tutor to a nobleman; and, on his return, settled in London, where he was chosen fellow of the Royal Society. He wrote observations inserted in Buffon's "Natural History;" also, "New Enquiries upon Microscopical Discoveries," the "Generation of Organic Bodies," and "Observations on Spallanzani's Microscopical Discoveries." B. in London, 1713; D. at Brussels, 1781.

NEEDLES.

NEEDLES, THE, need'-els, a cluster of pointed rocks on the coast of the English Channel, off the Isle of Wight. Lat. 50° 39′ 9″ N. Lon. 1° 34′ W.

NEEDWOOD, need'-wood, an ancient royal forest of Staffordshire, disforested in 1801.

NEEMUCH, ne-much', a town of India, in the territory of Gwalior. It stands in a district fertile in rice, wheat, maize, and barley. Pop. 4,000, exclusive of the cantonment. Lat. 24° 27′ N. Lon. 74° 54′ E.

NEERWINDEN, nair-vin'-den, a village of Belgium, 2 miles from Lauden. Here William III. of England was defeated by the duke of Luxembourg, in 1693; and here, in 1793, the French were defeated by the Austrians.

NEGAPATAM, neg-a-pa-tam', a decayed seaport of India, district of Tanjore, on the Coromandel coast, 48 miles from the city of Tanjore. It is well fortified, and has a large pagoda, or Hindoo temple. Pop. 10,000.—This place was taken by the British in 1781.

NEGRAIS, neg-riee', a small island, with an excellent harbour, at the mouth of an arm of the Irrawaddy river, in the Burman empire. Lat. of Cape Negrais, 16° 1′ N. Lon. 94° 14′ E. Cape Negrais forms the boundary of the British territory in further India, and is at the S. extremity of the Burmese dominions.

NEGROPONT, or EGRIBOS, neg'-ro-pont. (See EUBŒA and CHALCIS.)

NEGROPONT, Channel of, an arm of the Ægean Sea,

Greece, lying between Eubœa and Hellas, and consisting of the S.E. portion of the ancient Euripus. Ext. 40 miles long.

NEGROS, nai'-grose, one of the Philippine islands, in the Asiatic archipelago, S. of Luconia. Area. Estimated at 3,780 square miles. Pop. about 40,000. Another in the Pacific, near the N. coast of Admiralty Island.

NEHEMIAH, ne'-he-mi'-a, a celebrated Hebrew, was the son of Hachaliah, and born in Babylon, during the captivity. He became cupbearer to Artaxerxes, king of Persia, who permitted him to return to his own country, and to rebuild Jerusalem. He achieved this work 454 B.C., though greatly opposed by the enemies of the Jewish nation. After governing that people with great wisdom and zeal, he died at Jerusalem, 430 B.C.

NEILGHERRY, nile-gür'-re, a range of mountains in S. India, occupying an area of 700 square miles, at the junction of the S. and W. Ghauts. Several of their summits attain an elevation ranging between 6,000 and 8,760 feet. Among the hills are different stations resorted to by Europeans, on account of the salubrity of the climate.

NEINA, ni'-na, a river of Asiatic Russia, which, after a course of 350 miles, joins the Tobol, 50 miles from Tumen.

NEISSE, ni'-se, a river of Germany, which, after a course of 90 miles, falls into the Oder, 15 miles from Oppeln.—Another, which, after a course of 115 miles, joins the Oder, 20 miles from Frankfort.

NEISSE, a fortified town of Prussian Silesia, on the Neisse, 45 miles from Breslau. It contains a splendid mansion belonging to the bishop, a collegiate church, other churches, with a monastery, convent, a theatre, arsenals, barracks, and hospitals. Manf. Woollens, linens, ribbons, and stockings, and a brisk traffic in yarn. It has also some distilleries. Pop. 17,000.

NEJIN, or NEISHIN, nej-in', a town of Russia, on the Oster, 36 miles from Zchernigov. It is inclosed by walls, and has numerous churches, a cathedral, and a college. Manf. Leather, soap, preserves, and liquors. Pop. 17,000.

NELEDINSKY, Meletzky Yurii, nel-e-dins'-ke me-letz'-ke, a celebrated Russian ballad-writer, who at first served in the Russian army, and fought against the Turks during the campaigns which took place between the years 1770—1774. He was afterwards attached to the mission dispatched to Constantinople, and was selected by the emperor Paul, in 1797, to accompany him in his journey to White Russia. In 1809 the Czar bestowed upon him the order of St. Alexander Nevski, having previously rewarded his services by the grant of an estate, with several hundred serfs, together with the order of St. Anne. As a song-writer, he was graceful and charming to an extent far beyond anything that had hitherto been attained by the authors of his country. In his writings, the utmost simplicity was combined with tenderness and warmth of feeling. B. 1751; D. 1829.

NELEUS, ne'-le-us, or ne-le'-us, a son of Neptune and Tyro, was brother to Pelias, with whom he was exposed by his mother. They were, however, preserved, and brought to Tyro, who had then married Cretheus, king of Iolchos. After the death of Cretheus, Pelias and Neleus seized the kingdom of Iolchos, which belonged to Æson, the lawful son of Tyro by the deceased monarch. After they had reigned for some time conjointly, Pelias expelled Neleus from Iolchos. Neleus went to Aphareus, king of Messenia, who treated him with kindness, and permitted him to build a city, which he called Pylos. Neleus married Chloris, the daughter of Amphion, by whom he had a daughter and 12 sons, who were all, except Nestor, killed by Hercules, together with their father.

NELLOOR, or NELLORE, nel-loor', a town of India, in the presidency of Madras, and the capital of a district of the same name. In the last century many Roman coins were discovered here under the ruins of a Hindoo temple. Pop. 20,000.—The DISTRICT has an area of nearly 8,000 square miles, and a population of 936,000. Lat. between 13° 55′ and 16° N. Lon. between 79° 8′ and 80° 21′ E.

NELSON, nel'-son, a county of Virginia, U.S. Area, 438 square miles. Pop. 13,000.—2. In Kentucky. Area, 357 square miles. Pop. 15,000.—The name of several townships, a river in British N. America, and a LAKE, produced by an enlargement of the Churchill river, in the same region.

NELSON, the name of a district in W. Australia, and a settlement in New Zealand. Also of a channel in Tasmania, and an island in the S. Atlantic Ocean. Lat. 62° 15′ S. Lon. 58° 50′ W.

NELSON, Horatio, Viscount, the greatest of British admirals, was the fourth son of the Rev. Mr. Nelson, rector of Burnham-Thorpe, in Norfolk. He received his education at the school of North Walsham; but at the age of 12 years was taken to sea by his maternal uncle, Captain Suckling, of the Raisonable man-of-war. Soon afterwards, the ship was put out of commission, and young Nelson went on board a West Indiaman. Southey, speaking of this step taken by Nelson, says, "He returned a good practical seaman, but with a hatred of the king's service, and a saying then common among sailors, 'aft the most honour, forward the better man.'" To remove this objection, he was again placed with his uncle, who had obtained the command of the Triumph. In 1773, a voyage was undertaken for the discovery of a north-west passage, under the command of Commodore Phipps and Captain Lutwidge. The young seaman entered on board the ship commanded by the latter, and distinguished himself in that perilous voyage by his skill, courage, and promptitude. Soon after his return, he was appointed to the Seahorse, in which he sailed to the East Indies. He passed his examination for lieutenant in 1777, and received his commission as second of the Lowestoft frigate, in which he cruised against the Americans. In 1779 he obtained the rank of post-captain, and was appointed to the command of the Hinchinbroke, with which he sailed to the West Indies, and while there essentially contributed to the taking of Fort San Juan, in the Gulf of Mexico. His health having given way, he returned home, and after going through a course of Bath waters, was again employed in the Albemarle, and was subsequently appointed to the Boreas, having under his orders the duke of Clarence, afterwards William IV., who was captain of the Pegasus. While thus engaged, he married the daughter of William Woodward, Esq., judge of the island of Nevis, and the widow of Dr. Nesbit, a physician of that island, by whom he never had any issue. On the breaking out of the war with France, he was nominated to the Agamemnon, of 64 guns, on board of which he sailed to the Mediterranean, and was present with Lord Hood before Toulon. He also engaged and captured the Ca-Ira at the siege of Bastia, where he served in the batteries with a body of seamen, as he afterwards did at Calvi; and while employed before that place he lost an eye. He was so active on that station, that his name became dreaded throughout the Mediterrancan. Under Admiral Hotham he was in the action with the French fleet, March 15, 1795. In 1796 he was appointed commodore on board the Minerva, in which frigate he captured La Sabine, a 40-gun ship; but was compelled to abandon the prize upon the approach of the Spanish fleet. He immediately steered with the intelligence to Sir John Jervis, off St. Vincent. He had scarcely communicated the news, and shifted his flag on board the Captain, of 74 guns, when the enemy hove in sight. A close action ensued, which terminated in a complete victory on the side of the British, who were inferior in numbers. On this occasion, Commodore Nelson attacked the Santissima Trinidada, of 136 guns, and afterwards boarded and took the San Nicolas, of 80 guns; whence he proceeded in the same manner to the San Josef, of 112 guns, both of which surrendered to him. For his share in this glorious victory, the commodore was honoured with the order of the Bath, and having soon afterwards hoisted his flag as rear-admiral of the blue, he was appointed to command the in-shore squadron at the blockade of Cadiz. He there made a bold but unsuccessful attempt to bombard the city, heading his men himself. The next exploit in which he was engaged was an attempt to take possession of Teneriffe, which design also failed, with the loss of Captain Bowen, of the Terpsichore. In this expedition, Admiral Nelson lost his right arm by a cannon-shot, and was carried off to the boat by his son-in-law, Captain Nesbit, on his back. He now returned to England for the recovery of his health, and received the grant of a pension of £1,000 a year. The memorial which he was required to present upon this occasion stated that he had been four times in action with the enemy's fleets (in three with boats, upon cutting-out expeditions); had assisted at the taking of three towns; had served at Bastia and Calvi; had assisted in capturing seven sail of the line, six frigates, four corvettes, and eleven privateers; had taken fifty merchant-vessels; had been in action a hundred and twenty times; had lost his right eye and arm, besides receiving other severe wounds. The brave admiral, however, did not long remain inactive; he rejoined Earl St. Vincent, who, on receiving intelligence of the sailing of Bonaparte from Toulon, detached Sir Horatio Nelson, with a squadron, in pursuit of him. After exploring the coast of Italy, this indefatigable commander steered for Alexandria, where, to his great mortification, not a French ship was to be seen. He then sailed to Sicily, and having taken in fresh supplies and obtained more correct information, returned to Alexandria, which he descried August 1, 1798, at noon. The enemy, consisting of one first-rate, three second-rates, nine seventy-fours, and four frigates, were discovered in Aboukir Bay, lying at anchor in line of battle, supported by strong batteries on an island, and strengthened by gunboats. Notwithstanding this formidable appearance, the British admiral made the signal for battle, and, by a masterly and bold manœuvre, gave directions for part of his fleet to steer inside the enemy, who were thus exposed between two fires. The contest was hot and bloody: several of the French ships were soon dismasted, and at last the admiral's ship, L'Orient, of 120 guns, took fire, and blew up. The firing, however, continued; but, by the dawn of day, only two sail of the line were discovered with their colours flying, all the rest having struck: these two cut their cables and stood to sea. On the British admiral honours were deservedly poured: he was created Baron Nelson of the Nile, received the thanks of parliament, together with the captains engaged, and was granted a pension of £3,000 per annum. The king of Naples created him duke of Bronté, and gave him an estate. Soon after this he sailed for Sicily, and thence to Naples, where he quelled a rebellion, and restored the king. Having performed these and other important services, Lord Nelson returned to England, and was received with enthusiastic joy. A confederacy of the northern powers having alarmed the government, he was employed to dissolve it. A fleet was fitted out, the command of which was given to Admiral Sir Hyde Parker, Lord Nelson being appointed as second in command. On their arrival off the Cattegat, and being refused a passage, Lord Nelson offered to conduct an attack on the Danish force, which was stationed to oppose an entrance. This being accepted, he shifted his flag to the Elephant, and passed the Sound with little loss. On the 2nd of April the action commenced, at 10 o'clock, and, after a sharp conflict, seventeen sail of the Danes were sunk, burnt, or taken. A negotiation was then entered into between Nelson and the crown prince, in consequence of which the admiral went ashore, and an armistice was settled. He next obtained from the Swedish government an order for taking off the embargo on English ships in the Baltic. Having accomplished these great objects, he returned to England, and was created a viscount. In 1801 he bombarded the enemy's flotilla, which had been collected at Boulogne, to assist in Napoleon's projected invasion of England. After experiencing some loss, Nelson withdrew, without producing any material effect upon the enemy. Peace having been suddenly concluded, Nelson retired to his seat at Merton, in Surrey; but, hostilities recommencing, he sailed for the Mediterranean, and in March, 1803, took the command of that station on board the Victory. Notwithstanding all his vigilance, the French fleet escaped from Toulon, and was joined by that of Cadiz; on learning which, he pursued them to the West Indies with a greatly inferior force. The combined squadrons, however, struck with terror, returned without effecting anything, and, after a partial action with Sir Robert Calder off Ferrol, re-entered Cadiz. Admiral Nelson returned to England; but soon set sail to join his fleet off Cadiz. The French under Admiral Villeneuve, and the Spaniards under Gravina, ventured out with a number of troops on board, October 19, 1805, and on the 21st, about noon, the action began off Cape Trafalgar. The combined French and Spanish fleets consisted of 33 sail of the line and 7 frigates; the English squadron mustered 27 sail of the line and 4 frigates. It was while bearing down upon the enemy that Nelson hoisted his celebrated signal, "England expects every man to do his duty." Lord Nelson ordered his ship, the Victory, to be carried alongside his old antagonist, the Santissima Trinidada, where he was exposed to a severe fire of musketry; and not having taken the precaution to cover his coat, which was decorated with his star and other badges of distinction, he became an object for the riflemen, placed purposely in the tops of the Bucentaur, which lay on his quarter. During the heat of the action, a bullet from one of these entered just below his shoulder, of which he died in about three hours. After the fall of Lord Nelson, the command devolved on Admiral Collingwood, by whose bravery and skill the victory was completed. Eighteen French and Spanish ships were taken; eleven escaped into Cadiz, six of which were reduced to mere wrecks: four French line-of-battle ships, which hauled off in the action, were afterwards taken by Sir Richard Strachan. "The death of Nelson," says Southey, "was felt in England as a public calamity; yet he cannot be said to have fallen prematurely, whose work was done; nor ought he to be lamented, who died so full of honours and at the height of human fame." His brother, the Rev. William Nelson, was created an earl, with a grant of £6,000 per annum. Lord Nelson's sisters were voted each £10,000, with £100,000 for the purchase of an estate. The remains of Lord Nelson were interred in St. Paul's Cathedral, January 9, 1806. B. in Norfolk, 1758.

NEMAUR, ne-mor', a district of Western India, comprising a large portion of the valley of the Nerbudda and of the Vindhya Mountains. Area, 2,225 square miles. Desc. Mountainous, intersected with numerous valleys of considerable fertility. Pro. Wheat, rice, millet, oil-seeds, cotton, pepper, tobacco, and timber. Sheep, goats, cattle, and swine are numerous. The district has an extensive transit-trade. Pop. 250,000. Lat. between 21° 28′ and 22° 25′ N. Lon. between 74° 48′ and 76° 45′ E.

NEMESIANUS, Marcus Aurelius Olympius, ne-me'-si-ai'-nus, a Latin poet, who is supposed to have perished in the proscriptions that disgraced the commencement of the reign of Diocletian. He wrote a poem on hunting, and four eclogues: these were included in the collection edited by Stern in 1832. Flourished during the latter half of the 3rd century.

NEMESIS, nem'-e-sis, one of the infernal deities, daughter of NOX. She was the goddess of vengeance, always prepared to punish impiety, and, at the same time, liberally to reward the good and virtuous. Her power not only existed in this life, but she was also employed after death to find out the most effectual and rigorous means of correction. Nemesis was particularly worshipped at Rhamnus, in Attica, where she had a celebrated statue, ten cubits long, carved in Parian marble by Phidias. The Romans were also particularly attentive to her adoration. Her statue at Rome was in the Capitol. The Greeks celebrated a festival called Nemesia in memory of deceased persons, as the goddess Nemesis was supposed to defend the relics and the memory of the dead from all insult.

NEMESIUS, ne-me'-si-us, bishop of Emesa, in Syria, and a learned philosopher. He wrote a work entitled "The Nature of Man," from some passages in which it has been asserted that he was acquainted with the circulation of the blood. The work is certainly a very remarkable one, and is fully commented upon by Sprengel, in his "History of Medicine," and also by Freind and Haller. An English translation of it was made by George Wither, London, 1636. Flourished towards the end of the 4th century.

NEMOURS, ne-moor', a town of France, in the department of the Seine-and-Marne, on the Loing, 18 miles from Fontainebleau. It trades in corn, wine, and cheese; also in leather. Pop. 4,000.

NEMOURS, Dukes of. Nemours is an old French title of nobility, derived from the town of that name. A branch of the Armagnac family first bore the title. The last of that line, Louis d'Armagnac, duke of Nemours, was killed while fighting against the Spaniards at the battle of Cerignola, in Apulia, 1503. Gaston de Foix next bore the title. The duchy was subsequently granted by Francis I. to his uncle, Philip of Savoy. The last male descendant in this line was Philip, duke of Nemours.

NEMOURS, Mary de Longueville, Duchess of, was the daughter of the duke de Longueville, and the wife of the last-named duke de Nemours. Her "Memoirs of the Court of France during the Minority of Louis XIV." are written with spirit and fidelity. B. 1625; D. 1707.

NEMOURS, Louis Charles Philippe Raphael, Duke of, second and eldest surviving son of the late Louis Philippe, king of the French. In 1831 he was elected king of the Belgians; but, at the advice of his father, refused that dignity. In 1836 he went to Algeria, as adjutant-general of the French army, and commanded a brigade of infantry at the siege of Constantine. In 1840 he espoused Victoria Augusta Antoinette, duchess of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha, and, in the following year, he signalized himself in the decisive campaign against Abd-el-Kader. During the Revolution of 1848, he accompanied his brother's widow, the duchess of Orleans, to the Chamber of Deputies. Since the year 1848 he has continued to reside at Claremont, E. at Paris, 1814.

NEN, nen, a river of England, rising in Northamptonshire, and, after a course of 90 miles, falling into the North Sea at the Wash. It has communication with the Ouse by means of the Wisbeach canal.

NENAGH, nai-na', a market-town of Ireland, in the county of Tipperary, 12 miles from Newport. Pop. 9,500.

NEOPTOLEMUS, ne-op-tol'-e-mus, king of Epirus. (See PYRRHUS.)

NEOPTOLEMUS II. or III. usurped the throne of Epirus during the minority of Pyrrhus the Great, but was subsequently put to death by that king.

NEOPTOLEMUS, a relation of Alexander the Great. He was the first to scale the walls of Gaza, when that city was taken by Alexander, after whose death he received Armenia as his province, and made war against Eumenes. He was supported by Craterus; but an engagement with Eumenes proved fatal to his cause. Craterus was killed and Neoptolemus mortally wounded by Eumenes, B.C. 321.

NEPAUL, ne-pawl', an independent country of Northern Hindostan, bounded N. by the great range of Himalaya Mountains, W. and S. by British India and Oude, and E. by Sikkim. Area, 54,500 square miles. Desc. The valley of Nepaul proper, whence the country takes its name, is nearly of an oval figure, and in the S. is called the "Serriani," and is covered with wood. On the N. and S. it is bounded by lofty mountains, but is more open to the E. and W. Pro. Wheat, maize, barley, rice, cotton, and sugar-cane. Minerals. The mountains of Nepaul contain mines of copper and iron. Exp. Ivory, wax, honey, resin, fruits, hides, borax, salt, ginger, timber, bastard cinnamon, cardamums, and walnuts. Imp. Muslins and silks of Bengal, carpets, spices, tobacco, and European goods. Pop. about 2,000,000. Lat. between 26° 25' and 30° 17' N. Lon. between 80° 15' and 88° 15' E.—In 1814, the Nepaulese were engaged in a war with the British, who, though they were repulsed at first, again invaded their territories, and dictated to them a treaty of peace in 1816. Since that time, all the country situate between the Kali and Sutlej rivers has been ceded to the British.

NEPEAN, ne-peen', a river of E. Australia, New South Wales, joining the Warragamba to form the Hawkesbury.

NEPHELE, nef'-e-le, the first wife of Athamas, king of Thebes, and mother of Phryxus and Helle, was repudiated on pretence of being subject to fits of insanity, and Athamas married Ino, the daughter of Cadmus. Ino became jealous of Nephele, because her children were to succeed to the throne by right of seniority, and she resolved to destroy them. Nephele was apprised of this, and removed her children beyond the power of Ino, by giving them a celebrated ram, on whose back they escaped to Colchis. Nephele was afterwards changed into a cloud; whence her name is given by the Greeks to the clouds.

NEPOS, Cornelius, ne'-pos, a Latin historian in the reign of Augustus, whose patronage he enjoyed. Of all his works, there remains only his "Lives of Illustrious Greek Generals." This work contains short biographies of twenty Greek and two Carthaginian generals; the best sketches being those of Alcibiades, Epaminondas, and Pomponius Atticus. He appears to have also written the lives of the Roman generals; but the work has been lost.

NEPOS, Flavius Julius, emperor of the West, was a native of Dalmatia, and having married a niece of Leo I., that monarch gave him the Western empire. Nepos marched to Rome to secure his throne, after which he fixed the seat of government at Ravenna, but was obliged to quit that city by his general Orestes. He then retired to Dalmatia, where he was assassinated by two officers of his court, in 480.

NEPTUNE, nep'-tune, god of the sea in the Grecian mythology, son of Saturn and Ops, and brother to Jupiter, Pluto, and Juno. He was devoured by his father upon the day of his birth, and again restored to life by means of Metis, who gave Saturn a certain potion. Neptune shared with his brothers the empire of Saturn, and received as his portion the kingdom of the sea. This did not seem equivalent to the empire of heaven and earth, which Jupiter had claimed; therefore he conspired to dethrone him. The conspiracy was discovered, and Jupiter condemned Neptune to build the walls of Troy. Neptune, as god of the sea, was entitled to more power than any of the other gods, except Jupiter. Not only were the ocean, rivers, and fountains subjected to him, but he could also cause earthquakes at his pleasure, and raise islands with a blow of his trident. The worship of Neptune was established in almost every part of the earth. He was generally represented sitting in a chariot made of a shell, and drawn by sea-horses or dolphins. Sometimes he is drawn by winged horses, and holds a trident in his hand, and stands up as his chariot flies over the surface of the sea. Homer represents him as issuing from the sea, and in three steps crossing the whole horizon. The ancients generally sacrified a bull and a horse on his altars.

NERBUDDA, ner-bud'-da, 'the bestower of pleasure,' a celebrated river of Hindostan, which has its source in the district of Omercuntuc, in the province of Gundwaneh. After passing through the provinces of Khandesh, Malwah, and Gujerat, it falls into the Gulf of Cambay, 28 miles from Baroach. Length, 800 miles.

NEREIDES, ne-re'-i-des, Nereids, nymphs of the sea, daughters of Nereus and Doris. They were fifty, according to the greater number of the mythologists.

They had altars chiefly on the coasts of the sea, where milk, oil, honey, and often the flesh of goats, were offered up. Their duty was to attend upon the more powerful deities of the sea, and to be subservient to the will of Neptune. They are represented as young and handsome virgins, sitting on dolphins, and holding Neptune's trident in their hand, or sometimes garlands of flowers.

NERI, nai'-re, Philip of, founder of the congregation of the order of the Oratory in Italy, which was sanctioned by Pope Gregory XIII. in 1575, and soon afterwards found members in France and other countries. Their engagements were to relieve poor strangers and pilgrims, to administer to the sick, and to visit prisoners. B. at Florence, 1515; D. 1595.

NERI, Pompeio, an eminent Italian political economist. He became professor of law at Pisa, and was employed in state affairs by the duke of Lorraine and the empress Maria Theresa. He founded the Academy of Botany at Florence. He wrote "Observations on the Ancient and Present State of the Tuscan Nobility," on the "Imposts of Milan," on the "Legal Value of Coin, and the difficulty of fixing and maintaining the same." B. at Florence, 1707; D. at the same city, 1776.

NERIAD, ne-ri-ad', a town of British India, in the presidency of Bombay, 28 miles from Cambay. Pop. 40,000.

NERO, Claudius Cæsar, ne'-ro, sixth Roman emperor, was the son of Caius Domitius and of Agrippina, daughter of Germanicus. He was adopted by Claudius in A.D. 50, and four years after succeeded him on the throne. The commencement of his reign was characterized by justice and clemency. He was liberal, affable, polished, complaisant, and his heart seemed to possess every excellent quality. But all this was mere exterior, and a mask, which hid the most depraved mind that ever disgraced a human being. He soon laid aside his artificial virtues, released himself from the control of his mother, whom he caused to be assassinated, and vindicated the unnatural act to the senate on a pretence that Agrippina had plotted against him. Many of the courtiers shared the same fate, and Rome was deluged with the blood of her best citizens. Nero plunged himself as deep in debauchery as in cruelty. He turned actor, pretended to excel in music, and even appeared as a competitor in wrestling at the Olympic games, where, though he was defeated, the assessors and spectators, out of flattery, adjudged him the victor. After putting to death his wife Octavia, he sacrificed his tutor Seneca, Lucan the poet, Petronius, and many other eminent persons. He also commenced a dreadful persecution of the Christians, and is stated by Suetonius and Dion to have caused Rome to be set on fire in several places, and during the conflagration to have beheld the scene from a high tower, where he amused himself by singing to his lyre. It is certain that he attributed the fire to the Christians, numbers of whom were torn to pieces by dogs, and burned during the night in the gardens of his palace. His cruelties, extravagance, and debauchery, at length roused the public resentment. Piso formed a conspiracy against the tyrant, but it was discovered and defeated. That of Galba, however, proved more successful, and Nero, being abandoned by his flatterers, was, at his own request, put to death by one of the officers of his court. B. at Antium, in Latium, A.D. 37; D. A.D. 68.

NERVA, Marcus Coccius, ner'-va, thirteenth Roman emperor, succeeded Domitian, A.D. 96. He became the favourite of the Romans by his mildness and generosity, but would not allow any statues to be erected to his honour. At the close of life, his soldiers mutinied against him; on which occasion he behaved with calmness and intrepidity. He then appointed Trajan his successor, amidst the acclamations of the people. He was the first Roman emperor of foreign extraction, his father being a native of Crete. B. at Narvia, Umbria, A.D. 27; D. A.D. 98.

NERVII, ner'vi-i, a warlike people of Belgic Gaul, who continually urged the neighbouring nations to cast off the yoke of the Romans. They attacked Julius Cæsar, and were totally defeated. Their country forms the modern province of Hainault.

NESS, LOCH, ness, a beautiful lake of Invernessshire, Scotland, forming a natural portion of the Caledonian Canal. Ext. 22 miles long, with an average breadth of 1½. It receives several rivers, and discharges its surplus waters into the Moray Firth, by the river Ness.

NESSELRODE, nes'-sel-rod, Charles Robert, Count von, a modern Russian diplomatist, whose ancestors, Hanoverian nobles, settled in Livonia about the latter end of the 17th century. After a short career in the army, he became attached to the diplomatic service, and was employed in a minor capacity at Berlin, the Hague, and other places. In 1807 he went to Paris, as ambassador from Russia; but on the accession of Alexander, he was appointed his secretary. In 1814 he accompanied Alexander to Paris, where he signed the famous treaty of the Quadruple alliance. He also acted as the plenipotentiary of Russia at the congress of Vienna, and went with his master to the congresses of Aix-la-Chapelle, Troppau, Laybach, and Verona. During the subsequent half-century, he continued to serve the successive sovereigns of Russia as minister of foreign affairs. B. at Lisbon, 1780.

NESSIR-KHAN, nes'-sir-kan, sovereign of Beloochistan, who accompanied Nadir-Shah into India, and signalized himself there by his bravery and wisdom. He dethroned and killed his brother Hadji Mahommed, khan of the Belooches, who had rendered himself odious to his subjects, re-established order in the country, encouraged trade and commerce, and caused himself to become so powerful as to proclaim the independence of his kingdom, which he extended by many conquests. D. 1795.

NESSUS, nes'-sus, a celebrated centaur, son of Ixion and the Cloud. He offered violence to Dejanira, whom Hercules had intrusted to his care, with orders to carry her across the river Evenus. Hercules saw the distress of his wife from the opposite shore of the river, and immediately discharged a poisoned arrow, which struck the centaur to the heart. Nessus, as he expired, gave his tunic to Dejanira, assuring her that it had the power of calling a husband away from unlawful loves. Dejanira received the present, which afterwards caused the death of Hercules. (See HERCULES.)

NESTOR, nes'-tor, son of Neleus and Chloris. His father and eleven brothers were killed by Hercules; but the conqueror spared Nestor's life and placed him upon the throne of Pylas. As king of Pylas and Messinia, he led his subjects to the Trojan war, where he distinguished himself among the rest of the Grecian chiefs by eloquence, wisdom, and justice. After the Trojan war he retired to Greece, where he enjoyed the peace and respect due to his old age and his surpassing prudence of mind. The ancients declare that he lived three generations of man.

NESTOR, the father of Russian history, was a monk at Kiev. His principal work is a Chronicle, which dates from the year 862 to 1116, and is the source of the history of the Sclaves. It was published at St. Petersburg in 1767, by order of Peter the Great. Flourished at the close of the 11th and beginning of the 12th centuries.

NESTORIUS, nes-tor'-i-us, a bishop of Constantinople, in the early part of the 5th century, under Theodosius II. He was a native of Syria, and was deposed from his bishopric for denying the doctrine of the incarnation, or the two natures of Christ. His opinions spread widely over the East, and still have followers in those parts.

NETHE, or NEETHE, neet, a river of Belgium, formed by the union of the Great and Little Nethe, which unite at Lierre, and join the Ruppel 3 miles from Boom.

NETHERLANDS, KINGDOM OF THE, or HOLLAND, neth'-er-lands (Dutch, NEDERLAND, nai'-der-lant), in the central part of Europe, is bounded W. and N. by the German Ocean, S. by Belgium, and E. by Hanover and the Prussian territories of the Lower Rhine. The country is composed of the Netherlands proper, or the ancient republic of the Seven United Provinces, and part of the duchy of Limburg. Provinces. North and South Holland, North Brabant, Gelderland, Friesland, Overyssel, part of Limburg, Luxembourg, Gröningen, Zealand, Utrecht, and Drenthe. Area, about 13,600 square miles. Desc. In the northern provinces, the face of the country presents one continued plain, intersected, in all directions, by an infinity of canals and ditches, exhibiting vast meadows of the freshest verdure, and covered with numerous herds of cattle. Sheets of water may be seen, sometimes flowing and sometimes stationary; and at intervals clusters of trees, with here and there some gentle elevations. The S. provinces exhibit a greater variety of woods, meadows, and corn-fields. The maritime provinces have been the scene of great physical revolutions. There seems little doubt that the northern provinces formed, at one time, part of the bed of the sea. To guard against the inundations of the ocean, from which they have suffered most terrible losses at various periods, the Dutch have endeavoured to secure their coasts by dykes, or mounds of earth, the erection of which has been justly considered one of the greatest efforts of human industry. The large rivers are bordered with similar dykes; and in particular situations, portions of the country have been redeemed from the sea, and rendered available to the necessities of man. The whole nature of the country is, perhaps, sufficiently defined by its names, the words Netherland and Holland signifying nothing more than nether or low land, and hollow land. Rivers. The principal are the Rhine, with its branches, the Maese and the Scheldt. These, and the multitude of canals with which the country is intersected, are of the greatest advantage in the prosecution of inland trade. On entering Holland, the Rhine has a breadth of 2,000 feet; but, almost immediately after, it divides into two streams, the N. retaining the name of Rhine, and the S., which is the true Rhine, is called the Whael till it is joined by the Maese, when it takes that name. The delta of the Rhine is the largest in Europe. Climate. Wet and foggy. In the maritime provinces this is especially the case; but in the interior it is less variable. To the moisture arising from a marshy situation is attributed the extreme cleanliness of Dutch houses, the furniture requiring frequent rubbing and scouring to preserve it from the effects of the damp. Pro. In this country, agriculture has long been ardently followed; and this, joined to its excellent soil, has rendered the Netherlands one of the most productive countries in Europe. The northern provinces do not produce much grain; but they have excellent pasturage. Here are fattened the lean cattle brought from Denmark and Germany, and here, also, are made butter and cheese of superior quality, and in vast quantities, for export to England and other countries. The other products, in both the northern and southern provinces, are rye, buckwheat, oats, barley, vegetables, potatoes, beetroot, rape-seed, chicory, hops, mustard, flax, hemp, tobacco, hops, madder, and fruit: a little wine is made in the south. Horticulture is generally pursued, and Haarlem exports tulips and other flower-roots. Rabbits and water-fowl are abundant; storks are also numerous, and the coasts abound in cod, turbot, soles, and other flat fish. Minerals. Potter's clay and bog-iron. Manf. The linen of Holland, the lace of Brussels, the leather of Liége, the woollens of Leyden and Utrecht, and the silks of Amsterdam and Antwerp, were known several centuries ago throughout Europe. These are still made, with velvets, silks, paper, cotton goods, hats, ribbons, saltpetre, cordage, and tobacco. The absence of coal, and the prevalence of strong winds, have suggested windmills to be used as a motive power; and these, in all kinds of work, are universally employed. Distilleries for the manufacture of "Hollands" are numerous; and there are extensive brick- and tile-works and bleach-fields. Education. Excellent and general. There are parish or primary schools; while boarding-schools and other seminaries are numerous. The universities are those of Leyden, Utrecht, and Gröningen. Internal Communication. Good, and much by canals: the roads, however, are excellent, and generally run along the tops of dykes, being paved with bricks set on their edges. On the sides of these public highways, trees are usually planted, and serve to relieve the monotonous appearance of the country. Gov. Limited monarchy; the constitution, in many respects, bearing a close resemblance to that of Great Britain. The possession of all executive power by the king, the inviolability of his person, the responsibility of his ministers, the appointment of a cabinet and privy council, but, above all, a double house of parliament, are striking features of resemblance. The chief distinction is in the existence of provincial states, or assemblies charged with a variety of important local duties; such as the care of the roads and bridges, of religious worship, of charitable institutions, of the execution of the laws, of the expenditure of the local magistrates, and, in particular, with the election of the members of the commons' house of parliament. The heir-apparent bears the old family title of prince of Orange. Army. About 60,000. Navy. About 90 vessels, carrying 2,000 guns; besides gunboats carrying, perhaps, 200 guns more. Rel. The established religion of the northern provinces is the Calvinist; but religious sects of every description are to be found. The Roman Catholics form about a third of the population, and are found principally in the S. Colonial Possessions. These lie in different parts of the world. 1. In Asia,—Java, with the lesser governments of Amboyna, Banda, Ternate, Malacca, and Macassar, as well as the factories in Coromandel and Persia. 2. In Africa, on the coast of Guinea. 3. In the West Indies,—the colony of Surinam on the mainland, and the islands of Curaçoa, St. Eustatius, and St. Martin. Pop. 3,500,000. Lat. between 49° 26′ and 53° 34′ N. Lon. between 3° 24′ and 7° 12′ E.—The name of the Netherlands was, for several centuries, applied to the countries now forming the kingdoms of Belgium, the Netherlands, and part of the north of France. It belonged almost entirely to Charles V., emperor of Germany and king of Spain, who, about the year 1530, constituted the United Provinces one of the ten circles of the empire, under the title of the Circle of Burgundy. This prince was the first who began to encroach upon their liberties, by introducing foreign forces, and putting foreigners into places of trust and profit in the administration. His son, Philip II., proceeded to deprive the states of the several provinces of their share in the government, and, endeavouring to render himself arbitrary, occasioned a general insurrection. The counts Hoorn and Egmont, and the prince of Orange, appearing at the head of it, and Luther's reformation gaining ground about the same time in the Netherlands, his disciples joined the malcontents; upon which Philip attempted to introduce a kind of inquisition, in order to suppress them. The counts Hoorn and Egmont were taken and beheaded; but the prince of Orange retired into Holland, and, with the assistance of England and France, preserved that, with some of the adjacent provinces, which, in 1579, entered into a treaty for their mutual defence, at Utrecht. They were then styled the United Provinces, and several of them were reduced to the obedience of Spain by the duke of Alva and other Spanish generals: their ancient privileges were, however, in a great measure restored; every province was allowed its great council or parliament, the concurrence of which was required to the making of laws and the raising of money for the government, though these assemblies were too often obliged to follow the dictates of the court. The Spaniards remained possessed of ten provinces, till the duke of Marlborough, general of the allies, gained the memorable victory of Ramilies, in 1706. After this, Brussels, the capital, and great part of these provinces, acknowledged Charles VI., afterwards emperor of Germany, for their sovereign; and his daughter, the empress-queen, remained possessed of them till the war of 1741, when the French made an entire conquest of them, except part of the province of Luxembourg. They were restored, however, by the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, in the year 1748, the French retaining only Artois, Cambresis, part of Hainault, and part of Luxembourg.—For an admirable review of these provinces, see Beeton's cheap edition of Motley's "History of the Rise of the Dutch Republic," a work of great ability.

NETTUNO, net-too'-no, a seaport-town of Central Italy, in the States of the Church, 30 miles from Rome. It has the ruins of a temple of Neptune. Pop. 3,000.

NEU-BRANDENBURG, bran'-den-boorg, a town of Mecklenburg-Strelitz, 18 miles from Neu-Strelitz. It has a ducal palace and several churches. Manf. Cottons, woollens, playing-cards, and tobacco. Pop. 7,000.

NEUBURG, noi'-boorg, once a duchy of the German empire, incorporated in the Bavarian circles of the Upper Danube and the Regen in 1808.

NEUBURG, a neatly-built town of Bavaria, on the Danube, 30 miles from Augsburg. Pop. 6,500.—Another town of Bavaria, 21 miles from Amberg.—Also a village of France, in Alsace.

NEUENBURG, noi'-en-boorg, the name of several towns in Germany, none of them with a population above 3,300.

NEUENBURG, noi'-en-boorg, Switzerland. (See NEUFCHATEL.)

NEUFCHATEL, NEUCHATEL, or NEUENBURG, nu(r)sh'-a-tel', a canton in the W. of Switzerland, bounded by the canton of Bern, the Lake of Neufchatel, the Pays de Vaud, and a part of the frontier of France. Area, 280 square miles. Desc. Mountainous, and the climate cold and disagreeable, the winter continuing during seven or eight months. The surface is mostly devoted to pasturage, and numerous vineyards skirt the shores of the lake. Pro. With the exception of wine, which is made in considerable quantities, there is no other produce of importance. Corn is imported, and there are not sufficient vegetables grown for native consumption. Cattle are reared, and cheese is made an export of consequence. Manf. Watches, cotton fabrics, hosiery, metallic wares, and cutlery. Pop. 72,000, nearly all Protestants.

NEUFCHATEL, the capital of the above canton, is situate in the midst of vineyards and gardens, near where the rivulet of Seyon falls into the Lake of Neufchatel, 25 miles from Bern. It is in general well built, and consists of four principal streets. The public buildings are, an old castle, the town-house, the principal church, and the hospital. Manf. Printed cottons and linens. Pop. 8,000.

NEUFCHATEL, LAKE OF, a considerable lake in the N.W. of Switzerland, separating the canton of that name from the canton of Friburg. Ext. About 24 miles long and 4 broad. Its greatest depth is about 400 feet. Area, 90 square miles. It receives several rivers, and discharges its surplus waters by the Thiel, through the Lake of Bienne, into the Aar.

NEUFCHATEL, a town of France, on the Bethune, 26 miles from Rouen. Pop. 2,900.

NEUHALDENSLEBEN. (See HALDENSLEBEN.)

NEUHAUS, noi'-hous, a well-built town of Bohemia, 68 miles from Prague. Pop. 8,000.—The name of several other towns in Germany.

NEUHAUSEL, noi'-hou-sel, a town of Hungary, 20 miles from Neutra. It has the ruins of a fortress. Manf. Woollens. Pop. 7,000.

NEUHAUSEN, noi'-hou-sen, the name of several market-towns and villages of Wurtemberg, none of them with a population above 2,300.

NEUHOF, noi'-hof, the name of several market-towns of Central and S. Germany, none of them with a population above 2,000.

NEUHOFF, Theodore von, noo'-hof, called at one time "King of Corsica." He was the son of Anthony, Baron von Neuhoff, who, marrying the daughter of a merchant, thereby incurred the displeasure of his relations, and was obliged to emigrate to France, where he entered the army. Theodore was for some time in the suite of Baron von Gortz, the Swedish minister; but, when that statesman was executed at Stockholm, he entered the Spanish service, and rose to the rank of colonel. He soon afterwards married one of the queen's maids of honour, by whom he had a son, who became known in England as Colonel Frederick. After deserting his wife, whose jewels he carried off, Theodore von Neuhoff went to Sweden, Holland, Italy, France, and England, travelling under different names and titles. In 1736 he engaged with several Corsican leaders, who promised to hail him king of Corsica, on the condition that he should procure aid for the islanders in their struggle against Genoa. Theodore thereupon set out for Tunis, whose Bey he induced to give him ten cannons, 4,000 muskets, munitions of war, food, and 10,000 gold sequins. Thus provided, he set out from Tunis with a suite of sixteen persons, and landed upon the east coast of Corsica. Shortly afterwards, the Corsicans elected him their king, and, during several months, he exercised regal power, created an order of knighthood, and put three persons to death. The state of Genoa, however, declared him and his followers traitors, and, in a short time, the Corsicans grew tired of their monarch. He thereupon quitted the island to seek succour, which he declared had been promised him, but first appointed deputies to manage affairs during his absence. He next travelled in Italy, France, and Holland. At Amsterdam he was imprisoned for debt, but found means to procure his release, as well as to fit out a frigate and three merchant vessels, with which he set sail for Corsica in 1738. The Genoese and French were now, however, almost masters of the island, and the "king" was afraid to disembark. Four years afterwards he again went to Corsica, but could not succeed in obtaining recognition from his former subjects. He subsequently repaired to London, where he was reduced to poverty, and became a prisoner in the King's Bench for debt. In 1756 Horace Walpole procured his release, Theodore registering his kingdom of Corsica for the benefit of his creditors. He died in London in a state bordering upon destitution, 1756. Horace Walpole wrote a singular epitaph for his tombstone, which was set up in St. Ann's, Soho. B. at Metz, about 1696.

NEUILLY-SUR-SEINE, nu(r)'-ye, a town of France, on the Seine, near the W. extremity of Paris. Manf. Porcelain, starch, chemicals; and there are liquor-distilleries. Pop. 16,000. In the revolution of 1848, the royal château of Neuilly, built in the reign of Louis XV., was destroyed.—The name of several other places in France, none of them with a population above 2,000.

NEUKIRCH, Benjamin, noi'-keerch, a German poet, who made a versified translation of Fenelon's "Telemachus," and produced several other works. B. in Silesia, 1665; D. at Anspach, 1759.

NEUKOMM, the Chevalier Sigismund, noi'-kom, a modern German musical composer, who was a relation of, and received his first instruction in music from, Michael Haydn, elder brother of the composer of "The Creation." After acquiring a high reputation in Germany and France, he visited England in 1829, and produced there his greatest works, the oratorios "David" and "Mount Sinai." His song of "The Sea" was at one time the most popular song of the day. In 1853, the Society for the Revival of Sacred Music in Scotland published "Twenty Psalms" composed by him, which are classed amongst the most simple and beautiful productions of their kind in existence. In 1851 he acted as one of the jury at the Great Exhibition. B. at Salzburg, 1778.

NEUMARK, noi'-mark, the name of several towns in Germany, none of them with a population above 2,000.

NEUMARKT, noi'-markt, the name of several towns in Germany, none of them with a population above 5,000.

NEUMARKT, a town of Transylvania, on the Maros, 76 miles from Kronstadt. It has a strong castle and a Protestant college, with a cabinet of natural history. Pop. 3,000.

NEUVILLE, nu(r)'-veel, the name of several parishes and towns in France, none of them with a population above 2,300.

NEUVY, nu(r)'-ve, the name of numerous parishes and towns in France, none of them with a population above 2,200.

NEUWIED, noi'-veed, a town of Prussia, in the province of the Lower Rhine, on the Rhine, 8 miles from Coblentz. Its principal buildings are an ancient castle of the county of Wied, with a museum of natural history, library, churches for various religious denominations, a gymnasium, and educational establishments. Manf. Cotton and wool, hardware, linen, and soap. Pop. 6,500.

NEVA, nai'-va, a large river or strait of Russia, connecting Lake Ladoga with the Gulf of Finland. The city of St. Petersburg stands at one end of it, and Schlusselberg at the other. It is the great medium of communication between the internal parts of N. Russia and the sea.

NEVADA, or SIERRA NEVADA, ne-va'-da, 'snowy mountain,' the most elevated mountain-chain in the Spanish peninsula. It runs through the whole kingdom of Granada, and is at its base covered with groves of oranges, chestnuts, and olives. The culminating peaks are Mulhacar and Veleta, respectively 11,678 and 11,387 feet high. The line of perpetual snow begins at 9,500 feet.

NEVERI, nev'-e-re, a river of the province of Cumana, S. America, entering the sea between the cities of Barcelona and Cumana.

NEVERS, ne-vair', a city of France, in the department of the Nievre, on the Loire, 35 miles from Bourges. The streets are narrow and winding, and the cavalry barracks is the only public edifice worth notice. The Loire is here crossed by a fine bridge of twenty arches. Manf. Plate, hardware, earthenware, and enamel. In its neighbourhood are the forges of Fourchambault, the copper-works of Imphy, and the foundry of La Choussade, where cables and anchors are made for the imperial marine. Pop. 17,100.—It stands at the head of the branch railway du Centre.

NEVERS, Philip-Julien Mancini-Mazarin, Duke de, nev'-air, was the nephew of the Cardinal Mazarin. He distinguished himself as the patron of Pradon against Racine, which produced sharp controversies among the wits. The duke wrote some sonnets on that occasion, and other poems of little merit. B. at Rome, 1641; D. at Paris, 1707.

NEVIS, or NIEVIS, ne'-vis, an island of the West Indies, belonging to Great Britain, separated from the S. end of St. Christopher by a channel 2 miles across. Area, 20 square miles. Desc. It is little more than a single mountain, well watered, and, in general, fertile at its base. It contains one town, Charlestown, which is fortified. Pop. 10,000. Lat. 17° 14′ N. Lon. 62° 35′ W.

NEW ALBANY, awl'-ba-ne, a city of Indiana, U.S., on the Ohio, 105 miles from Indianapolis. It has numerous churches, a theological college, and an engine-factory. Pop. 10,000.—It communicates with Crawfordsville by railway.

NEWARK, nu'-ark, a market and borough town of Nottinghamshire, on the Newark river, a branch of the Trent, 17 miles from Nottingham. It is handsome and well built. The public buildings are, the castle, which was called the New Work, and gave name to the town, and was built in the reign of King Stephen, by the bishop of Lincoln. It is now in a ruinous state. The church is a very elegant building, of the age of Henry VI.: the tower is light, and supports a lofty stone spire. In the market-place stands the town-hall, an elegant building of stone. The workhouse is one of the best in the kingdom. Newark was formerly a noted stage on the road from York to London. Manf Linen sheetings, tiles; and there are metal-foundries. It has also a good trade in corn, coal, cattle, wool, and other commodities. The corn-market is the largest in that part of the kingdom, and the business of malting is carried on to a considerable extent. Pop. of borough, 11,500.

NEWARK, a city of the United States, New Jersey, on the Passiac river, 10 miles from New York. It has numerous churches and a court-house. It is the seat of a whale-fishing company. Pop. 40,000.

NEWBERRY, nu'-ber-e, a district of the United States, in South Carolina. Area, 620 square miles. Pop. about 24,000, of whom half are slaves.

NEWBOLD, nu'-bold, the name of several parishes and villages of England, none of them with a population above 1,500.

NEW BRITAIN, an archipelago in the Pacific Ocean, consisting principally of two populous islands, discovered in 1699 by Dampier. Lat. between 4° and 6° 30′ S. Lon. between 149° and 152° E.

NEWBURGH, nu'-bru(r), a parish and seaport-town of Scotland, in Fifeshire, 10 miles from Perth. Pop. 2,700.—It is a station on the Edinburgh and Perth Railway, and steamboats ply from it daily to Dundee and Perth.

NEWBURY, nu'-ber-e, a market and borough town of Berkshire, on the Kennet, which runs through the centre of the town, 17 miles from Reading. The streets are spacious, well paved, and the houses built mostly of brick. There are, besides the parish church, various chapels, a market-place, town-hall, and numerous endowed hospitals for the poor. Manf. Woollen goods, which have greatly declined. It still makes serges, shalloons, and ribbons; but the chief trade of the town consists in malting and flour-making. Pop. 7,000.—To the north of this place is Donnington Castle, where the poet Chaucer died in 1400. In 1643 and 1644 two severe actions took place here between the royalists and the parliamentarians. It is a station on the Hungerford branch of the Great-Western Railway.

NEWBURY, the name of several townships in the United States, none of them with a population above 3,000.

NEWBURYPORT, nu'-bre-port, a post-township of Essex county, Massachusetts, U.S., 38 miles from Boston. It has a court-house, custom-house, and gaol. Pop. 13,500, greatly employed in fisheries.

NEW CALEDONIA. (See CALEDONIA, NEW.)

NEWCASTLE, nu-kas'-el, a county of Delaware, U.S. Area, 925 square miles. Pop. 45,000.

NEWCASTLE, a town of British North America, in Upper Canada, 85 miles from Toronto. It is the capital of a DISTRICT, which comprises nearly all the basin of the Trent, and which has a population of about 50,000.

NEWCASTLE, a borough of New South Wales, E. Australia, 70 miles from Sydney. It has valuable coal seams in its neighbourhood.

NEWCASTLE-UPON-TYNE, a river-port and the capital of Northumberland, on the N. bank of the river Tyne, about 10 miles from its mouth, and 52 miles from Carlisle. It extends along the banks of the river, gradually ascending an acclivity towards the north and north-west from the river, until it crowns the summit. The old streets near the river are narrow, irregular, and steep, and the buildings on the slope of the hill much crowded together; but, with its progress in wealth and importance, several of the streets have been widened, and a great number erected, especially in the north and west quarters of the town. These newer quarters are judiciously laid out, and in a superior style of architecture. The principal public buildings are St. Nicholas's church, remarkable for its spire of admirable symmetry, which, in the form of an imperial crown, rises conspicuous above all the other buildings in Newcastle (this church is supposed to have been erected in 1359); the churches of All Saints, St. Andrew's, and St. John's. Besides these, there are numerous other places of public worship for various denominations. The other public buildings are the Mansion-house, the Trinity-house, the Exchange, with three Corinthian fronts. The Moot Hall, or assize-court, belonging to the county of Northumberland, is built in the style of the temple of Theseus, at Athens; and at the head of Grey Street there is a lofty column, supporting a statue of Earl Gray, by Bailey. A new bridge over the Tyne was finished in 1781, in place of the old bridge, which was carried away by an extraordinary flood, in 1770. There is also a viaduct across the Tyne, connecting the North British and Newcastle railways. To the S. and to the E. of the Exchange is the quay, which is one of the largest and longest in any part of Great Britain. The Assembly-rooms were erected in 1766, and are both elegant and commodious. The theatre is a handsome building, and on the outside of the west gate are the public baths, appropriately fitted up with hot, vapour, and tepid baths, &c. The butcher-market occupies nearly three acres, and is one of the handsomest in the kingdom. The remains of the ancient castle stand on an eminence, overlooking the whole town. This fortress was founded by Robert of Normandy, and some of its towers are employed for the halls of corporate trades. The great tower is about 80 feet high, 62 feet by 54 on the outside, and its walls 14 feet thick. The charitable institutions are the infirmary, the dispensary, a fever hospital, lunatic asylum, for the counties of Durham and Northumberland; and various hospitals. Newcastle is well supplied with the means of education, besides being the seat of a literary and philosophical society, a society of antiquaries, and several other learned institutions. It is noted for its collieries, which principally lie along the Tyne, both above and below the town. From this magazine, the vast consumption of London, the whole of the eastern, and most of the southern coasts of the island, and the opposite coasts of France, Holland, and Germany, have for centuries been supplied. The foreign trade consists chiefly in the importation of wines and fruits from the south of Europe; and of corn, timber, iron, hemp, and other commodities, from the Baltic and Norway. The principal exports, besides coals and lead, are grindstones, salt, butter, tallow, and salmon from the fisheries; several ships are also sent to the Greenland fishery. Manf. Pottery, glass, chemicals, iron, tin, and every kind of metal goods. Machinery is also made, and there are rope-walks, breweries, and distilleries. Shipbuilding is also carried on to a great extent. Pop. about 90,000.—Newcastle was made a borough by William the Conqueror, and is a place of great antiquity, and of considerable note in history: it was a military station among the Romans. The present name is derived from a new castle, which was built on the site of an old fortress, in 1080. It is the birthplace of Akenside the poet, Admiral Lord Collingwood, and Lord-Chancellor Eldon.—A station on the Great Northumberland Railway.

NEWCASTLE, or NEWCASTLE-UNDER-LYNE, a market-town of Staffordshire, in the centre of the district of the Potteries, 15 miles from Stafford. It stands on the E. bank of the river Lyne, a branch of the Trent. The houses are neat and well arranged. There are two churches, a Roman Catholic chapel, a grammar-school, numerous charities, a guildhall, market-house, public library, theatre, literary institution, and union workhouse. Manf. Hats, and silk and cotton goods. Around the town, the villages, to a considerable distance, are entirely occupied with the manufacture of porcelain, earthenware, and stoneware. Pop. 11,000. A branch canal connects this place with the Grand Trunk Navigation.

NEWCASTLE, the name of several places in Wales, none of them with a population above 3,500.

NEWCASTLE, the name of several parishes in Ireland, none of them with a population above 6,000.—Also of two towns, neither with a population above 3,000.

NEWCASTLE, Duke and Duchess of. (See CAVENDISH, Margaret.)

NEWCASTLE, Henry Pelham Clinton, Duke of, a modern British statesman. He was the eldest son of the fourth duke of Newcastle, and after completing his education at the university of Oxford, was chosen as the parliamentary representative of the southern division of Nottinghamshire in 1832. In 1834 he became a lord of the Treasury, and retained the appointment until April of the succeeding year. Between the years 1841—1846 he acted as chief commissioner of Woods and Forests, which post he vacated to assume the functions of chief secretary for Ireland. He lost his seat in the last-named year, for supporting Sir Robert Peel in the repeal of the corn laws. He was, however, returned shortly afterwards by the Falkirk burghs, and remained in the House of Commons until 1851, at which time he succeeded to the dukedom of Newcastle, upon the death of his father. He became secretary of state for the Colonies in 1852, in the Aberdeen administration. Upon the separation of the War business from that of the Colonies, with which it had hitherto been joined, the duke accepted the duties of the former department; but the mismanagement of the army during the first winter in the Crimea, led to his incurring the odium of the nation, before which he was compelled to resign office. Lord Panmure, his successor, stated, however, that the after and more successful arrangements, emanating from the War-office, were inaugurated by the duke himself. In 1859 he was appointed secretary for the Colonies, and in 1860 he accompanied the prince of Wales in his travels in Canada and the United States, acquiring, by his judicious and affable bearing, great esteem, both in Canada and in the United States. B. in London, 1811.

NEWCHURCH, the name of several parishes and places in England. The largest is in the Isle of Wight, with a population of about 12,000.

NEWCHURCH, a chapelry of Lancashire, 6 miles from Burnley. Manf. Cotton and woollen goods. Pop. 17,000.

NEWCOME, William, nu'-kom, a learned English divine, who became successively bishop of Ossory and Waterford, and archbishop of Armagh. He published "The Harmony of the Gospels," "Letter to Dr. Priestley on the Duration of Our Lord's Ministry," "Observations on Our Lord's Conduct," an improved version of the twelve Minor Prophets, another of Ezekiel, a "Review of the Chief Difficulties in the Gospel History relating to Our Lord's Resurrection," and other important works. B. in Berkshire, 1729; D. 1800.

NEWCOMEN, Thomas, nu'-ko-men, a locksmith of Dartmouth, who, about 1695, invented the engine which is called after his name, and which was the first in which steam was employed as a motive power. That engine was afterwards perfected by Watt. (See WATT.)

NEW-CROSS, a hamlet in Kent and Surrey, 3 miles S. of London, with an important station on the London and Brighton Railway.

NEW ENGLAND, a portion of the N. American continent, forming the N.E. part of the United States; comprising the states of Vermont, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, including the district of Maine, Rhode Island, and Connecticut.

NEW ENGLAND, a squatting district of New South Wales. Pop. about 6,000.

NEW FIELD, the name of several townships in the United States, none of them with a population above 4,000.

NEW FOREST, an extensive wooded tract in Hampshire. It has a circumference of about 50 miles, and abounds in game, red deer, and hogs. It supplies excellent timber for the navy. Here, in 1087, William Rufus fell.

NEWFOUNDLAND, nu'-fund-land', or nu-found'-land, an island on the E. side of the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and one of the British colonies of N. America. It is separated from the coast of Labrador on the N. by the Strait of Belleisle, which is about 12 miles wide. Area. Estimated at 36,000 square miles. Desc. The country is very unequal, covered with hills and mountains, everywhere overgrown with pines, so as to be practicable only in those parts where the inhabitants have cut roads. In winter the cold is excessive, nothing but snow and ice being seen, and the bays and harbours entirely frozen. The whole circuit of the island is full of bays and harbours, so spacious and sheltered on all sides by the mountains, except their entrance, that vessels lie in perfect security. Rivers. The Shumber, and the River of Exploits. Pro. The soil being ill-adapted to agricultural purposes, kitchen vegetables are the principal crops. Timber is scarce, and the chief resources of the population are in the cod, seal, and salmon fisheries. The plains abound with large herds of the Carabou deer, which with dogs, bears, foxes, wolves, and beavers, form the prevailing animals. Pop. about 100,000. Lat. between 46° 40′ and 51° 37′ N. Lon. between 52° 25′ and 59° 15′ W. This island, after various disputes about the property, was entirely ceded to England by the treaty of Utrecht, in 1713. The Great Bank of Newfoundland, which may properly be deemed a vast mountain under water, is not less than 330 miles in length, and about 75 in breadth. It is frequented by vast shoals of small fish, most of which serve as food to the cod, that are inconceivably numerous and voracious.

NEW GRANADA. (See GRANADA, NEW.)

NEW HAMPSHIRE. (See HAMPSHIRE, NEW.)

NEW HANOVER, hăn'-o-ver, a county of N. Carolina, U.S. Area, 995 square miles. Pop. 18,000.—Also the name of several townships, none of them with a population above 3,000.

NEW HANOVER, a region forming the coast-line of British N. America, along the Pacific Ocean. It is bounded on the N. by Russian America, and on the S. by Vancouver's Island and Queen Charlotte's Sound. Lat. between 50° and 54° N.—Also an island in the Pacific. Lat. 23° S. Lon. 150° E.

NEWHAVEN, nu-hai'-ven, a fishing-village of Scotland, 1 mile from Leith, and connected with Edinburgh by the Northern Railway. There is both a stone pier and a chain pier. Pop. 2,300.

NEWHAVEN, a village and seaport of Sussex, at the mouth of the Ouse, 4 miles from Lewes. Pop. 1,400.—It has a station on a branch of the South-Coast Railway, and has steam communication with Dieppe, in France.

NEWHAVEN, a maritime city of Newhaven county, Connecticut, U.S., round the head of a bay about 4 miles N. from Long-Island Sound, 35 miles from Hartford. It is divided into two parts, called the Old and New townships. The old town is laid out in a large square, divided into nine smaller squares. The central square is open, and is said to be one of the handsomest in the United States: in and around it are the state-house, college edifices, and several elegant churches. Besides these buildings, the town contains a gaol, almshouse, custom-house, two banks, three insurance offices, a grammar-school, an academy, Yale College, the finest mineralogical cabinet in the United States, an anatomical museum, state hospital, and benevolent institutions. The harbour is well defended from winds, and is furnished with excellent wharfs. Manf. Woollens, leather, rope, and machinery. Pop. 25,000. Lat. 41° 18′ 5″ N. Lon. 72° 56′ 5″ W.—Also the name of several townships in the United States, none of them with a population above 2,300.

NEW HOLLAND. (See AUSTRALIA.)

NEWINGTON, nu'-ing-ton, the name of several parishes in England, none of them with a population above 500.

NEW JERSEY. (See JERSEY, NEW.)

NEWMAN, Rev. John Henry, nu'-man, a modern English divine, who was educated at the university of Oxford, where, in 1822, he was elected fellow of Oriel College, and subsequently became vice-principal of Alban Hall. In 1833 he assumed a leading position in what was then termed "the Oxford movement;" and, in conjunction with Messrs. Pusey, Kebls, and others, commenced the publication of the "Oxford Tracts," which so deeply affected the theological world, and in which an attempt was made to recede from the principles of English Reformation, and to approach the doctrines of the Roman Catholic church. The last and 90th number was written by Dr. Newman himself; and after its publication, the bishop of Oxford was called upon to put an end to the series. In 1845, Dr. Newman entered the communion of the Roman Catholic church, and, in 1852, became rector of the new university established by that religious body in Dublin. He subsequently resigned that office, and retired to the continent, where he occasionally preached in the cathedrals. B. in London, 1801.

NEWMAN, Francis William, a modern English writer, brother of the preceding, like whom, he seceded from the Church of England, but upon totally opposite principles. It would be difficult to exactly define the peculiar theological views of Mr. Newman; but, by certain individuals, the term "sceptical" has been applied to them. After completing his education at Worcester College, Oxford, he was chosen fellow of Balliol in 1826, but resigned the office in 1830. During the three succeeding years, he travelled in the East, and, in 1834, became classical tutor in Bristol College, which he vacated in 1840, to assume the professorship of classics at Manchester New College. In 1846 he was nominated professor of the Latin language and literature in University College, London. As a philologist, he ranks as a highly accomplished and acute writer. In this department of knowledge, his most important works have been "A Grammar of the Berber Language," "The Odes of Horace, translated into unrhymed metres," and the "Iliad" of Homer. His peculiar political and theological opinions have been expressed in his "Lectures on Political Economy," "The Crimes of the House of Hapsburg against its own Liege Subjects," "The Soul; its Sorrows and its Aspirations," "Phases of Faith," and a "History of the Hebrew Monarchy, from the Administration of Samuel to the Babylonish Captivity." He has likewise contributed a number of political and other articles to the Eclectic, Prospective, and Westminster reviews. Some elementary works have also emanated from him; such as "Difficulties of Elementary Geometry," "An Introduction to Roman History," &c. B. in London, 1805.

NEWMARKET, nu-mar'-ket, a market-town of England, partly in the county of Cambridge, but principally in that of Suffolk, 12 miles from Cambridge. The town is well built, and chiefly depends upon its race-ground for its support. This course is formed out of an extensive heath, and is one of the finest in the kingdom. Pop. about 3,500, one half of whom are trainers, jockeys, grooms, and stable-keepers. It communicates with Cambridge by the Eastern Counties Railway. The course is upwards of 4 miles in length, and belongs to the Jockey Club.

NEWMILLS, nu'-mils, a village of Scotland, in Fifeshire, on the verge of the county, 2 miles from Culross. Pop. 500.

NEWNHAM, nune'-ham, the name of several parishes in England, none of them with a population above 1,500.

NEW ORLEANS. (See ORLEANS, NEW.)

NEWPORT, nu'-port, a market-town of the Isle of Wight, of which it is the metropolis, 16 miles from Southampton. It stands on the banks of the navigable river Medina. The houses are mostly of brick, and some of them are handsome. In the centre of one of the squares stands the church, in which Elizabeth, daughter of Charles I., was buried. After the execution of her father, she died a prisoner in Carisbrook Castle. It has, besides, a town-hall, assembly-rooms, theatre, a free grammar-school, founded by James I., and within which the treaty of Newport was concluded; an ancient guildhall, market-house, public library, literary institutes, and, in the neighbourhood, a national model prison and large house of industry. Manf. Lace. Pop. 4,000.

NEWPORT, a market-town of Monmouthshire, on the Usk, over which is a handsome bridge, 2½ miles from Monmouth. It has a parish church, several chapels, and schools. It has shipbuilding-yards and iron-foundries. Pop. 20,000.—It has a station on the Monmouth and Cardiff Railway.

NEWPORT, a market-town of Salop, on the Strine, 16 miles from Shrewsbury. It has a free school and almshouses. In the vicinity are coal- and iron-mines. Pop. 3,000.

NEWPORT, a market-town and port of Wales, Pembrokeshire, on the Nevern, 6 miles from Fishguard. It has the ruins of a castle, and a trade in agricultural produce, slates, coal, and timber. Pop. 2,000.

NEWPORT, the name of several towns and townships of the United States, none of them with a population above 10,000.—The largest is in Rhode Island, with a good harbour, defended by three forts.

NEWPORT, George, a modern English comparative anatomist and physiologist, whose earliest efforts at acquiring scientific knowledge were made under the most disadvantageous circumstances. He was at length enabled to become apprentice to a surgeon at Sandwich, in Kent, and subsequently concluded his medical education at the University of London. At a later period he produced a number of valuable memoirs, chiefly upon the insect tribes, which were read before the Royal Society, and published in the "Philosophical Transactions." In 1844 he was elected president of the Entomological Society. He was twice awarded the medal of the Royal Society, and was fellow of the Linnæan and Royal societies. His researches upon the respiration, temperature, and the structure of the blood-globules in insects are of the highest value. B. in Kent, 1803; D. 1854.

NEWPORT PAGNELL, a market-town of Buckinghamshire, on the Ouse, at its junction with the Louvet, which divides the town into two unequal parts, 4 miles from Wolverton. It has an ancient and spacious church, and several other places of public worship. Manf. Lace. Pop. 4,000.

NEWRY, nu'-re, a seaport in the county of Down, Ireland, on the Newry Water, 34 miles from Belfast. The town spreads along the side of a steep hill, and was formerly a pass and military post of considerable importance, as well as the seat of an abbey, of which the possessions were very important. Below it lies the river, over which are two handsome stone bridges, one of six arches. It has churches and chapels, a preparatory seminary for Maynooth College, a convent, assembly-rooms, barracks, two gaols, a custom-house, court-house, and market-house. It has a trade in linen, grain, provisions, cattle, eggs, and butter. Pop. 25,000.—It has a station on the Dublin and Belfast Junction Railway.

NEW SIBERIA, a group of islands in the Arctic Ocean. Lat. between 73° 12′ and 76° 20′ N. Lon. between 135° 20′ and 150° 20′ E.

NEW SOUTH SHETLAND, an archipelago and portion of mainland in the Pacific Ocean. Lat. extending from 61° to 64° 30′ S. Lon. 53° W., and 600 miles S. of Tierra del Fuego.

NEW SOUTH WALES, a colonial territory belonging to Great Britain, comprising, in its widest sense, all the E. part of the Australian continent S. of lat. 26° S., and E. of lon. 141° E. In a more restricted sense, it is limited to the country eastward, bordering on the Pacific Ocean, between lat. 30° and 37° 3′ S., and extending westward from lon. 153° E. to the boundary of the colony of S. Australia, exclusive of Victoria. Area. The settled portions are about 54,000 square miles. Desc. The Blue Mountains traverse the colony from N. to S., with an average elevation of from 3,000 to 4,000 feet above the level of the sea; otherwise, the general aspect of the country is pleasing, diversified with gentle risings and small winding valleys, covered, for the most part, with large spreading trees, affording a succession of leaves in all seasons; and a variety of flowering shrubs, of exquisite fragrance, abound in those places which are free from trees. Many of the plants have been imported into Britain, and are now flourishing, not only in the royal garden at Kew, but in many private collections. Climate. Rather hot, but equable, the heat never being excessive in summer, nor the cold intolerable in winter. Storms of thunder and lightning are frequent; but these are common to all warm countries. Zoology. The quadrupeds are principally of the opossum kind, of which the most remarkable is the kangaroo. There is also a species of dogs, which are extremely fierce, and can never be brought to the same degree of familiarity as those we are acquainted with. Some of them have been brought to England, but still retain their native ferocity. There are many beautiful birds of various kinds; among which, the principal is a black swan, its wings edged with white, its bill tinged with red; and the ostrich or cassowary, which frequently reaches the height of seven feet or more. Several kinds of serpents, large spiders, and scolopendras, have also been met with; and three or four species of ants, particularly green ants, which build their nests upon trees, in a very singular manner. There are likewise many curious fishes, though the finny tribe seem not to be so plentiful here as they generally are in higher latitudes. Pro. Wheat, maize, barley, oats, and potatoes are the principal crops; tobacco is grown, and in some districts the vine has been introduced with success. Sheep-farming is the principal branch of husbandry, and horned cattle and horses are abundant. Wool is the great article of export, and the whale-fisheries have some importance. Minerals. Coal. Manf. Unimportant. Pop. 220,000. This country was first explored by Captain Cook, in 1770; and a design was formed, in consequence of his recommendation, to settle a colony of convicts in Botany Bay. Captain Phillip being appointed governor of the intended settlement, as well as commodore on the voyage, sailed from Portsmouth in May, 1787, with a detachment of marines and 778 convicts, of which 220 were women. He arrived at Botany Bay in January, 1788; but finding this place very ineligible for a colony, he fixed upon Port Jackson, about 10 miles N. of Cape Banks; and here a settlement was begun, which he named Sydney Cove. (See AUSTRALIA, SYDNEY, and VICTORIA.)

NEWSTEAD, nu'-sted, a township of the United States, 20 miles from Buffalo. Pop. 3,000.

NEWSTEAD ABBEY, celebrated as being the former seat of Lord Byron, the poet, is in Nottinghamshire, not far from Hucknall, where is the family vault of the Byrons. It was founded by Henry II., shortly after the murder of Thomas à Becket; and the poet, in his "Elegy on Newstead Abbey," says it is the cloistered tomb of warriors, monks, and dames,—

"Whose pensive shades around its ruins glide."

NEWTON, nu'-ton, several places in Scotland, none of them with a population above 2,000.

NEWTON, the name of numerous parishes in England and Wales, with a population ranging between 200 and 12,000, the largest being in Lancashire, 3 miles from Manchester.

NEWTON, the name of various townships in the United States, none of them with a population above 6,000.

NEWTON, a county of Georgia, U.S. Area, 414 square miles. Pop. 14,000.

NEWTON, Sir Isaac, the greatest of English philosophers, was descended from an ancient family in Lincolnshire. Losing his father in his childhood, his care devolved on his mother, who gave him an excellent education, though she married a second time. In 1654 he was sent to Grantham school, where, says Brewster, in his life of the philosopher, he made little progress, until one day "the boy who was above him having given him a severe kick in the stomach, from which he suffered great pain, he laboured incessantly till he got above him in the school; and from that time continued to rise until he was the head boy." At the age of 18 he removed to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he had the learned Mr. (afterwards Dr.) Isaac Barrow for his tutor. Under that able mathematician, Newton made rapid progress. After going through Euclid's Elements, the most difficult problems in which were very easy and familiar to him, he proceeded to the study of Descartes' Geometry, with Oughtred's Clavis, and Kepler's Optics, in all of which he made marginal notes as he went along; and this always continued to be his method of study. It was in this early course that he invented the method of series and fluxions which he afterwards brought to perfection, though his claim to the discovery was unjustly contested by Leibnitz, who obtained a knowledge of it in 1676 from the author himself. At the age of 22, Mr. Newton took his degree of bachelor of arts; and, about the same time, he applied to the grinding of optic-glasses for telescopes; and, having procured a glass prism in order to try the phenomena of colours lately discovered by Grimaldi, the result of his observations was his new theory of light and colours. On the breaking out of the plague in 1665, he retired to Woolsthorpe, his native place, where, secluded from conversation and books, his active and penetrating mind conceived that hint which gave rise to his celebrated system of the universe. He was sitting alone in his garden, when some apples falling from a tree led his thoughts to the subject of gravity; and, reflecting on the power of that principle, he began to consider that, as it is not diminished at the remotest distance from the centre of the earth, it may be extended as far as the moon, and to all the planetary bodies. This subject he afterwards resumed on the occasion of the great comet in 1680; and in 1686 the important principle which forms the foundation of the Newtonian philosophy was first published, under the title of "Philosophiæ Naturalis Principia Mathematica." On the author's return to the university in 1667, he was chosen fellow of his college, and took his degree of master of arts. Two years afterwards he succeeded Dr. Barrow in the mathematical professorship, on which occasion he read a course of optical lectures in Latin. These he had not finished in 1671, when he was chosen fellow of the Royal Society, to which learned body he communicated his theory of light and colours, which was followed by his account of a new telescope invented by him, and other interesting papers. The second telescope made "with his own hands" is still preserved in the library of the Royal Society. When the privileges of the University of Cambridge were attacked by James II.,

SIR ISAAC NEWTON.

Newton was appointed to appear as one of her delegates in the High Commission court, where he pleaded with so much ability, that the king thought proper to stop his proceedings. He was next chosen to represent his university in parliament, in which he sat till it was dissolved, in 1699. In 1695 he was made warden of the Mint, and afterwards master of that office; which place he discharged with the greatest honour till his death. On his last promotion, he nominated Mr. Whiston to fill his chair at Cambridge, with all the profits of the place, and resigned it entirely to him in 1703. The same year he was chosen president of the Royal Society, which office he retained during twenty-five years. He was also a member of the Academy of Sciences at Paris, having been chosen in 1699. In 1704 he published his treatise of the "Reflections, Refractions, Inflections, and Colours of Light," which was afterwards translated into several languages, and went through many editions. The next year, Queen Anne conferred on him the honour of knighthood. In the succeeding reign, he was very often at court, and the princess of Wales, afterwards Queen Caroline, frequently conversed with him on philosophical subjects. About 1718 he communicated to her royal highness the outlines of his treatise on Ancient Chronology, with which she was so pleased, that she never would part with it. A surreptitious copy of it was, however, obtained and carried to France by the Abbé Conti, who translated and printed it, with observations. On this, Sir Isaac published a paper on the subject in the "Philosophical Transactions," and the work at length in English, in 4to. After enjoying an uncommon share of health, owing to his activity and temperance, till he was fourscore years old, this great man began to be afflicted with a disorder of the bladder. The last twenty days of his life were attended with much pain; yet, amidst the severest agonies, he never cried out, or expressed the slightest impatience. After his death, he lay in state in the Jerusalem Chamber, and was interred in Westminster Abbey, the lord chancellor, the dukes of Montrose and Roxburgh, and three earls, bearing the pall. A stately monument was erected over his remains, at the entrance to the choir. Sir Isaac was of a middling stature, and his countenance was pleasing and venerable. He was of a very meek disposition, and a great lover of peace: to his other great qualities, he added a serious and devout reverence of religion. His favourite study was the Bible, the prophecies of which he illustrated by his researches. He conformed to the church of England, but he lived in friendship with good men of all communions, and he was an enemy to every kind of persecution. Sir Isaac had a great abhorrence of infidelity, and never failed to reprove those who made free with revelation in his presence; of which the following is an instance. The learned Dr. Halley was sceptically inclined, and sometimes took the liberty of sporting with the Scriptures. On one such occasion, Sir Isaac said to him, "Dr. Halley, I am always glad to hear you when you speak about astronomy, or other parts of mathematics, because that is a subject which you have studied, and well understand; but you should not talk of Christianity, for you have not studied it: I have, and know you know nothing of the matter." Sir Isaac was never married, and, perhaps, had never time to think of it, being constantly immersed in the profoundest studies, and not being willing to have them broken by domestic concerns. Dr. Pemberton states of him, "that neither his age nor his universal reputation had rendered him stiff in opinion or in any degree elated;" and, shortly before his death, the great philosopher spoke of his sublime efforts in the following humble manner:—"I know not what I may appear to the world; but, to myself, I seem to have been only like a boy playing on the seashore, and diverting myself in now and then finding a smoother pebble, or a prettier shell, than ordinary, whilst the great ocean of truth lay all undiscovered before me." Upon the mantelpiece of the room in which Newton was born, at Woolsthorpe, is placed a marble tablet commemorative of the fact; beneath which are Popes line's:—

"Nature and nature's laws lay hid in night:
God said, 'Let Newton be!' and all was light."

An English translation of the "Principia" was made by Motte, and published in 1729. For a full account of the philosopher's works, see Sir David Brewster's "Memoirs of the Life, Writings, and Discoveries of Sir Isaac Newton," published in 1855. B. at Woolsthorpe, near Grantham, 1642; D. at Kensington, 1727.

NEWTON, Gilbert Stuart, a modern English painter and Royal Academician. His works are full of the grace and freshness of Watteau, but have an energy and expressiveness entirely his own. In 1826 he produced "The Lovers' Quarrel," which at once brought him reputation. In the following year he painted "The Prince of Spain's Visit to Catalina," for which the duke of Bedford paid him 500 guineas. In 1833, his last picture, "Abelard," was exhibited in the Royal Academy, and in the same year he became insane. After remaining in that unhappy condition for about two years, he recovered his reason, but died four days afterwards. His best works were, "The Vicar of Wakefield restoring his Daughter to her Mother," "Shylock and Jessica," "Abelard sitting in his Study," and "Captain Macheath." B. at Halifax, Nova Scotia, 1794; D. at Chelsea, 1835.

NEWTON, Thomas, an English divine and physician, was educated first at Oxford and afterwards at Cambridge. He taught a school at Macclesfield, and practised physic; after which he obtained the living of Ilford, in Essex. He wrote "The History of the Saracens," "Approved Medicines and Cordial Receipts," "Directions for the Health of Magistrates and Students," "Herbal of the Bible," &c. B. in Cheshire, 1543; D. 1607.

NEWTON, Thomas, an eminent English prelate. His education was commenced at Westminster school; whence he was elected to Trinity College, Cambridge, of which he was chosen fellow. After entering into orders, he became curate of St. George's, Hanover Square. In 1749 he published an edition of Milton's "Paradise Lost," with notes selected from various authors, and many of his own. He also prefixed a curious and well-written life of the author. In 1756 he was appointed chaplain in ordinary to the king; about 1783 he became bishop. His principal work is a course of "Dissertations on the Prophecies." After his death, were published his Miscellaneous Works, with his Memoirs, written by himself. B. in Staffordshire, 1704; D. 1782.

NEWTON-STEWART, a town of Scotland, in Wigtonshire, on the Cree, 26 miles from Stranraer. It has a Gothic church, town-house, public reading-rooms, and an agricultural society. Manf. Leather. Pop. 2,600.

NEWTON-UPON-AYR, a parish of Scotland, in the Firth of Clyde, opposite Ayr. Manf. Cotton fabrics and sailcloth. Pop. 5,000.

NEWTOWN, the name of numerous small towns and villages in Ireland, none of them with a population above 7,000.

NEWTOWN-ARDS, a seaport-town of Ireland, in the county of Down, at the N. extremity of Lough Strangford, 10 miles from Belfast. Pop. 10,200.

NEWTOWN BARRY, a town of Ireland, in the county of Wexford, on the Slaney, 3 miles from Clonegal. Pop. 1,400.

NEW-YEAR'S ISLANDS, in the S. Pacific Ocean, on the north coast of Staten Land. Lat. 54° 41′ S. Lon. 64° 28′ W.

NEW YORK, one of the United States of America, bounded N. by Lake Ontario, the river St. Lawrence, and Lower Canada; E. by Vermont, Massachusetts, and Connecticut; S. by the Atlantic, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania; and W. by Pennsylvania, Lake Erie, and the river Niagara. At its S. extremity it includes Long Island. Area, 45,650 square miles. Deso. Greatly diversified in its general aspect. On the west side of the Alleghany Mountains it is generally level, but on the eastern side it swells into hills and ridges of various forms, with rich intervening valleys. Round Top, one of the Catskill Mountains, attains an elevation of 3,804 feet above the level of the sea. The coast is sandy, the N. parts rough and mountainous; but the soil of the interior is generally rich. Rivers. The principal are the Hudson, Mohawk, St. Lawrence, Delaware, Susquehannah, Tioga, Alleghany, Genesee, Oswego, and Niagara. Lakes. A part of the lakes Erie, Ontario, and Champlain belongs to New York, with lakes George, Cayuga, Seneca, Oneida, Oswegatchie, Canandaigua, Chatauque, Skeneatiles, and several smaller ones. Canals have been constructed in various parts, by which internal communication is greatly facilitated. They generally connect the Canadian lakes with the Atlantic rivers; and the Erie Canal has an extent of 364 miles. Pro. Wheat is raised in greater abundance than any other kind of grain. Indian corn, rye, oats, flax, hemp, pease, beans, and various kinds of grass, are extensively cultivated. Orchards are abundant, and great quantities of excellent cider are made. Various other kinds of fruit, such as pears, peaches, plums, cherries, &c., flourish well. Sheep are abundant, and horses and cattle are more numerous than in any other state. Minerals. Iron, gypsum, limestone, marble, slate, and lead. There are also salt springs and mineral waters. Manf. Important and flourishing, comprising almost every description of goods. They command an extensive sale, and render the commerce of this state greater than that of any other in the Union. Exp. Beef, pork, wheat, flour, Indian corn, rye, butter, cheese, pot and pearl ashes, flax-seed, pease, beans, horses, cattle, lumber, &c., to the amount of more than three-fifths of the total exports of the Union. Pop. 3,100,000. Lat. between 40° 30′ and 45° N. Lon. between 72° and 79° 55′ W. This state has an extensive railway system, and in 1821 framed its present constitution. The first settlement of the country was made by the Dutch on Manhattan Island, in 1614. In 1664 the English took possession of it, but in 1673 it was retaken by the Dutch. Subsequently it was restored to England, and is now, though not the largest, the leading state in the Union.

NEW YORK, the largest commercial city in the United States, stands on the island of the same name, at the confluence of the Hudson and the East rivers. It extends along the Hudson from 2 to 3 miles, and from the Battery, in the S.W. corner, along East river, nearly 4 miles. Its circuit is about 9 miles. The streets of the ancient part, at the S. end of the city, are generally narrow and crooked; but all the northern part has been laid out with much better taste. The principal street is Broadway, which is 80 feet wide, and extends from the Battery, in a N.E. direction, through the centre of the city, for upwards of 3 miles. It is generally well built, and a part of it is splendid. The houses in the city are mostly built of substantial brick with slated roofs. Among the public buildings the most prominent and important is the City Hall, 216 feet long, 105 broad, and, including the attic story, 65 high. The front, and both ends above the basement story, are built of white marble. The Merchants' Exchange, in Wall Street, has a magnificent central dome, and the park embraces an area of 11 acres. The New York Hospital comprises the hospital for the reception of the sick and disabled, the lunatic asylum, and the lying-in hospital. The Almshouse is a plain stone structure on East river, and the state prison is on the Hudson, at Greenwich, about 1½ mile from the City Hall. It is constructed of freestone. The New York Institution is near the City Hall, and its apartments are occupied by the Literary and Philosophical Society, the Historical Society, the American Academy of Fine Arts, which has a valuable collection of paintings and statues, the Lyceum of Natural History, and the American Museum. Columbia College, formerly called King's College, was established in 1754. A theological seminary was instituted in 1805, by the general synod of the Associate Reformed Church. Among the other institutions, are a theatre, public gardens, an orphan asylum, an asylum for the deaf and dumb, a custom-house, market-houses, numerous benevolent and charitable institutions, for the relief of the poor, the sick, the aged, the widow, the orphan, and the stranger. The churches are very numerous, and comprise some beautiful structures among them. The Battery is a large open space, at the S.W. point of the city, commanding a fine view of the harbour, with its shipping, islands, and fortifications, and is much frequented by the citizens. The park, in front of the City Hall, is also a fashionable resort. New York harbour is a large bay, with a circumference of 25 miles, spreading before the city on the S. side. It contains several small islands near the city, on each of which are fortifications. It is deep enough for the largest vessels. New York is admirably situate for commerce, and few cities in the world have increased so regularly and rapidly. It has communication with all the principal ports of the United States, the West Indies, and S. America, and has also packets plying to Liverpool, Southampton, Antwerp, and Havre, in Europe. Pop. about 900,000. Lat. 40° 42′ 7″ N. Lon. 74° 0′ 7″ W. In 1785, this city was the seat of the first American Congress.

NEW ZEALAND. (See ZEALAND, NEW.)

NEY, Michael, nai, prince of the Moskowa, duke of Elchingen, and marshal of France. In his 13th year he was placed with a notary; but this occupation being little in accordance with his adventurous and energetic disposition, he, in 1787, enlisted in a regiment of hussars. His courage and activity were so conspicuous, that, in seven years, he rose to a captaincy. Attracting the notice of General Kleber, by whom he was surnamed "the Indefatigable," he was created adjutant-general. In 1796 he displayed signal valour at the battles of Altenkirchen, Montabour, and Dierdorf, at which last he was taken prisoner. Upon being exchanged, he was appointed to the army of the Rhine; while serving with which, he, with only a handful of cavalry, took 2,000 prisoners, and made himself master of the town of Würzburg. For that gallant affair he was created general of brigade; and, throughout the campaign, his brilliant courage was only eclipsed by his humane treatment of the French emigrants who fell into his hands, and whom he contrived to put beyond the power of the Directory, who sought their lives. Under General Moreau, he fought at Worms, Frankenthal, Manheim, and Iller; and to his unyielding bravery was due in great part the victory achieved at Hohenlinden. After the peace of Luneville, he went to Paris, where Napoleon gave him a cordial reception, and, in order to attach him to his cause, brought about a marriage between him and Mademoiselle Augnié, the friend of Hortense Beauharnais. He went to Switzerland in 1803 as minister plenipotentiary of the French republic. Upon his return, he was nominated to the command of the army encamped near Boulogne, and raised to the dignity of marshal of France. In 1805 he commanded the eighth corps of the army in Germany, and stormed the village of Elchingen, where the Austrians lost 1,500 killed and wounded, and 2,000 prisoners. It was in commemoration of this brilliant deed, that Napoleon, who was witness of it, subsequently created Ney duke of Elchingen. He signalized himself still further in the subsequent Prussian campaign. He caused Erfurt to capitulate; took Magdeburg, with 23,000 prisoners and 800 pieces of artillery. At Deppen he destroyed a whole Prussian corps, cut off the retreat of the Russians at Königsberg, and defeated the left wing of the enemy at Friedland. In Spain he was placed under Massena; and it was to his persevering skill that the capture of Ciudad-Rodrigo and Almeida was due. Although he greatly assisted Massena in his retreat from the lines of Torres Vedras, the latter and himself became engaged in serious disputes, which led to the recall of Ney. When the grand army set out for Russia, in 1812, Ney was placed in command of the third corps. In that disastrous expedition, he is stated to have urged Napoleon to winter at Smolensko; but, although his counsel remained unheeded by the emperor, he won from him the surname "Bravest of the Brave," by his intrepidity upon every occasion. During the terrible retreat that ensued, Ney performed prodigies of valour. General Dumas relates, that one morning at Gaubinnen, a man in a dark cloak, long beard, and weather-beaten face, entered his room.—"I am at last here," said the stranger; "General Dumas, do you recognize me?" General Dumas replied that he did not. "I am the rear-guard of the grand army," continued the stranger; "I have fired the last musket-shot on the bridge of Kowno; I have thrown the last of our arms into the Niemen, and have come here through the woods. I am Marshal Ney!" When Napoleon's star had begun to decline, Ney's courage and ability remained as fresh as before. He was at Bautzen, Lutzen, and Dresden, helping in all to bring victory to the French standard; but at Dannewitz he was defeated by Bernadotte. The emperor, however, displayed no resentment towards his brave general when he heard of the disaster. Upon the abdication of Napoleon, in 1814, Ney retired to his country seat, from which he was summoned to Paris to assume the command of the eighth military division. When he had reached Paris, he learned for the first time that he was called upon to oppose his old master, who had returned from Elba, and was advancing towards the capital. Unfortunately for himself, he undertook to oppose Napoleon, but gave way before the astute mind of his ancient chief. Instead of capturing, he went over to Napoleon, and his example was followed by almost his whole army. At Waterloo he displayed astonishing bravery; five horses were shot under him; but on foot, his dress torn with balls, he headed the columns of the Guard, and urged them to the charge. All was unavailing, however, and, in the retreat, he was one of the last to quit the disastrous field. After the fall of the emperor, he repaired to Paris, where he was soon afterwards proscribed as a traitor to France. Fouché provided him with a passport, by means of which he was enabled to gain the frontiers in safety; but, unhappily turning back for some slight cause, he was arrested, brought to trial, and condemned to death. The garden of the Luxembourg was chosen for the place of execution, and there the brave soldier calmly met his death;—there, "he who had fought five hundred battles for France—not one against her, was shot as a traitor." B. at Sarre-Louis, Lorraine, 1769; shot, 1815.

NGAMI, LAKE, nga'-mi, a lake in Africa, discovered by Dr. Livingstone in 1849. Lat. 20° 20′ S. Lon. 23° 30′ E. (See AFRICA.)

NGAN-HOEI, ngan-ho'-i, an inland province of China, with an even surface, and traversed by several rivers. It produces green tea, and is rich in minerals. Pop. 35,000,000. Lat. between 29° and 34° N. Lon. between 113° and 119° E.

NIAGARA, ni-ăg'-a-ra, or ni-a-ga'-ra, a river of North America, which issues from the N.E. end of Lake Erie, flows into Lake Ontario, and forms the boundary between the United States and Upper Canada. It has a course of 35 miles, and a varying breadth of from half a mile to 3 miles. It runs over a rocky channel, in which its waters are violently disturbed by the force with which they are dashed against the rocks; and at last, coming to the brink of a tremendous precipice, the whole stream tumbles headlong to the bottom, without meeting the slightest interruption in its descent. The waters of the river are divided by Goat Island into two distinct cataracts. The most stupendous of these is that on the N.W. or Canadian side of the river, and is commonly called the Great or Horse-shoe Fall, from its resemblance to the shape of a horse-shoe. The height of this fall is estimated at 158 feet, and it is 1,800 feet across. The fall on the American side is 600 feet in breadth and 163 in depth. It has been estimated that these falls discharge 100,000,000 tons of water per hour. A cable suspension-bridge was, in 1860, erected over the river, a little above the commencement of the cataract.

NIAGARA, a county of New York, U.S. Area, 784 square miles. Pop. 45,000.

NIAGARA, a village and fort of Niagara county, on the Niagara, 15 miles below the Great Falls. Pop. 2,000.

NIAGARA FALLS, a village near the cataract, in the United States, where the Buffalo and Lockport railways meet. Pop. 1,000.

NIAS, or NEAS ISLE, ne'-as, an island of the Asiatic archipelago, on the W. coast of Sumatra, from which it is separated by a strait 60 miles broad. Ext. 70 miles long, with a breadth of 16. Desc. Fertile; producing large quantities of rice. Pop. Unascertained.

NICANDER, ni-kan'-der, a Greek poet, physician, and grammarian. He was a voluminous writer; but only two of his works have come down to us. He is supposed to have been born at Claros, a town of Colophis, and to have lived 135 B.C.

NICANDER, Charles Augustus, a modern Swedish poet, who commenced his literary career in 1820, with the production of "The Runic Sword; or, the First Knight." In 1827 he visited Italy, and, upon his return, published "Recollections of the South," a prose work, but interspersed with some poems of great beauty and pathos. B. at Stregnäs, 1799; D. 1839.

NICANDRO, ST., ne-kan'-dro, a town of Naples, in the province of Capitanata, 24 miles from Manfredonia. Pop. 8,000.—Another, 10 miles from Bari. Pop. 3,000.

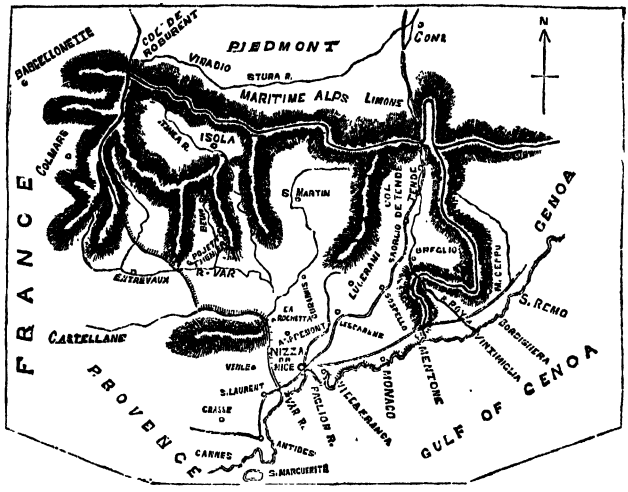
NICARAGUA, STATE OF, nik'-a-rág'-u-a, a state of the Central American Confederation, bounded on the W. by Guatemala; on the N. and E. by Mosquito territory; E. and S.E. by the Caribbean Sea and Costa Rica, and, elsewhere, by the Pacific. Area. Estimated at 50,000 square miles. Desc. Comprising extensive plains and several volcanic mountains. The soil has great fertility, and is partly watered by the San Juan. Pro. Cotton, sugar, indigo, timber, and cattle. Pop. 250,000. Lat. between 10° and 15° N. Lon. between 83° 40′ and 87° 35′ W. — Frequent revolutions have occurred in this state.



NICARAGUA, a lake of fresh water in the above state, which is named from it. Ext. 110 miles long, with an average breadth of 40. It is navigable for the largest vessels, and is of immense depth. Its surface is about 1,130 feet above the level of the Pacific, and it contains several islands. Lat. between 11° and 12° 12′ N. Lon. between 84° and 86° W.

NICARIA, or ICARIA, ne-kai'-re-a, an island of the Grecian Archipelago, belonging to Turkey, 12 miles from Samos. Pop. 1,000.—Near this island, Icarus, of Greek mythological fame, met his death after his flight. From this circumstance the island takes its name.

NICASTRO, ne-kas'-tro, anciently NEOCASTRUM, a town of Naples, in Calabria Ultra, 24 miles from Cosenza. It is the see of a bishop, and suffered greatly by an earthquake in 1638. Pop. 10,000, chiefly employed in the cultivation of the olive for its oil.

NICAUSIS (or, according to the Arabians, BALKIS), ni-kaw'-sis, queen of Sheba, who visited Solomon upon the report of his wisdom. Her country was probably that part of Arabia Felix which was inhabited by the Sabæans; but Josephus asserts that she reigned over Egypt and Ethiopia.

NICCOLA DI PISA, nik'-ko-la, a celebrated Italian sculptor and architect, whose statues were characterized by all the vigour and grace of the antique, while, as an architect, he rivalled the greatest masters of his country. The church and convent of St. Dominico at Bologna, the church of St. Antonio at Padua, and the restoration of the church of St. Lorenzo at Naples, are extant examples of his genius. Flourished in the 13th century.

PROVINCE OF NICE.

CITY OF NICE.

NICE, neece, an episcopal city and province, formerly of the Sardinian states, but ceded to France in 1859. The city is situate at the mouth of the small river Paglion, on the Mediterranean, 98 miles from Turin, and is surrounded with a rampart, and divided into the Old and New towns. The streets of the former are crowded and narrow, but those of the latter are tolerably straight and regular. It contains two public squares, one of which is surrounded with porticos. The other is bordered by a terrace, which serves at once as a public walk and as a mound or dyke against the sea. The only public edifice worth notice is the cathedral. Here are a theatre, public baths, coffee-houses, a library, delightful walks, and good society. The harbour, which is protected by a mole, is spacious and secure. Oil, wine, and silk are exported; also liqueurs, essences, and perfumery. Manf. Unimportant; consisting of silk, leather, paper, soap, and tobacco. Pop. 35,000.—Under the empire of Napoleon I., this place was the capital of the department of the Maritime Alps, and is the birthplace of the astronomer Cassini, the painter Vanloo, and Marshal Massena.—The PROVINCE is small, and stretches along the shores of the Mediterranean. It was, in 1859, ceded, with Savoy, to Napoleon III. by the king of Sardinia, for military services against Austria.

NICEPHORUS, Callistus, ni-sef'-o-rus, a Greek historian, who, among other works, produced an "Ecclesiastical History," in twenty-three books, the date of which commences with the year 610. This work was translated into French by Du Duc, and again into Latin by Lange, in the 17th century. Flourished in the 14th century.

NICEPHORUS I., emperor of Constantinople, was at first chancellor of the empire, but usurped the throne, in 802, from the empress Irene, whom he banished to the isle of Mitylene. The beginning of his reign was marked by wisdom and clemency; but afterwards he committed such cruelties, that his subjects revolted, and proclaimed Bardanes, surnamed the Turk, emperor. Bardanes was defeated, however, and sent to a monastery, where he was deprived of his eyes. The Bulgarians having invaded the empire, and ravaged Thrace, Nicephorus marched against them; but was vanquished and slain, 811.

NICEPHORUS II. (Phocas), a nobleman of Constantinople, whose character was so popular, that he was raised to the imperial throne in 963. He married the widow of his predecessor, Romanus II., and drove the Saracens out of a great part of Asia. He was assassinated by John Zimisces and other conspirators, in 969.

NICEPHORUS III. was invested with the purple by the army, which he commanded, in 1078. He was deprived of this dignity in 1081, by his general Alexis Comnenus, who sent him to a convent, where he died shortly after.

NICERON, John Peter, nis'-e-rawng, an eminent French biographer. He entered the religious order of the Barnabites, and became a celebrated preacher. He was also successively professor of philosophy and theology, and librarian to his society. His works are "Memoirs of Men illustrious in the Republic of Letters, with an Account of their Works," a translation of Dr. Hancock's treatise on the "Virtues of Common Water," "The Conversion of England to Christianity." B. at Paris, 1685; D. 1738.

NICETAS, Acominatus, ni-se'-tăs, a Byzantine historian, who wrote the Annals of the Byzantine empire, in twenty-one books. He was employed in various posts at the court of Constantinople, until the year 1204, when he retired to Nicæa, where he died, 1216.

NICHOLAS, nik'-o-las, a county of Kentucky, U.S. Area, 281 square miles. Pop. 10,500.—Another in Virginia. Area, 676 square miles. Pop. 8,000.

NICHOLAS, ST., one of the Cape Verd Islands, in the Atlantic, between Santiago and St. Lucia. Ext. 30 miles long, with an average breadth of 12. Its surface is mountainous. Pop. 6,000. Lat. 16° 35′ N. Lon. 24° 15′ W.

NICHOLAS, ST., a small island of England, in Plymouth Sound, on the coast of Devonshire.—Also the name of several parishes in England, none of them with a population above 1,500.

NICHOLAS, one of the seven deacons mentioned in the Acts. He was a proselyte of Antioch; but afterwards founded a sect called by his name, which permitted concubinage and the offering of meats to idols. By some, however, this Nicholas is said to have been a person other than Nicholas the deacon.

NICHOLAS I., Pope, was elected in succession to Benedict III., in 858. He excommunicated Photius, patriarch of Constantinople, whose schism led to the separation of the Roman and Byzantine churches. D. at Rome, 867.

NICHOLAS II. was a native of Burgundy, who became archbishop of Florence, and succeeded Stephen IX. in 1059. He was opposed by a rival, who styled himself Benedict X.; but being disavowed by the council of Latri, the latter was obliged to forego his claim to the papal chair. This pope assembled a council at Rome, and caused a decree to be passed which was very important in the subsequent elections to the tiara. He was succeeded by Alexander II. D. 1061.

NICHOLAS III. was of a noble Italian family, and elected pope in succession to John XXI., in 1277. He obtained from the emperor Rudolph of Hapsburg large grants of Italian territory; among the rest, the exarchate of Ravenna. He dispatched a number of missions to heathen countries, and deprived Charles of Anjou, king of Naples, of the dignity of a senator of Rome. His successor was Martin IV. D. 1280.

NICHOLAS IV. was a native of Ascoli, and was elected to the papal chair upon the death of Honorius IV., in 1288. He excommunicated James of Aragon and his followers in the island of Sicily, and advanced the claims of Charles II. of Anjou to that kingdom. He likewise endeavoured to excite a new crusade, but without success. This disappointment hastened his death, which took place in 1292.

NICHOLAS V., cardinal bishop of Bologna, became pope after Eugenius IV., in 1447. He restored peace to the Romish and Western churches, and caused the sovereigns and states of Italy to forget their feuds. He collected books and manuscripts, and ordered translations to be made of the Greek classics. The Vatican library was also founded by him, and he embellished Rome with numerous fine edifices. He was an enlightened and distinguished pope. D. 1455.

NICHOLAS I., emperor of Russia, was the third son of the emperor Paul, by his second wife, Sophie Dorothea, daughter of Frederick Eugene, duke of Würtemberg. His father having been assassinated while Nicholas was only in his fifth year, his education devolved upon his mother, who caused him to be most carefully instructed in letters, the sciences, and the arts. He was taught to speak the French and German languages with as much fluency as his native Russian; while in the theory of the arts of war, for the study of which he evinced great aptitude from his earliest years, his progress was rapid and brilliant. He ascended the throne of Russia in 1825, after the death of his eldest brother Alexander, who had no issue. Constantine, the next brother, was the legitimate heir; but he had renounced his claim two years previously. Before becoming emperor, Nicholas had, however, to repress a formidable insurrection, comprising powerful members of the military and nobility. During that critical period, Nicholas displayed a fearless and energetic character, which rapidly awed the insurrectionists, many of whom were shot down or subsequently executed, or banished to Siberia. Shortly after his coronation, he sent his troops against the shah of Persia, whose army was defeated in several engagements by Marshal Paskiewitch. The shah was compelled to sign the treaty of Tourkmanchai, by which the provinces of Erivan and Nakschivan were ceded to Russia, an additional indemnity of about three millions sterling being exacted from him. Nicholas also joined with England and France in aiding the Greeks to achieve their independence, and the Russian fleet co-operated with those of the two first-named powers in annihilating the Turkish flotilla at Navarino. In 1828 war broke out between Russia and Turkey; upon which General Diebitsch captured the fortress of Silistria, routed the Turkish army at Shumla, crossed the Balkan, and appeared before Adrianople. In 1829 the treaty of Adrianople was concluded, which gave to Russia, besides large tracts of territory in Asia, the right to trade in all parts of Turkey and upon the Danube, and the free passage of the Dardanelles. In virtue of this concession, Nicholas likewise became the protector of the Danubian principalities. In 1830 he displayed considerable hostility towards the revolution that had brought about a change of dynasty in France; and in the same year an insurrection burst forth in Poland, which was not repressed until after a terrible struggle of ten months. The brave but unsuccessful Poles were treated with the utmost rigour; many were sent to Siberia or the army of the Caucasus; the universities were suppressed, the libraries and other great establishments were transferred to St. Petersburg; and finally, in 1832, the kingdom of Poland became extinct. In 1839 a formal declaration of war was made against the Circassians, with whom the Russians had long been engaged in a desultory warfare. This struggle was vigorously maintained by the emperor throughout his whole life, but it remained for his successor Alexander to thoroughly subdue the brave mountaineers. Nicholas visited England for the second time in 1844, and was cordially received by her Majesty Queen Victoria. During the Hungarian insurrection of 1849, the troops of Nicholas enabled Austria to triumph over her revolted subjects, and to complete the subjugation of Hungary. In 1853 he dispatched Prince Menschikoff to Constantinople, to exact from the Porte a treaty whereby Russia might be permitted to interfere in the internal affairs of Turkey, and secure to herself the prerogative of protecting the Greek subjects of the Ottoman empire. The result of Prince Menschikoff's mission is well known; Russia occupied the Danubian principalities as "a material guarantee;" the fleet of Nicholas destroyed the Turkish vessels at Sinope; and France and England, after employing every effort at conciliation fruitlessly, declared war against the czar, invaded the Crimea, where the Russian arms were subjected to defeat at the Alma, at Inkermann, and at Sebastopol; all the forts upon the southern side of which were captured and destroyed. This last event, however, was subsequent to the death of the emperor, who succumbed to a mortal malady, whilst busily engaged in preparing renewed efforts against the allies. The emperor Nicholas was a man of prodigious industry; his energetic character enabled him to assume the position of defender of order and legitimacy throughout the continent of Europe. Order and legitimacy signified to him, however, a total repression of national liberty. With respect to his own country, he was professedly despotic. "Despotism," he observed, "is the very essence of my government." The great object of his public life was to realize the ambitious projects of Peter I. and Catharine II.—the possession by Russia of Constantinople and of the territories of the sultan. B. at St. Petersburg, 1796; D. at the same city, 1855.

NICHOLS, John, nik'-ols, a learned antiquarian writer, who early in life was placed in the office of William Bowyer, "the last of the learned printers." He was afterwards manager and partner of that printing-office; and at Bowyer's death, in 1777, the establishment fell into his hands. Nichols was author, or editor and printer, of a very large number of learned works. The most important of these were, "Biographical and Literary Anecdotes of William Bowyer, F.S.A.," "Illustrations of Literary History," "History of the County of Leicester," "The Progresses and Processions of Queen Elizabeth," and "Illustrations of the Manners and Expenses of Ancient Times." From the year 1778 until his death, he conducted the "Gentleman's Magazine." B. at Islington, 1745; D. 1826.

NICHOLS, John Gough, a modern English antiquarian, and grandson of the preceding. His first important work was produced in 1829, with the title, "Fac-Similes of Autographs, with Biographical Memoirs of Royal, Noble, Learned, and Remarkable Persons." His later productions included, among others, "The Chronicle of Queen Jane," a translation from Erasmus's "Pilgrimage to St. Mary of Walsingham," and "The Chronicle of the Grey Friars of London." During many years he was at the head of the "Gentleman's Magazine," but vacated the post in 1856. Subsequently, however, he contributed to the pages of that periodical "The Autobiography of Sylvanus Urban, Esq.," which contained much interesting matter relative to the early writers and affairs of that magazine. B. in London, about 1807.

NICIAS, nish'-i-is, an Athenian commander and statesman, who, by his merit, rose to the highest offices in his country. He signalized himself in the war of the Peloponnesus, which he had the honour of concluding. Afterwards he was appointed to command, with Eurymedon and Demosthenes, against Sicily. These three generals laid siege to Syracuse for two years; but, finding it impregnable, they were about to retire, when they were attacked by the Syracusans, and Nicias and Demosthenes, with a great part of their troops, made prisoners. Nicias was put to death by the Syracusans, 413 B.C.

NICIAS, physician to Pyrrhus, king of Epirus, who made an offer to Fabricius, the Roman consul, of poisoning his master for a sum of money, B.C. 280. Fabricius disdained the proposal, and acquainted Pyrrhus with his treachery. Thereupon Pyrrhus is stated to have exclaimed, "This is that Fabricius whom it is harder to turn aside from justice and honour than to divert the sun from its course." Nicias is said to have been put to death, and his skin used for covering the seat of a chair.

NICIAS, a celebrated Grecian painter, who was contemporary with Apelles. His greatest picture was that which illustrated the passage in Homer's "Odyssey," where Ulysses invokes the shades of the departed. Ptolemy I., king of Egypt, offered Nicias sixty talents (about £15,000) for the picture; but the painter preferred to present it to his native city of Athens. One of his pictures was taken to Rome by Augustus, in whose temple it was afterwards fixed. He is likewise stated to have painted some of the statues of Praxiteles. Flourished about the 3rd century B.C.

NICOBAR ISLANDS, nik-o-bar', the name of a group situate in the Bay of Bengal, and forming, with the Andamans, the extension of the great volcanic band of Sumatra and Java. There are seven large and twelve small islands. The names of the principal are Carnicobar, Teressa, Chowry, Bombochia, Kaichull, Carmorta, Nancowry, Tonlongar, Sambelong, and Nicobar, or Great Sambelong. These islands are almost all inhabited, are very fertile, and yield large quantities of sugar, and various kinds of fruits. They are, however, exposed to frequent hurricanes, and are deemed unhealthy. The south end of the Great Nicobar is in lat. 6° 44′ N.; lon. 94° E.

NICODEMUS, nik'-o-de'-mus, a Jewish senator, of the sect of Pharisees, who visited our Saviour by night, and afterwards became his disciple, though secretly; but when Jesus Christ was crucified, he avowed himself, and, together with Joseph of Arimathea, paid the last duties of regard to his master. The Jews, it is said, intended to have put him to death, but were hindered by his relation Gamaliel: they, however, deposed and excommunicated him. There is a pretended gospel under the name of Nicodemus; but it is full of errors, and was composed by the Manichæans.

NICOLA, ST., nik'-o-la, the name of several towns in the S. of Italy, none of them with a population above 2,500.

NICOLAI, Christopher Frederick, nik'-o-lai, a learned German bookseller, who taught himself Greek, Latin, and English, and, in the 18th century, established several critical journals at Berlin. The most important of his separate works are "Anecdotes of Frederick the Great," "Essay on the Templars," and "Remarks on the History of the Rosicrucians and Freemasons." B. at Berlin, 1733; D. in the same city, 1811.

NICOLAI, Nicholas de, an old French geographer, who became geographer and valet-de-chambre to Henry II. of France. During sixteen years, he travelled over Europe and the East, and wrote a curious account of his wanderings, in a work entitled "Navigations and Peregrinations of Nicholas de Nicolai." D. 1517; D. 1583.

NICOLAS, Sir Harris, an English antiquarian writer, whose early years were spent in the English navy. At the conclusion of the great war with France, he devoted himself to the study of the law, and was called to the bar in 1825. As a lawyer, he was almost entirely employed in peerage cases before the House of Lords. His works were both numerous and important; the principal of them being "The History of the Battle of Agincourt," a "Life of Chaucer," appended to Pickering's edition of the poet's writings; "The Dispatches and Letters of Lord Nelson," and two volumes of a "History of the British Navy," which were all that he completed before his death. In 1831 he was created a knight of the Hanoverian Guelphic Order. B. in Cornwall, 1799; D. near Boulogne, 1848.

NICOLAS, ST., nik'-o-la, a town of Belgium, in East Flanders, 12 miles from Antwerp. It has a spacious market-place, and a fine town-house and prison. Manf. Cotton, woollens, and coarse linen. Pop. 21,000.

NICOLE, Peter, nik'-ol, an eminent French writer, who, in 1639, became a member of the Society of Port Royal, where he taught youth with great reputation, and assisted Arnauld in many of his works. In 1677 he quitted France, on account of the persecution against the Jansenists; but, some time after, he obtained leave to return to Paris. In his latter years he espoused the cause of Bossuet against the Quietists, and was engaged in other controversies. He was the chief author of the celebrated work known as the "Port Royal Logic." He also translated several valuable works from the Latin; and his moral essays are esteemed; as also is his treatise on Preserving Peace in Society. His other works are chiefly polemical. B. at Chartres, 1625; D. 1695.

NICOLL, Robert, nik'-ol, a Scotch poet, who was the son of parents in humble circumstances, and whose efforts at self-education were pursued under the most disadvantageous circumstances. At the age of 21 he produced a small volume of poems, which became exceedingly popular, and passed through several editions. He shortly afterwards obtained the post of editor to the Leeds Times, which, under his control, was more than tripled in its circulation. His prose writings consisted, for the most part, of political articles contributed to the before-mentioned print, and were marked by strongly liberal sentiments and a clear energetic style. His health, which had always been frail, and was probably shattered by his youthful studies, gave way after he had been engaged upon his editorial duties about a year; and he removed to Edinburgh, where he died almost as soon as he had reached manhood. B. at Tulleybeltane, Perthshire, 1814; D. 1837.

NICOMEDES I., nik-o-me'-dees, king of Bithynia, succeeded his father Ziphœtes, B.C. 278. In the following year he sought the assistance of the Gauls against his brother Zibœtes, who disputed the throne with him. His barbarian auxiliaries subsequently turned against him, and overran the whole of Asia Minor. D. about 250 B.C.

NICOMEDES II. succeeded Prusius II., 149 B.C. During his long reign, he remained the ally of the Romans, and assisted the latter against Aristonicus, king of Pergamus, 131 B.C. The last years of his reign were spent in contending against Mithridates VI., king of Pontus. D. 91 B.C.

NICOMEDES III., son and successor of the preceding, was deposed in the first year of his reign, by Mithridates VI.; but was afterwards restored to it by the Romans. In 88 B.C. he engaged with the Romans in attacking Mithridates, whose general defeated him in Paphlagonia; whereupon he fled to Italy, where he remained till the conclusion of the war, B.C. 84. Dying without issue, he left his crown to the Romans, 74 B.C.

NICOPOLIS, or NIKOPOLI, ne-kop'-o-le, a town of European Turkey, in Bulgaria, on the Danube, 55 miles from Rustchuk. It has an ancient castle and several handsome mosques and baths. Pop. 20,000. Lat. 43° 45′ N. Lon. 24° 8′ E.—This place was founded by Trajan, and here the Hungarians, under Sigismund, were, in 1396, defeated by the Turks.

NICOSIA, ne-ko'-se-a, a town of Sicily, in the Val di Demona, remarkable only for the number of its churches and convents. It is 40 miles from Catania, and stands in a fertile district. Pop. 15,000.

NICOSIA, capital of the island of Cyprus. (See LEFKOSIA.)

NICOT, John, ne'-ko, a French courtier and writer, who was sent by Francis II. as ambassador to Portugal, whence he brought the plant named tobacco, which, in France, has been called Nicotiana, out of compliment to the importer. He wrote a work upon Navigation, and, in 1606, published "The Treasury of the French Language," which is stated to be the first French dictionary known. B. at Nimes, 1530; D. at Paris, 1600.

NICOTERA, ne-ko'-tair-a, a town of Naples, in Calabria Ultra, 32 miles from Reggio. Pop. 4,000.

NIEBUHR, Carsten, ne'-boor, a celebrated Danish traveller, whose parents died while he was very young. In consequence of this occurrence, he remained until his 21st year in an almost uneducated condition, gaining his subsistence as an agricultural labourer. In 1754, however, he zealously devoted himself to the study of geometry, with the view of gaining the post of land-surveyor in his native district. He afterwards passed to the university of Göttingen; but, his pecuniary resources becoming exhausted, he enlisted in the Hanoverian engineers, which he quitted in 1757, on being appointed to a scientific expedition about to be dispatched by the king of Denmark to Arabia. Niebuhr requested to be allowed to increase his scientific qualifications by eighteen months' study; and, when the expedition set out, he joined it as mathematician and geographer. After travelling in Arabia, Bombay, Persia, and Asia Minor, Niebuhr returned to Copenhagen in 1767, having been absent six years. His four companions had died in the East; but Niebuhr succeeded in bringing home a collection of notes and sketches, which were subsequently edited, engraved, and printed at the expense of the Danish government, and have been used by every historian of Arabia, from Gibbon until the present day. The most important of these classical works were, "Description of Arabia," "Travels in Arabia," and "Political and Military State of the Turkish Empire." His great services to science were recognized by his government, who appointed him to a civil post in Holstein, and created him counsellor of state. Further, when he became incapacitated from discharging the duties of his office through blindness, the Danish government would not accept his resignation, but appointed an assistant to carry on his labours until the end of his life. B. at Holstein, 1733; D. 1815.

NIEBUHR, Barthold George, a celebrated Danish historian, was son of the preceding. After concluding a brilliant academical career, he became private secretary to the Danish minister of finance in 1796; but his studious and retiring disposition being little in accordance with administrative functions, he exchanged the post for that of assistant-secretary to the Royal Library at Copenhagen. After spending about two years in Edinburgh, London, and Holstein, he returned to Copenhagen in 1800. Niebuhr was next invited to Berlin, where he arrived shortly before the battle of Jena. Upon the establishment of the University of Berlin, he was appointed therein lecturer on Roman history; and the discourses which he delivered while fulfilling this office formed the germs of that great work upon which his fame rests. The War of Liberation, as it was termed in Germany, called Niebuhr from his studious life; and, during the years 1813-14, he was employed at the head-quarters of the allied army. In 1816 he was sent from Berlin as ambassador to Rome, whence he requested to be recalled in 1822. After spending some time at Naples, he returned to Berlin, but shortly afterwards repaired to Bonn, where he gave lectures upon Roman antiquities and other subjects, in the newly-founded university. After superintending the publication of the works of the Byzantine historians, he occupied himself with the enlargement and completion of his "Roman History." The first volume of this new edition was given to the world in 1827; but, a fire having destroyed all Niebuhr's manuscripts, the publication of the second was delayed until 1830. This great work has inaugurated a new and more rational mode of dealing with the misty legends of early tradition; and, although Niebuhr therein displayed a scepticism and a distrust of mystical authorities, he has done more than any other man to evolve a truthful and sound basis whereon to erect a rational history of Rome. In an introductory letter upon this work, he himself said, "As there is nothing which Eastern nations find more difficult to conceive than the idea of a republican constitution, as the people of Hindostan cannot be induced to regard the East-India Company as an association of proprietors, or in any other light than as a princess, just so is it with even the acutest of the moderns when they study ancient history, unless they have contrived, by critical and philological studies, to shake off the influence of their habitual associations." The "Roman History" has been translated into English by Archdeacon Hare, Bishop Thirlwall, and Dr. Schmitz. Many of Niebuhr's shorter treatises are to be found in the "Classical Journal," the "Philological Museum," &c. Niebuhr's character of mind was spoken of thus:—"While his horizon was ever widening before him, it never sunk out of sight behind him; what he possessed, he always retained; what he once knew, became a part of his mind, and the means and instrument of acquiring more knowledge; and he is one of the very few examples of men gifted with a memory so tenacious as to seem incapable of forgetting anything; who, at the same time, have had an intellect so vigorous as in no degree to be oppressed or enfeebled by the weight of their learning, but who, on the contrary, have kept it in orderly array, and made it minister continually to the plastic energy of thought." In addition to the before-mentioned works, Niebuhr produced "Lectures on the History of Rome," which have been translated into English by Dr. L. Schmitz. B. at Copenhagen, 1776; D. 1831.

NIEDERBRONN, ne'-der-bron, a town of France, in the department of the Lower Rhine, 25 miles from Strasburg. Manf. Steel, bar-iron, and artillery. Pop. 3,500.

NIEL, Adolphe, neel, a modern French general and marshal of France. In 1823 he became a student of the Polytechnic School, which he quitted to study engineering at Metz. He rose but slowly through the subordinate grades of the army. In 1827 he was a lieutenant of engineers; in 1835 he became a captain, and won his promotion as chef-de-bataillon for his bravery upon the field of Constantine, two years afterwards. He was made colonel in 1846, and with that rank took part in the expedition to Rome in 1849, as head of the staff of engineers. While at Rome he was promoted to the rank of brigadier-general, and was shortly afterwards charged with the mission of carrying the keys of the city to the pope at Gaeta. Upon his return to Paris, he became a member of the superior committee of engineering and fortification, and was appointed director of the engineering department in the ministry of war. In 1853 he rose to be general of division, and in that capacity commanded the French engineers in the Baltic, and took part in the siege of Bomarsund. Subsequently he commanded the engineers in the Crimea, having been dispatched thither in 1855, by which time he had attained the distinction of aide-de-camp to the emperor. After the assault and taking of the Malakhoff, he was decorated with the grand cross of the Legion of Honour. In 1859 he was sent on a mission to the court of Victor Emmanuel at Turin, and to make the official demand of the Princess Clothilde's hand for Prince Napoleon. Shortly afterwards he was created a marshal of France. His reputation as a scientific officer has always stood remarkably high. B. in France, 1802.

NIEMCKWICZ, Julian Ursin, neem'-tse-vitch, a distinguished Polish poet, historian, and patriot. In 1788, after having travelled in France, Italy, and England, he entered the Polish diet as deputy for Livonia. He subsequently drew up the Polish constitution, which was so warmly commended by Fox. In 1794 he served as aide-de-camp to Kosciuszko, during the Polish insurrection of that year, and was taken prisoner at the disastrous battle of Macicowice. He was kept in confinement at St. Petersburg until 1796, after which he emigrated to America, passing on his way through London, where he was cordially received. When Napoleon created the grand-duchy of Warsaw, in 1806, Niemcewicz was appointed secretary of state; and this and other high offices he continued to hold until the outbreak of the Polish insurrection of 1830. Shortly afterwards he went to London to request the aid of the English government; but, Russia having taken the capital of Poland in his absence, he was precluded from returning to his native country. He subsequently repaired to Paris, where the last days of this illustrious patriot and author were spent. His chief works were, a collection of spirit-stirring poems, a number of dramas, the "History of the Reign of Sigismund III. of Poland," translations from Pope, Dryden, Byron, and Wordsworth, and a narrative of his captivity in St. Petersburg. B. at Skoki, Lithuania, 1757; D. at Paris, 1841.

NIEMECZ, ne'-mech, a fortified town of Moldavia, near the river Niemecz, 280 miles from Belgrade. Pop. Unascertained.

NIEMEN, or MEMEL, ne'-men, a large river of Lithuania, which rises a few miles S. of Minsk, and, after a course of 400 miles, enters the Curische Haff by the Russ and Gilge mouths, 30 miles from Tilsit. On the waters of this river Napoleon I. and Alexander of Russia held an interview in 1807.

NIEMES, neems, a town of Bohemia, 18 miles from Jung-Bunzlau. Manf. Cotton and linen goods, and paper. Pop. 4,300.

NIENBURG, neen'-boorg, the name of several towns in Germany, none of them with a population above 5,000.

NIÉPCE DE SAINT VICTOR, Claude Francis, ne'-aips, a modern French photographic chemist, and the discoverer of the process of obtaining images on glass. He is the nephew of that M. Niépce who was the friend and fellow-worker of M. Daguerre; was educated for the military profession, and was acting as lieutenant of dragoons in 1842, when an accident turned his thoughts towards the science of chemistry. Having stained his uniform with some drops of lemon-juice, he undertook a series of chemical experiments for the purpose of restoring the lost colour, and at length succeeded, by employing ammonia. Shortly afterwards, the minister of war ordered that the collars and cuffs of thirteen cavalry regiments should be changed in colour. This change had been estimated to cost six francs the suit; but Niépce suggested a plan which would cost only half a franc. His proposal was accepted, and the government was saved an expenditure of 100,000 francs. For this service he received a reward of 500 francs. Three years afterwards, he obtained an exchange into the municipal guard of Paris, which step gave him the means of prosecuting his scientific studies in the capital. During the revolution of 1848, the barrack in which he lodged was destroyed, and with it the whole of his scientific apparatus and collections. Notwithstanding, he contrived to conclude his experiments, and to present to the academy his second memoir upon photography on glass, in the same year. Besides his first great discovery, he has made researches upon producing photographic images in colours, and photographically engraved steel plates. In 1855 he published a collection of his scattered memoirs, with the title "Photographic Researches," and another entitled "Treatise upon Engraving upon Steel and Glass." In 1850 Napoleon III. appointed him commandant of the Louvre, for the purpose of enabling him to prosecute more perfectly his photographic researches. B. in France, 1805.

NIEPPE, nyep, a market-town of France, 13 miles from Hazebrouck. Manf. Potash; and there are vinegar-works. Pop. 3,600.

NIEPPERG, Adam Albert, Count von, nee'-pairg, a general and chamberlain of the Austrian empire. In 1813 he acted as minister-plenipotentiary at Stockholm; upon which occasion he succeeded in inducing Bernadotte to take part in the coalition against Napoleon. In 1814 he signed, at Naples, with Murat, a treaty of alliance with Austria. When the empress Maria Louisa quitted France, Count von Niepperg became her confidential adviser, and defended her interests at the congress of Vienna. He next contributed towards the overthrow of Murat, and passed some time in France as commandant of the department of Gard. He subsequently repaired to Parma, where he was secretly married to Maria Louisa. His administration of his wife's duchy was characterized by ability and energy: several important reforms, both political and military, likewise emanated from him. B. at Salzburg, 1771; D. at Parma, 1828.

NIEUPORT, nu'-por, a fortified town of Belgium, West Flanders, 2 miles from the seacoast and 11 from Ostend. Manf. Rope-making; and there are shipbuilding-docks. Pop. 3,560.—This place has often been besieged and taken and retaken by the French and English.

NIÈVRE, ne'-aier, a department in the central part of France, comprehending most part of the province formerly called Nivernois, and bounded by the departments of the Yonne, the Côtes d'Or, the Saone-and-Loire, the Allier, and the Cher. Area, 2,700 square miles. Desc. Mountainous, and not generally fertile, although it possesses several productive plains. Rivers. The principal are the Loire, the Allier, the Nièvre, the Yonne, and the Aron. Manf. The chief industry consists in iron- and steel-works, and the manufactures of linen, jewellery, and porcelain. Pop. 330,000.

NIÈVRE, a river of France, which, after a course of 25 miles, falls into the Loire, at Nevers.

NIGDEH, nig'-de, a town of Asia Minor, in the pashalic of Karamania, 48 miles from Eregli. It has a Turkish college, is the residence of a pasha, and has three fortresses. Pop. about 5,300.—The PLAIN OF NIGDEH has an extent of about 50 miles.

NIGER, Caius Pescennius, ni'-jer, a celebrated Roman general, who, when the empire was sold to Didius Julianus by the Prætorian guards, in 193, refused to acknowledge the new emperor. Niger commanded in Syria, and was chosen emperor by all the provinces of the East; but Septimius Severus, who was at the head of the Roman legions in Pannonia, set up a rival claim, and, marching upon Rome, dethroned Didius. Severus next sent troops against Niger, whose army was defeated; and, in a second encounter, Niger was vanquished, and abandoned by his followers. He attempted to effect his escape; but was overtaken and slain, 195.

NIGER, ni'-jer, a great river of Western Africa, considered identical with the Quarra or Jobba. One of its branches rises in the Kong Mountains, near lat. 55′ N., lon. 9° 45′ W., at a height of 1,600 feet above the level of the sea. The course of this river was represented by the ancient geographers to be from E. to W.; thus flowing directly into the African continent. This was doubted by the moderns, until the point was ascertained and set at rest by Park's first journey into Africa. The knowledge of this important fact immediately set afloat many geographical speculations, to solve which, Park set out on his last and fatal expedition. Another expedition by land and sea was fitted out by the British government, under the orders of Major Peddie by land, and Captain Tuckey by sea, who was to sail up the Congo, and, on the hypothesis of the junction of the two streams, was to meet the expedition under Major Peddie, who was to reach the Niger by land, and then to descend its stream. The result was most fatal. All the leaders of Major Peddie's expedition fell a sacrifice to the climate, without reaching the Niger. Captain Tuckey, having penetrated up the Congo 300 or 400 miles, was obliged to return: in the course of his journey back, he himself, with many others, fell a sacrifice to the fatigue and privations they encountered. Lander was the next to trace a large portion of its course, and, in 1841, Captain Allen commanded an expedition fitted out by the British government, at an expense of £65,000. The results, however, have generally been unsatisfactory, all attempts to ascend the river having failed, on account of the deadly character of the climate. (See AFRICA.)

NIGHTINGALE, Miss Florence, ni'-tin-gail, an English philanthropic lady, was the daughter of William Edward Nightingale, of Lea-Hurst, Derbyshire, and received her education under her parents' direction. In addition to the ordinary accomplishments of an English lady, she acquired a competent knowledge of the modern languages. Early in life, her serious and earnest mind turned towards missions of charity with a natural instinct. After examining the schools and hospitals in the neighbourhood of her father's estate, and, at a later period, extending her observations by visiting the schools, workhouses, and hospitals of the metropolis and the large provincial towns, in 1849 she entered the Kaiserswerth hospital at Düsseldorf as voluntary nurse, and, after visiting similar establishments in other parts of Germany, she returned to London, and founded the Sanatorium for English invalid ladies, at Upper Harley-street. The sickness and distress of the British army in the Crimea induced Mr. Sidney Herbert, then minister of war, to request Miss Nightingale to go thither as superintendent of a staff of voluntary nurses. With a noble devotedness, she immediately complied, her estimable example being followed by forty-two other nurses, many of whom were ladies of rank and fortune. From November, 1854, until the re-embarkation of the army in 1856, did Miss Nightingale minister to the wounded and the sick, her zeal never abating except on one occasion, when she was herself laid upon a sick bed by an attack of hospital fever. Upon her return to England, in the latter year, the whole English nation, from the queen to the peasant, acknowledged her devoted assiduity. She has written several excellent works; the last of which was, "Notes on Nursing, what it is, and what it is not." B. in Florence, 1820.

NIGRITIA, or SONDAU, ni-grish'-e-a, a general name given to a vast undefined region of Central Africa, having on its N. the desert of Sahara, on its E. Kordofan, on its W. Senegambia, and on its S. the parallel of lat. 6° N.

NIJM TAGILSK, nizhm ta-gilsk, a town of Russia, in the Ural Mountains, 155 miles from Perm. It has extensive iron-forges. Pop. 53,000.

NIKOLAIEV, nik'-o-lain, a town of European Russia, in the government of Cherson, at the confluence of the Ingul and the Bug, 40 miles from Cherson. It was founded in 1791, and is one of the stations of the Russian navy. It has a cathedral, town-hall, admiralty-house, with museums, a library, an observatory, and several schools. Pop. 3,000. Lat. 46° 58′ 20″ N. Lon. 31° 59′ E.

NIKOLSBURG, nik'-ols-boory, a town of Moravia, 25 miles from Brunn. It has a magnificent castle, with a public library, gymnasium, a high school, college, and philosophical institute. Manf. Woollen cloths and other stuffs. Pop. 8,500.

NIKON, ni'-kon, patriarch of Russia, was the son of a peasant, but by his religious zeal and learning obtained the favour of the czar Alexis Michaelowitch. Nikon introduced into the Russian church the method of chanting, and called a council for restoring the sacred text according to the ancient versions. A new edition of the Bible was accordingly published at Moscow, under the direction of the patriarch. He composed a chronicle of Russian affairs to the year 1630. Through the intrigues of his enemies, he was afterwards banished. B. near Nishni-Novgorod, 1605; D. at Garoslar, 1681.

NILE, nile, a celebrated river of Eastern Africa, which traverses Egypt through its whole extent, and, by its inundation, produces all the fertility for which that country is distinguished. It is formed by the union of the Bahr-el-Abiad, or White River, and the Bahr-el-Azrek, or Blue River. Its source is believed to be near the equator, to within 4° of which it was traced by M. Bruce-Rollet in 1854. In Sennaar it is joined by the Bahr-el-Azrek, according to Bruce a much smaller river than the Bahr-el-Abiad, which rolls three times the quantity of water as its rival, and has its channel always full; while the Abyssinian river is great only after the rains, and could not of itself force its way across the Nubian desert. Having pursued its way a considerable space farther, it receives the Tacazze, after which, during a course of about a thousand miles, it is not fed by any river, scarcely even by the smallest rivulet, but rolls its stream over an immeasurable expanse of sandy desert. Before reaching Egypt, it forms two celebrated cataracts. In passing through Upper Egypt, it is confined between two mountain-ranges, which leave only a narrow strip on each side. Near Cairo the valley widens, and the river then spreads itself over a wide and level plain of the Delta. It separates into branches, of which there are now only two of any importance,—the Rosetta and the Damietta branch. The ancients, however, numbered seven mouths by which this great river entered the sea. The inundation of the Nile, caused by the tropical rains, begins to be felt about the 17th of June, and continues till August, when the river is at its height, and all the level parts of the country are overflowed. From its supposed source, including its windings, it has a length of about 3,000 miles, and is the only large tropical river which, by its periodical inundations, fertilizes a country encompassed in a great part of its course by sandy deserts. These inundations have been made the means of feeding canals constructed by the Egyptians to distribute the water as widely as possible over the country.

NILEUS, ni'-le-us, a son of Codrus, who conducted a colony of Ionians to Asia, where he built Ephesus, Miletus, Priene, Colophon, Libedos, &c.

NILSSON, Sven, nils'-son, a modern Swedish naturalist, who was educated for the medical profession, and was, in 1832, appointed professor of natural history in the university of Lund. He has published several valuable works on the subject of Scandinavian zoology, and upon the origin and history of the Scandinavian races. Some small but important treatises have likewise emanated from him upon geology and palæontology. B. in Sweden, 1787.

NILUS, ni'-lus, a king of Thebes, who gave his name to the river which flows through the middle of Egypt, and falls into the Mediterranean Sea.

NIMBERA, nim-be-ra', a town in India, in Rajpootana, inclosed by wall and towers, and having a mosque and several temples. It is the chief place of a pergunnah. Pop. Unascertained. Lat. 24° 36′ N. Lon. 74° 48′ E.—The DISTRICT has an area of 172 square miles, and is farmed and governed by the British.

NIMEGUEN, or NYMEGEN, ne'-me-gen, an old town of the Netherlands, in Gelderland, on the great branch of the Rhine called the Waal, 10 miles from Arnham. It is fortified with walls, ditches, and extensive outworks. Though not ill built, it has an irregular appearance, the streets being narrow, and, on account of the abrupt elevation from the river, the windows of one range of houses overlooking the chimneys of another. It is the seat of an agricultural institute and a commercial tribunal. Manf. Pale ale, leather, and glue. Pop. 24,000. It was taken by the French in 1794.

NIMES, neems, a town of France, in the department of the Gard, 30 miles from Montpellier. It is irregular and ill built, except in its modern portion, which consists of a number of excellent edifices. On the Boulevard de l'Esplanade is a hall of justice, in the Grecian style of architecture, and adorned with beautiful Tuscan columns. On another is a handsome hospital, and a theatre on an extensive scale. Nimes being an ancient city, comprises considerable Roman remains. The maison quarrée is a fine old edifice, with six columns in front and 10 on each side. It was built in the age of Augustus. There is also a beautiful fountain, with the remains of Roman baths, statues, and other antiquities; a building, commonly called the Temple of Diana; a large ancient tower, above 200 feet in height; and, lastly, the walls of the amphitheatre, an edifice almost as large as the Coliseum of Rome, and in a better state of preservation. There are various literary and scientific institutions, a bishop's palace, national college, seminary, normal school, and library. Manf. Silk stuffs, stockings, ribbons, linen, and leather. It has likewise dyeing and printing works, and an extensive trade in raw and wrought silk, corn, dried fruits, olive-oil, and wine. Pop. 55,000. This is the birthplace of Nicot, who introduced the use of tobacco in France. Lat. 43° 50′ 8″ N. Lon. 4° 21′ 15″ E.

NIMROD, nim'-rod, grandson of Cham, who is supposed by some to have been the founder of Babylon, where he reigned while Assur ruled in Assyria. He is also supposed to be the first king, and the first conqueror. In the Scriptures he is called "a mighty hunter before the Lord."

NINEVEH, nin'-e-vē, a famous city of antiquity, opposite Mosul, in Asiatic Turkey, 275 miles from Babylon. In its vicinity numerous remains of antiquity were discovered by Mr. Layard.

NINGPO, ning-po', a great seaport of China, in the province of Tchekiang, and recently opened to foreign trade. It stands on the Ningpo river, 95 miles from Hang-chow-foo, and is inclosed by walls. It is 6 miles in circumference. It has many shops, a large temple, and extensive trade in junk-building. Manf. Silks. Pop. Estimated at nearly 300,000. Lat. 29° 57′ N. Lon. 121° 32′ E.

NINIANS, ST., nin'-i-ăns, a town and parish of Scotland, 21 miles from Stirling. Manf. Woollens, leather, and nails. Pop. 10,000. Several battles have been fought in this parish. The first was between the Scottish followers of Wallace and the English, who were defeated; the second was the famous battle of Bannockburn; and the third was that in which James III. of Scotland was defeated and slain by his rebellious nobles.

NINUS, ni'-nus, king of Assyria, and a celebrated conqueror, who, about 1968 B.C., succeeded Belus, his father, as king of Babylon and Nineveh. He entered into an alliance with the Arabs, subjugating Egypt and Bactria. He became enamoured of Semiramis, the wife of one of his generals, and married her after her husband's death. Semiramis was supposed to have subsequently poisoned Ninus, who reigned during 52 years, and enlarged Nineveh, to which city he gave his name.

NINUS II., or NINYAS, son of the preceding and Semiramis, who profited by his youth to assume the regency. According to some, she subsequently voluntarily abdicated, while others state that she was put to death by Ninus. His reign is remarkable for its luxury and extravagance. His successors imitated the example of his voluptuousness; and very little further is known of the Assyrian monarchs until the age of Sardanapalus. His reign is placed between the years 1874—1836 B.C.

NIO, anciently Ios, ne-o', a small island of European Turkey, in the Grecian archipelago, 18 miles from Naxos. Ext. 11 miles long, with a breadth of 5. Pro. Cotton, oil, wine, and honey. Pop. 4,000. Lat. 36° 46′ N. Lon. 5° 24′ E.

NIOBE, ni'-o-be, a daughter of Tantalus, king of Lydia, and wife of Amphion, by whom she had, according to different writers and mythologists, a different number of children. The most received opinion is, that she had seven sons and seven daughters. This number increased her pride, and she had the imprudence not only to prefer herself to Latona, who had only two children, but even to ridicule the worship paid to her; observing that she had a better claim to sacrifices than the mother of Apollo and Diana. This insolence provoked Latona. She entreated her children to punish the arrogant Niobe. Her prayers were heard, and immediately all the sons of Niobe expired by the darts of Apollo, and all the daughters, except Chloris, were equally destroyed by Diana; and Niobe, struck at the suddenness of her misfortunes, was changed into a stone. The bodies of Niobe's children, according to Homer, were left unburied for nine days, because Jupiter changed into stones all such as attempted to inter them. On the tenth day, they were honoured with a funeral by the gods.

NIORT, nyor, a town of France, the capital of the department of the Two Sèvres, on the Sèvre, 35 miles from La Rochelle. It has a castle flanked with four round towers, a town-house, churches, a lyceum, a public library, and a botanical garden. Manf. Woollen stuffs, gloves, shoes, leather, and confectionary. Pop. 19,000.

NIPHON, ni'-fon, the principal island of Japan, in the E. of Asia, forming by much the largest part of the empire, and separated from the island of Jesso by the Strait of Matsmai. Ext. 800 miles long, with a breadth of 200. Desc. A mountain-chain of moderate elevation traverses it lengthwise, and culminates in the peak of Fusi, 12,000 feet high. It has several volcanoes, the sacred lake of Fakonca, and the largest river in Japan. Pro. Wheat, buckwheat, barley, almonds, figs, cotton, ginger, tobacco, camphor, pepper, pearls, and ambergris. Minerals. Coal, gold, silver, copper, naphtha, and porcelain clays. Pop. Unascertained. Lat. the S. part, 33° 26′ N. Lon. 135° 36′ E.

NIPISSING, LAKE, nip'-is-sing, a lake containing many islands, in Upper Canada, British N. America. It lies nearly midway between Lake Huron and the Ottawa river. Ext. 50 miles long, with a breadth of 36 at its widest part.

NIRGUA, neer'-gwa, a town of the Caraccas, in the province of Venezuela, S. America, 50 miles from Valencia. The city is unhealthy, and manifests every symptom of decline. Pop. 3,200. Lat. 10° N. Lon. 68° 45′ W.

NISCHNEI-NOVGOROD, or NISHEGOROD, nish'-ne-nov-go-rod', a province or government of European Russia, situate in the centre of the empire, to the E. of that of Vladimir. Area, 18,640 square miles. Desc. Generally level, with extensive forests, and producing corn, hemp, flax, cattle, and horses. Rivers. The Volga and its affluents. Manf. Coarse linen, canvas; and there are distilleries, iron- and soap-works. Pop. 1,180,000. Lat. between 51° 20′ and 57° 6′ N. Lon. between 41° 40′ and 46° 38′ E.

NISCHNEI-NOVGOROD, i.e. LOWER NOVGOROD, capital of the government of the same name, at the confluence of the Oka and Volga, 280 miles from Moscow. It carries on a great trade with St. Petersburg in Siberian wares; but it has also extensive dealings in salt, corn, and all sorts of provisions. Here is the great depôt of the salt-works both of this and of the adjoining province of Perm. The dwelling-houses are generally of wood, but the shops and warehouses are more substantial. A great fair is held in the city, frequented by dealers from Russia, Poland, Germany, Tartary, and even Persia. The quantity of merchandise sold is immense. Manf. Linen and leather chiefly. Pop. between 200,000 and 300,000. Lat. 56° 19′ 43″ N. Lon. 44° 28′ 36″ E.

NISHAPOOR, nish-a-poor', an ancient city of Persia, once the greatest and richest in the extensive province of Korassan, 40 miles from Meshid. Its ruins are said to cover a circuit of 25 miles. Iron and salt are the principal products of the district in which it stands. Pop. about 7,000.

NISMES. (See NIMES.)

NISSA, nis-sa', a well-fortified town of Turkey, in Servia, on the Nissawa, 245 miles from Constantinople. Pop. about 8,000.

NITH, nith, a river of Scotland, in Ayrshire, which, after a course of 60 miles, falls into the Solway Firth, 3 miles below Dumfries.

NITHSDALE, niths'-dail, the western stewartry or district of Dumfriesshire, Scotland.

NITI-GHAUT, nil'-e-gawt', a pass across the Himalaya, between the British district Kumaon and Tibet, with an elevation of nearly 17,000 feet above the level of the sea. Lat. 30° 47′ N. Lon. 79° 56′ E.

NITOCRIS, ni-to'-kris, a celebrated queen of Babylon, who built a bridge across the Euphrates, in the middle of the city, and dug a number of reservoirs for the superfluous water of the river.

NIVELLE, ne-vail'-yai, a river rising in Spain, and, after a short course, falling into the Bay of Biscay at St. Jean-de-Luz, near which the duke of Wellington, in 1813, crossed the river, after carrying the French posts.

NIVELLES, ne-vel', a town of S. Brabant, on the Thienne, 15 miles from Brussels. Manf. Cambric, lace, oil, and paper. Pop. 8,000.

NIVERNOIS, ne'-vair-nwaw, an old province of France, to the W. of Burgundy, now comprehended in the department of the Nièvre and part of Cher.

NIXDORF, nix-dorf', a town of Austria, 27 miles from Dresden. Manf. Woollen and linen stuffs. Pop. 5,200.

NIZAMPATAM, ni-zam'-pa-tam', a maritime town of British India, 30 miles from Gunpoor. Pop. 25,000.

NIZZA. (See NICE.)

NOAH, no'-a, the patriarch, was the son of Lamech. The Almighty, designing to punish the wickedness of mankind, commanded Noah to build an ark to save himself and family; and, when it was completed, a deluge of waters overwhelmed the globe, and every living creature perished, except those in the ark. Seven months after the commencement of the flood, the ark rested on Mount Ararat, and Noah offered a sacrifice to the Lord, who made a covenant with him. After this, Noah cultivated the land, and planted the vine; but having drunk of the juice of the grape, he was discovered lying asleep by his son Ham, who, instead of being concerned at his father's weakness, called his brothers Shem and Japhet to witness the indecent spectacle. They, however, covered Noah with a mantle; and when he awoke, and understood what had passed, he uttered a prophetic curse on the posterity of Ham. The patriarch died 350 years after the flood, at the age of 950 years.

NOAILLES, Adrian Maurice, Duke of, no'-ail, a celebrated French general, came of a noble family, and evinced, early in life, eminent talents for the military profession. He served with his father in Catalonia, and afterwards under Vendôme, both in Spain and Flanders. In 1708 he commanded in Roussillon, and gained several advantages over the enemy. In 1710 he made himself master of Gironne, one of the most important places in Catalonia, for which Philip V. created him a grandee of Spain, and Louis XIV. made him a duke and peer of France. In the succeeding reign he was appointed president of the council of finances; but when Dubois obtained the ascendancy in the ministry, Noailles was exiled. On the death of that minister he was recalled, and restored to his posts. In the war of 1733 he commanded at the siege of Philipsburg, and obliged the Germans to abandon Worms. He afterwards served with great reputation in Italy. B. 1678; D. 1766.

NOAILLES, Louis-Anthony de, uncle of the preceding. He devoted himself to the ecclesiastical state, and, in 1676, was nominated bishop of Cahors; whence he was removed to Châlons, and, lastly, to the see of Paris, in 1695. He made excellent rules for the conduct of his clergy, but his peace was disturbed by the Jesuits, in consequence of the approbation which he gave to Quesnel's "Reflections on the New Testament." In 1700 he was honoured with the dignity of cardinal. He subsequently lost the favour of Louis XIV., through the influence of Father Tellier, the Jesuit. Pope Clement XI. was also set against the archbishop, and issued his famous bull of Unigenitus on occasion of Quesnel's book, which the latter had sanctioned. The cardinal was exiled; but, after the death of Louis, Tellier was banished in his turn, and the archbishop recalled. B. 1651; D. 1729.

NOBLE, no'-bel, a county of the United States, in Indiana. Area, 423 square miles. Pop. 8,000.

NOCERA DELLA PAGANI, no-chai'-ra, a town of Naples, on the Sarno, 8 miles from Salerno. It is a place of some antiquity, and contains a number of churches and convents. Pop. 8,000.

NOCI, no'-che, a town of Naples, 30 miles from Bari, with a trade in silk, wine, and oil. Pop. 8,000.

NODIER, Charles, no'-de-ai, a celebrated French author, who was the son of the mayor of Besançon, and under whose care he received a careful and complete education. He early displayed a love for natural history, and, at the age of 18, published a treatise on Entomology. In 1800 he went to Paris, where he quickly became celebrated by his fine romances and poems; but incurred the displeasure of the first consul, in consequence of producing a satirical poem entitled "Napoléone," in which he defended liberty. For this, he was sent back to his native place, and there kept under police inspection. In this condition of forced exclusion from society, he occupied himself with the composition of his "Critical Examination of the Dictionaries of the French Language;" in which work he displayed the utmost acuteness and learning. He next commenced a series of journeys over France, in order to escape the watchful annoyances of the police. His mode of life during this period is detailed in his "Painter of Salzburg." He subsequently repaired to Dôle, and commenced the delivery of a series of lectures on French literature, which gained the greatest success. At a later period he obtained, through the influence of Fouché, the post of librarian at Laybach, in Illyria; but the restoration of the Bourbons enabled him to again take up his residence at Paris, where he found employment as literary contributor to the "Journal des Débats." In 1818 he produced "Jean Shogar," and, in the following year, "Thérèse Hubert," two charming romances. In 1824 he received the important appointment of librarian to the arsenal, and, in 1833, he became a member of the French Academy. Charles Nodier exercised his talents upon the most diverse subjects: fiction, history, poetry, criticism, biography, philology,—all were touched upon and enriched by his writings. He contributed articles to the "Biographie Universelle," and originated the "Grand Dictionnaire Historique." His most attractive works of a lighter order were "Recollections of my Youth," "The Last Banquet of the Girondins," and his last and finest novel, "Franciscus Columna." In all his works, he wrote in the chastest style, and his plots and sentiments were of a similar purity. During the last years of his life, his society was sought by Victor Hugo Lamartine, and the most distinguished French authors. B. at Besançon, 1780; D. at Paris, 1844.

NOGENT, no'-zha, the name of several parishes and villages in France, none of them with a population above 3,000.

NOGENT-LE-ROTROU, ro-trawng', a parish and town of France, 30 miles from Chartres. It has a fortress, inhabited once by Sully. Pop. 7,000.—This place was taken by the English in 1428.

NOIRMOUTIERS, nwaw-moo'-te-ai, an island of the Atlantic, on the coast of France, from which it is separated by a narrow channel. Ext. 12 miles long, with a breadth of 3. Pop. 8,500.—The capital is of the same name, with a population of about 2,600.

NOLA, no'-la, a city of Naples, in Terra di Lavoro, 16 miles from Naples. It has numerous churches, convents, a college, barracks, and hospitals. Pop. 9,000.—Anciently, this was one of the largest cities in Magna Græcia, and was besieged by Hannibal after the battle of Cannæ. Both Augustus and M. Agrippa died in it.

NOLLEKENS, Joseph Francis, nol'-le-kens, an eminent painter, was born at Antwerp, but came young to England. He studied under Tillemans, and afterwards copied Watteau and Paolo Pannini. He painted landscapes, figures, and conversations, and particularly the amusements of children. He was much employed by Lord Cobham, at Stowe, and by the earl of Tylney. B. 1706; D. 1748.—His son JOSEPH was an admirable sculptor, and served under Scheemaker. He executed several capital works. B. in London, 1737; D. 1823.

NOLLET, John Anthony, nol'-lai, a French divine and philosophical writer, who studied at Beauvais and Paris. In 1734 he visited London, and was chosen a member of the Royal Society. On his return to Paris, he commenced a course of lectures in experimental philosophy, to which he added illustrations of chemistry, anatomy, and natural history. In 1738 he was appointed professor of experimental philosophy at Paris, and, the year following, admitted a member of the Academy of Sciences. About the same time he went to Turin, on an invitation from the king of Sardinia, who appointed him professor of philosophy in that university; but he was recalled in 1744, to give lessons to the dauphin of France. In 1753 he was nominated first professor of experimental philosophy in the college of Navarre; he was also appointed philosophical tutor to the royal family. His "Lectures in Experimental Philosophy" was the best work which had till then appeared. Besides these, he wrote some excellent works on Electricity, the "Art of making Experiments," and several papers in the Memoirs of the Academy. B. 1700; D. 1770.

NOMBRE DE DIOS, nome'-brai, a town of Mexico, 60 miles from Durango. It has rich silver-mines and a good parish church. Pop. 7,000.

NONNUS, non'-nus, a Greek poet. He wrote an account of his embassy to Æthiopia and among the Saracens; also a work entitled "Dionysiaca;" a paraphrase in Greek verse, on the gospel of St. John; and a collection of Histories or Fables. Nonnus was a native of Panoplis, in Egypt, and flourished at the beginning of the 5th century.

NOOAHEEVA, noo'-a-he-va, the largest island of the Marquesas, near the centre of the group, in the Pacific Ocean. Pop. 16,000. Lat. 8° 53′ S. Lon. 139° 49′ W.

NOODT, noot, Gerard, a Dutch writer on jurisprudence, who was chosen professor of law in 1671. He afterwards accepted the professorship at Francker, whence he removed to Utrecht; but, in 1686, he settled at Leyden, of which university he became rector. He published a collection of his works in 1713, which were almost wholly upon subjects of jurisprudence, and are esteemed of high authority. B. at Nimeguen, 1647; D. at Leyden, 1725.

NOOTKA SOUND, noot'-ka, a bay of the N. Pacific Ocean, on the W. coast of N. America, discovered by Captain Cook, in 1778. It has a breadth of 10 miles, with deep water, and numerous islets. The entrance is situate in the E. corner of Hope Bay, in lat. 19° 33′ N.; lon. 126° 34′ W.

NORBURY, nor'-be-re, the name of several places in England, none of them with a population above 1,000.

NORCIA, nor'-cha, a town of Italy, on the Freddara, 70 miles from Rome. Pop. 4,000.

NORD, a department of France. (See NORTH.)

NORDBERG, George, nord'-bairg, chaplain to Charles XII. of Sweden, whom he accompanied in all his campaigns. Subsequently to the death of that monarch, he was appointed by Queen Ulrica Eleanora to write his history, which was completed, and published at Stockholm in 1740. This work is wanting in the lightness and point of Voltaire's well-known biography; but having been composed from the best materials, it is a work of authority, and has the additional advantage of being written by a man who was present at the actions he narrates. Nordberg spent his last years as a pastor at Stockholm. B. at Stockholm, 1677; D. there, 1744.

NORDEN, Frederick Lewis, nor'-den, a Danish traveller, who, after serving in the navy of his country, and travelling in the East, entered as a volunteer in the English fleet under Sir John Norris, in the Mediterranean. The king of Denmark sent him to Egypt, to make drawings and observations of the ancient monuments of that country. These he executed with great fidelity, and his Travels, with plates, were splendidly printed at Copenhagen in 1752-55. Being elected a member of the Royal Society of London, he presented to that learned body his drawings of ruins and colossal statues at Thebes. B. at Glückstadt, Holstein, 1708; D. at Paris, 1742.

NORDEN, a town of Hanover, in East Friesland, 15 miles from Embden. It is connected by a canal with the German Ocean. Manf. Linen, yarn, tobacco, and soap. Pop. 6,000.

NORDHAUSEN, nord'-hou-sen, a walled town of Prussian Saxony, on the Zorge, 38 miles from Erfurt. It contains several churches, an orphan-house, hospitals, and a theatre. Manf. Woollens, linens, soap; and it has oil-mills and tanneries. Pop. 11,500.

NORDHEIM, nort'-hime, a town of Germany, Hanover, on the Ruhme, 12 miles from Gottingen. Manf. Tobacco. Pop. 5,000.

NORDKOPING, nor'-che(r)-ping, a well-built town of Sweden, in E. Gothland, on the Motala, 85 miles from Stockholm. Manf. Iron, brass, fire-arms, and woollen goods. Pop. 11,500.

NORDLAND, nord'-land, a division of Norway. Area, 7,200 square miles. Pop. 70,000. Lat. between 65° and 70° N. Lon. between 12° and 22° E.

NORDLINGEN, nort'-ling-en, an ancient town of Bavaria, 36 miles from Augsburg. It has a beautiful high church, in the Gothic style, and was formerly a free imperial town. Manf. Woollens, linens, carpets, gloves, and stockings. Pop. 7,000.—The vicinity of Nordlingen has been the scene of repeated conflicts. In 1634 the Swedes were here defeated by the Austrians and Bavarians, and in 1796, the Austrians were here defeated by the French.

NORDSTRAND, nord'-strand, an island of Denmark, off the W. coast of Schleswig, 15 miles from the mouth of the Eider. Ext. 4 miles long and about 3 broad. Pop. 2,500.

NORE, nor, a noted part of the river Thames, in England, situate off Sheerness. It has a light, which floats on a sand-bank, 4 miles N.E. of Sheerness. Lat. 51° 29′ N. Lon. 0° 48′ W.

NORFOLK, nor'-fuk, an extensive maritime county of England, on the E. coast, bounded N. and N.E. by the German Ocean, S. and S.E. by Suffolk, and W. by Cambridgeshire, part of Lincoln, and the Washes. It is almost entirely insulated by the sea and the rivers, which divide it internally from the adjacent counties. Area, 2,024 square miles. Desc. Diversified. In many parts, the country presents a perfect flat; in other places, the surface is broken into gentle undulations; and a ridge of high ground stretches northwards from Thetford to the coast. Though half encompassed by the ocean, it has few seaports. Sand-banks occur all along the coast, and often extend far out to sea, and are extremely dangerous to mariners. The most remarkable are those of Yarmouth, between which and the shore are the noted Yarmouth Roads. Rivers. The principal are the Ouse, the Nen, the Waveney, the Wensom, and the Bure. Flowing through a flat country, their course is very sluggish, in many cases the fall being scarcely sufficient to carry off the water; and a land-flood usually lays the adjacent grounds under water. Hence are formed numerous small shallow lakes or pools, provincially termed "broads" and "meres," which are plentifully stocked with fish, and abound with aquatic fowls. The principal of these are Bredon Broad, to the south of Yarmouth; Hickling Broad, and Rockland. Pro. Agriculture forms the chief business of the inhabitants: at least two-thirds of the whole county are arable, and kept in a state of tillage. The fattening of cattle is carried on to a considerable extent, and, in some of the marsh and fen lands, the dairy is much attended to; and large quantities of butter are made and exported, under the name of Cambridge butter. The raising of grain for exportation, however, forms by far the principal object with the farmer. Wheat, barley, oats, rye, pease, beans, &c., are more or less cultivated, with mustard, saffron, flax, and hemp. Poultry of all kinds are very plentiful, and of superior quality. Turkeys are numerous; and being in great repute for the delicacy of their flavour, immense quantities are sent to the most distant parts of the kingdom. Large supplies of geese are also furnished from the fenny parts of this county. Rabbits and pheasants abound; whilst in the marshes and meers, woodcocks, snipes, widgeon, teal, &c., are very abundant. The mackerel and herring fisheries are also carried on to a great extent along the coast. Minerals. Unimportant, with the exception of chalk and marl. Manf. These consist chiefly of woven goods, such as woollens, silks, crapes, and stockings. Pop. 445,000. Under the Britons this county formed a portion of the territory belonging to the Iceni, and, under the Saxons, it constituted part of the kingdom of East Anglia. It is traversed by the Norfolk, and branches of the East-Anglian Counties Railway.

NORFOLK, the name of two counties in the United States. 1. In Massachusetts. Area, 350 square miles. Pop. 80,000.—2. In the S.E. part of Virginia. Area, 432 square miles. Pop. 35,000, of whom a third are slaves. —Also a borough and port of entry in Norfolk county, Virginia, on Elizabeth River, 32 miles from the sea. It contains a court-house, a gaol, a market-house, a theatre, an academy, an orphan asylum, a Lancasterian school, an Athenæum, and various churches. Near it also is a marine hospital, and Gosport, U.S., navy-yard. Pop. 15,000.

NORFOLK, NEW, a district of Tasmania. Area, 1,500 square miles.

NORFOLK, an ancient and illustrious English house, descended from the royal family of Plantagenet, through Thomas Plantagenet of Brotherton, earl of Norfolk, second son of Edward I., and earl-marshal of England. The heiress of the Norfolk family, Margaret, eldest daughter of Thomas de Mowbray, duke of Norfolk, having espoused, at the commencement of the 15th century, Robert Howard, the title of duke of Norfolk passed to the latter, and was transmitted by him to his descendants. The living head of this family takes precedence as premier duke and earl-marshal of England, and follows immediately after the princes of the blood royal. The most remarkable of this house were :—

NORFOLK, Roger Bigod, earl-marshal of England, went, in 1245, as ambassador of the king and barons of England, to the general council at Lyons, where he combated the pretensions of the pope to the title of sovereign of England. He died in 1270, without issue.

NORFOLK, Thomas Howard, fourth Duke of, was eldest son of the earl of Surrey. During many years, he was one of the confidential advisers of Queen Elizabeth, by whom he was charged, in 1568, to hold an interview with Mary, queen of Scots, who had just taken refuge in England. Norfolk was, however, subsequently brought to trial, upon the charge of having conceived the project of liberating and marrying the unfortunate Scottish queen. He was condemned to death, 1572.

NORFOLK ISLAND, an island in the S. Pacific Ocean, discovered by Captain Cook in 1774. Ext. 5 miles long and about 2 broad. This island was colonized by Governor Phillip, shortly after that of Port Jackson. One great objection, however, to its colonization, is the difficulty of approaching it, owing to the heavy sea which constantly beats on its rocky shores. It was used for many years as a penal colony. Lat. 29° 3′ S. Lon. 168° 10′ E.

NORGE, the Norwegian name for Norway.

NORHAM, nor'-ham, a township of England, on the Tweed, in the county of Northumberland. Pop. 4,300.

NORIS, Henry, no'-ris, a celebrated Italian cardinal, who was educated at Verona, by his father, a native of Ireland. He afterwards entered the monastic order of St. Augustine, and acquired great reputation for learning and piety. In 1673 he published the "History of Pelagianism," which gave offence to several persons, who accused him to the pope as being heretically inclined; but Clement X. so little regarded the charge, that he made Noris under-librarian of the Vatican. In 1695 he was honoured with the purple. His works were published at Verona in 1729-41, in 4 vols. B. at Verona, 1631; D. at Rome, 1705.

NORMANBY, nor'-man-be, several parishes in England, none of them with a population above 600.

NORMANBY, a maritime county of Victoria, S. Australia. Area, 3,125 square miles. Pop. 3,000.

NORMANBY, Constantine Henry Phipps, first Marquis of, was eldest son of the first earl of Mulgrave; and, after concluding his academical career at Cambridge, entered the House of Commons as member for Scarborough, in 1818. He took his seat among the liberals, and supported the Roman Catholic claims and parliamentary reform. In 1831 he succeeded to the peerage, and soon afterwards went out as governor to Jamaica, where he distinguished himself by his philanthropic efforts in carrying out the slave emancipation act. In 1835 he was appointed lord-lieutenant of Ireland. In 1839 he was for a short time secretary for the Colonies, for the Home department subsequently, and in 1841 went to the French capital as ambassador from the English court. He continued to perform the duties of that office until 1852. In 1856 he published a narrative of the events of 1848, in a work entitled "A Year of Revolutions." B. 1797.

NORMANDY, nor'-man-de, the name of an old province of France, one of the most extensive and fertile in the kingdom, now divided into the five following departments :—Lower Seine, Eure, Orne, Calvados, and La Manche. It abounds in quarries, and the houses are more generally of stone than of brick or wood.—This country was taken possession of by the Normans in the 9th century, and came into possession of the English, who kept it till the beginning of the 13th century, when it was united to France. In 1419 it was again taken by the English, who retained it till 1425.

NORMAN ISLES, nor'-măn, are the Channel Isles of Guernsey, Jersey, &c., and are the only portions of Normandy yet belonging to England, to whom, since the Conquest, they have uninterruptedly belonged.

NORMANTON, nor'-man-ton, the name of several parishes in England, none of them with a population above 1,500.

NORRISTON, nor'-ris-ton, a township of Pennsylvania, U.S., on the Schuylkill, 17 miles from Philadelphia. Pop. 7,000.

NORRKÖPING. (See NORDKÖPING.)

NORRLAND. (See NORDLAND.)

NORTH, Francis, north, Lord Guildford, keeper of the great seal in the reigns of Charles II. and James II., was the third son of Dudley, Lord North, and educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, whence he removed to the Middle Temple. After being solicitor and attorney-general, he was made chief justice of the King's Bench, and in 1682 he was appointed lord keeper, with the title of Lord Guildford. Of him, Lord Campbell says: "He had as much law as he could contain; but he was incapable of taking an enlarged and commanding view of any subject." He wrote "An Index of Verbs Neuter," printed with Lilly's Grammar; "A Paper on the Gravitation of Fluids in the Bladders of Fishes," printed in the "Philosophical Transactions;" "A Philosophical Essay on Music;" several Concertos, &c. B. 1637; D. 1685.

NORTH, Sir Dudley, brother of the preceding, who in his youth resided at Smyrna and Constantinople, and after his return to England, published some interesting works upon the life, institutions, and languages of the East. Of the Turkish tongue, he observed, "That for scolding and railing, it was more apt than any other language." He was subsequently knighted, became sheriff and alderman, and was appointed a commissioner of the Treasury towards the end of the reign of Charles II. At the Revolution he lost this post, and retired into private life. B. 1641; D. 1691.

NORTH, Roger, an English biographer, who was the son of Dudley, Lord North, and was educated for the profession of the law. He wrote a work against Kennet's "Complete History," in which he defended Charles II. He also left, incomplete, a "Memoir of Music;" but the work by which he is best known is a series of biographies of his brothers, including the lives of the two preceding. He is stated by some to have been attorney-general under James II. B. about 1650; D. about 1743.

NORTH, Frederic, earl of Guildford, an eminent English statesman. In 1769 he succeeded Mr. Charles Townshend as chancellor of the Exchequer; and in 1770 was made first lord of the Treasury, in which office he continued till the close of the American war. For his supposed deference to the wishes of George III. in prolonging that struggle, he became exceedingly unpopular, but it is now known that he wished to make peace long before the termination of the contest. He was a man of uniformly good temper, a fair orator, and in his private life was thoroughly amiable. Before his death, he became wholly blind. B. 1733; D. 1792.

NORTH, Christopher, a name assumed by Professor Wilson, an eminent Scottish author. (See WILSON.)

NORTH, a department of France, formed of the old province of Flanders, on the borders of Belgium, and between the departments Aisne, Pas-de-Calais, Somme, and the German Ocean. Area, 2,278 square miles. Desc. Generally flat, and watered by the Somme, the Scheldt, the Lys, and the Deule. The soil is fertile and well cultivated. Pro. Wheat, lint, hemp, tobacco, fruit, and vegetables. Its situation is beyond the limit of the vine. Horses, cattle, and sheep are reared in large numbers, and the yield of wool is valuable. Minerals. Iron, coal, turf, and bitumen. Manf. Cambric, thread, lace, linen, and beet-root sugar. Pop. 1,160,000.

NORTH ADAMS, ăd'-ams, a village of Massachusetts, U.S., 105 miles from Boston. Pop. 3,000.

NORTHALLERTON, nor-thal'-ler-ton, a market and borough town of Yorkshire, 30 miles from York. It has a Gothic church, in the form of a cross. Pop. 5,300.—In the neighbourhood is "Standard Hill," where, in 1138, the battle of the Standard was fought between the Scotch and English, in which the former were defeated. It has a station on the North of England Railway.

NORTHAM, north'-am, a parish of Devonshire, 2 miles from Bideford. Pop. 4,000.

NORTHAMITON, nor-thămp'-ton, the chief town of Northamptonshire, on the Nene, 5 miles from Blisworth. It consists of four principal streets meeting at right angles, and various smaller ones branching off from them. The principal streets are wide, commodious, and regular. There were formerly seven parish churches, of which four now remain. All Saints consists of one large room, with a square chancel, a tower, and a dome supported on four large columns. St. Giles's comprises a nave, aisles, transept, and tower rising from the centre. St. Peter's and St. Sepulchre's are curious specimens of ecclesiastical architecture; the former was erected about the time of the Conquest, and the other by the Knights Templars. Besides the churches, there are other places of worship for various denominations. The other public buildings and institutions are, the general infirmary, the county gaol, the county hall, in the Corinthian style; a barracks, theatre, and a fine Gothic building called Queen's Cross, erected by Edward I. to the memory of his queen Eleanor; besides various schools and a lunatic asylum. Manf. Boots, shoes, lace, hosiery, saddlery, and leather; and there are brass- and iron-works. Of the boot and shoe manufacture it is the principal seat in England. Pop. 28,000. Northampton is noted in history for the number of councils and synods held here, for its formidable castle, its numerous monastic foundations, and various remarkable events. Among these we may notice a great victory gained by the earl of Warwick over the Lancastrians in 1460. In 1642 it was fortified for the Parliament by Lord Brooke; and, in 1675, it was nearly destroyed by fire. It was, for a short time, the seat of a university; and several parliaments have been held in it. A station on the Peterborough branch of the London and North-Western Railway.

NORTHAMPTON, the name of several counties in the United States.—1. On the E. side of Pennsylvania. Area, 418 square miles. Pop. 42,000.—2. In the N. part of North Carolina. Area, 480 square miles. Pop. 15,000.—Also the name of several townships, none of them with a population above 5,500.

NORTHAMPTONSHIRE, an inland county of England, bounded N. by the counties of Leicester, Rutland, and Lincoln; E. and S. by those of Cambridge, Huntingdon, Bedford, Buckingham, and part of Oxford; and W. by those of Oxford and Warwick. Area, 1,016 square miles. Desc. Diversified, and distinguished from the neighbouring counties by extensive forests and private woodlands, which are scattered over the surface, and add greatly to the variety and picturesque beauty of the scenery. Rivers. The principal are the Nene, the Charwell, the Leam, the Avon, the Welland, the Ouse, and the Tone. Climate. Mild, and the air is exceedingly pure and favourable to vegetation. Pro. Chiefly noted as a farming county, and more especially in the department of grazing, which constitutes the capital object of its husbandry, although the raising of grain for exportation is also carried on to a great extent. Horned cattle and other animals are fed in large numbers, and brought to an extraordinary size. Calves are also bred in considerable numbers, and sent out of the county young, to be fattened nearer the metropolis. The dairies are numerous and extensive; and large quantities of butter are regularly sent from them to London. The milk is used to fatten hogs for the same market. All the ordinary crops are raised. Minerals. Except limestone, the mineral productions are few, and of no great value, including neither coal nor any of the metals. Manf. Inconsiderable; consisting chiefly of shoes, lace, and woollen stuffs. At Daventry, a great number of whips are made; and here is a large manufactory of silk hose. The trade is greatly facilitated by canals; and the London and North-Western and Northampton and Peterborough railways traverse the county. Pop. 213,000.—Under the Saxons, Northamptonshire formed a part of Mercia.

NORTH BERWICK. (See BERWICK, NORTH.)

NORTH BERWICK LAW, a conicall hill of Scotland, in E. Lothian, a landmark for seamen. Height, 940 feet.

NORTH, CAPE, the most N. point of land in Europe, in the island of Magerœ, on the coast of Norway. Lat. 71° 11′ 30″ N. Lon. 25° 0′ 45″ E.—The name, also, of several other headlands in different parts of the globe.

NORTHCOTE, James, north'-kote, an English artist and writer on art, who repaired to London in his 25th year to study painting under Sir Joshua Reynolds. He subsequently commenced as a painter of portraits, and was on the high road to fame and fortune, when his ambitious mind led him to abandon that line of art, and to visit Italy for the purpose of studying the ancient masters of historical painting. After spending five years in that artistic land, he returned to London, and soon became extensively employed by Boydell and others to make drawings for the "Shakspeare Gallery," a series of prints illustrative of the writings of the poet. During the subsequent half-century he lived almost solitarily in his studio in Argyle Street, London, where he produced several fine and many excellent works of art, and also occupied himself with literary composition. In 1813 he published "Memoirs of Sir Joshua Reynolds, with an Analysis of his Discourses." In his 82nd year he gave to the public his "One Hundred Fables, Original and Selected," which were embellished with a number of excellent woodcuts, engraved after his designs. His "Life of Titian" subsequently followed; but this work is said to have been written by Hazlitt from his notes and conversations. Two of his best paintings were "The Murder of the Princes in the Tower," and "Hubert and Arthur." Northcote was never married, but had an affectionate companion in a maiden sister. B. at Plymouth, 1746; D. in London, 1831.

NORTH-EAST, the name of several townships in the United States, none of them with a population above 3,000.

NORTHERN CIRCARS. (See CIRCARS.)

NORTHFIELD, north'-feeld, the name of several townships in the United States, none of them with a population above 4,500.

NORTHFLEET, north'-fleet, a parish of Kent, 2 miles from Gravesend. It has shipbuilding-docks and the Rosherville Gardens. Pop. 5,000.

NORTH SEA. (See GERMAN OCEAN.)

NORTHUMBERLAND, DUKES OF. (See DUDLEY and PERCY.)

NORTHUMBERLAND, north-um'-ber-land, an extensive border county of England, bounded on the E. by the German Ocean, N. and N.W. by Scotland, W. by Cumberland, and S. by Durham. Area, 1,871 square miles. Desc. Diversified, and, along the seacoast, nearly level. Towards the middle the surface is thrown into large swelling ridges, formed by the principal rivers: here the land is well inclosed, and, in some places, enriched with wood, though the general appearance is destitute of these ornaments. The western part, except a few intervening valleys, is an extensive scene of open mountainous district, where the hand of cultivation is rarely to be traced. In the northern part, between Wooller and Alnwick, these mountains approach very near to the coast, the top of Cheviot being distant from it not above 18 miles. Rivers. The principal are the Tweed, the Tyne, the Coquet, the Aln, the Till, the College and Beaumont waters, the Wansbeck, the Blyth, and a vast variety of smaller streams. Pro. This county is distinguished for its agriculture, which, being conducted on a great scale, and by men of intelligence, enterprise, and capital, has reached a high degree of perfection. Its soil varies through many gradations, from great fertility to a state of irreclaimable barrenness. The rearing of stock is a capital object with the farmers, as well as the raising of crops for the market; and it is in preserving a due balance between the arable and grass lands, so as always to have a large breeding live stock, especially of sheep, that the excellence of their management is thought chiefly to consist. The principal crops comprise wheat, oats, beans, barley, and turnips. The woodlands are not very extensive. Minerals. Important. Excepting the Cheviot Hills, coal is found over the greater part of Northumberland, especially in the lower district; but the finest kind, which alone is raised for exportation, and goes under the name of Newcastle coals, is confined to a district around that town, called the Coal district. Besides this, there is a Lead district. The mineral strata that accompany and alternate with the coal in the Coal district are chiefly sandstone, or granite, if it be very hard, and slate and clay. The coal of the Lead district is of very inferior quality, and is distinguished by the limestone which accompanies it, and which never occurs in any part of the Coal district. Besides coal and limestone, the Lead district contains sandstones or freestones of various qualities; shell marl in some places, and also slate clay, in which iron-ore is found in such abundance as to have been sometimes worked for the metal. The lead which gives name to so extensive a district is found in veins, traversing chiefly the limestone and sandstone in various parts of the county. Manf. These are chiefly confined to the town of Newcastle and the vicinity of the Tyne. They consist mostly of shipbuilding, roperies, glass-works, potteries, and iron-foundries. Pop. 305,000.

NORTHUMBERLAND, a maritime county of New South Wales, E. Australia, with a mountainous surface. Area, 2,342 square miles. Pop. 14,000.—In this district coal is found in considerable quantities.

NORTHUMBERLAND, the name of two counties in the United States.—1. In the central part of Pennsylvania, watered by both branches of the Susquehannah. Area, 431 square miles. Pop. 24,000.—2. In Virginia, west of Chesapeak Bay. Area, 143 square miles. Pop. 8,000.—Also the name of several townships, none of them with a population above 2,000.

NORTHUMBERLAND CAPE is in S. Australia. Lat. 38° 3′ S. Lon. 140° 37′ E.

NORTHUMBERLAND ISLANDS lie near the N.E. coast of Australia. Lat. 21° 32′ to 22° S. Lon. 149° 47′ to 150° 37′ E.

NORTH-WESTERN PROVINCES, a division of India, comprising the divisions of Delhi, Agra, Allahabad, Benares, Meerut, and Rohilcund. Area, 72,000 square miles. Pop. 31,000,000. Lat. between 21° 17′ and 31° 6′ N. Lon. between 73° 2′ and 84° 40′ E. Within these boundaries the Non-regulation districts are included.

NORTH-WEST PASSAGE, a water communication between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, to the north of the American continent. It was discovered in 1850-51, by Captain McClure, of the Investigator, whilst in search of Sir John Franklin.

NORTHWICH, north′-wich, a town of England, 18 miles from Chester. It is noted for its neighbouring salt-mines. Pop. 1,500.

NORTON, nor′-ton, the name of numerous parishes and small towns of England, none of them with a population above 3,000.

NORTON, Hon. Caroline Elizabeth Sarah, a modern English poetess, one of the three daughters of Thomas Sheridan, son of the celebrated Richard Brinsley Sheridan. Her father dying while she was still very young, her care devolved upon her mother, who gave her a high education. At the age of 19 she became the wife of the Hon. George Chapple Norton, the barrister and police-magistrate. In 1829 she commenced her career of authorship by publishing anonymously the "Sorrows of Rosalie," a tale, and other poems. In the following year she achieved the greatest success as a poetess, with the production of her "Undying One," and other poems, which the "Quarterly Review" declared to be worthy of Lord Byron. The "Child of the Islands," "Aunt Carry's Ballads for Children," and "Stuart of Dunleath," a novel, were her subsequent works. In 1854 her warm sympathies with the social wrongs of her sex found expression in a work entitled "English Laws for Women in the 19th Century." This work was privately printed; but a very large circulation was obtained for a later effort of the same character, which was named "A Letter to the Queen on Lord Chancellor Cranworth's Marriage and Divorce Bill." B. 1808.

NORWAY, nor′-wai, a country of the north of Europe, extending from the Naze to the North Cape, and bounded E. by Sweden and Swedish Lapland; W. by the German and Northern oceans; and S. by the narrow sea forming the entrance to the Sound and Baltic. Coast. Extensive, and deeply indented with openings, called fiords or firths. Area, 121,807 square miles. Desc. Norway is divided into 17 counties, and presents a very uneven surface, comprising a succession of mountains and valleys; the former in general barren and uninhabited; the latter not deficient in the products of a high latitude. The line of separation between Norway and Sweden is very clearly marked by the Thulian Mountains, extending above a thousand miles from north to south, and composed of several ridges. These form the watershed of the peninsula, and, on the side of Norway, descend abruptly, and throw off to the N. and W. ranges which are continued to the Logoden Islands. Besides these, there are the Dovrefield in the centre, and the Koelen Mountains in the N. The highest summits are those of Skagotlos Find and Sneehalten, both above 8,000 feet. Rivers. Numerous, and of difficult navigation, being either mountainous torrents, or interrupted in the navigation by rapids and falls. The principal are the Glommen and the Tana. Lakes. Extremely numerous. The most remarkable are those of Miosen, Fœmund, and Sperdillen. Climate. Not severe throughout. In the mountains the cold of winter is intense. On the sea-coast the atmosphere is softened by the western breeze, and is often less cold, in the depth of winter than in the interior of Germany. There is no spring, however, and the summer is both very hot and dry. Pro. Flax and hemp are raised in many parts of the country, and in others barley and oats. The pastures are pretty good, and cattle are reared and exported in numbers; but the main article of export is timber. The mountains are covered with forests of pine, ash, but in particular of fir, which grows over almost all the country. The horses are small but hardy; goats are more plentiful than sheep; swine are not abundant. Minerals. Iron and copper of a very superior quality, besides lead, some silver, and marble. Stone for building, and slate, are in great abundance; and the loadstone, or natural magnet, is also frequently found and exported. Zoology. In Norwegian Lapland, the reindeer forms the sole wealth, and almost the only source of the subsistence of the inhabitants. In the mountains and forests are numbers of beasts of prey, such as bears, wolves, lynxes, and foxes. Water-fowl, especially the eider-duck, is very plentiful. During the hot season, mosquitoes are almost as troublesome as they are in tropical countries. Manf. The only works of industry possessed by Norway are forges, foundries, glass-houses, potash-refineries, and saw-mills. The inhabitants of the towns import the various articles they are in want of. The fisheries are extensive, and may be considered, after timber and iron, the chief support of the export trade. The herring and cod fisheries are the principal branches. Inhabitants. Teutonic. Pop. 1,329,000. Lat. between 57° 57′ 45″ and 71° 11′ 40″ N. Lon. between 4° 50′ and 31° 15′ E. Norway, since it has come into the possession of Sweden, in 1814, is governed as a province of that country, exactly as it was formerly governed as a province of Denmark. (See SWEDEN.)

NORWICH, nor′-ij, an ancient city of England, the chief town of the county of Norfolk, on the river Wensom, which is navigable up to the town, and crossed by 10 bridges, 18 miles from Yarmouth. It has a circumference of about 5 miles, and formerly had an embattled wall, with 12 gates, and flanked by 40 towers, some remains of which are yet to be seen. The streets in general are narrow and ill disposed; but there are many good buildings; and modern improvements have imparted to the town a better appearance than it had formerly. The chief public buildings are the castle and the cathedral; but there are, besides, a large number of other churches, different places of worship, and numerous institutions for charitable, benevolent, or other useful purposes. The castle stands in the centre of the town, on an eminence raised partly by art above the adjacent ground, and commanding a fine view of the city. It was first erected in the 6th century, by the Saxons. The keep, a principal tower, is the only considerable part of the building which now remains. The cathedral is one of the most spacious and handsome buildings of the kind in the kingdom. The architecture is chiefly in the Norman style, of which the semicircular arch and large short column are the leading features. The whole length of the church, from east to west, is 411 feet; of the nave, from western door to transept, 140 feet; the width of transept is 191 feet, and of the nave, with aisles, 72 feet. At the intersection of the transept with the nave and choir, rises a lofty tower, surmounted by a spire, the whole height of which is 315 feet. The bishop's palace stands on the same site with that which was built by the founder of the cathedral. Of the parish churches, the only one deserving particular notice is that of St. Peter Mancroft, which is distinguished for its size and architecture. The other public buildings are, the Guildhall, St. Andrew's Hall, formerly the conventual church of the Benedictine monastery of Blackfriars; the assembly-room, the theatre, the market-place, gaol, and bridewell, or house of correction, built of flint, and curiously cut into regular little squares, without any appearance of cement. The charitable establishments are, the Norfolk and Norwich Hospital, the dispensary, Doughty's Hospital, Bethlehem Hospital, or Bedlam, an excellent institution for lunatics. There are, besides, a great number of other charities and benefactions, numerous charity and Sunday schools, a free grammar-school, literary institution, mechanics' institute, art union, and also a public library, with various other institutions for the pursuit of knowledge. Manf. Norwich was early famed for its woollen manufactures. The staple articles are bombazines, worsted damasks, flowered satins, fine camlets, gauzes, crapes, bandanas, mohair, silk fabrics, cottons, lace, shawls, and other fancy goods, both for furniture and dress. A trade in linen, called Suffolk hempen, is also carried on; and there are iron- and brass-foundries, snuff-, oil-, mustard-, and corn-mills; breweries, and dyeing-works. Pop. about 70,000. This is the birthplace of Dr. Samuel Clarke, Archbishop Parker, Dr. Kay, and Beloe, the translator of Herodotus. In it a triennial musical festival is held.

NORWICH, a township of Connecticut, U.S., on the Thames, 35 miles from Hartford. It contains a court-house, a gaol, churches for different denominations of dissenters, and is favourably situate for trade. Pop. 11,000.—Also the name of several other townships, none of them with a population above 4,000.

NORWOOD, nor'-wood, a chapelry of England, in Middlesex, 2 miles from Hounslow. Pop. 3,000.—Also the name of two villages in Surrey, with a station on the London and Croydon Railway. They have separate churches, a cemetery, and public gardens. Pop. 6,300.

NORWOOD, Richard, an English mathematician, who in 1633 measured a degree of the meridian between London and York. Nothing authentic is known of his personal history. His most important works were, "Fortification, or Military Architecture," "The Seaman's Practice," "Trigonometry, or the Doctrine of Triangles," and "Application of the Doctrine of Triangles."

NOSTRADAMUS, Michael, nos-tra-dai'-mus, a notorious French astrologer and physician. He studied physic at Montpellier, where he took his doctor's degree. Having rendered some eminent service to the inhabitants of Aix when the city was visited by the plague, he received an annual pension from the town during many years. In 1555 he published his prophecies, which, though very obscure and absurd, gained the author a considerable reputation. These were followed by several others, the whole making one volume folio, in barbarous verse. Nostradamus was honoured with marks of distinction by persons of the highest rank, particularly Charles IX., king of France. B. at St. Remy, 1503; D. 1566.

NOTO, VAL DI, no'-to, one of the old provinces into which Sicily was divided, forming the S.E. portion of the island. It now comprises the districts of Catania, Syracuse, and Caltanisetta.

NOTO, a town in the above province, delightfully situate on an eminence, 15 miles from Syracuse. Of its numerous churches and convents, several are elegantly built. It is chiefly noted for a valuable museum of medallions. Pop. 16,000. About 3 miles from this town are the remains of the ancient Netum, destroyed by an earthquake in 1693.

NOTRE DAME, notr dam, the name of numerous parishes and villages in France, none of them with a population above 3,000.

NOTTAWAY, not'-ta-wai, a county in the S. of Virginia, U.S. Area, 261 square miles. Pop. 9,000—Also a river of Virginia.

NOTTINGHAM, Heneage Finch, Earl of, not'-ting-ham, an eminent English lawyer and statesman, who, after completing his education at the university of Oxford, was entered of the Middle Temple, and was subsequently called to the bar. He became solicitor-general under Charles II., at the Restoration, and took a prominent part in the prosecutions of the regicides, an account of which he published in 1660, in a curious work entitled "An Exact and Impartial Account of the Indictment, Arraignment, Trial, and Judgment (according to law) of Twenty-nine Regicides." In the following year he was chosen to represent the university of Oxford in parliament, and was created a baronet. In 1667 he had a principal share in impeaching the earl of Clarendon, and was, three years later, appointed attorney-general. In 1673 he received the great seal of England as lord-keeper; in 1675 he became lord chancellor of England. At the trial of Viscount Stafford, in 1680, he presided as lord high steward, and delivered judgment against that nobleman in a speech of great eloquence. In the following year he was created earl of Nottingham. Besides the work above mentioned, he published several others, the chief of which were "An Argument on the Claim of the Crown to Pardon on Impeachment," "Speech at the Sentence of William, Viscount Stafford," and "Reports of Cases in the High Court of Chancery." Dryden, in his "Absalom and Achitophel," alludes to the earl of Nottingham under the name of Amri:—

> "To whom the double blessing does belong,
> With Moses' inspiration, Aaron's tongue."

The earl's reputation is that of a sound lawyer and upright judge. B. 1621; D. 1682.

NOTTINGHAM, Daniel Finch, Earl of, was eldest son of the preceding, and finished his education at Christ Church, Oxford. In 1680 he was appointed first lord of the Admiralty, and, in 1682, succeeded his father as earl of Nottingham. He opposed the arbitrary measures of James II.; but though he was an adherent of the party of the prince of Orange, he was against his taking possession of the throne, and strenuously supported the convention in favour of the regency. However, William offered him the post of lord chancellor, which he declined; but he was, for a short time, secretary of state. On the death of Queen Anne, he was one of the lords justices for the administration of affairs, and, soon after, was made president of the council; but, in 1710, he was dismissed, on account of a speech which he made in the behalf of the Scottish lords condemned for high treason. In 1729 he became earl of Winchelsea, on the death of John, fifth earl, in virtue of his descent from Elizabeth, daughter and heiress of Sir Thomas Heneage, and wife of Sir Moyle Finch, his great-grandfather. He was an able speaker and a man of learning, as appears from his reply to Whiston on the Trinity, for which he received the thanks of the university of Oxford and of the bishop and clergy of London. D. 1730.

NOTTINGHAM, Charles Howard, Earl of. (See HOWARD, Lord.)

NOTTINGHAM, a town of England, and the capital of Nottinghamshire, is situate on a rocky eminence, in a line with the course of the Trent, which is here crossed by a bridge of nineteen arches, 16 miles from Derby. The little river Lene runs into the Trent close to the town, which stands on a hill so steep, that the ground floors of the houses towards the top of it are considerably elevated above the roofs of those at the bottom. The ancient walls and gates of the town are entirely destroyed. Of the public buildings, the castle is the most conspicuous. It is a large and handsome building, erected near the site of the ancient fortress, by the duke of Newcastle, during the short reign of James II. The ancient fortress was founded by William the Conqueror, and was then thought impregnable. The other buildings are churches, an exchange, assembly-rooms, lunatic asylum, theatre, cavalry and infantry barracks, hospitals, and schools. The market-place has been long admired, and is one of the most spacious in the kingdom. Manf. Stockings, chiefly the finer kinds, as those of silk and cotton; lace for veils, and shawls. It has also flax-mills, dye-works, wire-works, and breweries; but lace is its great staple, of which it is the centre in the kingdom. Pop. 58,000. —Several parliaments have been held in this town.

NOTTINGHAM, the name of various townships in the United States, none of them with a population above 5,000.

NOTTINGHAMSHIRE, not'-ting-ham-sheer, an inland county of England, bounded on the N. by Yorkshire, E. by Lincolnshire, S. by Leicestershire, and W. by Derbyshire. Area, 837 square miles. Desc. Except in the Vale of Trent, its surface is undulating, and sufficiently irregular and broken to avoid the sameness of a general flat. Rivers. The principal are the Trent, the Idle, the Soar, and the Erewash. Climate. Mild and salubrious. Pro. Turnips, clover, wheat, barley, and oats; the latter of a remarkably fine quality. More pigeons are supposed to be reared in this district than anywhere besides in England. Hops form an article of considerable cultivation in the central parts of the county. Mincrals. Coal is abundant, and is supposed to be part of the same deposit which is found in Derbyshire, Yorkshire, Durham, and Northumberland. Besides coal, limestone and gypsum are found. Building- and paving-stone are quarried in different parts, and marl is also found in various places. Manf. Nottinghamshire has been long noted for its stockings, of which Nottingham is the principal seat. It has also cotton-, worsted-, and silk-mills; thread, lace, starch, and sailcloth manufactories. Canals traverse the county, and greatly facilitate the means of communication, in conjunction with branches of the North Midland, Sheffield and Lincoln, and Great Northern railways. Pop. 272,000.—Nottinghamshire formed a part of the ancient kingdom of Mercia.

NOTTING-HILL, not'-ting hil, a suburban hamlet of London, in Middlesex, 5 miles from St. Paul's Cathedral. Pop. 8,500.

NOTTUROE, not'-tu-ro'-e, an island of Norway, in Christiana Fiord, immediately to the S. of Tonsberg. Ext. 7 miles long, with a breadth of 3. Pop. 3,500.

NOUE, Francis de la, noo, surnamed the Arm of Iron, a celebrated French soldier, who distinguished himself in the wars of Italy, and, upon his return to France, espoused the cause of the Huguenots, then in arms against the Catholics. He took Orleans in 1567, and, two years afterwards, signalized himself at the battle of Jarnac; subsequently to which he made himself master of Fontenoy; on which occasion he lost his left arm. He had another made of iron; whence his surname. He was at the siege of Rochelle, and, in 1578, entered the service of the States-general in the Low Countries, where he took Count Egmont prisoner; but was himself taken in 1580, and did not gain his liberty till five years afterwards. In the time of the League he served on the royal side, and was killed by a musket-shot at the siege of Lamballe. He was the author of a "Discourse, Political and Military," which was first printed in 1587. B. in Brittany, 1531; killed, 1591.

NOUR-DJIHAN, noor-ji-han', wife of Geanjir, the Mogul emperor. She was the daughter of a Tartar general, and became sultana in 1611. After the death of her husband, she retired to the palace at Lahore. Her tomb is accounted one of the most beautiful edifices in that city. To Nour-Djihan has been attributed the discovery of the essence of roses. B. 1585; D. 1645.

NOUR-EDDIN, Mahmoud, noor-ed'-din or noor-ed-deen', sultan of Egypt, was the son of Sanguin, or Amad-eddin. When his father was slain by his own eunuchs at the siege of Jabbar, in 1146, Nour-eddin and his brother Seiff-eddin divided his possessions between them. The former obtained the sovereignty of Aleppo, and, by his prudence, became one of the most powerful princes of the East. He distinguished himself against the Christians in the time of the crusades; he defeated Jocelyn de Courtenay, count of Edessa, and Raymond, prince of Antioch, whose head was sent as a trophy to the caliph at Bagdad; after which he made himself master of Egypt. To the qualities of a great warrior he added the virtues of a liberal prince: he patronized the arts and sciences, founded cities and establishments of learning, hospitals, caravanserais, and mosques. To him has been ascribed the first employment of pigeons to carry messages. B. 1117; D. at Damascus, 1173.

NOUR-EDDIN, Ali, was the eldest of the seventeen sons of the celebrated Salah-eddin (the Saladin of Christian writers). At his father's death, Damascus, Southern Syria, and Palestine fell to his share; but he was soon afterwards deprived of his kingdom by his brother and uncle. After vainly attempting to recover Damascus from his uncle, he retired to Samosata, where he died. B. 1170; D. 1224.

NOUR-EDDIN, Aralan Shah, prince of Moossool and Mesopotamia, succeeded his father in 1193. He was a just and liberal monarch, and, in a great degree, restored the declining power of his dynasty. D. 1210.

NOUR-EDDIN, Ali, second sultan of the Tartar Mamelukes in Egypt, ascended the throne upon the assassination of his father Ibeh, in 1257. He reigned only two years; being deposed by the emir Kotuz, in 1259.

NOVALIS, Frederick von Hardenberg, usually styled, a celebrated German writer. He was the son of Baron von Hardenberg, and was sent in 1790 to the university of Jena; after which he passed to that of Leipsic, in 1792. About the year 1797 he published his "Hymns to Night;" and between that time and the year 1801, when his premature death took place, he produced a number of works displaying a boundless imagination and a love of the mystical and supernatural such as is not to be equalled in any other writer. In 1800 he gave to the world his wild and grotesque romance entitled "Heinrich von Ofterdingen." A complete collection of his writings was made by his friends Tieck and Frederick Schlegel. B. at Mansfeld, 1772; D. 1801.

NOVARA, no-va'-ra, a city of Sardinia, Piedmont, defended by a castle, 27 miles from Milan. It stands on the Mora; has a cathedral, other churches, two colleges, convents, a hall of commerce, hospital, and a theatre: it also contains a number of handsome private buildings. Manf. Silks, linens, hats, and leather. Pop. 19,000.—In 1849 the Sardinians were here disastrously defeated by the Austrians (see CHARLES ALBERT); and in 1859 a French corps occupied the town.

NOVA SCOTIA, no'-va sko'-she-a, in its most extensive meaning, a province of British America, bounded N.W. by Canada, N.E. by the Gulf of St. Lawrence, S.E. by the Atlantic, and S. by the Atlantic Ocean and the United States of America. It was, in the year 1784, divided into two provinces; viz., New Brunswick and Nova Scotia proper. Nova Scotia, in this limited sense, is a peninsula, joined to the continent by an isthmus 14 miles across, at the N.E. extremity of the Bay of Fundy. Area. Estimated at about 17,000 square miles. Desc. Greatly diversified and well watered. The winter is of almost insupportable length and severity; and the soil, in most parts, is thin and barren. Pro. Wheat, rye, oats, potatoes, and turnips. Live stock are reared, and hogs are numerous. Mincrals. Coal. Manf. Weaving, carding; and there are numerous mills, tanneries, distilleries, and breweries. Pop. 280,000. Lat. between 43° 25′ and 45° 40′ N. Lon. between 60° 35′ and 66° 10′ W.—This country was discovered by Cabot, in 1497, and, under the name of Acadia, was subsequently settled by the French. In 1758 it finally came into possession of the British. In 1860 this colonial territory was visited by the prince of Wales, who was everywhere received with the greatest enthusiasm.

NOVATIAN, no-vai'-shi-an, a pagan philosopher, who embraced Christianity, was admitted to holy orders, and became the first anti-pope. Being of an ambitious character, he contrived to get himself ordained bishop, which was done in an irregular manner in Italy. He then endeavoured to get possession of the see of Rome, after the death of Pope Fabian, but was opposed by Cornelius. Novatian promulgated the doctrine, that it was sinful to admit persons who had once lapsed into idolatry to communion; a practice then universal in the Church. This produced a schism, in which Novatian had many partisans, who called themselves Catharites, or pure. By others, however, they were named Novatians. To the above error they added many others, particularly those of the Montanists. There are several works by Novatian extant, an English edition of which was published by Jackson at London in 1728. Lived in the 3rd century of the Christian era.

NOVA ZEMBLA, zem'-bla, a large island in the Arctic Ocean, belonging to the Russian government of Archangel, from which it is separated by the Straits of Waigatz. Ext. Estimated at 470 miles long, with an average breadth of 56. No part of this dreary and inhospitable region has any permanent inhabitants; but particular tracts of the south and west coasts are visited by fishermen and hunters sent out by the merchants of Archangel and Mezen. Subterranean stone labyrinths of great antiquity have been discovered in it. Lat. between 70° 30′ and 76° 30′ N. Lon. between 52° and 66° E.

NOVELDA, no-vail'-da, a town of Spain, 13 miles from Alicante. Manf. Lace; and there are several distilleries. Pop. 9,000.

NOVENIASTO, no'-ven-i-as'-to, the name of several towns in Poland, none of them with a population above 3,500.

NOVGOROD, or NOVOGOROD, nov-go-rod', a large government or province in the N.W. of European Russia, to the E. of the governments of St. Petersburg and Pskov. Area. Estimated at 50,000 square miles. Desc. Well watered, partially fertile, and of a severe climate. Pro. Rye, oats, and barley; hemp and flax are also raised. Manf. Unimportant. Pop. 900,000. Lat. between 57° and 61° N. Lon. between 30° and 40° E.

NOVGOROD, or NOVGOROD-VELIKI, 'the Great Novgorod,' the capital of the above government, at the extremity of the Lake Ilmen, 100 miles from St. Petersburg. It is divided into two parts by the Volchof; one called the Torgaraia, or the Market-town; the other the Sophiskaia, or quarter of St. Sophia. The latter contains the Kremlin, or citadel, in which are the ancient palace of the czars, now in a state of dilapidation, and the cathedral of St. Sophia, a large building with brazen gates. The other part of the town has the building occupied by the governor; but the rest of the habitations are an irregular collection of wooden structures. Manf. Sailcloth, vinegar, and leather. Pop. 16,000.—Novgorod-Veliki is one of the most ancient cities of the empire, having been founded in the 5th century. In the 12th, 13th, and 14th centuries it was a place of great commercial importance.

NOVGOROD-SIEVERSKOI, a town of European Russia, in the government of Tzernigov, 108 miles from the town of that name. Pop. 8,000.

NOVI, no'-ve, a town of Italy, in the Sardinian states, at the foot of the Apennines, 15 miles from Alessandria. It has a castle, situate in an elevated position, a college, and an hospital. Manf. Silk. Pop. 12,000.—It is noted for a sanguinary battle, in August, 1799, between the French, under Joubert, and the Austro-Russian forces: the latter were victorious.—The name of other two towns in Italy, neither with a population above 3,000.

NOVI-BAZAR, no'-ne-ba'-zar, a town of European Turkey, in Servia, near the Oresco, 85 miles from Belgrade. It has a castle, several mosques, and shops. Pop. 15,000.

NOVIKOFF, Nicolas Ivanovitch, nov'-i-kof, a Russian gentleman, who devoted his life to the production of standard editions of the authors of his country. He has been called the "Franklin of Russia." The first circulating library in Moscow was established by him; and, among other important works, he produced a "Library of Old Russian Authors," in 30 vols. B. 1744; D. 1818.

NOVO-TCHERKASK, cher-gask', a town of Russia, on the Don, 240 miles from Jakaterinoslav. It has a cathedral, with numerous other churches. Pop. 14,000.

NOWAGURH, no-wa-gur', a raj of India, subject to the political agent of the S.W. frontier. Area, 1,512 square miles. Pop. 70,000. Lat. 20° 20′ N. Lon. 82° E.

NOWANUGGUR, no'-wa-nug-gur', a town of India, in the province of Guzerat, 310 miles from Bombay. It has an active trade, and is the capital of a district. Pop. Unascertained.—The DISTRICT has a population estimated at 210,000.

NOY, William, noi, an eminent English lawyer, who, at the beginning of the reign of Charles I., sat in parliament, and opposed the court; but, being made attorney-general in 1631, he gave his adherence to the most unpopular measures, particularly that of shipmoney, which was of his proposing. He wrote a "Treatise of the Grounds and Maxims of the Laws of England," the "Complete Lawyer," and other works. B. in Cornwall about 1577; D. 1634.

NOYON, nwoi-yaung', a town of France, in the department of the Oise, on the Verse, 70 miles from Paris. It has a cathedral, an hospital, a bishop's palace, and a seminary. Manf. Linen, leather, hats, and stockings. Pop. 6,000.

NUBIA, nu'-be-a, a country of E. Africa, inclosed between Egypt, the Nile, Abyssinia, and the Red Sea. Area, with Kordofan, estimated at 300,000 square miles. Desc. With the exception of the immediate banks of the Nile, which are rendered fertile by laborious irrigation, Nubia consists almost entirely of sandy and rocky deserts. As the Nile here seldom or ever overflows its banks, the land is irrigated exclusively by wheels, which raise the waters to the adjacent grounds. Rivers. The Nile is the principal. Pro. Chiefly the grain called "dhourra;" also barley, French beans, lentils, sometimes water-melons, tobacco, indigo, dates, senna, and coffee. No fruit-trees are cultivated except palms, though the climate seems very well adapted to them. Cattle, sheep, and goats are reared by the Arabs in the deserts; whilst the giraffe and antelope are among t its wild animals. Climate. Intensely hot in summer, yet remarkably healthy, in consequence, probably, of the extreme dryness of the atmosphere. Inhabitants. The Nubians are in general well made, strong, and muscular, with fine features. The women are not handsome, but perfectly well made, and possess, in general, sweet countenances, and are modest and reserved in their manners. Pop. 400,000. Lat. between 11° and 24° N. Lon. between 28° and 39° E. One of the most remarkable features of this region consists in the magnificent remains of antiquity with which it is covered. Before its conquest, in 1821, by Ibrahim Pasha, it was governed by a great number of independent chiefs; since that time it has been under the sway of Egypt.

NUDDEA, nood-de-a', the ancient capital of a district of the same name, in Bengal. Pop. Unascertained. The DISTRICT has an area of 2,942 square miles, and a population of 300,000. Lat. between 22° and 24° N.

NUMA-POMPILIUS, nu'-ma pom-pil'-i-us, according to tradition, second king of Rome. He is said to have introduced among his subjects religious festivals and a code of laws. Supposed to have lived between the 8th and 7th centuries B.C.

NUMENIUS, nu-me'-ni-us, a Greek Christian philosopher of the 2nd century, was a native of Apamea, in Syria, and followed the opinions of Pythagoras and Plato; but he charged the latter philosopher with having stolen, without acknowledgement, from the works of the Jewish legislator, and therefore called him "the Greek Moses." Fragments of Numenius are extant.

NUMERIANUS, Marcus Aurelius, nu-me-ri-ai'-nus, son of the emperor Carus, by whom he was honoured with the title of Cæsar, and succeeded him, with his brother Carinus, in 284. He was murdered shortly after by his father-in-law, Arrius Aper, prefect of the Prætorians, who himself subsequently fell a sacrifice to the irritated soldiers. Killed 284.

NUNEATON, nun-e'-ton, a well-built market-town of Warwickshire, on the Anker, 8 miles from Coventry. The church has a square tower, and there is a good free school. Manf. Ribbons. Pop. 8,300. It has a station on the Trent Valley Railway.

NUNGGENAH, nun-ge-na', a town of India, in the N.W. Provinces. Manf. Fire-arms. Pop. 30,000. Lat. 29° 27′ N. Lon. 78° 30′ E.

NUREMBERG, nu'-rem-burg (Germ. NUREMBERG, noom'-bairg), an ancient town of Bavaria, on the Pegnitz, which divides it into two parts nearly equal, 96 miles from Munich. It is surrounded by an old wall and ditch, with round towers at intervals. Of the public edifices, the chief are the castle or fort called Reichsfeste, the occasional residence of emperors in the middle ages. The council-house, built in 1619, is a fine old structure; the church of St. Sebald, also a fine building, adorned with beautiful sculptures and paintings. In the public library is a good collection of manuscripts and early editions of printed books. The church of St. Egidien, rebuilt in 1718, has elegant columns, and a beautiful altar-piece by Vandyke. The other public buildings are an alms-office, a foundling hospital, and a house of correction. Industry. At an early period it was a noted place for working in iron, brass, and other metals. Its wares have long comprised a great variety of articles; such as musical and mathematical instruments, copper-plates, pins, needles, spectacles, and toys of all kinds, whether of hardware or wood. The printing and bookselling business is also carried on to a considerable extent. In 1390 the first paper-mill in Germany was established here, and here gun-carriages were first made. The first railway in Germany was also opened from Nuremberg to Furth in 1836. Pop. 47,000. In 938, this place was the seat of the first German diet: in 1805, Napoleon I. annexed it to Bavaria. It is the birthplace of Albert Durer, whose house is still to be seen in the principal square. It has a station on the Augsburg and Leipsic Railway. Nuremberg appears to have been most prosperous in the 15th and 16th centuries.

NUSCO, noos'-ko, a town of Naples, with several convents and a cathedral, 46 miles from Naples. Pop. 4,000.

NUSSDORF, noos'-dorf, several villages of Austria, none of them with a population above 2,000.

NYASSI, nyas'-se, 'the Sea,' a large lake of S.E. Africa, supposed to be the Lake Maravi in the old maps of Africa. Lat. The centre about 10° S. Lon. between 30° and 35° E.

NYE, Philip, ni, a nonconformist divine. In 1620 he became curate of St. Michael's, Cornhill. Becoming a puritan, he went to Holland, and did not return till the civil wars, when he was chosen a member of the assembly of divines. He was a zealous champion of the Solemn League and Covenant: he wrote several sermons and tracts. Butler thus whimsically alludes to this person in his "Hudibras,"—"Philip Nye's thanksgiving beard." D. in Sussex, about 1596; D. 1672.

NYIREGYHAZA, nyir'-e-dya'-zar, a town of Hungary, in the palatinate of Szabolcs, 30 miles from Debreczin. It has churches for Lutherans, Calvinists, and Catholics, besides soda- and salt-works. Pop. 14,000.

NYKÖPING, ni-che(r)'-ping, a town of Sweden, the capital of a district of the same name, and of Sudermania, on a bay of the Baltic, 52 miles from Stockholm. Pop. 3,000.—The DISTRICT has an area of 2,508 square miles, and a population of 115,000. It is abundant in mineral products.

NYMPHÆ, nim'-fe, 'Nymphs,' certain female deities among the ancients. They were generally divided into two classes, nymphs of the land, and nymphs of the sea. Of the nymphs of the earth, some presided over woods, and were called Dryades and Hamadryades; others presided over mountains, and were called Oreades; some presided over hills and dales, and were called Napææ, &c. Of the sea nymphs, some were called Oceanides, Nereides, Naiades, Potamides, &c. These presided not only over the sea, but also rivers, fountains, streams, and lakes. The nymphs were immortal, according to some mythologists: they lived for several thousand years, according to Hesiod. The number of the nymphs is not precisely known; according to Hesiod, there were above 3,000, whose power was extended over the different places of the earth, and the various functions and occupations of mankind. They were generally represented as young and beautiful virgins, veiled up to the middle, and sometimes holding a vase, from which they seemed to pour water.

NYON, ne'-one, a town of Switzerland, in the canton of Vaud, on the Lake of Geneva, 21 miles from Lausanne. Pop. 2,500.

NYONS, ne'-awng, a town of France, in the department of Drôme, on the Aigues, 33 miles from Avignon. Manf. Earthenware, leather, and silk. Pop. 4,000.

NYSTAD, ne(r)'-stad, a seaport-town of European Russia, in Finland, on the Gulf of Bothnia, 38 miles from Abo. Pop. 2,000.

NYSTEN, Peter Hubert, nis'-ten, an eminent French physician and writer on medicine. He was charged with several important undertakings by the government of his country, and was appointed physician to the hospital for children. His most important works were "New Dictionary of Medicine, Surgery, and Botany," and "Experiments upon the Muscular Organs of Mankind and upon those of Warm-blooded Animals." B. in France, 1771; D. at Paris, 1818.

NYVEL. (See NEVILLES.)

O.

OADLEY, odo'-le, a parish of Leicestershire, 4 miles from Leicester. Pop. 1,200.

OAHOO, wo'-hoo, one of the Sandwich Islands. (See WOAHOO.)

OAKE, o'-ke, a parish of Somersetshire, 5 miles from Taunton. Pop. 200.

OAKHAM, oke'-ham, the chief town of Rutlandshire, in the vale of Catmos, 12 miles from Stamford. Its church is a fine building, with a lofty spire. Pop. 3,000. —It has a station on the Midland Railway, and is connected by canal with Melton Mowbray.

OAKHAMPTON, oke'-ham-ton, a market-town of Devonshire, near the source of the river Oak, on the borders of Dartmoor Forest, 22 miles from Exeter. It is an ancient town, and, at the time of the Domesday survey, had a market and four burgesses. It was then held by Baldwin de Briouiis, a Norman, who built the castle, the ruins of which are still standing about a mile from the town. Pop. 650.

OAKINGHAM. (See WOKINGHAM.)

OAKLEY, oke'-le, the name of several parishes in England, none of them with a population above 1,200.

OATES, Titus, otes, a notorious character in the history of the 17th century. He was originally of the Baptist persuasion; but afterwards obtained orders in the church of England, and was appointed chaplain of a ship of war. Being dismissed the service for his immoral conduct, he became a lecturer in London, and, in conjunction with Dr. Tongue, invented a pretended Popish plot, of which several persons were accused, on the testimony of Oates, and executed. For this discovery, Oates received a pension of £1,200 per annum. In the succeeding reign, however, he was convicted of perjury, pilloried, and sentenced to be imprisoned for life; but obtained his release at the Revolution. B. about 1620; D. 1705.

OAXACA, or GUAXACA, wa-ha'-ka, a department of the Mexican Confederation, bounded N. by Vera Cruz, E. by Guatemala, W. by La Puebla, and S. by the Pacific Ocean. Area, 33,000 square miles. Desc. Mountainous in the N., and otherwise highly fertile. Rivers. The Rio Verde and Tehuantepee. Pro. Wheat, maize, cotton, sugar, cocoa, silk, and cochineal. Minerals. Gold and silver. Pop. 500,000. Lat. between 16° 40′ and 18° 20′ N. Lon. between 91° and 98° 30′ W.

OAXACA, the capital of the department, is situate 210 miles S. of the city of Mexico, in the delightful valley of Guaxaca, watered by a beautiful river. The town is laid out in the form of an oblong square, and the streets are wide and well paved. It has a bishop's palace, cathedral, and a town-house, built with stone of a sea-green colour. Pop. 24,000.

OBADIAH, o-ba-di'-a, the fourth of the minor prophets, is by some supposed to have been cotemporary with Hosea; but St. Jerome maintains him to be the same with Obadiah, the servant of Ahab and friend of Elijah.

OBAN, o'-ban, a village of Scotland, in Argyleshire, situate on a fine bay of a semicircular form, in the Sound of Mull, 20 miles from Inverary. It has risen rapidly, and is well adapted for trade, having an excellent harbour. Manf. Silk and straw hats. It has a trade in wool, whiskey, slates, and fish. Pop. 2,000.—It has communication with Liverpool, Glasgow, Tobermoy, and the Western Islands, by steam-packets.

OBER, o'-bair, the prefix of numerous places in Germany, none with a population exceeding 6,000.

OBERLAND, o'-bair-land, Switzerland, comprises the canton of Berne, S. of the Lake of Thun, with the adjacent parts of Uri and Unterwalden. More restricted, it applies to the valleys of Grindelwald, Hasli, and Lauterbrunnen.

OBERLIN, Jeremiah James, o'-bair-lin, a learned writer in German and French, who, in 1763, was appointed librarian at Strasburg, and afterwards became professor of logic and metaphysics in the university of that city. He wrote a number of curious and learned works; such as "Dissertation upon the Troubadours of Alsace," "Essays on the Dialects of Lorraine," also several valuable elementary manuals in German, and produced good editions of Horace, Tacitus, and other classic authors. B. at Strasburg, 1735; D. at the same city, 1806.

OBERLIN, John Frederick, a celebrated philanthropist, who, after completing his studies at the university of Strasburg, entered into orders as a Lutheran divine. In 1767 he became pastor of the Ban-de-la-Roche, then a wild and sterile district, lying on the western slope of a range of mountains to the east of the Vosges. He found the inhabitants of that district in a condition bordering upon barbarism; but he succeeded in causing them to make roads to Strasburg, to build a bridge across the river Bruche, at Rothau; to plant fruit-trees, and to convert large tracts of pasturage into arable land. He also built school-houses, where reading, writing, arithmetic, and the principles of agriculture were taught; and, at his own expense, printed books and an almanac for the use of the people. Straw-plaiting, knitting, dyeing, and other employments were organized by him. During fifty-nine years, he laboured at these noble schemes, creating industry and happiness where he had found ignorance and barbarism. He received the decoration of the Legion of Honour from Louis XVIII., and, in 1818, was voted the gold medal of the Royal and Central Agricultural Society of Paris. After his death, the inhabitants followed the remains of their "dear father" to the grave; and all the Protestant, and several of the Roman Catholic clergy of the district, joined in the funeral procession. B. at Strasburg, 1740; D. 1826.

OBI, OBE, or OB, o'-be, a great river of Asiatic Russia, rising in the Little Altai, in lat. 52° N., and, after a course of 2,000 miles, falls into the Northern Ocean, near lat. 67° N., lon. 72° E.

OBI, GULF OF, is the estuary of the above river, which it receives, as it forms a wide inlet of the Arctic Ocean.

OBIDOS, o'-be-doss, a town of Portugal, 44 miles from Lisbon. Pop. 3,000.—Here, in 1808, an engagement took place between the French and English.

OBSEQUENS, Julius, ob'-se-quens, a Latin author, who wrote a work entitled "De Prodigiis," which contained a record of all the wonderful events which took place from the foundation of Rome to the time of Augustus. The following is an example of the contents:—"It rained milk on the Græcostatis. At Croton, a flock of sheep, with a dog and three shepherds, were killed by lightning. At Saturn, a calf with two heads was born. There was an uproar in the city, owing to Gracchus proposing his laws." A portion of the book was lost, but was supplied, in an imitation of the author's manner, by Lycostenes, in the 16th century. Obsequens is supposed to have lived about the commencement of the 4th century of the Christian era.

OCANA, o-kün'-ya, a town of Spain, 30 miles from Madrid. It is a very old place, fortified in former ages, and still preserving part of its ancient walls. Manf. Silk, leather, and soap. Pop. 5,000.—A battle was fought here in 1810, between the French and Spaniards, who suffered a complete defeat.

OCCAM, or OCKHAM, William, ok'-am, an English scholastic divine of the 14th century. He was the disciple of Duns Scotus, and obtained the name of the invincible doctor. Occam was a member of the order of Cordeliers, the general of which, Michael de Cezena, appointed him to write against Pope John XXII., who excommunicated both; but Occam was protected by the king of France. After being absolved, he fell a second time under the displeasure of the papal see, and was fortunate enough to find another protector in the emperor of Germany. Fabricius, in his "Bibliotheca Latina," gives a list of Occam's writings. D. at Munich, 1347.

OCEANIA, o'-she-ai'-ne-a, a name applied by modern geographers to a fifth division of the globe, comprising the Asiatic Archipelago, Australia, and Polynesia.

OCEANUS, o-se-ai'-nus, a powerful deity of the sea, who, according to Homer, was father of all the gods. He is generally represented as an old man, with long flowing beard, and sitting upon the waves of the sea.

OCELLUS, o-sel'-lus, a Greek philosopher, of the school of Pythagoras, called, on account of his birthplace, Lucanus. He wrote a work on kings and kingdoms, of which only some fragments remain; but his work "On the Nature of the Universe" is extant, and was translated into English by Thomas Taylor, in 1831. The date of his existence is unascertained.

OCHIL HILLS, ok'-il, a range of lofty mountains in Perthshire and Fife, Scotland. Ext. 24 miles long, with an average breadth of 12. The highest summit is Benclegh, which attains an elevation of 2,300 feet.

OCKLEY, Simon, ok'-le, a learned English divine, was educated at Queen's College, Cambridge, where he took the degree of B.D., and where, in 1711, he was chosen professor of Arabic. His most important works were, "The History of the present Jews throughout the World," "Introduction to the Study of the Oriental Languages," and "The History of the Saracens." D. at Exeter, 1678; D. 1720.

O'CONNELL, Daniel, o-kon'-nel, called in his day "the Liberator of Ireland" and the "Great Agitator." He was the son of a small landed proprietor in Ireland, by whom he was sent to France to be educated for the Roman Catholic priesthood. After residing at both St. Omer's and Douai, he, at the outburst of the French Revolution, fled from St. Omer's, and reached the shores of England in safety. In 1794 he commenced the study of the law, and four years afterwards was called to the bar. His first public speech was against the proposed union of the Irish and English legislatures, and was delivered at Dublin, in which city he obtained a fair amount of legal practice. But, about the year 1803, he began to take a leading part in urging the claims of the Catholics upon the attention of the English legislature. An account of his labours was furnished by himself, in a letter to Lord Shaftesbury. "For more than 20 years before the passing of the Emancipation Bill, the burden of the cause was thrown upon me. I had to arrange the meetings, to prepare resolutions, to furnish replies to the correspondence, to rouse the torpid, to animate the lukewarm, to control the violent and inflammatory, to avoid the shoals and breakers of the law." In 1828 he was elected to represent the county of Clare in parliament, but was not allowed to take his seat, in consequence of the civil disabilities under which he, as a Roman Catholic, laboured. The passing of the Emancipation Bill, however, enabled him to enter the House of Commons in the following year. From this period until the year 1843 he laboured incessantly at the great movement he had inaugurated, and which was called by himself "the Repeal of the Union." In the last-named year, however, he was convicted of sedition, sentenced to pay a fine of £2,000, and to be imprisoned for a year. An appeal to the House of Lords subsequently led to the reversal of this judgment; but, from that time, his power to excite the political sympathies of his countrymen appeared greatly to decline. Exhausted by his long labours, he went to Italy, in 1847, to recruit his shattered health, but expired at Genoa, on his way to Rome. B. in Kerry, Ireland, 1775; D. 1847.

O'CONNOR, o-kon'-nor, the name of a dynasty of Irish kings who reigned in Connaught, before the conquest of Ireland by the English. The most remarkable of the name was Torlagh O'Connor, who sought to gain power over the whole island, but found a formidable rival in Murtogh O'Brien. Roderick O'Connor reigned about 1171, when Henry II. of England invaded the country. He protested against that act; but Pope Adrian IV. conceded to the English king the possession of his territory.

OCTAVIA, ok-tai'-vi-a, daughter of Caius Octavius, and sister to Augustus. She was first married to Claudius Marcellus, by whom she had two children, before his death, which happened a little after the was of Persia. She then married Antony, to whom she behaved with the greatest respect. His conduct, however, was so base as greatly to inflame the people against him. But the loss of her son, Marcellus, an accomplished youth, gave her the deepest concern. D. 4 B.C.

OCTAVIA, daughter of Claudius and Messalina. She was betrothed to Lucius Silanus, but that marriage was broken off by the intrigues of Agrippina, and Octavia married Nero, who afterwards divorced her, and, at the instigation of Poppæa, sent her to a small island, where she was put to death, at the age of 20 years, in 62.

OCTAVIANUS, or OCTAVIUS CÆSAR. (See AUGUSTUS.)

OCTAVIUS. This name was common to many eminent Romans, but of celebrity inferior to Octavius Cæsar, afterwards Augustus, second Roman emperor.

OCZAKOV, or OTSHAKOV, otch'-a-kof', a town of European Russia, in the government of Cherson, near the mouth of the Dnieper, 40 miles from Odessa. It was never a place of great size; and, since the building of Odessa, it has greatly decayed. Pop. 3,500.—This place was once the object of obstinate contests between the Turks and Russians.

ODEIPORE, o-de-por', a raj of India, now incorporated with the British possessions. Area, 2,306 square miles. Pop. 135,000. Lat. of the centre, 22° 40′ N. Lon. 83° 23′ E.

ODENATUS, od'-e-nai'-tus, king of Palmyra, who made war against Sapor, king of Persia, with great success. The emperor Gallienus associated Odenatus with him in the empire, and conferred the title of Augusta on his wife, Zenobia. Odenatus was assassinated, with his son Herodian, by Meonius, a relation, on whom they had conferred many favours, A.D. 267. Zenobia then assumed the government, under the title of queen of the East.

ODENSE, o-den-se', a town of Denmark, capital of the island of Funen, on a river which runs into a large bay, about a mile from the town, and 90 miles from Copenhagen. It is noted for the good education of its inhabitants. Manf. Woollens, leather, and soap. Pop. 11,000.

ODENWALD, o'-den-vald, a mountain region of Western Germany, extending between the Neckar and Main rivers. Ext. 45 miles long, culminating in the summit of Katzenbuckil, 2,300 feet above the sea.

ODER, o'-der, a great river in the E. of Germany, the course of which is chiefly in the Prussian states. It rises in Moravia, 18 miles from Olmutz; enters Silesia, flows through that province, Brandenburg, and Pomerania; forms the large maritime lake called the Haff, and runs into the Baltic by three mouths, called the Peene, the Swine, and the Divenss. Length, to Stotten, 445 miles. It is connected with several canals, which greatly facilitate the commerce of the countries through which it flows.

ODERAN, o'-de-ran, a town of Saxony, 32 miles from Zwickau. Manf. Woollens and cottons. Pop. 5,000.

ODERBERG, o'-der-bairg, two towns of Germany, neither with a population above 2,500.

ODESSA, o-des'-sa, a fortified seaport of European Russia, in the government of Cherson, or Kherson, on a small bay of the Black Sea, between the mouths of the Dniester and the Dnieper, 90 miles from Kherson. The foundation of this place was, after the peace of Jassy, laid by the empress Catharine, in 1792. It is fortified in the modern style, and has on the east side a citadel commanding an artificial port, adapted for the reception of about 300 vessels. A row of barracks formed a line between the harbour and the town. The roadstead is very extensive, and the anchorage safe in summer. The town is neatly built of stone, the streets being wide, straight, and crossing each other at right angles. The principal buildings are a large number of churches, the Admiralty court, the custom-house, and the hospital, all adjoining the harbour; the exchange and the theatre. The establishments for education are a lyceum, on the plan of similar institutions in France, and schools for trade and navigation; also schools for the instruction of girls. Odessa being occasionally resorted to by Polish families for sea-bathing, public baths have been constructed. The chief disadvantages of the place, are the scarcity of wood and water. It has been declared a free port. The great article of export is corn from the Ukraine and neighbouring provinces. Pop. about 75,000. In 1854, Odessa was attacked by the Anglo-French frigates, and its barracks and mole for ships of war destroyed.

ODEYPOOR, or OODEYPOOR, o-de-poor', the capital of a district of Hindostan, on the Banass river, 395 miles from Bombay. Pop. Unascertained. Lat. 25° 28′ N. Lon. 74° 5′ E.

ODIHAM, o'-di-ham, a market-town of Hampshire, 22 miles from Winchester. It has the remains of a castle, in which David I., king of Scotland, was confined for eleven years after his capture at Neville's Cross. Manf. Chiefly silk-winding and worsted-spinning. Pop. 2,900. —This is the birthplace of William Lilly, the grammarian.

ODIN, o'-din, the greatest of the Scandinavian heroes, who was stated to have lived about 70 years B.C., in Denmark. He was monarch, priest, and a poet; and, after his death, was regarded by his countrymen as a god. The mythological work called the "Edda," and a poem entitled "Hawtnaal," are attributed to him.

ODOACRE, o-do'-a-ser, a celebrated Gothic chieftain, who originally served among the barbarian auxiliaries which the emperors of the West had employed to protect Italy. He revolted against the emperor Augustulus, whom he seized at Ravenna and put into prison. Odoacer then proclaimed himself king of Italy, but rejected the imperial titles of Cæsar and Augustus. He allotted to his Gothic followers a third of the conquered territories; but nevertheless governed Italy with the greatest moderation. In 489, Theodoric, king of the Ostrogoths, marched from the Danube, and defeated Odoacer in several battles. Odoacer was compelled to shut himself up in Ravenna, where he held out for more than two years. In 493 he surrendered to Theodoric, who promised to spare his life, but slew him at a banquet shortly afterwards.

O'DONNELL, Leopold, o-don'-nel, count of Lucena, a modern Spanish general and statesman. He early entered the military service, and reached the grade of colonel in his 25th year. Upon the death of Ferdinand VII., in 1832, he espoused the cause of Maria-Christina, and was a faithful adherent to her fortunes until her forced abdication of the regency in 1836, when he took refuge in France. In the meanwhile, he had been created general and count of Lucena. After the fall of Espartero, in 1843, General O'Donnell was enabled to return to Spain, and was soon afterwards sent to Cuba, as captain-general; in which capacity he acquired a very large fortune, and was, it is said, far from hostile to the slave-trade. After his return to Spain, he was appointed director-general of infantry. Being implicated in a conspiracy at the beginning of the year 1854, he was compelled to secrete himself; but soon afterwards left his retreat, and put himself at the head of the insurrection, which resulted in a change of ministry, Espartero being commanded to compose a new one, in which O'Donnell held the department of war. After being eclipsed during some time by Narvaez, he at length succeeded in effecting his rival's overthrow, and returned to power in 1858. In the following year he was appointed commander-in-chief of the Spanish forces sent against Morocco. In that command he was successful; he caused the enemy to capitulate, and to cede to Spain some territory, as well as to pay a large sum. Upon his return to Spain, he was created duke of Tetuan. B. 1808.

ŒCOLAMPADIUS, John, e-ko-lam-pai'-di-us, a celebrated German divine, who, in 1522, became professor of divinity and principal preacher at Basil, where he exposed the abuses of the Romish church, and exhorted the Swiss to embrace the principles of the Reformation; but, in 1525, he joined with Zuinglius against Luther in the dispute relative to the sacrament, and wrote a learned treatise on the subject. Mosheim calls him one of the most learned men of his century, and it was owing to his exertions that the Reformation took root in Switzerland. B. at Weisberg, Franconia, 1482; D. 1531.

OEDELEM, oo-de-lem', a parish and village of Belgium, 8 miles from Bruges. Pop. 3,500.

OEDENBURG, e'-den-boorg, a free town of Hungary, 36 miles from Vienna. It is neatly built, and has churches for various religious denominations, colleges, hospitals, a barrack, riding-school, military academy, and theatre. Manf. Cotton and woollen goods, potash, nitre, tobacco, and refined sugar. Pop. 12,300.

ŒDIPUS, e'-di-pus, a son of Laius, king of Thebes, and Jocasta. Laius, the father of Œdipus, was informed by the oracle, when he married Jocasta, that he must perish by the hands of his son. This awakened his fears, and to prevent the fulfilment of the oracle, Laius ordered his wife to destroy her child as soon as born. The mother did not obey, yet she gave the child to one of her domestics, with orders to expose him in the mountains. The servant bored the feet of the child, and suspended him with a twig by the heels to a tree on Mount Cithæron, where he was soon found by one of the shepherds of Polybus, king of Corinth. The shepherd carried him home, and Periboea, the wife of Polybus, who had no children, educated him as her own child. The accomplishments of the infant, who was named Œdipus, on account of the swelling of his feet, soon became the admiration of the age. His companions envied him, and one of them told him he was an illegitimate child. This raised his doubts, and he went to consult the oracle of Delphi, and was there told not to return home, for, if he did, he must necessarily be the murderer of his father. This answer terrified him; he knew no home but the house of Polybus; therefore, he resolved not to return to Corinth. He travelled towards Phocis, and on his journey met, in a narrow road, Laius, in a chariot with his arm-bearer. Laius ordered Œdipus to make way for him. Œdipus refused, and a contest ensued, in which Laius and his arm-bearer were both killed. Œdipus, ignorant of the rank of the men whom he had slain, continued his journey, and was attracted to Thebes by the fame of the Sphinx, whose enigma he solved, and obtained, in consequence, the crown of Thebes from Creon. (See SPHINX.) The cruelty of the Sphinx had become an object of public concern; and, as the successful explanation of an enigma would end in the death of the monster, Creon, who, at the death of Laius, had ascended the throne of Thebes, promised his crown to him who succeeded in the attempt. The enigma proposed was this: "What animal in the morning walks upon four feet, at noon upon two, and in the evening upon three?" This was left for Œdipus to explain: he came to the monster and said, that man, in the morning of life, walks upon his hands and his feet; when he has attained the years of manhood, he walks upon his two legs; and, in the evening, he supports his old age with the assistance of a staff. The monster, mortified at the true explanation, dashed his head against a rock, and perished. As the death of Laius had never been examined, Œdipus wished to discover the murderer, and, at length, found that himself had killed his father. In the excess of his grief, he put out his eyes, as unworthy to see the light, and banished himself from Thebes, or, as some say, was banished by his own sons. The manner of his death is singular: it is said that the earth opened, and Œdipus disappeared into its depths.

OEHLENSCHLÄGER, Adam Gottlob, e(r)'-len-shlai'-ger, the greatest Scandinavian poet, whose father was German and his mother Danish. His father rose to be steward of the king of Denmark's palace at Fredericksburg, where the early youth of the future poet was spent. He was educated for a mercantile career, and at the age of 16 was placed in a counting-house; but being seized with a desire to appear on the stage, he obtained an engagement in the theatre of Copenhagen. He soon quitted this pursuit, however, and devoted himself to the law, which was in turn deserted for literature. In 1801 he witnessed the attack made by Lord Nelson upon the Danish fleet. "That contest," he afterwards wrote, "inspired the Danes with a taste for poetry, as the battles of Marathon and Salamis did the Greeks, and the destruction of the Spanish armada the English, in the time of Elizabeth." In the following year he produced a small volume of poems, which instantly brought him fame. His next work was a play, entitled "Aladdin," which was founded upon the celebrated story in the "Arabian Nights," and which placed him at the head of the poets of his country. In 1803 he was granted a travelling stipend by the government; whereupon he went to Germany, and while in that country composed some of his best works, in the native language of his father. He witnessed the battles of Auerstadt and Jena before leaving Germany, immediately after which he repaired to Paris, where he wrote his finest work, the tragedy of "Palnatoke." He next visited Rome, where he wrote his "Correggio," and became the friend of Thorwaldsen. In 1810 he returned to his native country, and received a cordial reception at the hands of the king and queen of Denmark. Shortly afterwards he married, and during the succeeding five years he continued to produce plays, but inferior to those he had already composed. In 1816 he again went to Germany and France, but returned after an absence of twelve months. Eleven years subsequently he lost his father, who, he writes, "was vain of his son; but, like a sensible father, he never allowed me to see it; only sometimes I detected the feeling when he had been reading my poems." In the same year he went to Sweden, where he was received with enthusiasm and was crowned with a laurel wreath. He paid a third visit to Paris in 1844, was invited to court by Louis Philippe, and there met King Leopold, who requested him to come to Brussels. When he had attained his 70th birthday, a grand fête was held in his honour, but in the beginning of the following year, the greatest poet Denmark has produced, breathed his last. Like Thorwaldsen, Oehlenschläger was honoured with a public funeral, at which the nobility and all the most distinguished persons in Copenhagen attended. One of his fellow-countrymen writes of the poet,—"Small as Denmark is, it must be counted among the great powers of the world of art and poetry, since it has a sculptor to show like Thorwaldsen, whom only the great masters of antiquity can be considered to rival; and a poet like Oehlenschläger, who can worthily take the fourth seat by the side of the three heroes of poetry, Shakspeare, Byron, and Göthe." Besides poems, operas, and comedies, he wrote twenty-four tragedies, nineteen of which are founded upon Scandinavian subjects. He also translated one play of Shakspeare's,—the "Midsummer Night's Dream," and one of Otway's,—"The Orphan," into Danish. The poet left behind his Autobiography, in the pages of which he evinces a high admiration for his own talents; but those best acquainted with his works state that this was grounded upon sterling merit. Some of his poetical works have been translated into English by Theodore Martin. B. at Vesterbro, near Copenhagen, 1779; D. at Copenhagen, 1850.

ORLAND, or OLAND, o'-land, a narrow island in the Baltic, on the south-east coast of Sweden. Ext. 85 miles long, with an average breadth of 7. Area, 609 square miles. Desc. Low on the W. and hilly on the E., with a large portion of the soil appropriated to pasturage. Its forests are extensive, and it has the most important alum-mine in Scandinavia. Pop. 33,000.

ORLAND, LITTLE, an island of Denmark, in the duchy of Schleswig, between the island of Fohr and the mainland.

OELS, e(r)ls, a town of Prussian Silesia, and the capital of a mediatized principality, on a small river of the same name, 16 miles from Breslau. It has several churches, a ducal castle, a library, museum, a theatre, and gymnasium. Manf. Paper, woollens, and linens. Pop. 6,200.

OELSNITZ, e(r)ls'-nitz, a town of Saxony, in the circle of Zwickau, 6 miles from Plauen. Manf. Woollens, cottons, and leather. Pop. 4,300.

OERSTED, Anders Sandöe, er'-sted, a modern Danish statesman, who received his education at the university of Copenhagen, and afterwards applied himself to the study of jurisprudence, which he subsequently adopted as his profession. Passing through various distinguished positions, he at length attained the office of prime minister of Denmark; but in that capacity displayed a strong tendency towards reactionary measures, which excited so much ill feeling in the kingdom, that he was driven from power in 1855. The members of the Oersted ministry were next impeached, and brought to trial before the supreme tribunal, but were, in the end, acquitted. In his retirement, the former minister occupied himself with composing a history of his own career, which was published in 1856, and contained important matter towards the history of modern Denmark. B. in the island of Langeland, 1778.

OERSTED, Anders Sandöe, a modern Danish traveller, and nephew of the preceding, who travelled in the West Indies and South America. He published some works on natural history, and contributed to the Journal of the Royal Geographical Society of London an account of a survey made for a canal through the river Sapea to the port of Salinos, or Bolenos, in Costa Rica. B. at Rudkjöbing, 1816.

OERSTED, Hans Christian, a celebrated Danish philosopher, who originated the science of electro-magnetism, which paved the way for the invention of the electric telegraph. He was the uncle of the preceding, and brother of the prime minister, with whom he studied at the university of Copenhagen. In 1800 he became doctor of philosophy in that institution. After spending two years in Holland and France, he returned to Copenhagen, and there composed a treatise upon the identity of the forces of magnetism, electricity, and galvanism, which relationship had until then been only surmised. He proved that "there is always a magnetic circulation round the electric conductor, and that the electric current, in accordance with a certain law, always exercises determined and similar impressions on the direction of the magnetic needle, even when it does not pass through, but near the needle." The Royal Society of London presented him with its Copley medal, and the French Institute granted him 3,000 francs for this demonstration. In 1809 he published his "Manual of Mechanical Physics," in which several chemical discoveries were announced. The years 1822-23 were passed by him in France and England. In 1846 he was present at a meeting of the British Association at Southampton. Like our own Faraday, he was particularly happy in his delivery of occasional lectures to non-scientific people; and a collection of his discourses was translated into English, and published under the title of "The Soul in Nature." He was likewise a regular contributor to newspapers and magazines, and sought, on every occasion, to popularize the facts of natural science in his country. He was the recipient of many honours, was secretary of the Royal Society of Copenhagen, member of the Academy of Sciences in the French Institute, knight of the Legion of Honour, and of the Prussian order which rewards the distinguished in arts and sciences. B. at Rudkjöbing, 1777; D. near Copenhagen, 1851.

OESEL, or ESEL, e'-sel, an island in the Baltic, at the mouth of the Gulf of Riga, belonging to Russia. Area, 1,200 square miles. Desc. Generally level and well wooded, though much covered with marshes. Pro. Wheat, oats, rye, barley, and pease. Cattle, horses, and sheep are bred in large numbers, and fishing forms one of the principal occupations of the inhabitants. Pop. nearly 50,000. Lat. between 57° 40′ and 58° 14′ N. Lon. between 21° 40′ and 23° E.

ŒTA, MOUNT, e'-ta, a mountainous chain of Greece, 9 miles from Thermopylæ. Its principal summits are Aninos and Katabothra, about 7,000 feet above the level of the sea.

OFANTO, o-fan'-to, a river of Naples, rising in the province Principato Ultra, 6 miles from Monte Marano, and, after a course of 75 miles, entering the Adriatic, 4 miles from Barletta. Near its mouth was fought the famous battle of Cannæ, in which the Romans were defeated by Hannibal.

OFFA, of'-fa, a king of Mercia, succeeded Ethelbald in 755. He murdered Ethelbert, king of the East Angles, and took possession of his kingdom. To make atonement for his guilt, he gave the tenth of his goods to the Church, made a journey to Rome, instituted the tax called Peter-pence, and built the monastery at St. Alban's. D. 794.

OFFAGNA, of-fan'-ya, a town of Central Italy, near the Musone, 6 miles from Ancona. Pop. 1,500.

OFFENBACH, James, of'-fen-bak, a modern French musical composer, who has made himself famous for his light and sparkling "musical buffooneries," which his troupe have performed in Paris, London, and in Germany. The best of these charming little trifles are,—"Les Deux Aveugles," "Une Nuit Blanche," "La Rose de Saint-Fleur," and "Le Financier et le Savetier." D. in France, about 1823.

OFFENBACH, a neatly-built town of Germany, on the Maine, here crossed by a bridge of boats, 4 miles from Frankfort. It has various churches, schools, and a castle. Manf. Snuff and tobacco, wax, japanned goods, musical instruments, and carriages. Pop. 13,000.

OFFENBURG, of'-fen-boorg, a walled town of Baden, capital of a district, on the Kinz, 11 miles from Strasburg. It has a gymnasium, a convent, hospital, theatre, and transit trade. Pop. 4,200.—It has a station on the Basle and Manheim Railway.

OGDENSBURG, og'-dens-berg, a town of New York, U.S., 170 miles from Albany. Pop. 6,000.

OGEECHEE, o-je'-che, a river of Georgia, U.S., rising 6 miles from Greensborough, and, after a course of 200 miles, falling into Ossabaw Sound, at Hardwick.

OGGIONE, Marco da, odj'-e-o-nai, a Milanese painter, who was the pupil of Leonardo da Vinci. His copy of his master's "Lord's Supper" was made in 1510, and is the only authentic reproduction of that work extant. D. about 1470; D. 1530.

OGILBY, or OGILVY, John, o'-gil-be, a voluminous writer, was originally a dancing-master, and employed in the family of the earl of Strafford, as teacher to his children. That nobleman appointed him deputy master of the revels at Dublin, where Ogilby erected a theatre. Upon the outbreak of the Irish rebellion, he returned to England, and settled at Cambridge, where he applied himself to the study of the learned languages. He was appointed, in 1661, to conduct the ceremonies at the king's coronation, and of which he published a pompous account in folio, with plates. Ogilby translated Virgil and Homer into English verse; and published a magnificent Bible, with prints, for which he was remunerated by the House of Lords. He was appointed geographical printer to the king. The other works of this industrious writer were an account of Japan, an Atlas, the Fables of Æsop, in verse, and a "Book of Roads." This last went through numerous editions; but was afterwards superseded by Patterson. B. near Edinburgh, 1600; D. 1676.

OGLE, o'-gel, two counties of the United States.—1. In the N. of Illinois. Area, 576 square miles. Pop. 11,000.—2. In Georgia. Area, 515 square miles. Pop. 13,000.

OGLETHORPE, James, o'-gel-thorp, an English general, who entered into the army as ensign, in 1710. He afterwards served under Prince Eugene, to whom he became secretary and aide-de-camp. In 1732 he went to America, where he helped to found the colony of Georgia, and erected the town of Savannah. He again visited that country, and made an unsuccessful attempt upon Augustine, in Florida, belonging to the Spaniards. For this he was tried, on his return to England, and acquitted. In 1745 he was promoted to the rank of major-general, and was sent to the north against the rebels, but did not overtake them; for which he was again brought to a court-martial, and honourably acquitted. B. in London, about 1688; D. 1785.

OGLIO, ole'-yo, a considerable river of Italy, rising in the Rhætian Alps, and, after a course of 130 miles, joins the Po, 8 miles from Mantua.

OGYGES, oj'-i-jeez, said to have been the first king of Attica and Bœotia, in the 19th century B.C. In his reign is stated to have occurred the great deluge that covered the whole of Greece. That event has been placed as occurring 250 years before that of Deucalion; viz. about 1832 B.C. Ogyges belongs rather to mythology than to history; and the name, according to some, belongs not to a king, but to the ancient deluge above mentioned.

OHETEROA, o-te-ro'-a, an island in the Pacific Ocean, 28 miles from Tahiti. Lat. 22° 34′ S. Lon. 150° 13′ W.

OHIO, o-hi'-o, one of the United States, bounded N. by Michigan territory, E. by Pennsylvania, S. by the river Ohio, which separates it from Virginia and Kentucky, and W. by Indiana. Area, 40,000 square miles. Desc. The interior and northern parts bordering on Lake Erie are generally level, and in some places marshy; whilst the eastern and south-eastern parts are both hilly and broken. Along the rivers the soil is remarkably fertile, consisting of rich and luxuriant meadows; but forests are extensive, and there are some wide prairies. Rivers. Those which flow into Lake Erie on the north are the Maumee, Sandusky, Huron, Vermilion, Black Cayahoga, Grand, and Ashtabula; those in the south, flowing into the Ohio, are the Muskingum, Hockhocking, Little and Great Miami. The Au-Glaize and St. Mary's, in the western part, are branches of the Maumee. Climate. Generally mild, though in winter the mercury sometimes falls below zero, while the greatest heat of summer is 98°. Pro. Wheat is the staple article of produce. Other sorts of grain, various kinds of fruit, grass, hemp, and flax, are extensively cultivated, with hay, Indian corn, potatoes, and tobacco. The woods abound with deer, wild turkeys, geese, ducks, pheasants, and partridges. The bear still inhabits the forests, and the rivers are stocked with fish. Minerals. Coal abounds in the E. parts; iron, marble, salt, and lime. Manf. Cotton, wool, hemp, flax, iron, glass, and pottery. Steamboats of a large size, and commodious in every respect, are constantly plying on the Ohio, and shipbuilding is carried on to a considerable extent on that river. Ohio takes the lead of the other states in the West for manufacturing industry. Pop. about 2,000,000.—This state was first settled in 1788, and in 1802 formed its constitution, when it was admitted into the Union.

OHIO, a great river of the United States, which is formed by the junction of the Alleghany and the Monongahela, at Pittsburg, Pennsylvania; and which, after a W.S.W. course of upwards of 1,000 miles, joins the Mississippi, 193 miles below the Missouri, in lat. 37° N., lon. 88° 58′ W. The Ohio is a beautiful river, with a gentle current. Its waters are clear, and nowhere broken by any considerable falls except at Louisville. It varies in breadth from 400 to 1,100 yards. Steamboats are employed on it with great advantage, but in winter it is frozen over in the upper part of its course. Its basin is estimated to comprise 196,000 square miles. On its banks are several important towns.

OHIO, the name of two counties in the United States. 1. In the north-west part of Virginia. Area, 112 square miles. Pop. 20,000.—2. In the west part of Kentucky, on the Ohio. Area, 728 square miles. Pop. 10,000.—Also the name of various townships, none of them with a population above 7,000.

OHLAU, o'-lou, a town of Prussian Silesia, on the Ohlau, 14 miles from Breslau. It has a royal palace. Manf. Woollens, paper, vinegar, and tobacco. Pop. 6,200.

OHRDRUFF, or'-droof, a walled town of Germany, in the duchy of Saxe-Gotha, 8 miles from Gotha. Manf. Woollens, porcelain, with iron-forges and copper-mines in the vicinity. Pop. 4,500.

OICH, oik, a lake of Scotland, in Inverness-shire, forming the level summit of the Caledonian Canal. Ext. 6 miles long, with an average breadth of 1. Its superfluous waters are carried by a river of the same name into Loch Ness.

OIGNON, oin'-yawng, a river of France, which, after a course of 80 miles, joins the Saône 8 miles from Auxonne.

OISE, woise, a department of France, including portions of the old provinces of the Isle of France and Picardy, and bounded by the departments of the Somme, of the Aisne, and of the vicinity of the Seine. Area, 2,280 square miles. Desc. Flat, but fertile, with agriculture far advanced as a science. Rivers. The principal are the Oise, the Aureq, the Aisne, the Epte, the Therain, and the Brèche. Pro. The usual cerealia, with extensive forests. Cattle and sheep are reared in large numbers, and wine, beer, and cider are much used by the inhabitants. Manf. Woollens, carpets, calico, and lace. Pop. 405,000.

OISE, a considerable river of France, rising by two streams; the one in Ardennes and the other near Chimay, in Belgium, and, after a course of 135 miles, falling into the Seine above Conflans. It has canal communication with the Scheldt, the Sambre, and the Somme.

OJEDA, Alphonso, o-hai'-da, a Spanish navigator, who accompanied Columbus in his second expedition, and commanded the flotilla sent out by Amerigo Vespucci, in 1499, and which led to the last-mentioned individual giving his name to the New World. After experiencing a great many varieties of adventure and of changes of fortune, Ojeda died in the greatest poverty.

OKA, o'-ka, a river of European Russia, rising 40 miles from Orel, and, after a course of 650 miles, joining the Wolga at Nigni-Novgorod. Its basin comprises the richest portion of the Russian dominions, and is estimated to comprise 127,000 square miles.

OKAMANDAL, o'-ka-man'-dal, a district of India, in the province of Guzerat. Area, 335 square miles. Pop. 13,000. Lat. between 22° 5′ and 22° 30′ N. Lon. between 69° and 69° 18′ E.

O'KEEFFE, John, o-keef', a dramatist, who was destined for the profession of painting, but who, having written a play which was placed upon the stage at Dublin when he was only 18, abandoned the studio for the theatre. He remained in Ireland as an actor and occasional writer for the stage until his 34th year; after which he repaired to London, where he remained for the rest of his life, entirely devoting himself to the composition of plays. Among the best of these productions, may be mentioned "Wild Oats," "The Highland Reel," and "The Agreeable Surprise." Towards the close of his life he published "Recollections of the Life of John O'Keeffe," but had ceased to write for the stage, being almost blind. B. at Dublin, 1747; D. at Southampton, 1833.

OKEN, Lawrence, o'-ken, an eminent Swiss naturalist, who studied medicine and natural history at Gottingen, and was afterwards professor of medicine in the universities of Jena and Zurich. The aim of all his writings might be summarily said to be an attempt at applying the principles of transcendental philosophy to the facts of natural history. He produced his first work in 1802, with the title "Elements of Natural Philosophy, the Theory of the Senses, and the Classification of Animals founded thereon." Oken was the first to suggest that all animals are built up of vesicles or cells, in his work on generation, published in 1805. His remarkable essay "On the Signification of the Bones of the Skull," attracted little attention at the time of its publication, but was, nevertheless, the forerunner of the investigations of Carus, Geoffroy St. Hilaire, and Professor Owen, upon the laws of homology in the vertebrate skeleton. In 1847 his work called "Elements of Physio-Philosophy" was translated into English; and although, like the other efforts of this writer, it is beyond the grasp of the general reader, it would seem to be of the deepest importance to the man of science. B. at Offenberg, 1779; D. at Zurich, 1847.

OKHOTZK, o'-kotzk, or o-hotsk', a province of Asiatic Russia, forming a maritime territory, extending along the gulfs of the Eastern Ocean called the seas of Okhotzk, of Kamtschatka, and of Anadir. Ext. It has a length of 1,100 miles, and an average breadth of 150. Its climate is severe, and the dog and the reindeer are its only domestic animals. Its inhabitants deal in furs and timber. Pop. Unascertained. Lat. between 57° and 66° N. Lon. between 135° 30′ and 166° E.—The TOWN of this name has a church, some magazines, and a double row of shops. It is supported by being the channel of trade between Irkutsk and Kamtschatka. Pop. 800. Lat. 59° 20′ N. Lon. 142° 44′ E.

OKHOTZK, SEA OF, a large gulf of the Eastern Ocean, inclosed between Kamtschatka, the circle of Okhotzk, part of Chinese Tartary, and Saghalin. It receives the waters of the Amoor, has few islands, and its navigation is generally safe.

OKNA, ok'-na, the name of several towns in European Turkey, none of them with a population above 2,000.

OKTAI, ok'-tai, grand khan of the Mongol Tartars, was third son and successor of Ghengis Khan. He overran the north of China, Armenia; made himself master of Moscow, of Poland, and of Hungary; and for a time, threatened the whole of the Christian world. His chief minister was the sage Ye-lin-tchou-tsaï, who ruled with justice, but vainly attempted to subdue the ferocity of the Mongols. Oktai D. 1241.

OKTIBBEHA, ok-tib'-be-ha, a county in the N.E. of the Mississippi, U.S. Area, 618 square miles. Pop. 10,000.

OLAUS I., o'-la-us, king of Denmark, perished in 814, in combat with the Franks.

OLAUS II., king of Denmark, succeeded his brother, Canute IV., in 1086. A terrible famine desolated his kingdom during his reign. D. 1095.

OLAUS I., king of Norway, ascended the throne in 994. He introduced Christianity in Norway, Iceland, and Greenland. Having been defeated by the kings of Sweden and Denmark, in 1000, he threw himself into the sea.

OLAUS II., king of Norway, energetically propagated

Christianity throughout his dominions; but was driven from his throne by Canute, in 1030. Two years afterwards, he was killed by the people of Drontheim.

OLAUS III., surnamed the Pacific, reigned, in conjunction with his brother Magnus II., from 1066 until 1068, and singly for nine years afterwards.

OLAUS IV., son of Magnus III., reigned, in conjunction with his two brothers, between the years 1103—1116.

OLAUS V., son of Haquin VIII., succeeded to the throne of Denmark in 1376, and to that of Norway in 1380. After his death, in 1387, his mother, Margaret de Waldemar, united the three kingdoms of Denmark, Sweden, and Norway under one crown.

OLAUS MAGNUS, a Swedish author of the 16th century. He held the office of archdeacon of the Swedish church until the principles of the Reformation began to spread in his country; upon which he retired to Rome, where he spent the remainder of his life. He was the author of a work upon the antiquities of the North of Europe, which was published at Rome in 1555. B. in Sweden, about 1500; D. at Rome, about 1570.

OLAVIDES, Anthony Joseph, Count de, o-la-vé'-dais, a celebrated Spanish statesman, who became secretary to the Count de Aranda, whom he accompanied in his embassy to France. On his return to Spain, Charles III. created him count, and appointed him superintendent-general of Seville. He afterwards undertook the great work of fertilizing the Sierra Morena, or Black Mountains, a desert region barren to the very summit; but, by his perseverance, aided by the exertions of a colony of Germans, which he encouraged to settle in the place, he succeeded in his task. Notwithstanding the benefits which this worthy man had rendered his country, he was accused of heresy by the Inquisition, was disgraced, and thrown into prison. He subsequently contrived to effect his escape, and to reach Venice in safety. There is attributed to him an excellent book, entitled "The Triumph of the Gospel." B. at Lima, 1725; D. at Venice, 1803.

OLBERS, Henry William Matthias, ol'-bairs, an eminent German astronomer, who was educated for the profession of medicine, in the exercise of which, combined with astronomical pursuits, his whole life was passed. He discovered two planets,—Pallas in 1802, and Vesta in 1807. In 1815 he discovered a comet, and subsequently wrote a treatise on the probability that a comet may come into collision with the earth. Among other useful works of his was a proposal to revise the nomenclature of the stars, and a reformation of the constellations. Dr. Olbers was fellow of the Royal Society of London, corresponding member of several learned societies of Europe, and knight of the Prussian orders of the Red Eagle and Danebrog. B. near Bremen, 1758; D. at Bremen, 1840.

OLDCASTLE, Sir John, Lord Cobham, old'-kas-el, the first martyr and first author among the English nobility. In the reign of Henry IV., he commanded the English army in France, where he compelled the duke of Orleans to raise the siege of Paris. He was an adherent of Wickliffe's doctrines, which he propagated with such zeal, that, in the reign of Henry V., he was sent to the Tower, whence he made his escape, but was taken in Wales. Being conveyed to London, he was condemned to be hanged and burnt; which sentence was executed with circumstances of peculiar barbarity, in St. Giles's Fields, London, in 1417. He wrote "Twelve Conclusions, addressed to the Parliament of England," a number of religious tracts and discourses, and edited the works of Wickliffe. D. in the 14th century.

OLDENBURG, ol'-den-boorg, a state of Germany, having the title of grand-duchy, consisting of several scattered portions, chiefly in the N.W. of the empire. The principal part is Oldenburg proper, bounded N. by the German Ocean, and E., W., and S. by portions of the Hanover territory. Area, including the principality of Eutin and lordship of Birkenfeld, which are the names of the other portions, 2,420 square miles. Desc. The duchy proper almost entirely forms a level, and, in some places on the coast, is so low that it requires large dykes, as in Holland, to prevent inundations. It is, however, generally fertile. Rivers. The principal are the Weser, the Hunte, and the Delme. Pro. Corn; but pasturage is the chief feature. Horses, cattle, and sheep are extensively reared. Manf. Principally coarse woollens and linen-weaving. Pop. 230,000.—The grand-duke of Oldenburg is a member of the Germanic body. In 1810 he was expelled from all his possessions by Bonaparte; but, after the battle of Leipsic, in 1813, returned, and at the congress of Vienna was entitled grand-duke.

OLDENBURG, the capital of the above duchy, on the river Hunte, 82 miles from Hanover. It has churches, hospitals, a house of correction, a gymnasium, library, schools, a castle, and palace. It is the residence of the grand-duke, and has a trade in wool. Pop. 9,000.

OLDENSWORTH, ole'-dens-vort, a town of Denmark, 6 miles from Husum. Pop. 1,500.—A convention was, in 1713, held here between Peter the Great of Russia and Frederick IV. of Denmark.

OLDFIELD, Ann, old'-feeld, a celebrated English actress. Sir John Vanbrugh recommended her to Mr. Rich, patentee of the King's theatre, by whom she was engaged. Her abilities were of the highest order, and her person extremely pleasing. Her remains were interred in Westminster Abbey. B. in London, 1683; D. 1730.

OLDHAM, ole'-dam, a manufacturing town of Lancashire, on the Medlock, near its source, 7 miles from Manchester. It has a large and ancient church, several churches for dissenters, a mechanics' institute, and a blue-coat school. Manf. Fustians, cottons, hats, cords, and silks. Pop. 73,000.

OLDHAM, John, an English poet. Shortly after taking a B.A. degree at Oxford, he became usher to the free school at Croydon. Some of his poems being read by the earls of Rochester and Dorset, they procured him the appointment of tutor to the grandsons of Sir Edmund Thurland, and afterwards to a son of Sir William Hicks. He next resided with the earl of Kingston. His works were printed in Bell's annotated edition of the English Poets. B. at Shipton, Gloucestershire, 1653; D. 1683.

OLDMIXON, John, old'-mix-on, an English political writer and historian. He was a violent opponent of the Stuart family, in the reign of Queen Anne, and attacked the best writers of that period with so much violence, that Pope gave him a conspicuous place in the "Dunciad." He became collector of the customs at Bridgewater. He wrote "A History of the Stuarts," a volume of Poems, "The Life of Queen Anne," and other works. B. 1673; D. in London, 1742.

OLD PROVIDENCE, an Island of the Caribbean Sea, belonging to New Granada, 100 miles from the Mosquito coast. Ext. 5 miles long, with a breadth of 2½. Desc. Hilly, but fertile; and productive of cotton. Manf. Tortoise-shell and hides. Pop. Unascertained. It is noted for being a resort of buccaneers.

OLDYS, William, ol'-dis, an historical and biographical writer, was the natural son of Dr. Oldys, chancellor of Lincoln and advocate of the court of Admiralty. Of the early life and education of the son little is known; but he is said to have squandered the patrimony which had been left him. He afterwards became keeper of Lord Oxford's library, of which he formed the catalogue when that collection was sold by Osborne, the bookseller. He was also employed to superintend the publication of the Harleian Miscellany. The only public post he ever had was that of Norroy king-at-arms. His principal works are, "Life of Sir Walter Raleigh," some articles in the "General Historical Dictionary," those in the "Biographia Britannica" signed G, "The British Librarian," "Life of Richard Carew the Antiquary," a translation of Camden's "Britannia," and a number of treatises upon medical and bibliographical subjects. B. 1687; D. 1761.

OLEARIUS, Adam (real name, OELSCHLAGER), o(r)l'-shlai-ger, minister to the duke of Holstein, who appointed him secretary to the embassy which he sent to Muscovy and Persia in 1633. Olearius was absent six years in this employment, and on his return wrote an account of his travels, published in 1647. He also wrote an Abridgement of the Chronicles of Holstein, from 1448 to 1663. B. about 1600; D. 1671.

OLEGGIO, o-ledg'-o, a town of Sardinia, Piedmont, 10 miles from Novara. Pop. 7,500.

OLEKMA, o-lek'-ma, a river of Asiatic Russia, which, after a course of 800 miles, joins the Lena, 110 miles from its mouth.

OLERON, o'-lai-rawng, an island on the S.W. coast of France, opposite to the mouth of the Charente, and separated from the continent by a narrow channel called Pertuis de Maubuisson. Ext. 20 miles long, with a breadth of 5. Pop. 17,000. Lat. 43° 11′ N. Lon. 1° 20′ W.

OLEVANO, o-lai-va'-no, the name of several towns in Italy, none of them with a population above 1,500.

OLIAROS. (See ANTIPAROS.)

OLIFANT'S RIVER, ol'-i-fant, a considerable river of the territory of the Cape of Good Hope, falling into the Atlantic Ocean in lat. 31° 38′ S., and lon. 18° 12′ W. Length, about 170 miles.

OLINDA, o-lin'-da, a city of Brazil, in the province of Pernambuco, 4 miles from Recife. Pop. 8,000.

OLIPHANT, Lawrence, ol'-i-fant, a modern English writer and traveller, who was educated in England, but went out while very young to Ceylon, where his father was chief justice. He afterwards visited Nepaul with Jung Bahadoor, and, upon his return, published his observations, in a work entitled "A Journey to Katmandu." He next studied law at Edinburgh and at Lincoln's Inn, and was called to the bar. In 1852 he went to Russia, and, among other provinces of that country, visited the Crimea. In the following year he produced an account of his wanderings, in a work entitled "The Russian Shores of the Black Sea." His next occupation was as private secretary to the earl of Elgin, whom he accompanied to Canada; and when the earl was appointed lord high commissioner to China, Mr. Oliphant again acted in his former capacity. Towards the close of the year 1860 he gave to the public an account of his observations in China and Japan, in his "Narrative of the Earl of Elgin's Mission in the Years 1857-8-9." His latest work was entitled "Patriots and Filibusters; or, Incidents of Political and Exploratory Travel." B. 1832.

OLIVA, o-le'-ra, a town of Spain, in Valencia, 36 miles from Valencia. It has an ancient palace, an hospital, and schools. Manf. Linen and hempen cloths. Pop. 6,900.

OLIVARES, Gaspar Guzman, Count de, o-li-va'-rais, an eminent Spanish statesman, who, during twenty-two years, administered the affairs of the kingdom under the feeble Philip IV. He first became prime minister in the room of the Duke de Uceda, and began his political career by several useful measures; but his haughty conduct at length occasioned a revolt in Catalonia, and the separation of Portugal from Spain. Olivares was disgraced, and died of chagrin at Toro, 1643. B. at Rome, about 1587.

OLIVENZA, o-le-vain'-tha, a fortified town of Spain, in Estremadura, 16 miles from Badajoz. It has a brisk trade in wine, oil, and corn. Pop. 8,000.—This town was ceded by Portugal to Spain in 1801; by which cession Godoy received his title of "Prince of the Peace." In 1811 it was taken by the French.

OLIVER, Isaac, ol'-i-ver, an English painter in the reign of Queen Elizabeth. He painted historical pieces, but chiefly miniatures in a style of exquisite beauty. B. 1556; D. 1617.

OLIVER, Peter, eldest son of the preceding, was an historical and miniature painter, and even surpassed his father. Nineteen of his historical paintings were in the collections of Charles I. and James II. Some of these are still kept in Kensington Palace. B. 1601; D. about 1664.

OLIVET, Joseph Thoulier de, ol'-e-vai, a learned French critic, who studied under his uncle, a Jesuit, and acquired a great knowledge of the learned languages. In 1710 he published an excellent edition of the works of Cicero, in 9 vols., with notes. Besides the above, he produced a French translation of Cicero's treatise on the "Nature of the Gods," a translation of some of the orations of Demosthenes and Cicero, a "History of the French Academy," of which he was a member, and some other works. B. near Salins, 1682; D. at Paris, 1768.

OLIVETO, o-le-vai'-to, a town of Naples, 45 miles from Policastro. Pop. 6,000.

OLIVETO, a town of Naples, in the Principato Citra, 7 miles from Campagna. Pop. 3,250.

OLIVIER, Claude Matthew, o-liv'-i-ai, advocate of the parliament of Aix. He was one of the founders of the academy of Marseilles, and distinguished himself by his eloquence. His works are,—"History of Philip of Macedon, Father of Alexander the Great," "Memoir on the Succour given to the Romans by the People of Marseilles, in the Second Punic War and in that of the Gauls," and several historical dissertations of less importance. D. at Marseilles, 1701; D. at the same city, 1736.

OLIVIER, William Antony, a French entomologist, who was, in 1792, sent upon a mission to Persia, and returned at the end of six years, with a rich collection of specimens of natural history. He became a member of the French Institute in 1800, and published, among other works, "Dictionary of the Natural History of Insects," in which he was assisted by Latreille and Godard. B. at Aves, near Frejus, 1750; D. at Lyons, 1814.

OLMÜTZ, ol-me(r)tz, a fortified and well-built town of Moravia, on the March, by which it is almost surrounded, 40 miles from Brunn. The houses are high and gloomy, and its university, replaced by a lyceum or high school, was restored in 1827. It is an archbishop's see, and one of the richest ecclesiastical benefices of the empire. The principal public buildings are the hospital, the cathedral, and the riding academy. Manf. Woollen, linen, and cotton fabrics, earthenware, leather, and vinegar. Pop. 15,000. It was unsuccessfully besieged by Frederick II. in 1758, and from 1794, Lafayette was confined in it for many years. When the late emperor of Austria took his second flight from Vienna, he came here, and abdicated in December, 1848.

OLNEY, ol'-ne, a market-town of Buckinghamshire, on the Ouse, 10 miles from Bedford. It consists of one long street, and has a spacious building, ornamented with a tower and beautiful spire. Manf. Hosiery and lace. Pop. 2,339. It has a station on a branch of the London and North-Western Railway.

OLONA, o-lo'-na, a tributary of the Po, in Italy, falling into the canal Naviglio Grande, near Milan. Under the French it gave its name to a department of the kingdom of Italy.

OLONETZ, o-lo-netz', a government in the north of European Russia, lying to the south of that of Archangel, and to the east of Finland. Area, 51,000 square miles. Desc. Marshy, and covered with extensive forests. Rivers. The Onega, Suna, Svir, and Schnia. Lakes. Numerous: the principal are the Onega and the Vigo. Pro. Hemp and flax; but timber is the chief source of wealth derived from the land. A few cattle and horses are reared. Minerals. Iron, copper, silver, and marble; but none of them are extensively worked. Manf. Unimportant: there are some tanneries, iron-forges, and an extensive cannon-foundry. Pop. 265,000. Lat. between 60° and 64° 30′ N. Lon. between 29° and 41° 30′ E.

OLONETZ, the chief town of the above government, is 110 miles from St. Petersburg. Pop. 2,800.

OLONNE, o'-lon, a market-town of France, in the department Vendée, near the Atlantic. Pop. 2,200.

OLORON, o-lo-rawng', a parish and town of France, in the department of the Lower Pyrenees, 15 miles from Pau. It has a trade in horses, wool, and timber. Pop. 6,500.

OLOT, o'-lote, a town of Spain, on the Fluvia, 20 miles from Gerona. It has churches, monasteries, a large hospital, and cavalry barracks. Manf. Woollens, soap, and paper. Pop. 13,000.—In the neighbourhood there are numerous craters of extinct volcanoes, and here, in 1421, a destructive earthquake occurred.

OLTENITZA, ol-te-nitz'-a, a fortified village of European Turkey, on the Danube, 2 miles from Turtukai. Pop. Unascertained.—Here, on the 4th of November, 1853, the Russians were defeated by the Turks.

OLYMPIA, o-lim'-pi-a, daughter of Neoptolemus, king of Epirus, was the wife of Philip, king of Macedon, and mother of Alexander the Great. She was repudiated by Philip, about 336 B.C. Olympia, in revenge, is presumed to have instigated the murder of Philip. After the death of Alexander, she seized the government of Macedonia, and put to death a number of the leading personages of the kingdom; but Cassander at length besieged her in Pydna, and obliged her to surrender. Cassander promised to spare her life, but she was soon afterwards killed by the relatives of those whom she had put to death.

OLYMPIC GAMES, o-lim'-pik, celebrated Greek games, which received their name either from Olympia, where they were observed, or from Jupiter Olympius, to whom they were dedicated. The opinion most generally received is, that they were first established by Hercules in honour of Jupiter Olympius, after a victory obtained over Augeas. But they were neglected some time after their first institution, till Iphitus, in the age of the lawgiver of Sparta, renewed them. This re-institution, which happened B.C. 881, forms a celebrated epoch in Grecian history, and is the beginning of the Olympiads. The care and superintendence of the games were intrusted to the people of Elis, till they were excluded by the Pisæans, B.C. 364, after the destruction of Pisa. The presidents of the games were obliged solemnly to swear that they would act impartially, and not take any bribes, or discover why they rejected some of the combatants. They generally sat naked, and held before them the crown which was prepared for the conqueror. There were also certain officers to keep good order and regularity. No women were permitted to appear at the celebration of the Olympian games: this rule, however, was sometimes departed from. The preparations for these festivals were great. No person was permitted to enter the lists, if he had not regularly exercised himself ten months before the celebration, at the public gymnasium of Elis. The wrestlers were appointed by lot. In these games were exhibited running, leaping, wrestling, boxing, and the throwing of the quoit. Besides these, there were horse and chariot races, and also contentions in poetry, eloquence, and the fine arts. The only reward that the conqueror obtained was a crown of olive, which, however, stimulated courage and virtue more than the most unbounded treasures. The statues of the conquerors, called Olympionicæ, were erected at Olympia, in the sacred wood of Jupiter. Their return home was that of a warlike conqueror; they were drawn in a chariot by four horses, and everywhere received with the greatest acclamations; painters and poets were employed in celebrating their names. The Olympic games were observed every fifth year, or rather at the expiration of four years: they continued for five successive days, and drew together not only the inhabitants of Greece, but of the neighbouring islands and countries.

OLYMPIODORUS, o-lim-pi-o-dor'-us, a heathen philosopher of Egypt, who wrote, in Greek, a continuation of the History of Eunapius, up to A.D. 425. Flourished in the 5th century.

OLYMPIODORUS of Alexander was a Peripatetic philosopher, and composed a commentary upon the "Meteorologica" of Aristotle. Flourished at the latter end of the 6th century.

OLYMPIODORUS, a Platonic philosopher of Alexandria, who wrote several commentaries upon the works, and a life of Plato. Flourished towards the close of the 6th century.

OLYMPUS, o-lim'-pus, a celebrated mountain of Thessaly, 30 miles from Larissa. It is famous from Homer and other poets making it the seat of the gods. Height, 6,332 feet. Lat. 40° 4′ 32″ N. Lon. 22° 25′ E.

OMAGH, o'-ma, a town of Ireland, in the county of Tyrone, 14 miles from Strabane. It is the seat of the courts of assize. Pop. 3,200.—It has a station on the Derry and Enniskillen Railway.

OMAR I., o'-mar, second caliph of the Mussulmans after Mahomet. He made himself master of Syria, and, in 637, besieged and took Jerusalem, after a defence of several months. In the following year he invaded Persia, and led a powerful army into Egypt, the conquest of which country was completed by the taking of Alexandria in 640. Upon that occasion, Omar ordered the famous library founded in that city by Ptolemy Philadelphus to be burnt; for, said he, "if the books of the Greeks agree with the book of God (the Koran), they are superfluous, and need not be preserved; and if they disagree, they are pernicious, and ought to be destroyed." The manuscripts were thereupon given to the four thousand public baths of the city for fuel. This inflexible Mussulman conqueror is said to have taken 36,000 cities or castles, destroyed 4,000 temples or churches, and founded or endowed 1,400 mosques. He instituted the era of the Hejira, or Flight of Mahomet, from which the Mussulmans compute their years. It commenced with the 16th July, 622 A.D. His memory is held in the highest veneration by the Sunnite, or orthodox Mahomedans; but the Shiites, or partisans of Ali, regard him as a usurper. Omar was assassinated by a Persian slave, 644.

OMAR II., the eighth caliph of the Ommiades, was great-grandson of the preceding, and succeeded Solyman in 717. He laid siege to Constantinople, but was forced to raise it, on account of a violent storm, which destroyed a great part of his fleet. Poisoned, 720.

OMAR, Ben Alftas, Mahomedan monarch of Estremadura and Portugal, succeeded his brother in 1082. He assisted the Mussulman king of Toledo against Alphonso VII., but was defeated by the latter. In 1086 he, with other Moorish monarchs, sought the aid of the sultan of Morocco, who joined his troops with the Mahomedans, and fought a sanguinary battle with Alphonso near Badajoz. The Africans subsequently turned against Omar, who was assassinated by them in 1090.

OMAR, Ben Haffssoun, a famous Moorish rebel, who was at first a tailor, but quitted that calling for the profession of arms. In 859 he put himself at the head of a powerful army, and overran the kingdom of Cordova. The Moorish sovereign of that country, Mahomet I., sent his troops against Omar, whose bands were routed, after an obstinate struggle. Omar subsequently became the ally of the Navarrese, for whom he took several fortresses, and was by them created king. In 882 he was completely defeated by Mahomet, and received a wound in the conflict, which afterwards proved mortal. D. 883.

OMAR, a famous Arabian philosopher, who settled at Seville, and acquired a great reputation for his attainments in medicine, astronomy, and geometry. D. at Seville, 1071.

OMAR, a celebrated Moorish pirate, who, in the 9th century, committed great ravages in the Mediterranean, took the island of Crete, and there erected a fort called El-Khandah, from which Candia, the modern name of the island, has been derived.

OMER, or OMAR, PASHA, o'-mer, a modern Turkish commander, whose former name was Michael-Lattas, he being a native of Austrian Croatia. He served at first as cadet in an Austrian regiment, from which he became assistant surveyor of roads and bridges in his native district. About his 28th year he suddenly left the Austrian service, and went into the Turkish province of Bosnia, where he embraced the Mahometan faith, adopted the name of Omer, and obtained employment as tutor in the family of a Turkish merchant. Subsequently visiting Constantinople with his pupils, he became master in the new military school. In a short time he attracted the notice of Khosroo Pasha, the minister of war, who attached him to his staff, and afterwards bestowed upon him the hand of his ward, a rich heiress. After serving in the Danubian principalities, and as aide-de-camp to General Chrzanowski, Khosroo Pasha obtained for him the appointment of writing-master to Abd-ul-Medjid, the present sultan. In 1839 he served with the Turkish army sent against Ibrahim Pasha, and, three years later, was appointed military commandant of a district in Syria. When the Russians passed into Wallachia, in 1848, to act against the insurgent Hungarians, Omer Pasha went to the same place as commander of a Turkish army of observation. His next services were against the disaffected beys in Bosnia, whom he reduced to submission to the authority of the sultan. At the commencement of the year 1853, he marched at the head of 20,000 men against the mountaineers of Montenegro, who were almost completely subjugated by him; when, at the instance of the Austrian government, his force was recalled by the sultan. In 1853 he was chosen to the command-in-chief of the Turkish army in Bulgaria. Prince Gortschakoff, in command of a powerful Russian army, was upon the opposite bank of the Danube; and against him Omer Pasha executed a series of strategic manœuvres, which completely baffled the skill of the former general. At Calafat, Oltenitza, and Citate, the pasha repulsed the Russians; and finally, at Silistria, he inflicted on them so heavy a defeat, that they were compelled to evacuate the Danubian principalities. In 1855 he went to the Crimea, having a Turkish and Egyptian army under his command, but remained inactive until he was sent into Georgia,—Teflis, the capital of which, he threatened; but the surrender of Kars forced him to beat a retreat to Redout Kaleh. B. at Vlaski, Austrian Croatia, 1801.

OMER, ST., o-mair', a fortified town of France, in the department of the Pas-de-Calais, and defended by Fort Notre Dame, 22 miles from Calais. It is built with tolerable regularity, the principal streets being broad and spacious; but they are in general bordered with low mean-looking houses. The only square is the Place d'Armes. On one of its sides is the town-hall. Of the public walks, the most frequented are the ramparts, the borders of the canal Neuf-Fossée, and the avenue of the gate leading towards Calais. The public buildings worth notice are two fine Gothic churches, the cathedral, and that of St. Bertin, now fallen into ruins. The college has an extensive library. Manf. Woollens, leather, paper, and starch. Pop. 22,000.—In 1677 this place was taken by Louis XIV. It is the birthplace of Abbé Segur.

OMETEPE, o'-mai-tai'-pe, a volcanic island of Central America, in Lake Nicaragua. Ext. 20 miles long, with a breadth of 7 or 8. On it are a couple of villages, with an aggregate population of about 2,000.

OMEY, o'-me, a parish of Ireland, in Connaught, county of Galway. It includes the town of Clifden. Pop. 6,500.

OMMON, or OMAN, o'-man, an extensive division of Arabia, comprising the coast that extends from its E. extremity of Rasalgate to the entrance of the Persian Gulf. It is a kind of desert studded with oases, having fertile valleys among its mountains.

OMPHALE, om'-fa-le, a queen of Lydia. She married Tmolus, who, at his death, left her mistress of his kingdom. She purchased Hercules, who had been sold as a slave for the recovery of his senses, after the murder of Eurytus. Omphale soon restored her slave to liberty, and the hero became enamoured of his mistress. The queen favoured his passion, and had a son by him. Hercules is represented by the poets as so desperately enamoured of the queen, that, to conciliate her esteem, he spun by her side among her women, while she covered herself with the lion's skin, and armed herself with the club of the hero, often striking him with her sandals for the uncouth manner with which he held the distaff.

OMSK, omsk, a fortified town of Asiatic Russia, situate in a plain on the Irtish. It has a military school, in which the Mongol languages are taught, a Cossack school, and an hospital. In civil jurisdiction it is subordinate to Tobolsk. Pop. 12,000. Lat. 54° 57′ N. Lon. 73° 40′ E.

OPIE, John, o'-pe, an eminent English painter, who was the son of a poor carpenter in Cornwall. His talents for design were evinced at the earliest age, but were discouraged by his father, who intended him for his own trade. Despite every obstacle, the lad continued to improve himself in drawing, and soon attracted great notice in his native district, in consequence of his spirited likenesses of the people who sat to him for their portraits. Dr. John Wolcot, or Peter Pindar, as he is known in literature, hearing of young Opie's skill, took him into his service, and afterwards provided him with the means of repairing to London. In 1781, Wolcot obtained an introduction for his protégé to Sir Joshua Reynolds, who tendered the self-taught artist some valuable advice. Through Wolcot's management, the Cornish lad became a favourite with the fashionable world of the metropolis, and crowds of wealthy sitters came to his studio. Opie's style, however, was more vigorous and truthful than graceful and flattering, and in time his popularity as a fashionable portrait-painter declined. Meanwhile he had entered into a matrimonial alliance with the daughter of a rich pawnbroker; but the match proving an unhappy one, a divorce was obtained. His second wife, Miss Alderson, was a lady of refinement and intellect, and it was to her judicious advice that the painter's subsequent improvement both as an artist and as a member of polite society was owing. Although he did not abandon portrait-painting, Opie next devoted much of his time to historical subjects. His best works in the latter walk of art, were "The Murder of James I. of Scotland," "The Death of David Rizzio," "Juliet in the Garden," and "Hubert and Arthur." Late in life Opie had qualified himself sufficiently, in a literary sense, to aspire to the appointment of professor of painting to the Royal Academy. That post, after a first failure, he ultimately obtained; but his death occurring soon afterwards, he only found time to deliver four lectures, which were published, and are still considered valuable to the student of art. His remains were honoured by being placed near the tomb of Sir Joshua Reynolds in St. Paul's cathedral. B. at Truro, Cornwall, 1761; D. 1807.

OPIE, Mrs. Amelia, an English novelist, and wife of the preceding. The daughter of a physician in easy circumstances, carefully educated, handsome, and with considerable musical acquirements, she was the distinguished member of a very refined social circle when she became acquainted with Mr. Opie. After her marriage with the artist, in 1798, she made her first appearance as an author, by producing a moral tale, entitled "Father and Daughter." In 1802 she published a sweet and graceful volume of poems, and two years later gave to the public her novel of "Adelaide Mowbray." Her "Simple Tales" were her next production, and after her husband's death she wrote "The Warrior's Return and other Poems," "Tales of the Heart," and "Valentine's Eve." In 1825 she became a member of the Society of Friends, and subsequently visited France, Belgium, and Switzerland, giving her travelling impressions in "Tait's Magazine" and elsewhere. B. at Norwich, 1769; D. at the same city, 1853.

OPITZ, Martin, o'-pitz, the father of modern German poetry. He distinguished himself by his poems in Latin and German. His chief works were a poem upon the campaigns of Vladislaus IV. against Russia, a version, in German, of the Psalms, and "Consolation in the Disasters of War." B. at Bunslau, Silesia, 1597; D. at Dantzig, 1639.

OPORTO, o-por'-to, a city of Portugal, about 2 miles from the mouth of the Douro, and 175 from Lisbon. It stands partly on a hill and partly on a bank of the river. It is inclosed by an old wall, five or six feet thick, flanked at intervals with mean-looking towers, and further protected by a small fort. The quay extends the whole length of the town. The roadstead is spacious, and is, at times, the rendezvous of fleets of merchantmen for Brazil. It is commanded by a small fort. The town is, in general, well built. On the opposite bank of the Douro there are two places, or rather suburbs of the city; the smaller and more westerly of these is called Gaya. To the east, and also on the south bank of the Douro, is another small but populous town, called Villa Nova do Porto, inhabited by mechanics, and others of the lower orders. Between Gaya and Villa Nova are immense depôts or warehouses, for storing the wine from the interior, previous to its being embarked. The harbour is difficult of access, partly from rocks at the mouth of the Douro, partly from the accumulation of sand. The public buildings are the town-hall, hospital, cathedral, numerous churches, episcopal palace, exchange, mint, barracks, opera-house, English factory, and a suspension-bridge. It is the seat of a medical college, has a public library, superior schools, a foundling hospital, and a gallery of paintings. It formerly had a large number of convents, but they were destroyed in 1832, by the troops of Don Pedro. Manf. Oporto being the principal manufacturing city of Portugal, it has about twenty large mercantile English houses, by whom the greatest part of the foreign trade is conducted. Silk is the staple manufacture, besides cottons, shawls, leather, soap, and earthenware. Exp. Wine, of which about 50,000 pipes are exported, and the half goes to Britain. The other articles are bullion, fruit, corn, wool, oils, provisions, salt, leather, and cork. Imp. Woollen, cotton, and hardware manufactures, almost all from England; also fish from the west of England and Newfoundland; from the Baltic hemp and flax; from the United States rice. Near the city are mines of coal, copper, and antimony. Pop. 80,000, with the suburbs. Lat. 41° 11′ 15″ N. Lon. 8° 39′ 30″ W.—Oporto was in the possession of the French during part of 1808 and the spring of 1809, when it was evacuated by them. Good roads connect it with Braga and Viana.

OPOTSHKA, o-potsh'-ka, a town of Russia, on an island formed by the Velikaja. It is about 80 miles from Pskov. Pop. 2,300.

OPPELN, op'-peln, a town of Prussian Silesia, on the Oder, 50 miles from Breslau. It is inclosed by a wall, and has a castle, several churches, a synagogue, a gymnasium, and numerous schools. Manf. Linen, leather, ribbons, and earthenware. Pop. 8,000.

OPPENHEIM, op'-pen-hime, a town of the grand-duchy of Hessen-Darmstadt, on the Rhine, 12 miles from Mayence. It has several churches, a synagogue, and an hospital. Pop. 2,600.

OPPIAN, op'-pi-an, a Greek poet and grammarian, who wrote three poems on hawking, hunting, and fishing, entitled "Ixeutica," "Cynegetica," and "Halieutica," which are extant. A portion of Oppian was translated into English by Mawer, 1736. Flourished probably towards the close of the 2nd century of the Christian era.

OPPIDO, op'-pe-do, a town of Italy, in Calabria Ultra, situate among the mountains, 20 miles from Reggio. It has a cathedral, several churches, and monasteries. Pop. 4,000.

ORADOUR, or'-a-door, several parishes and villages of France, none of them with a population above 3,500.

ORAN, or WARRAN, o-ran', a town of Algeria, 210 miles from Algiers. It is situate at the foot of a hill called the Peak of St. Croix. Pop. about 35,000.—In 1830 this place was taken by the French, and occupied by them in 1831.

ORANGE, William I. of, or'-anj, surnamed William the Silent, succeeded, at the age of 11 years, to the family possessions and titles in Luxembourg, Brabant, Flanders, Holland, and to the French principality of Orange, in Provence; whence the most celebrated title of the family was derived. His father had embraced the doctrines of the Reformation, and he was at first educated in the same principles; but, at an early age, the emperor Charles V. summoned him to his court, and had him brought up in the Roman Catholic faith. "At fifteen," says Mr. Motley, in his "History of the Rise of the Dutch Republic," "William was the intimate,—almost confidential, friend of the emperor, who prided himself, above all other gifts, on his power of reading and of using men. The youth was so constant an attendant upon his imperial chief, that, even when interviews with the highest personages, and upon the gravest affairs, were taking place, Charles would never suffer him to be considered superfluous or intrusive. There seemed to be no secrets which the emperor held too high for the comprehension or discretion of his page." The emperor appointed his discreet favourite to the highest posts, as he advanced in years: the command-in-chief of the army upon the French frontier, a post eagerly sought after by many distinguished generals, was given to William of Orange when he had attained his 21st year. When Charles V. abdicated his throne to his son Philip II., he leaned upon William's shoulder; and to him, also, the retiring monarch intrusted the mission of delivering the imperial crown to his brother Ferdinand, at Augsburg. With the gloomy Philip, however, William was soon to become an object of suspicion and hatred. At the peace of Cateau-Cambresis, in 1559, William was one of the Spanish hostages sent to the court of France; and, while hunting with Henry II. in the forest of Vincennes, the French monarch revealed to him the scheme which had been recently formed by Philip and himself, "to extirpate Protestantism by a general extirpation of Protestants." The prince, says Mr. Motley, "although horror-struck and indignant at the royal revelations, held his peace and kept his countenance. The king was not aware that, in opening this delicate negotiation to Alva's colleague and Philip's plenipotentiary, he had given a warning of inestimable value to the man who had been born to resist the machinations of Philip and of Alva. William of Orange earned the surname of the Silent, from the manner in which he received these communications of Henry, without revealing to the monarch, by word or look, the enormous blunder he had committed." Henceforth, William resolved to thwart the designs of Philip, by means of secret intrigues with the leaders of the Protestant party in the Netherlands. During the feeble administration of Margaret of Parma, William, as stadtholder of Holland, Zealand, and Utrecht, and as member of the Flemish council of state, was secretly but indefatigably employed in undermining the tyrannical schemes of the Spanish bigot; but, upon the nomination of the sanguinary Alva to the government of the Netherlands, the prince, to avoid the tragical fate of his fellow-nobles Egmont and Horn, retired from the Netherlands to his estate of Nassau. In 1568 the wrongs of the people whom he loved awoke the prince into fierce action. He left his retreat, and became the champion of the cause of liberty and Protestantism in the Netherlands. In the ensuing struggles, notwithstanding that his raw and ill-disciplined levies of French and German Protestants were often beaten in the field by the veteran Spanish infantry, then the best soldiers in the world, the statesmanship of the prince counterbalanced every disaster, enabled him to achieve a victory over his foes, and finally led to the famous Union of Utrecht, in 1576, by which seven Protestant provinces—Holland, Zealand, Utrecht, Friesland, Gröningen, Overyssel, and Guelderland—became the nucleus and the lasting basis of the Dutch republic. The Spanish monarch thereupon set a price upon the head of William of Orange. This temptation, combined with fanatical zeal, produced several attempts upon his life, from the first of which (that of John Jaureguy, in 1582) he escaped with a wound: the fatal shot was, however, dealt to him two years afterwards, by one Balthazar Gerard, a Burgundian. The tragic incident is thus narrated by Motley, in his excellent history:—"The prince came from the dining-room, and began leisurely to ascend. He had only reached the second stair, when a man emerged from the sunken arch, and, standing within a foot or two of him, discharged a pistol full at his heart. Three balls entered his body, one of which, passing quite through him, struck with violence against the wall beyond. The prince exclaimed in French, as he felt the wound, 'Oh my God, have mercy upon my soul! Oh my God, have mercy upon this poor people.'" The historian concludes his account of the life and labours of the prince as follows:—"He went through life, bearing the load of a people's sorrows upon his shoulders, with a smiling face. Their name was the last word upon his lips, save the simple affirmation with which the soldier, who had been battling for the right all his lifetime, commended his soul, in dying, 'to his great captain, Christ.' The people were grateful and affectionate, for they trusted the character of their 'father William;' and not all the clouds which calumny could collect ever dimmed, to their eyes, the radiance of that lofty mind, to which they were accustomed, in their darkest calamities, to look for light. As long as he lived, he was the guiding star of a brave nation; and when he died, the little children cried in the streets." (See Motley's "History of the Rise of the Dutch Republic," published in the series entitled "Beeton's Historian.")—William left three sons, two of whom, Maurice and Frederick Henry, became, in succession, stadtholders of the United Provinces. (See MAURICE OF NASSAU.) William, prince of Orange, was born at Dillenburg, in Nassau, 1533; assassinated at Delft, 1584.

ORANGE, a parish and town of France, in the department of the Vaucluse, 12 miles from Avignon. Its streets are narrow, dark, dirty, and ill paved, with houses devoid of elegance and even of neatness. It has no public buildings worth notice, and the only objects which recommend it to attention, are its remains of antiquity. The principal of these is a triumphal arch, profusely ornamented with sculptures, and the remains of a theatre. Manf. Linen, serge, and paper. Pop. 9,300. This place was long the capital of a principality which gave title to the family now on the thrones of Nassau and the Netherlands. The king of the latter still holds the title of prince of Orange; but, at the peace of Utrecht, the town and territory were ceded to Louis XIV.

ORANGE, the name of several counties in the United States. 1. In New York. Area, 760 square miles. Pop. 60,000.—2. In the central part of Virginia. Area, 380 square miles. Pop. 12,000.—3. In North Carolina. Area, 676 square miles. Pop. 18,000.—4. In Indiana. Area, 400 square miles. Pop. 12,000.—5. In Vermont. Area, 740 square miles. Pop. 28,000.—Also the name of various townships, none of them with a population above 3,000.

ORANGE, or GARIEP, a river of S. Africa, rising near lat. 29° S., lon. 30° E., and, after a course of about 1,000 miles, inclusive of a tributary called the Vaal, falling into the Atlantic, in lat. 28° 30′ S., lon. 16° 30′ E. —Another in Jamaica, which runs into the sea 4 miles E. of Montego Bay.

ORANGEBURG, or'-ing-berg, a district in the central part of S. Carolina. Pop. 18,229.

ORANSAY, or ORONSAY, or'-an-sai, a small island of Scotland, on the W. coast of the Isle of Sky. It has the remains of an ancient priory.

ORATAVA, o-ra-ta'-va, a town of the Canary Islands, on the N. coast of Teneriffe, below the Peak. It has a mole, governor's residence, and a citadel. Pop. 8,500.

ORAVICZA, o-ra-vitz'-a, a town of Hungary, 52 miles from Temesvar. In its neighbourhood are silver-, copper-, and iron-mines. Pop. 5,000.

ORB, or ORBE, orb, a town of Bavarian Franconia, 40 miles from Wurtzburg. Manf. Paper; and it has some salt-mines and mineral springs. Pop. 4,600.

ORB, or ORBE, a river of France, in the department Herault, rising near Roumières, and, after a course of 60 miles, entering the Mediterranean 7 miles below the Canal du Midi.

ORBE, a well-built town of Switzerland, in the canton of Vaud, 16 miles from Lausanne. Pop. 2,000.

ORBEY, or'-bai, a parish and market-town of France, in the department of the Upper Rhine, 15 miles from Colmar. Manf. Cottons, glass, and earthenware. Pop. 5,600.

ORCADES, or'-kā-dees, the ancient name for the Orkney Islands.

ORDERICUS VITALIS, or-der'-i-cus vi-ta'-lis, an old Norman-English chronicler. He was the son of a Frenchman, who came to England with William the Conqueror, and was born in England, but sent, at the age of 10 years, to be educated in Normandy, where he subsequently gave himself up to a life of study, and only visited his native country once. In 1107 he was ordained a priest. His work, which is entitled "The Ecclesiastical History of England and Normandy," commences with the birth of Christ, and is brought down to the year 1141. The first two books are of little value; but of the third, in which he treats of the lives of the first Norman kings of England, M. Guizot says, "No work contains so much and such valuable information on the history of the 11th and 12th centuries; on the political state, both civil and religious, of society in the west of Europe; and on the manners of the times, whether feudal, monastic, or popular." B. near Shrewsbury, 1075; D. about 1142.

OREBRO, e(r)'-e-bro, an old and neatly-built inland town of Sweden, in the province of Nerike, on the river Svartelf, 100 miles from Stockholm. It has an active trade with Stockholm, and is the chief place of a province of the same name. Pop. 4,500. In this town is to be seen the small house occupied by Gustavus Vasa when, in 1523, he was elected to the Swedish throne.—The PROVINCE has an area of 3,256 square miles, and a population of 140,000.

OREGON, or'-e-gon, a territory of the United States, situate at the N.W. extremity of the Union. Area. Estimated at about 342,000 square miles. Pop. Estimated at about 40,000; comprising Americans and Indians.—The country N. of lat. 49°, inclusive of the valley of Upper Columbia, with the right of navigating the Columbia from its mouth, and the whole basin of the Frazer river, belongs to Great Britain.

OREL, ORLOV, or ARJOL, o'-rel, a province of European Russia, to the south of the governments of Tula and Kaluga. Area, 18,000 square miles. Desc. Undulating and fertile, with extensive forests, and agriculture attentively pursued. Pro. Corn, hemp, flax, honey, timber, and cattle. Minerals. Iron, copper, nitre, mill-stones, and turf. Manf. Leather, sugar; and there are steel-works and distilleries. Pop. 1,503,000. Lat. between 51° 50′ and 54° N. Lon. between 33° and 39° E.—The CAPITAL town of the same name is 168 miles from Voroniej, and has a population of 35,000. In 1848 it was nearly consumed by fire.

ORELLANA, Francis, o-rail-ya'-na, a Spaniard, who was the first to traverse the continent of South America. In 1531 he accompanied Pizarro to Peru; but, learning that gold, silver, and spices were to be found beyond the mountains east of Quito, he joined an expedition formed by Gonzales, brother of Pizarro, and set forth in the direction indicated. After experiencing great fatigue, the Spaniards reached Zumaco, and then explored the Napo for 200 leagues. Orellana, with a few followers, was next sent forward with provisions in a boat; upon which, instead of returning to Gonzales, he pursued his course down the river; and, after entering the main stream, continued his navigation of it for upwards of 1,000 leagues, until he reached the sea. After his return to Spain, he gave such marvellous accounts of the countries he had passed through, and of the women dwelling upon the banks of the river (whence the name Amazon was given to it), that he obtained numerous followers, and set forth upon a second expedition, but died at the mouth of the Amazon, 1519.

ORELLANA, a name of the river Amazon.

ORENBURG, o'-ren-boorg, the most westerly government of Asiatic Russia, having on one side Russia in Europe and on the other the government of Tobolsk. Area. Estimated at 144,000 square miles. Desc. Mountainous; covered by ranges of the Ural and extensive steppes. Rivers. The Ural and Samara in Europe, and affluents of the Tobol in Asia. Lakes. Numerous in the steppes, and chiefly salt. Pro. Mostly cattle, sheep, horses, and camels. Agriculture is very backward, but forests are extensive. Caviare, taken from fish in the various rivers, is an important article of trade. Minerals. Gold, copper, iron, sulphur, and vitriol. Pop. about 2,000,000. Lat. between 47° 10′ and 56° 25′ N. Lon. between 48° 20′ and 65° E.—Also a CITY in the above government. Pop. 15,000.

ORESTES, o-res'-tees, a son of Agamemnon and Clytemnestra. When his father was murdered by Clytemnestra and Ægisthus, he was saved by his sister Electra, called Laodicea by Homer, and was privately conveyed to the house of Strophius, king of Phocis, by whom he was carefully educated with his son Pylades. From the familiarity between the two young princes soon arose the most inviolable friendship. When Orestes reached manhood, he visited Mycenæ, and avenged his father's death by assassinating his mother Clytemnestra and her adulterer Ægisthus. The manner in which he committed this act is variously reported; but the people immediately after acknowledged him as king. In consequence of the matricide, Orestes is represented as tormented by the Furies, and exiles himself to Argos, where he is still pursued by the avengeful goddesses. Apollo himself purifies him, and he is acquitted by the unanimous opinion of the Areopagites. Euripides says that Orestes, after the murder of his mother, consulted the oracle of Apollo at Delphi, where he was informed that nothing could deliver him from the persecutions of the Furies, if he did not bring into Greece Diana's statue, which was in the Taurica Chersonesus, and which, as it is reported, had fallen from heaven. The king of the Chersonesus always sacrificed those who crossed the borders of his country. Orestes and his friend were both carried before Thoas, the king of the place, and doomed to be put to death. Iphigenia, then priestess of Diana, was to immolate the strangers. The intelligence that they were Grecians delayed the preparations, and Iphigenia was anxious to learn something about the country which had given her birth. She offered to spare the life of one of them, provided he would convey letters to Greece from her hand. This was a difficult trial; never was friendship more truly displayed; but at last Pylades gave way to the pressing entreaties of his friend, and consented to carry the letters of Iphigenia to Greece. These were addressed to Orestes himself, and therefore these circumstances soon led to a discovery of the connection of the priestess with Orestes. Iphigenia, convinced that he was her brother Orestes, resolved, with the two friends, to fly from Chersonesus, and to carry away the statue of Diana. Their flight was discovered, and Thoas prepared to pursue them; but Minerva interfered, and told him that all had been done by the will and approbation of the gods. After these celebrated adventures, Orestes ascended the throne of Argos, where he reigned in perfect security, and married Hermione, the daughter of Menelaus, and gave his sister to his friend Pylades. The marriage of Orestes with Hermione is, however, a matter of dispute among the ancients. His old age was crowned with peace and security, and he died in Arcadia, in the 90th year of his age, leaving his throne to his son Tisamenes, by Hermione. The friendship of Orestes and of Pylades became proverbial.

Orfah, or'-fur, a fortified town of Asiatic Turkey, 78 miles from Diarbekir. It has numerous mosques, with Greek and Armenian churches. Pop. Estimated at 25,000.

Orffyreus, or Orphyreus, or-fi-re'-us, Ernest Bessler surnamed, was in turn soldier in the service of Austria, quack doctor, mechanician, seeker of treasures, and counsellor of commerce at Cassel. In 1719 he proclaimed that he had discovered perpetual motion, and exhibited at different places in Saxony a machine which he declared successfully solved the problem. But upon the unfavourable report of the philosopher Gravesande, he destroyed his piece of mechanism. He next turned his attention to religion, and endeavoured to found an establishment to be called Gottesburg, "city of God," where Christians, Turks, and Jews were to live in peace and amity. He wrote a treatise, entitled "Perpetual Motion solved," and another upon the union of all religious sects. B. in Alsace, 1680; D. at Furstenburg, 1745.

Orfila, Matthew, or'-fe-la, a distinguished French physician and toxicologist. He was the son of an opulent merchant, and was himself destined for a commercial career; but having been shipwrecked in his 15th year, he resolved to devote himself to the study of medicine. In 1807, so highly had he distinguished himself in the science of chemistry, that he was sent, at the expense of the Spanish government, to complete his studies at Paris. The war which ensued between France and Spain, prevented his return to the latter country, and he settled at Paris, where, in 1811, he became a French citizen by letters of naturalization. In 1813 he published his "Treatise on Poisons," which placed him among the best French chemists, and led to his election as member of the Academy of Medicine, and correspondent of the Institute. In 1819 he became professor of medical jurisprudence; in 1831 he was elected dean of the faculty of medicine. His most important works were "Elements of Chemistry, applied to Medicine and the Arts," "Treatise on Legal Medicine," in four volumes, which is the greatest work on medical jurisprudence extant, and "Lectures upon Legal Medicine." He likewise wrote, in conjunction with M. Leseur, a work "On the Appearances presented by Dead Bodies after Exhumation, Drowning, Suffocation in Cesspools, or by Gasses." Orfila may be said to have founded the science of toxicology: in medical jurisprudence he was, while living, the most profound professor in Europe. B. in the island of Minorca, 1787; D. at Paris, 1853.

Orford, or'-ford, a market-town of Suffolk, at the confluence of the rivers Alde and Ore, 18 miles from Ipswich. It has an ancient church, old town-hall, and assembly-room. Pop. 1,100.

Orford, Earl of. (See Walpole, Horace.)

Oria, o'-re-a, a town of Naples, Terra d'Otranto, 22 miles from Brindisi. It has a cathedral, an hospital, and several convents. Pop. 5,000.

Oribasus, o-ri-bai'-sus, of Pergamus, physician to Julian the Apostate, who wrote "Medical Collections," compiled from the works of Galen, and two other works on anatomy. Flourished in the 4th century of the Christian era.

Orient, L', a town of France. (See L'Orient.)

Origen, or'-i-jen, a father of the Church. From his earliest youth he devoted himself to the study of the Scriptures, and, by his exhortations, his father was encouraged to endure martyrdom. Origen taught grammar for his own support and that of his mother and brethren. In his 18th year, Demetrius, bishop of Alexandria, appointed him catechist of his church. His austerities were very great, and taking the words of Matthew xix. 12, in their most literal and rigid sense, he castrated himself, to become qualified for the kingdom of heaven. From Alexandria he went to Rome, where he began his famous Hexapla, or the Bible in different languages. At the command of his bishop, he returned to Alexandria, and was ordained. Soon after this he began his Commentaries on the Scriptures; but Demetrius, who was envious of his reputation, persecuted him with violence, and in a council, assembled in 231, it was decreed that Origen should desist from preaching, and quit the city. Upon this, he went to Cæsarea, where he was well received by the bishop, and permitted to preach, which gave additional offence to his persecutors, who excommunicated him. Though he was thus treated at home, he met with the greatest respect wherever he went. He was consulted in several episcopal synods; but in the persecution under Decius, in 250, he was thrown into prison, and put to the torture. On his release, he applied himself to his ministerial labours and to writing. His most valuable works were editions of the Hebrew text and Greek version of the Old Testament, and Stromata and Principia, wherein he commented upon the doctrines of Christianity, and illustrated them by a reference to the opinions of the philosophers. Jerome styles Origen "a man of immortal genius, who understood logic, geometry, arithmetic, music, grammar, rhetoric, and all the sects of the philosophers; so that he was resorted to by many students of secular literature, whom he received chiefly that he might embrace the opportunity of instructing them in the faith of Christ." The allegorical mode employed by Origen in interpreting the Holy Scriptures led, however, to violent controversies in the 4th century; but many of his errors are said to be owing to heretical interpolations of his writings. The best edition of his works is that of De la Rue, Paris, 1733. B. in Egypt, about 186 A.D.; D. probably at Tyre, about 254.

Origen, a Platonic philosopher, who was the disciple and friend of Porphyry. He made a panegyric on the emperor Gallienus. Flourished in the 2nd century of the Christian era.—There was an Egyptian of this name, who said that marriage was the invention of the devil.

Orihua, or'-e-wa, one of the Sandwich group of islands.

Orihuela, o'-re-wai'-la, a well-built town of Spain, in Murcia, on the Segura, over which there are two bridges, 31 miles from Alicante. It is situate in a tract termed, on account of its fertility, the "Garden of Spain," and has a cathedral, churches, monasteries, convents, an hospital for the poor, another for the sick, and a third for orphans. It has, besides, a university, college, and a cavalry barracks. Manf. Silk, brandy; and there are saltpetre-works. Pop. 18,060. Orihuela was in the possession of the Moors during 550 years: they lost it 1264.

Orinoco, o-ri-no'-ko, a river of South America, and one of the greatest in the world. It rises in the Sierra Nevada, Venezuelan Guiana, and afterwards turning round with a circular sweep, it holds a northerly course, when, being joined by numerous large rivers from the eastern ridge of the Andes, it is swelled to an immense size, and runs eastward to the Atlantic Ocean, which it enters by several mouths, in lat. 8° 40′ N., lon. 61° W. During the rainy season it inundates the immense plains through which it flows, during the highest flood to an extent of from 80 to 90 miles. Its delta commences about 100 miles from the coast. It is computed that the river has 50 outlets into the ocean, only seven of which are navigable, but not for vessels of any great burden. The grand mouth of the Orinoco is formed by Cape Barima to the S.S.E., which is in lat. 8° 54′ N., and the island of Cangrejos, lying W.N.W. of the cape. They are 25 miles from each other, but the breadth of the navigable part of the passage is not quite three. The depth of water on the bar, which lies a little farther out to sea than the cape, is, at ebb, 17 feet. Near the Andes are the falls of Maypura and Atures, which are said to be tremendous. The annual swell of the Orinoco commences in April and ends in August, and its basin has an area estimated at 252,000 square miles. Its banks are clothed with dense forests, which, like the waters, abound with animal life.

Orion, o-ri′-on, a celebrated giant. Jupiter, Neptune, and Mercury, pleased with the hospitality they received from the peasant Hyricus, and the piety he exhibited as they travelled through Bœotia in disguise, promised to grant him whatever he required; and the old man desired a son without another marriage. The gods consented; and they ordered him to bury in the ground a skin. Hyricus did as they commanded; and when, nine months after, he dug for the skin, he found in it a beautiful child, whom he called Orion. Orion soon rendered himself celebrated, and Diana took him among her attendants, and even became deeply enamoured of him. His gigantic stature, however, displeased Œnopion, king of Chios, who promised to make him his son-in-law as soon as he delivered his island from wild beasts. This task was soon performed by Orion; but Œnopion intoxicated his guest, and put out his eyes on the seashore, where he had laid himself down to sleep. Orion, however, miraculously recovered his sight, it is said, by turning his face to the rising sun, and amply punished the perfidy of Œnopion. It is said that Orion was an excellent workman in iron, and that he fabricated a subterraneous palace for Vulcan. According to Ovid, Orion died of the bite of a scorpion, which the earth produced to punish his vanity in boasting that there was not on earth any animal which he could not conquer. After death, Orion was placed in heaven, where one of the constellations still bears his name. The constellation of Orion, placed near the feet of the Bull, was composed of seventeen stars, in the form of a man holding a sword, which has given occasion to the poets often to speak of Orion's sword.

Orissa, o-ris′-sa, an extensive tract of India, bounded E. by the sea and the province of Bengal, and W. by Gundwaneh. It comprises Cuttack, a portion of the British district Midnapoor, and the unsettled region lying on the W. of these. Area, about 53,000 square miles. Desc. Mountainous, and extensively covered with timber. Rivers. The Godavery, the Mahunaddee, and the Brahming. Wild beasts and reptiles of all kinds abound in the country, while the rivers swarm with fish. Pop. Estimated at 4,500,000; comprising different races. Lat. between 17° 16′ and 22° 23′ N. Lon. between 81° 35′ and 87° 20′ E.

Oristano, o-ris-ta′-no, a town of the island of Sardinia, on a bay of the same name, 54 miles from Cagliari. It is inclosed by lofty walls, and has a cathedral, hospital, college, and an archbishop's palace. It has a trade in corn and salt. Pop. 16,000.

Orizaba, o-re-sa′-ba, a town of the Mexican Confederation, 120 miles from Mexico. It has wide, neat, and well-paved streets. Manf. Coarse cloth; and there are several tanneries. Pop. 16,000. Lat. 18° 48′ N. Lon. 97° 7′ W.

Orkney Islands, ork′-ne, the Orcades of the ancients, a cluster of islands in the North Sea, separated from the north coast of Scotland by the Pentland Firth. They are sixty-seven in number, but many of them are uninhabited, being small, and producing only sheep-pasture. Those principally inhabited are Pomona or Mainland, Hoy, North Ronaldshay, South Ronaldshay, Sanday, Stronsay, Eday, Westray, Shapinshay, Englishay, Græmsay, Rousay, Weir, Enhallow, Papa Westray, Papa Stronsay, Burray, &c. (See these articles.) Desc. The Orkneys are disjoined from one another by sounds or firths, from one to five miles broad, and their surface presents great variety. The east and north coasts in general are low, the western coasts more elevated, terminating in bold and steep cliffs, and exhibiting a thousand different shapes, forming a scene highly picturesque and interesting. Climate. Variable, and insalubrious. Pro. Barley, potatoes, and turnips. Zoology. The land animals are small horses, black-cattle, sheep, swine, and rabbits. Of these, the sheep are most numerous. The heaths abound with red grouse, plovers, and snipes. The other wild fowl are eagles of various kinds, wild geese and ducks in great variety, herons, hawks, gulls, Solan geese or gannets, and swans. Seals and sea otters are very common; the firths are occasionally visited by whales, and by great herds of grampuses. Cod, ling, haddock, and flat fish, are exceedingly abundant in the surrounding seas. On the shores are found a variety of sponges, corals, and corallines; large oysters, mussels, and cockles. Manf. Plaiting straw; and there are some distilleries. Pop. about 33,000, nearly equally divided between Mainland and the rest of the islands. Lat. between 58° 43′ and 59° 24′ N. Lon. between 2° 22′ and 3° 26′ W. In the middle ages the Orkneys belonged to Norway, but, in 1468, they were annexed to the Scottish crown.

Orkney and Shetland, the most N. county of Scotland, comprising the islands of the same names. Area, 1,325 square miles. Pop. 65,000.

Orleans, or′-le-ans (Fr. or′-lai-awng), a parish and town of France, on the Loire, over which is a magnificent bridge of nine arches, 58 miles from Paris. It is built with tolerable regularity, the streets being, in general, straight; but they are narrow and incommodious. The houses are mostly in an antiquated style. Among the public edifices, the principal is the cathedral, one of the finest Gothic buildings in France; the town-house, the court of justice, the mint, the theatre, an academy, and a royal college or high school. There are public walks along the ramparts and the quays; but the most agreeable are along the banks of the river. Manf. Stockings, woollens, hats, and leather; there are, also, some sugar-refineries. Pop. 48,000.—Orleans is a place of great antiquity, having been besieged by Attila in the year 450. In 1428 it was for six months besieged by the English, and was saved by the heroism of "Joan of Arc." Eleven councils have been held in it, and it is the birthplace of Robert, king of France, Pothier, and the physician Petit.

Orleans, Island of, an island of Lower Canada, in the St. Lawrence, below Quebec. Ext. 26 miles long and 5 broad. It has a fertile soil, with numerous country houses. Pop. about 8,000.

Orleans, the name of two counties in the United States.—1. In Vermont. Area, 640 square miles. Pop. 16,000.—2. In New York. Area, 372 square miles. Pop. 30,000.—Also the name of several townships, none of them with a population above 4,000.

Orleans, New, a city and port of entry of the United States, and capital of the state of Louisiana, on the left bank of the Mississippi, 105 miles from its mouth in the Gulf of Mexico. It is regularly laid out: the streets are generally 40 feet wide, and intersect each other at right angles. Most of the houses in the suburbs have beautiful gardens, ornamented with orange-groves. The principal public buildings are churches of various denominations, a court-house, a gaol, market-house, an arsenal, governor's palace, custom-house, hospital, theatres, a college, an Ursuline convent, and an orphan asylum. The Place d'Armes is a beautiful green, which serves as a parade. The buildings are mostly of brick. New Orleans is, after New York, the principal emporium of American commerce. It is a great mart for the produce of the western states, to which the Mississippi affords the only outlet to the sea; and the quantity of goods imported to it from this quarter is immense. Numerous steamboats navigate the rivers Mississippi and Ohio, and the country around New Orleans is covered from the inundations of the Mississippi by an artificial embankment, called the Levee, which was raised at a great expense, and which extends about 100 miles along the banks of the river. From the swamps in the vicinity, it is very unhealthy; and the cemeteries are so constructed, that their tombs rise tier upon tier, until some of them reach three stories high. Pop. about 150,000; of whom upwards of 20,000 are slaves. Lat. 29° 57′ 7″ N. Lon. 90° 6′ W.—The British made an attack on New Orleans in December, 1815, but were repulsed with great loss. This city has communication with New York and most of the large trading cities in the W. Indies.

ORLEANS, HOUSE OF, a branch of the Royal family of France. It has three times originated in the younger son of the king, and has given two monarchs to France.

ORLEANS, Louis, first Duke of, was the second son of Charles V., and was assassinated at Paris by his cousin John, duke of Burgundy, in 1407.

ORLEANS, Charles, second Duke of, was eldest son of the preceding, during whose lifetime he bore the title of duke of Angoulême. In 1415 he was made prisoner at the battle of Agincourt, and remained in England during 25 years. Upon his return to France, he undertook the conquest of the duchy of Milan, to which he conceived himself entitled in right of his mother, Valentine Visconti. He was, however, unsuccessful in this enterprise. During his captivity in England, he wrote some poetical pieces, which have been printed. B. 1391; D. 1465.

ORLEANS, Louis, third Duke of. (See LOUIS XII. of France.)

ORLEANS, John Baptist Gaston, first and only duke of the second branch of, was the younger son of Henry IV. and brother of Louis XIII. He passed his life in intrigues and conspiracies, and formed several plots for the assassination of Cardinal Richelieu, but basely saved himself by denouncing, at different times, his accomplices, the duke of Montmorency, the marquis of Cinq-Mars, and Francis de Thou, son of the celebrated historian. After the deaths of Louis XIII. and Richelieu, he was restored to favour at court, but became involved in the Fronde commotions, wherein he played a despicable and vacillating part, until he was banished to Blois, where he spent the remainder of his life. He left no male issue; but his daughter, Mademoiselle de Montpensier, signalized herself during the Fronde insurrection against Mazarin. (See MONTPENSIER, Mademoiselle.) Gaston, duke of Orleans, D. 1660.

ORLEANS, Philip, first duke of the third and existing branch of the house of, was second son of Louis XIII. and Anne of Austria. Upon the death of his uncle Gaston, he inherited the title of duke of Orleans, and obtained the duchy of Montpensier at the death of Mademoiselle Montpensier in 1693. His first wife, Henrietta of England, was married to him in 1661; and by that princess he had two daughters, one of whom became wife of Charles II. of Spain, and the other, queen of Victor Amadeus II., of Savoy. He is stated to have cultivated letters with some success, while in the field he displayed great courage during several of the campaigns of his brother Louis XIV. B. 1640; D. 1701.

ORLEANS, Philip, second Duke of, was son of the preceding, by his second marriage. He is known in French history as Regent Orleans, and is declared by Voltaire "to be famed for his courage, his wit, and his pleasures. He was born for society even more than for public affairs, and was one of the most amiable men that ever existed." The general verdict of history is, notwithstanding, that Regent Orleans was an unbounded personal and political profligate. He was certainly endowed with brilliant talents, but his mind was early tainted by the debasing lessons of his preceptor, the infamous Cardinal Dubois. (See DUBOIS.) He distinguished himself in command of the French armies in Spain and Italy. In 1715 he was nominated regent, and during his administration France became bankrupt and miserable. The wild schemes of Law brought ruin upon thousands of families (see LAW), and the country was reduced to the most abject condition. B. 1674; D. 1723.

ORLEANS, Louis, third Duke of, was son of the preceding. In his youth he led a dissipated life; but, upon his marriage with a princess of Baden, to whom he was devotedly attached, he renounced his former course. At the death of this princess, which occurred prematurely, in 1726, he retired from the world, and devoted himself to works of piety, and to the study of religion and science. In 1730 he entered the abbey of St. Geneviève, where he practised extreme austerity, and performed numerous acts of humility and charity. He understood the Hebrew, Greek, and Latin languages, and was versed in ecclesiastical and civil history, botany, geography, and the fine arts. He translated the Psalms from the original, and wrote paraphrases upon several books of the Old Testament, a literal translation of St. Paul's epistles, and other works. B. 1703; D. 1752.

ORLEANS, Louis Philippe, fourth Duke of, was son of the preceding. He took part in the campaigns of 1742-3, and fought at the battles of Dettingen and Fontenoy. Like his father, he was a learned and benevolent prince. In 1756 he contributed to the introduction of inoculation into France, and is stated to have distributed as much as £1,000 per annum in charity. B. 1725; D. 1785.

ORLEANS, Louis Philippe Joseph, fifth Duke of, surnamed Philippe Egalité, was only son of the preceding. During the lifetime of his father he was known by the title of duke of Chartres. In 1778 he served on board the fleet commanded by Count d'Orvilliers; but in the action with Admiral Keppel, off Cape Ushant, he went down into the hold, and would not come up till the engagement was over. For his cowardice, he became an object of contempt with the French court. His conduct afterwards was extremely dissipated; and he joined the revolutionary party against the court, for which he was exiled. On the death of his father, he took the title of duke of Orleans. In the beginning of the Revolution, he displayed the greatest hatred to his royal relations, and became a member of the National Assembly. He also assumed the title of Citizen Egalité, and voted for the death of Louis XVI.; but, some time afterwards, he was abandoned by his partisans, seized at Marseilles, whence he was removed to Paris, where he was condemned to suffer death by the revolutionary tribunal; which sentence was executed in 1793. B. at Paris, 1747.

ORLEANS, Louis Philippe, sixth Duke of. (See LOUIS PHILIPPE, king of the French.)

ORLEANS, Ferdinand Philip, seventh Duke of, eldest son of Louis Philippe, king of the French. He was sent, in his fifth year, to the College of Henry IV., where he was distinguished by his intelligence and his amiability of disposition. In 1825 he was appointed colonel of hussars, and was serving with the French army when the revolution of 1830 burst forth. He immediately repaired to the capital with his regiment, and was received with enthusiasm. When his father received the crown, he was sent into the provinces to obtain the recognition of the new order of government. In 1835 he went to Algiers, where he signalized himself by his bravery and skill. The organization of the celebrated chasseurs de Vincennes was due to him. He unhappily met his death by a fall from his horse. Affable, generous, brave, a friend of liberal ideas, protector of the arts,—the death of this prince was regarded throughout France as a great calamity. His two sons (by the Princess Helen of Mecklenburg-Schwerin), the Count de Paris and the Count de Chartres, have resided in England since the revolution of 1848. B. at Palermo, 1810; killed, 1842.

ORLEANS, the Bastard of. (See DUNOIS.)

ORLOFF, or'-lof, a celebrated Russian family, founded by Ivan Orel, one of the archers, or Strelitzes. When this body, which was analogous to the Turkish janissaries, was destroyed, Ivan saved his life by his cool courage. Peter the Great was himself engaged in decapitating the archers, who, in turn, came forward, knelt down, and placed their heads upon a beam. When Ivan came up, a head was still remaining upon the beam. "If this is my place," said he, "it ought to be clear;" and thereupon he kicked away the head. Peter, struck with this coolness, spared his life, and appointed him to an infantry regiment; after which he became an officer and a noble. The most celebrated of his descendants were:—

ORLOFF, Gregory, Count. He served at first in the army; but attracting the attention of the grand-duchess Catherine, he became her favourite. In 1762 he was engaged in the conspiracy which brought about the assassination of Peter III., and the accession of his wife to the throne, as the empress Catherine II. From that time honours were showered upon him by the empress, the father of whose child he was. Orloff, however, desired to become the husband, and to share the throne of Catherine. At length, growing tired of his tyrannical sway, the empress banished him to his seat at Gatchina, but created him prince. After living in oriental splendour for several years, he died at St. Petersburg a lunatic, 1783. B. 1734.

ORLOFF, Alexis Count, brother of the preceding, was a soldier in the Russian guard when his brother became the favourite of Catherine. In 1762 he was one of the murderers of Paul III.; after which Catherine created him an admiral, and showered honours upon him. In 1770 he held the command in chief at the battle of Chesmi, having under his orders the English officers Elphinstone, Greig, and Dugdale, and upon that occasion destroyed the Turkish fleet. At a later period, while travelling in Italy, he met the Princess Tarakanova, daughter of the empress Elizabeth, at Leghorn. The princess, a girl of 16, was enticed on board Orloff's frigate by means of a pretended marriage, after which she was sent a prisoner to Russia. Catherine, fearing that she might, at a future period, set up a claim to the Russian throne, kept her ever afterwards in confinement. When his brother had been supplanted by Potemkin, Alexis Orloff retired to his palace at Moscow, whence he was summoned in 1796, by the emperor Paul, to act as pall-bearer to the remains of Peter III., whose body had been exhumed, in order that it might be honoured with a magnificent public funeral. Orloff is stated to have betrayed great emotion upon that occasion, perhaps expecting to be sent to execution by the son of his victim. He escaped, however, and immediately left St. Petersburg for a tour in Germany; nor did he return until Paul had himself met a violent death. D. at Moscow, 1808.—There were other brothers of Ivan. The eldest was surnamed by Catherine, "the Philosopher," and lived a retired life; he died 1791. Vladimir was president of the Academy of Sciences of St. Petersburg, and died 1832. Feodor served in the army, and signalized himself in the war against Turkey in 1770; D. 1796. This last left four children, who, although illegitimate, were allowed to take the family name, and to inherit the vast estates of their relatives. Two of these have become celebrated.

ORLOFF, Michael, served in the Russian army against Napoleon, and went to Paris in 1814 with the allied armies. Towards the close of Alexander's reign, he incurred the emperor's displeasure, and was sent to command the army of the south. He was deeply implicated in the military insurrection of 1825; was imprisoned, but escaped further punishment through the influence of his brother (see ORLOFF, Alexis), who had become the favourite of the new emperor, Nicholas. (See NICHOLAS.) From that period till his death, he lived in retirement. B. 1785; D. 1841.

ORLOFF, Alexis, a Russian diplomatist and statesman, brother of the preceding. He entered the military service, and shared in the campaigns against Napoleon; but his great power and popularity dates from the year 1825, when Nicholas had been proclaimed emperor, and when the troops revolted against the new ruler. On that occasion, Orloff led his regiment against the mutineers, and was the chief instrument in deciding the events of that critical period in favour of Nicholas, who, throughout his life, retained the deepest sense of the services Orloff had rendered him. Nicholas created him a count, adjutant-general, and gave him the command of a division of cavalry. After signalizing himself in the Turkish campaign of 1828, he signed the treaty of Adrianople, and was sent as ambassador extraordinary to Constantinople. Two years afterwards, he was dispatched by Nicholas to inspect the operations of Marshal Diebitsch against the insurgent Poles. Very soon after his arrival, both the marshal and the grand-duke Constantine died suddenly, and for a long time subsequently, the name of Orloff was held in odium with the Russians, as the suspected author of their deaths; but the suspicion has now become rejected as baseless and absurd. In 1833 he signed the treaty of Unkiar-Skelessi with Turkey, which gave to Russia the key of the Dardanelles. In 1844 he accompanied Nicholas to London; and, upon the outbreak of the war between Russia and the Western powers, he was sent to Vienna to demand the assistance of Austria, but without success. Nicholas, before his death, recommended him to his successor as his personal and tried friend. Since 1856, Orloff has acted as chief of the grand council of the empire. B. 1787.

ORME, Robert, orm, an English historian, who was the son of a surgeon of the Bombay army. He received his education at Harrow school, after which he went to India as a writer in the service of the East-India Company. He returned to England in 1752, with Captain, afterwards Lord Clive, with whom he lived many years on terms of intimacy. In 1755 he went to Madras as fourth member of the council. He also held the office of commissary-general; but in 1759 he returned to England with a small fortune. Soon afterwards he commenced writing the "History of the Military Transactions of the British Nation in India," the first volume of which appeared in 1763, the second in 1775. The Court of Directors appointed him historiographer to the Company, at a salary of £300 per annum. He completed his History in 3 vols.; and also published "Historical Fragments of the Mogul Empire during the Reign of Aurungzebe." B. in Bombay, 1728; D. 1801.

ORMOND, James Butler, Duke of, or'-mond, a celebrated Irish nobleman, who was descended from an ancient family of Tipperary, which had retained the hereditary dignity of cupbearer to the English sovereigns from the beginning of the 13th century. Upon the outbreak of the Irish rebellion in 1640, he was appointed to command the royal troops, at the head of which he defeated the rebels at Dublin, Drogheda, Kilrush, and Ross. During the struggle between Charles I. and the Parliamentarians, Ormond, who had been previously nominated lord-lieutenant of Ireland, held that country for the king; but after Charles had been taken prisoner, he resigned the command, and repaired to London, when he had an interview with the captive monarch at Hampton Court. He next went to France; but at the invitation of the Roman Catholics, he returned to Ireland, and for some time endeavoured to overcome the parliamentary forces in that country. In 1650, however, he was compelled by Cromwell to evacuate the island; upon which he again retired to France. After rendering a number of important services to Charles II. while in exile, he accompanied that monarch to England at the Restoration. During the reigns of Charles II. and James II., he was twice nominated viceroy of Ireland, and twice lost the post through court intrigue. In 1670, the notorious Colonel Blood, instigated, it is said, by Ormond's bitter enemy, the duke of Buckingham, waylaid and dragged him from his coach, with the intention of conveying him to Tyburn, and there hanging him. This infamous project was, nevertheless, frustrated by the rescue of the duke. (See BLOOD, Colonel.) The earl of Ossory, the brave son of the duke, afterwards thus addressed Buckingham in the king's presence:—"My lord of Buckingham, I know well that you are at the bottom of this late attempt upon my father, and therefore I give you fair warning, that if my father comes to a violent end by sword or pistol, if he dies by the hand of a ruffian, or by the more secret way of poison, I shall not be at a loss to know the first author of it. I shall consider you as the assassin; I shall treat you as such, and wherever I meet you I shall pistol you, though you should stand behind the king's chair. And I tell you now, in his majesty's presence, that you may be sure I shall keep my word." Subsequently, when Charles II. had most unaccountably pardoned Blood, his majesty sent to Ormond a request that he should also forgive the ruffian. Ormond thereupon replied, "that if the king could pardon the offender for stealing the crown, he might easily forgive the attempt upon his life." B. 1610; D. 1688.

ORMOND, James Butler, second Duke of, was grandson of the preceding. He distinguished himself as a soldier under William III. and Anne; but upon the accession of George I., he embraced the cause of the Pretender, was attainted in consequence, and thenceforth passed his life abroad. B. at Dublin, 1665; D. at Avignon, 1747.

ORMSBY, orms'-be, the name of several parishes in England, none of them with a population above 1,300.

ORMSKIRK, orms'-kirk, a town of England, in Lancashire, 13 miles from Liverpool. It consists of four principal streets, crossing each other at right angles. It has a church, town-hall, grammar-school, and several charities. Manf. Cottons, silks, and hats. Pop. 16,500. —It has a station on the E. Lancashire Railway.

ORMUZ, or'-muz, an island in the Persian Gulf, on which was built a city, once the most splendid and celebrated of all Asia, 45 miles from Cape Mussendone. It is now greatly decayed, the whole of the ancient city being one mass of ruins. Lat. 27° 8′ N. Lon. 56° 40′ E. Ormuz now belongs to the Imaum of Muscat. Milton thus alludes to its wealth in the opening passage of the second book of "Paradise Lost:"—

"High on a throne of royal state, which far Outshone the wealth of Ormuz or of Ind."

ORNANO, Alphonso, or-na'-no, a Corsican leader, who was brought up at the court of Henry II. of France, but returned to his native country when he had attained his 18th year, and maintained a struggle with his compatriots against the Genoese, until the signature of peace in 1568. Thereupon he retired to France with 800 followers, and was appointed colonel-general of the Corsican troops in the service of Charles IX. For his subsequent services to the French monarch he became marshal of France and lieutenant-general of Guienne. D. 1610.

ORNANO, John Baptist, son of the preceding, was, at first, appointed superintendent-general of the household of Gaston, duke of Orleans, brother to Louis XIII., and was afterwards created marshal of France; but, for his share in the intrigues against Richelieu, he was, in 1626, imprisoned at Vincennes, where he was, subsequently, either strangled or poisoned. B. 1581.

ORNANS, or'-nawng, a town of France, in the department of the Doubs, on the Louve, 10 miles from Besançon. It has a considerable trade in Gruyère cheese. Pop. 3,500.

ORNE, orn, an inland department in the N. of France, comprising a portion of the old provinces of Normandy and Perche, and bordered by the departments of Calvados, Eure-and-Loir, Mayenne, and Sarthe. Area, about 2,500 square miles. Desc. Diversified, and abounding with rich pastures on the banks of its rivers. Rivers. The principal are the Orne, the Mayenne, the Sarthe, the Eure, the Dive, the Louque, the Charenton, and the Iton. Pro. Hemp, apples, and pears. Cattle are extensively fattened, and the horses are the best in France. Fowls and eggs also form important articles of commerce. Manf. Cotton, lace, needles, and pins. Pop. 410,000.

ORNE, a small river of France, which falls into the Moselle.—Another, which, after a course of 70 miles, falls into the English Channel, about 9 miles below Caen.

ORONSAY, o-ron-sai', one of the smaller Hebrides, having on it the remains of an ancient priory.

ORONTES, o-ron'-tes, 'the rebellious,' a river of Syria, which, near Antioch, makes a circuit, and, after a course of 240 miles, falls into the sea.

OROPESA, o-ro-pai'-sa, the capital of the province of Cochabamba, in Peru. (See COCHABAMBA.)

OROSHAZA, o-ro-sha'-za, a town in the E. of Hungary, in the palatinate of Bekes, and 26 miles from the town of that name. It stands in a fertile country. Pop. 10,000.

OROSIUS, Paul, o-ro'-si-us, a Spanish divine, the disciple of St. Augustine, who sent him to Jerusalem to consult Jerome concerning the nature and origin of the soul. By the advice of the same father, he undertook a History of the World to A.D. 416. He also wrote a treatise on Free Will, and other works. Flourished in the 5th century. His "History of the World" was translated into the Anglo-Saxon language by King Alfred; and of this an English version was made in 1773.

ORPHEUS, or'-fe-us, of Thrace, a Greek poet, who flourished before Homer. He was the disciple of Linius, and the master of Musæus. His works are lost, except a few fragments; and their authenticity is doubted.

ORPHEUS. (See EURYDICE.)

ORRERY, Charles Boyle, Earl of, or'-re-re, a British statesman and writer, the son of Roger, the second earl, received his education at Christ Church, Oxford, under Dr. Atterbury, and, while there, engaged in a famous dispute with Dr. Bentley, on the Epistles of Phalaris, a new edition of which was published by Mr. Boyle in 1695. On the death of his brother, he succeeded to the earldom. During the treaty of Utrecht, he was envoy-extraordinary to the states of Flanders and Brabant, and, on his return, was created a British peer, by the title of Lord Boyle. At the accession of George I. he retired from court, and, in 1722, was sent to the Tower on suspicion of treason. After six months' confinement, he was discharged. The astronomical instrument called an "orrery" was named after him by the inventor, Graham, in gratitude for favours received from his lordship. B. 1676; D. 1731.

ORRERY, Roger Boyle, Earl of, a British statesman, who, after concluding his education at Trinity College, Dublin, went abroad, and, on his return, married the daughter of the earl of Suffolk. After the execution of Charles I. he repaired to England; when, being suspected of acting as an agent of Charles II., the committee of safety were about to send him to the Tower, but were prevented by Cromwell, who prevailed upon him to accept a commission under him in his Irish campaigns. His conduct gave Cromwell such satisfaction that, when he became protector, he made him one of his privy council. After the death of Cromwell, he withdrew to Ireland, where he took measures for the restoration of monarchy. Charles II., on his accession, created him earl of Orrery, and appointed him one of his privy council. He was shortly afterwards constituted one of the lords justices of Ireland, and commissioned to call a parliament, before the meeting of which he drew up the celebrated Act of Settlement. On the fall of Lord Clarendon, he was offered the place of chancellor, but refused it. The earl wrote several poems and plays, and his Correspondence was printed in 1742. B. in Ireland, 1621; D. 1679.

ORRERY AND KILMORE, a barony of Ireland, in Munster, in the county of Cork. Pop. 23,000.

ORSINI, or-se'-ne, a celebrated Roman family during the middle ages, the rival of the Colonna. The first Orsini known became cardinal in 1145. Matthew Orsini, his nephew, was prefect of Rome in 1153. Gaetano Orsini was made pope in 1277, under the name of Nicholas III. Another of the family was elected pope in 1724, with the name of Benedict XIII. The family has had many cardinals and other distinguished personages among its members.

ORSINI, Felice, a modern Italian patriot, who, in his 20th year, was sent to prison for taking part in the proceedings of a secret society. The amnesty granted by Pius IX., in 1816, gave him his liberty. He afterwards took part in the defence of Rome and of Venice, but was banished by Sardinia, in 1853, for attempting to excite a revolt at Genoa. Upon this he repaired to London, where he became the intimate friend of Mazzini. In 1854 he went as agent of the revolutionary committee to Parma, and proceeded thence to Milan, Trieste, Vienna, and Hermanstadt; in which last town he was arrested, and, after undergoing an examination at Vienna, was sent to the fortress of Mantua. In 1856 he effected his escape from that stronghold, under the most extraordinary circumstances, and contrived to reach England, where he commenced the delivery of public speeches, which became exceedingly popular. In the same year he produced a narrative of his life in captivity, under the title of "The Austrian Dungeons in Italy." At the commencement of the year 1858, he, with Pierri and other accomplices, made an attempt upon the life of the emperor of the French. That attempt failed, although the plot which had produced it was carefully concocted during some length of time. Orsini and Pierri were executed; and it having been asserted that the plot was organized in England, the emperor of the French made a demand upon the English nation that its laws respecting the right of asylum to foreigners should be altered. This demand was indignantly refused. Orsini was B. at Meldola, in the Roman States, 1819; executed 1858.

ORSOVA, NEW, or-sho'-vo, a town and fortress of Little Wallachia, on an island in the Danube, 36 miles from Moldavia. It is a station for steam-packets. Pop. 3,400.

Orta, or'-ta, a town of Naples, 26 miles from Manfredonia. Pop. 1,500.—Another, 36 miles from Rome. —Also the name of a Lake, 6 miles W. of Lago Maggiore, into which its surplus waters are discharged. Ext. 8 miles long, with a breadth of 1¼.

Ortegal, Cape, or-tai-gal', a N. point of land in Spain. Lat. 43° 46′ 40″ N. Lon. 7° 54′ W.

Ortellius, Abraham, or-tel'-li-us, a Dutch geographer, who travelled in England, France, Germany, and Italy, and was generally accounted the first geographer of his time. In 1570 he produced "Theatrum Orbis Terræ," or Universal Geography, the success of which led to his obtaining the appointment of geographer to Philip II. of Spain. He composed other works of the same nature, and corresponded with most of the learned men of his time. b. at Antwerp, 1527; d. 1598.

Ortelsburg, or'-tels-boorg, a town of East Prussia, 80 miles from Konigsberg. Pop. 2,000.—Here, in 1807, several engagements took place between the French and Russians.

Orthès, Henri d'Apremont, Viscount of, or'-tai, was governor of Bayonne, under Charles IX. of France. Having received an order to destroy all the Huguenots in the city on St. Bartholomew's day (25th August, 1572), he replied to the king, "Sire, I communicated the letter of your majesty to the garrison; but, although I could find everywhere good soldiers and loyal citizens, I could not obtain a single executioner."

Orthez, or Ortès, a parish and town of France, in the department of the Upper Pyrenees, on the Gave de Pau, 24 miles from Pau. Manf. Flannel, leather, and iron and copper wire. It carries on a brisk trade in cattle, Bayonne hams, and goose-feathers. Pop. 7,000.—This place was the scene of a battle between the French and British in 1814.

Ortler, or Ortelle, or'-te-ler, the loftiest mountain of the Tyrol, and of the Austrian empire, about 10 miles from Glarus. Height, 12,811 feet.

Orton, or Overton, or'-ton, the name of several parishes in England, none of them with a population above 600.

Ortona, or-to'-na, a town of Naples, in Abruzzo Citra, 8 miles from Lanciano. It has a cathedral, and a considerable trade in wine. Pop. 10,000.

Oruro, o-roo'-ro, a town of Bolivia, in S. America, 70 miles from Potosi. It has several churches and convents, and is the capital of a department of the same name. Pop. 5,000.—The Department is chiefly devoted to pasturage, and rears large numbers of cattle.

Orust, o'-roost, an island of Sweden, in the Cattegat, 28 miles from Gottenburg. Ext. 14 miles long, with a breadth of 10. Desc. Level, and fishing and rearing cattle are the principal occupations of the inhabitants. Pop. Unascertained.

Orvieto, or-ve-ai'-to, a town of Italy, 60 miles from Rome, at the confluence of the Paglia and the Chiana. Its cathedral is a fine Gothic edifice. Pop. 8,000.

Orwell, or'-wel, a beautiful river, rising near Felsham, in Suffolk, and uniting with the Stour from Manningtree, to form the fine harbour of Harwich. The site of the old town of Orwell is now covered by the sea.

Orwell, the name of several townships in the United States, none of them with a population above 1,500.

Osage Mountains, o'-saj, a county of the United States, in Missouri. Area, 855 square miles. Pop. 8,000. —Also a river and a range of mountains.

Osborne. (See Wight, Isle of.)

Oscar I., Oscar Joseph Francis Bernadotte, os'-kar, king of Sweden and Norway, was the only son of the celebrated French general Bernadotte, who became king of Sweden under the title of Charles XIV. When his father was elected heir presumptive to the Swedish crown, in 1810, he accompanied him to that country, where he received an education in conformity with the high position he was destined to fulfil. He abjured Catholicism for the Lutheran faith, was created duke of Sudermania, and began to display considerable aptitude for the military sciences, with which, and political economy, he chiefly occupied himself. In 1811 he entered the army as lieutenant-colonel, and soon afterwards rose to the high grades of grand admiral of Sweden and Norway, and general commandant of the fourth corps of artillery. In 1824 he was nominated viceroy of Norway, and became regent, during the illness of his father in 1828. Meanwhile, he had married Josephine, daughter of Eugene de Beauharnais, duke of Leuchtenberg. In 1844 he succeeded to the throne. During the war with Russia, although Sweden took no part in the struggle, he manifested the strongest sympathy with the cause of the allied Western powers. In 1855 a treaty between Sweden and France was signed, by which the former power engaged not to cede any portion of her territory to Russia. The health of the king having become frail, he, in 1857, made a tour in Germany, Switzerland, and Italy. b. at Paris, 1799.

Oschatz, o'-shatz, a town of Saxony, 32 miles from Dresden. Manf. Woollen cloth and yarn. Pop. 6,000.

Oschersleben, o'-shers-lai'-ben, a town of Prussian Saxony, 19 miles from Magdeburg. Manf. Woollen cloth. Pop. 4,000.

Osero, o-sai'-ro, a town of Austrian Illyria, on an island of the same name, in the Adriatic. Pop. 1,500.

Osero, Island of, an island of Austria, near the island of Cherso, in the Adriatic. Ext. 16 miles long and 4 broad. Pop. 3,000.

O'Shaughnessy, Sir William Brooke, o-shaw'-nes-se, a gentleman to whom is due the great merit of introducing the electric telegraphic system into India. The descendant of an ancient Irish family, he was sent, at an early age, to the university of Edinburgh, where he graduated M.D. In his 21st year he entered the service of the East-India Company, with the grade of assistant-surgeon. After being transferred to civil employment by the governor-general, in 1833, he acted as physician to Lord Metcalfe while the latter commanded at Agra. It was whilst holding the professorship of chemistry in the Medical College at Calcutta, that he first began to investigate the capabilities of the electric telegraph as a mode of communication between widely-separate places. In 1839 he published a work, wherein he urged the government to adopt a telegraphic system which was calculated to afford immense services to the civil and military administrations of India. But Lord Auckland, the governor-general of that day, gave the indefatigable man of science little encouragement; and the succeeding governors, Lords Ellenborough and Hardinge, were too much engrossed with warlike operations to give thought to any measure for the improvement of the internal resources of the country under their rule. In Lord Dalhousie, however, Dr. O'Shaughnessy found an appreciative patron: that nobleman authorized the projector to lay down an experimental line of electric telegraph, and to furnish a report of its working. That report was so satisfactory, that the court of East-India directors authorized the immediate construction of telegraphic lines between Calcutta, Agra, Bombay, Peshawur, and Madras. The lines were commenced in November, 1853, and so energetically did Dr. O'Shaughnessy pursue his labours, that, in less than six months, a line in full working order was completed between Calcutta and Agra, a distance of 800 miles. Early in 1855, the line was 3,050 miles in length, and Calcutta and Madras were placed in instantaneous communication. In February, 1856, the line was laid down throughout 4,000 miles. To justly appreciate the gigantic labours of the doctor, it must be borne in mind that there was no iron road, few bridges; that the wires cross seventy broad rivers, and pass through dense jungles, to enter which is death during six months of the year; but the chief difficulty that he had to contend with was the sudden and simultaneous training of 300 persons, who were to be employed in the many offices connected with the working of the system. In 1856 he went to England, where he was nominated a knight commander of the Bath, in acknowledgment of his great services. b. at Limerick, Ireland, 1809.

Oslander, Andrew, o-se-an'-der, a German divine, who studied at Wittemburg and Nuremburg, was one of the first disciples of Luther, and became minister and professor at Konigsberg, where he distinguished himself by a peculiar doctrine on justification, which he asserted to be effected in man by the union of God with our souls. This doctrine he zealously defended, and opposed Luther with great fury. He was the author of several Latin works, the most important of which were, "On the Harmony of the Gospels," and "Epistle to Zwinglius on the Sacrament of the Eucharist." B. in Bavaria, 1498; D. 1552.

OSIMO, o-se'-mo, a town of Italy, 10 miles from Ancona. It has a cathedral and other churches, with a trade in silk and corn. Pop. 14,000.

OSIRIS, o-si'-ris, a great deity of the Egyptians. The ancients greatly differ in their opinions concerning this celebrated god; but they all agree that, as king of Egypt, he took particular care to civilize his subjects, and to teach them agriculture. After he had accomplished a reform at home, Osiris resolved to spread civilization in the other parts of the earth. He left his kingdom to the care of his wife Isis, and in his expedition was accompanied by his brother Apollo, and by Anubis, Macedo, and Pan. His march was through Æthiopia. He afterwards passed through Arabia, and visited the greatest part of the kingdoms of Asia and of Europe, where he enlightened the minds of men by introducing among them the worship of the gods, and a reverence for the wisdom of a supreme being. At his return home, Osiris found the minds of his subjects agitated. His brother Typhon, who had raised a revolt, murdered him in a secret apartment, and cut his body to pieces, which were divided among the associates of his guilt. This cruelty incensed Isis; she, with her son Orus, defeated Typhon and his partisans, and revenged her husband's death. She recovered the mangled pieces of her husband's body, which the murderer had thrown into the sea, and then directed the different Egyptian priests to choose whatever animals they pleased to represent the person and the divinity of Osiris, and they were enjoined to pay the greatest reverence to that representative of divinity, and to bury it, when dead, with the greatest solemnity. To render their establishment more popular, each sacerdotal body had a certain portion of land allotted to it to defray the expenses attending the ceremonial rites. As Osiris had particularly instructed his subjects in cultivating the ground, the priests chose the ox to represent him, and paid the most superstitious veneration to that animal. Osiris, according to the opinion of some mythologists, is the same as the sun, and the adoration which is paid by different nations to an Anubis, a Bacchus, a Dionysius, a Jupiter, a Pan, &c., is the same as that which Osiris received in the Egyptian temples. Nothing can give a clearer idea of the greatness of Osiris than this inscription, found on some ancient monuments:—"Saturn, the youngest of all the gods, was my father: I am Osiris, who conducted a large and numerous army as far as the deserts of India, and travelled over the greatest part of the world, and visited the streams of the Ister, and the remote shores of the ocean, diffusing benevolence to all the inhabitants of the earth."

OSIUS, o'-si-us, bishop of Cordova, in Spain. He became the confidant of Constantine, who, by his persuasions, convened in 323 the council of Nice, where Osius presided. The emperor Constantius persecuted him with so much cruelty to make him turn Arian, that Osius, at the age of 100, was induced to sign a confession of faith prescribed to him. He was then permitted to return to his diocese, where he died soon after, extremely penitent for his weakness, and renouncing the Arian heresy with great fervour. D. 357.

OSMA, os'-ma, a river of European Turkey, which, after a course of 100 miles, joins the Danube near Nictapolis.

OSMAN OR OTHMAN I., os'-man, surnamed El-ghazi, 'the victorious,' the founder of the dynasty at present reigning at Constantinople, was at first the chieftain of a small territory in Bithynia; but, in 1299, he invaded the whole country of Nicæa, and subsequently extended his conquests as far as the Black Sea. B. at Sukut, Bithynia, 1259; D. 1326.

OSMAN OR OTHMAN II., sultan of the Turks, was the son of Achmet I., and succeeded his uncle Mustapha in 1618. He declared war against Poland in 1621; but, after several defeats, was obliged to conclude a disadvantageous peace. Attributing his failures to the Janissaries, he resolved to substitute a militia of Arabs in their room, which so provoked them that they deposed him and placed Mustapha on the throne. Osman was strangled in 1622.

OSMAN OR OTHMAN III. became sultan in 1754, but reigned only three years, during which time he behaved with the utmost cruelty towards his subjects. D. 1757.

OSMOND, St., os'-mond, a Norman prelate, who, in 1066, followed William the Conqueror to England, and was made chancellor of the kingdom and bishop of Salisbury. For this diocese he reformed the liturgy, which became general throughout the kingdom, under the name of the liturgy of Salisbury, and was commonly used throughout England until the Reformation. At his death, he was canonized by Pope Calixtus III. B. in Normandy, in the 11th century; D. in England, 1099.

OSNABRUCK, or OSNABURG, os'-na-burg (Germ. os'-na-brock), a town of Hanover, and the capital of a principality, on the Hase, 73 miles from Hanover. It is divided into the Old and New towns. The public buildings are the cathedral, which possesses several relics of antiquity, and the town-house, in which was concluded the peace of Westphalia in 1648; several churches, a Lutheran orphan-house, hospitals, a workhouse, a Catholic and a Lutheran gymnasium. Manf. Coarse woollen, leather, tobacco, chicory, and paper. Pop. 13,000.

OSNABURGH, a township of the United States, in Ohio, 130 miles from Columbus. Pop. 2,500.

OSORIO, Jerome, o-so'-re-o, a Portuguese bishop, who became professor of divinity at Coimbra, and afterwards bishop of Sylves. His works were published at Rome in 1592. On account of the elegance of his Latin style, he was called the Cicero of Portugal. B. at Lisbon, 1506; D. 1580.

OSSA, os'-sa, a celebrated mountain of Greece, in Thessaly, immediately N. of Mount Pelion, and bounding, with the opposite chain of Olympus, the vale of Tempe.

OSSA, a town of Russia, on the Kama, 58 miles from Perm. Pop. 2,000.

OSSAT, Arnaud d', os'-sa, an eminent French cardinal. By the kindness of a gentleman, he received a good education, and was appointed tutor to some young noblemen. He afterwards practised the law, but forsook that profession, and became secretary first to Cardinal d'Este, and next to Cardinal de Joyeuse. He was ambassador of France at Rome, and obtained the papal absolution for Henry IV., for which he was made bishop of Rennes, in 1596. In 1598 he was made cardinal. B. at Armagnac, 1536; D. 1604.

OSSIAN, os'-si-an, an ancient Scotch bard, was the son of Fingal, whom he accompanied in several military expeditions. He lived to an advanced age, and, at the close of life, became blind. Mr. Macpherson published a translation of poems, in a sort of poetical prose, which he ascribed to Ossian; but their authenticity has been disputed by several critics, and as zealously defended by others. (See MACPHERSON, James.) Supposed to have flourished in the 3rd century.

OSSOLI, Sarah Margaret Fuller, Marchioness of, os'-so-le, a modern American authoress, whose father gave her so high an education, that, even as a child, "she knew more Greek and Latin than half the professors." In 1835 this parent died suddenly, and, her means becoming straitened, Miss Fuller sought employment as teacher of Latin, German, Italian, and French in a school at Rhode Island. Subsequently, she joined the "Brook Farm" community, and began to exercise her pen by contributing to the periodicals. In 1839 she produced a translation of Eckermann's "Conversations with Göthe." About the same time, her great conversational powers induced some ladies of Boston to request her to form "conversational classes" under her direction. This singular scheme became highly successful, and five-and-twenty ladies met to discuss such topics as "the genealogy of heaven and earth," "the celestial inspiration of genius and transmission of divine law." In 1840 Mr. Emerson commenced his "Dial," to which Miss Fuller contributed some philosophical articles on the "Fine Arts." At a later period, she went to reside at New York, on being appointed to the direction of the literary department of the "Tribune." In 1846 she set out upon a tour of Europe, a project which had long been cherished in her mind. London and Paris were visited, the literary circles in both cities being her resort. At Rome, while attending divine service in St. Peter's, she met a young

Italian nobleman, and, after a short acquaintance, became his wife, in 1847. The marriage was, however, kept secret until the siege of Rome, which took place in the following year. During that struggle, she acted as nurse in one of the hospitals. When the French succeeded in entering the city, she, with her husband and infant child, retired to Leghorn, and, after remaining in that place several months, embarked for America; but, after a stormy passage, the vessel was wrecked upon the coast at Long Island, and herself, husband, and child, were drowned. A narrative of the Roman revolution, in manuscript, was lost with her. Her essays were collected and published in a work entitled "Papers on Literature and Art." D. in Massachusetts, 1810; D. 1850.

OSSORY, Thomas Butler, Earl of, os'-so-re, son of the duke of Ormond. Cromwell sent him to the Tower; whence he was released, after eight months' confinement, and then went to Flanders. At the Restoration he was appointed lieutenant-general of the army in Ireland, and in 1666 created an English peer, by the title of Lord Butler. He was a volunteer under Lord Albemarle in the great fight with the Dutch; for which, in 1673, he was made sole admiral of the fleet, in the absence of Prince Rupert. In 1677 he commanded the English forces at the battle of Mons. B. in Ireland, 1643; D. 1680.

OSSUN, os'-su(r), a town of France, in the Upper Pyrenees, 10 miles from Tarbes. Pop. 3,000. In its neighbourhood a great battle was, in the 8th century, fought with the Saracens.

OSSUNA, Tellez y Giron, Duke of, os-soo'-na, a celebrated Spanish statesman, who attracted notice at court by his sarcastic wit, and thereby incurred the displeasure of Philip II. Banished from his native country, he went into Flanders, where he assumed the command of a regiment, which he had equipped at his own expense, and fought with so much success on the Spanish side, that he thereby obtained his recall. He became the favourite of the duke of Lerma, and was appointed viceroy of Sicily in 1610, which post he retained during five years. In 1618 he was appointed viceroy at Naples, and in that capacity defeated the Venetians; but refused to establish the Inquisition in Naples. He conceived a plan of obtaining Venice for the Spanish crown, or, as some assert, as an independent monarchy for himself. He succeeded in deceiving the court of Madrid for some time, but was superseded as viceroy of Naples by Cardinal Borgia; upon which he was imprisoned in the castle of Almeida, where he D. 1624. B. at Valladolid, 1579.

OSTADE, Adrian van, os'-tad, one of the most celebrated painters of the Dutch school. He studied under Frank Hals and Rembrandt, and drew his subjects from low life. In his pictures we generally find people smoking and drinking in alehouses and kitchens, or indulging in rural sports. B. at Lübeck, 1610; D. at Amsterdam, 1685.

OSTADE, Isaac van, was brother of the preceding, and was, like him, an excellent painter. Of him, Dr. Waagen says: "Great injustice is done to Isaac van Ostade by the poor pictures of country life which are frequently ascribed to him in the galleries of Germany. In Holland, in Paris, and above all, in England, we may be convinced that in his village scenes, and in his winter pieces, he is a wholly original master, and by no means inferior to his brother. B. at Lübeck, 1617; D. 1671.

OSTASCHKOW, os'-tash-ko, a town of European Russia, in the government of Tver, on Lake Salig. It is mostly built of wood, and has salt and spirit magazines, tanneries, and shipbuilding-docks. Pop. 9,000.

OSTEND, os-tend', a fortified town of Belgium, in West Flanders, on the North Sea, 36 miles from Ghent. The streets of Ostend are straight, and the houses in general well built, but deficient in height. It has no public edifices worth mentioning, except the town-house and citadel. Its harbour is considered one of the best in Flanders; but it is formed only by the tide entering the mouth of a small river, and ships of burden cannot enter but at high water. It communicates by canals with Bruges and Ghent W., and with Nieuport E. Manf. Rope, soap, salt, and sailcloth. Its trade is not, as formerly, between one distant seaport and another, but between the interior and foreign countries, particularly England. Pop. 17,000. Lat. 51° 14′ 1″ N. Lon. 2° 55′ 5″ E.—Ostend is remarkable for a very long and obstinate siege (from 1601 to 1604) against the Spaniards. It has regular steam communication with London, and is connected with Antwerp by the Great Belgian Railway.

OSTERODE, os'-te-rod, a town of Hanover, on the Soese, at the foot of the Harz, 50 miles from Hanover. Manf. Woollen and cotton goods, table linen, tobacco, soap, white lead, and metallic and wooden wares. It has, besides, some tanneries, breweries, and distilleries. Pop. 6,000.

OSTERVALD, John Frederic, os'-ter-vald, a Swiss Protestant divine, who wrote "A Catechism of the Christian Religion," "Arguments and Reflections on all the Books of the Bible," and other works, and produced a translation of the Bible in French, much in use among French Protestants. B. at Neufchâtel, 1663; D. at the same place, 1747.

OSTHEIM, ost'-hime, the name of several villages in Germany, none of them with a population above 3,000.

OSTROG, os'-trog, a town of Russian Poland, in the government of Volhynia, 57 miles from Constantinov. Pop. 6,500.

OSTROLENKA, os-tro-len'-ka, a town of Poland, on the Narew, 86 miles from Plock. Pop. 2,000.—This place was, in 1806, the scene of a severe conflict between the Russians and French; and, in 1831, the Russians and Poles had an engagement here.

OSTROVNO, os-trof'-no, a village of Russian Lithuania, on the Dwina. Pop. 2,000.—Here, in 1812, the Russians were defeated by the French.

OSTUNI, os-too'-ne, a town of Naples, 50 miles from Bari. It is a bishop's see. Pop. 6,000.

OSUNA, o-soo'-na, a town of Spain, 42 miles from Seville. It is an important military post, has several hospitals, a university, and a barracks. Its trade is considerable in wine, corn, fruit, oil, capers, and rush-wares. Pop. about 18,000.

OSWALD, os'-wald, king of Northumberland, was obliged, after the death of Ethelfrid, his father, to take refuge in Ireland, his uncle, Edwin, having possessed himself of the throne. He became a Christian in his retreat, and, returning to his own country, defeated Cerdowalla, king of the Britons, who lost his life. Oswald reunited the two kingdoms of Northumberland; but was slain in a battle with Penda, king of Mercia, 643 A.D. The monkish historians relate that many miracles were performed by his relics, for which he was canonized.

OSWALDTWHISTLE, os'-wald-wis'-el, a township of Lancashire, 4 miles from Blackburn. Manf. Cotton-spinning. Pop. 8,000.

OSWEGO, os-we'-go, a county in the state of New York, U.S. Area, 925 square miles. Pop. 65,000.

OSWEGO, a river of the state of New York, U.S., which issues from Oneida Lake, and, after a course of 24 miles, falls into Lake Ontario. At the mouth of the river is a safe and good harbour, with two fathoms water. The channel is commanded by a well-built fort, on an eminence E. of the river.

OSWEGO, a city of the United States, standing on both sides of the Oswego, and united by a bridge 700 feet in length. It has several churches, custom-house, female seminary, an academy, and other schools. Manf. Cotton-spinning, tanning; and there are shipbuilding-docks. Pop. 13,000.

OSWESTRY, os'-wes-tre, a borough and market-town of Salop, 20 miles from Shrewsbury. It was formerly inclosed by walls, and there are still some remains of its once magnificent castle. The public buildings are the church, town-hall, prison, theatre, and several schools. Manf. Flannels. Pop. 9,000.—It has a station on the Shrewsbury and Chester Railway. The name of this town is taken from Oswald, the king of Northumbria, who, in the early part of the 7th century, was slain here.

OSYMANDIAS, o-si-măn'-di-as, an Egyptian king, and the first monarch who formed a library. He caused a colossal statue of himself to be erected, on which was this inscription: "I am Osymandias, king of kings; whoever will dispute this title with me, let him surpass my works." He is said to have reigned at Thebes between the 20th and 16th centuries before Christ.

OTAGO, o-ta'-go, a colonial settlement of New Zealand, on Ontago Bay, 320 miles from Port Nicholson. It is principally composed of Scotchmen. Pop. about 3,000.—DUNEDIN is its principal town, which is rapidly increasing in population.

OTAHEITE, or TAHITI, o'-ta-he'-te, an island in the South Pacific Ocean, forming the principal of the Society Islands. Ext. About 110 miles in circumference. Desc. It consists of two peninsulas, connected by a low isthmus about three miles across, covered with trees and shrubs, but wholly uncultivated, though no part of the island seems more capable of improvement, and of admitting the plough, if cleared from wood. The soil of the low lands, and of the valleys which run up from the sea between the mountains, is remarkably fertile, consisting of a rich blackish mould, covered with bread-fruit, cocoa-nut, plantains, eve-apple, the youte or cloth-plant; besides a variety of others. The mountains afford trees of all kinds and sizes, and are, in most places, covered to their very tops with wood; in others, with bamboos of great length; and, in some, with fern and reeds. The hills rise very steep, and swell into mountains almost inaccessible, but everywhere productive of plantains, yams, and a multitude of wild roots growing spontaneously, and sometimes used for food. In these higher regions only is to be found sandal-wood of two kinds, yellow and dark-coloured; whence the natives chiefly draw the perfume for the cocoa-nut oil, with which they anoint themselves. Inhabitants. These are above the common size; and the chiefs are a larger race, few of them being under six feet. The men are tall, strong, well-limbed, and finely-shaped. The women of the superior rank are also in general above our middle stature; but those of the inferior class are below it, and some of them are very small. Their natural complexion is a kind of clear olive or brunette. Their manners, institutions, and religion are altogether those of savages, though the efforts of missionaries have greatly improved them. Lat. of Point Venus, 17° 29′ 2″ S. Lon. 149° 29′ W.—The French claim a protectorate over this island and the islands of Wallis and Gambier. It was taken possession of by them in 1816.

OTHMAN. (See OSMAN.)

OTHO, Marcus Salvius, o'-tho, Roman emperor, was of a family which descended from the ancient kings of Etruria. Nero, whose companion he was in his debaucheries, elevated him to the highest offices in the empire. After Nero's death he attached himself to Galba; but that emperor having adopted Piso as his heir, Otho excited an insurrection, murdered Galba and Piso, and ascended the throne in 69; was opposed by Vitellius, who was supported by the German army; and in a battle between the two rivals near Cremona, Otho was defeated; on which he slew himself, after reigning three months. B. at Rome, A.D. 31 or 32; D. 69.

OTHO I., emperor of Germany, called the Great, was the eldest son of Henry the Fowler, and crowned in 937, at the age of 14. Berenger having usurped the title of emperor in Italy, Otho entered Rome, where he was crowned by John XII. That pontiff afterwards entered into a league with Berenger; on which Otho caused him to be deposed, and put Leo XIII. in his place, in 963. On the emperor's return to Germany, the Romans revolted, and imprisoned Leo; for which Otho again visited Rome, where he exercised severe vengeance on the senate. He next turned his arms against Nicephorus Phocas, emperor of the East, whose army he defeated, and after cutting off the noses of his prisoners, sent them to Constantinople; but John Zimisces, the successor of Nicephorus, made peace with Otho. B. 923; D. 973.

OTHO II., surnamed the Bloody, succeeded his father, the preceding emperor, in 973. His mother Adelaide opposed his accession; on which he expelled her from court. Her party proclaimed Henry, duke of Bavaria, emperor; but he was defeated by Otho, who also repulsed the Danes and Bohemians. He afterwards marched into Italy, in order to expel the Saracens from Sicily, but fell ill at Rome, where he died, 983; B. 951.

OTHO III., the son of the preceding, was only three years old at the death of his father; but his empire was administered by his grandmother Adelaide, conjointly with the archbishop of Cologne. At the age of 16 he assumed the reins of government, and went to Italy, which was in a state of confusion, owing to the opposition of different popes. Otho having re-established order, returned into Germany, and made Boleslas king of Poland. He was obliged again to pass into Italy to quell a revolt, but died soon afterwards. B. 980; D. 1002.

OTHO IV., called the Superb, was the son of Henry, duke of Saxony, and chosen emperor in 1208. He was excommunicated by the pope for seizing the lands which the Countess Matilda bequeathed to the Holy See. In 1212 the princes of the empire elected Frederic, king of Sicily, in the room of Otho, who, after struggling against his rival until 1215, resigned his crown to him, and retired to Brunswick. D. 1240.

OTHO I., king of Greece, was the second son of Louis I. of Bavaria, and was, in his 17th year, offered the throne of the new Greek kingdom in 1832. After being assisted in his government by a regency, he, in 1835, became the unassisted monarch of Greece. In 1836 he married Amelia, daughter of the grand-duke of Oldenburg, a marriage offering some peculiarities. The king was a Roman Catholic, the queen Protestant, while any children that might be born were to be educated in the faith of the Greek church. After some internal dissensions, the king, in 1844, promulgated a new constitution, which was founded upon that of the French in 1830. At the commencement of the year 1847, a public insult addressed to M. Musurus, the Turkish minister at the court of Athens, had nearly provoked a rupture between the two powers. In that affair, both the interests of the nation and the dignity of the throne were compromised. In 1850 the commerce of Greece was materially injured by the obstinate attitude of the king with respect to the indemnity claimed for M. Pacifico, an English subject, by England, whose fleet was sent to blockade the Greek ports. During the war with Russia, the Greek capital was the place where numerous bands of brigands were organized, which, taking advantage of the troubled condition of Turkey, committed great ravages upon the frontiers. Both England and France protested against these predatory hordes, and an Anglo-French division was sent to the Piræus. The Western powers demanded also the retirement of the ministry; since which period the administration has been frequently and apparently capriciously changed. Otho was born in Bavaria, 1815.

OTHRYS, MOUNT, o'-thris, a chain forming the N. frontier of Greece. Its height varies between 4,000 and 6,000 feet above the level of the sea.

OTISCO, o-tis'-ko, a township of the United States, on a lake of the same name, in New York, 14 miles from Syracuse. Pop. 2,000.

OTLEY, ot'-le, a neat market-town of the West Riding of Yorkshire, on the Wharf, 10 miles from Leeds. It has a church, a grammar-school, and mechanics' institute. In the neighbourhood are worsted-mills. Pop. 12,500.

OTRANTO, or TERRA D'OTRANTO, o-tran'-to, a peninsular province, forming the S.E. extremity of Italy, having the Gulf of Taranto on the W. and the Adriatic on the E. It it the "heel of the Italian boot." Area, 2,883 square miles. Pop. 402,000.

OTRANTO, a fortified seaport-town of Naples, in the cape of the same name, 22 miles from Lecce. Pop. 4,500.

OTRANTO, CAPE, is on the STRAIT OF OTRANTO, a channel 44 miles across, and connecting the Adriatic with the Mediterranean Sea. Lat. 40° 8′ N. Lon. 18° 29′ E.

OTRICOLI, o-tre'-ko-le, a town of Central Italy, 36 miles from Rome. Pop. 1,000.—In its neighbourhood the Neapolitans were defeated by the French, in 1798.

OTSEGO, ot-se'-go, a county in the central part of New York, U.S. Area, 892 square miles. Pop. 50,000.—Also, a LAKE of the United States, 60 miles from Albany. Ext. 9 miles long, with a breadth of 2.

OTTERBURN, ot'-ter-burn, a township of Northumberland, 20 miles from Hexham. Pop. about 500.—About half a mile from this place is an obelisk marking the spot where Earl Douglas fell in the battle of Chevy Chace, in 1388.

OTTERY ST. MARY, ot'-te-re, an irregularly-built town of Devonshire, on the Otter, 10 miles from Exeter. The principal building is the church, a spacious edifice, possessing many singularities in its construction. The monuments are numerous, and many of them curious. Manf. Silk and ropes. Pop. 4,500. This is the birthplace of Coleridge, the poet.

OTTAWA, or GRAND RIVER, ot'-ta-wa, a river of Canada, rising in lat. 48° 30′ N., lon. 80° W., and, after a course of 600 miles, entering the Lake of the OTTAWA.

Mountains, 40 miles from Montreal.—Also a county of the United States, in Michigan. Area, 828 square miles. Pop. 6,000.

OTWAY, Thomas, ot'-wai, an English dramatic writer, who was educated at Winchester school; whence he removed to Christ Church, Oxford, which he left without taking a degree, and went to London, where he became a performer, and writer for the stage, producing his first tragedy, "Alcibiades," in 1675. The earl of Plymouth procured him a cornetcy in a regiment in Flanders; but Otway, having little taste for the army, returned to London, where, in great poverty, he recommenced writing plays. Having been compelled by his necessities to contract debts, and haunted by the emissaries of the law, he retired to a public house on Tower Hill, where, according to one account, he died of want, by swallowing, after a long fast, a piece of bread which charity had supplied. Otway excels in depicting the tender passions in tragedy; of which his "Orphan" and "Venice Preserved" are proofs. A complete edition of his works, which were numerous, was published in 1814. B. at Trotten, Sussex, 1651; D. 1685.

OTTOCAR II., ot'-to-kar, surnamed the Conqueror, succeeded Wenceslaus III., and united the kingdoms of Bohemia, Austria, and Styria, in 1253, and in the following year made some conquests in Prussia. He founded cities, encouraged trades and manufactures, and protested against the election of Rudolph of Hapsburg. Placed under the ban of the empire in 1275, he was abandoned by his allies, and in the succeeding years deprived of Austria. He recommenced the war in 1277, but perished at the battle of Marchfeld, in 1278.

OUDE, oud or ood, an extensive province of Hindostan, bounded N. by Nepaul, E. by Bahar, S. by Allahabad, and W. by Delhi and Agra. Area. Estimated at about 23,000 square miles. Desc. The whole surface is flat, extremely fertile, and well watered by large rivers, or by the copious streams which intersect the country. Rivers. The Gogra, Goomtee, Sael, and Ganges, which runs along its western boundary. There are, besides, numerous smaller streams, and several lakes. Climate. Dry, but subject to the extremes of heat and cold. In the south, the climate is salubrious, and longevity common. Zoology. The tiger, wolf, flying-fox, hyena, reptiles; birds and insects in great variety. The botany is also extremely rich and varied. Pro. Wheat, barley, rice, and a variety of other grains; cotton, sugar-cane, indigo, hemp, mustard, tobacco, and poppies. It is also celebrated for its grapes, mangoes, and other fruits. Oxen are exclusively used for agricultural purposes, and the domestic animals generally consist of cattle, sheep, and goats. Minerals. In some of the districts, quantities of saltpetre, and lapis lazuli. Manf. A variety of cotton cloths and a course kind of flannel, paper, glass-wares, and bows, arrows, shields, matchlocks, and swords; but it is not celebrated for any peculiar manufacture, unless it be cotton carpets. Pop. Estimated at about 3,000,000; comprising Mahometans and Hindoos of all castes. Lat. between 25° 34′ and 29° 0′ N. Lon. between 79° 45′ and 83° 11′ E. Oude was formerly governed by a native prince, under the superintendence of the British, who had a resident at his court, and a regiment of infantry to protect him. In 1849, an armed force, of the strength of about 6,000 men, was maintained by the British in the province. After the rebellion of 1857, it was taken possession of by the British.

OUDE, or AYODHYA, the ancient capital of the above province, on the Gogra river, and said to have been of great extent. It is one of the most sacred places of antiquity, and has the temple of a monkey god. Pop. 8,000. Lat. 26° 45′ N. Lon. 82° 10′ E.

OUDENARDE, oo'-de-nard, a town of Belgium, in East Flanders, divided into two parts by the Scheldt, 32 miles from Brussels. Manf. Woollen and linen. Pop. 6,300.—It is noted for the memorable victory gained over the French, in 1708, by Prince Eugene and the duke of Marlborough.

OUDINOT, Charles Nicholas, oo'-de-no, marshal of France and duke of Reggio. At the age of 16 he entered upon his military career, and, in 1792, obtained the command of a battalion. In the same year he performed his first great feat of arms,—the repulse of the Prussians from the fort of Bitsch, with the loss of 700 prisoners. In 1794, while in command of a distant outpost, he, with a single regiment, kept in check a corps of the Austrians numbering 10,000 men. For that service he was appointed general of brigade; and, after being severely wounded in a subsequent attack, was taken prisoner by the Austrians. On obtaining his exchange, he performed signal feats of bravery at Trèves, Nordlingen, and Donauwerth, and was created general of division in 1799. At Zurich, the siege of Genoa, the battle of Pozzolo, and the passage of the Mincio, he maintained his great reputation for skill and bravery. Napoleon presented him with a sword of honour, and when, in 1805, he established an élite corps of grenadiers, he intrusted the command to Oudinot. At the head of this corps, he was the first to enter Vienna, and likewise contributed to the victory at Austerlitz. In 1807 he gained the battle of Ostrolenka, in Poland; and at Friedland, soon afterwards, performed his greatest deed. With one corps, he kept the whole Russian army in check until Napoleon came up. After Wagram, the emperor created Oudinot a marshal, and duke of Reggio; and, upon the flight of Louis Bonaparte from Holland, he was sent to occupy the country, where he remained for two years, to the complete satisfaction of the Dutch people. Throughout the battles of 1812, '13, '14, Oudinot's name shone with all its old lustre; but, after the emperor's abdication, he gave his adherence to the Bourbons, to whom he afterwards steadfastly submitted. In 1839, Louis Philippe nominated him grand chancellor of the Legion of Honour, and governor of the Invalides. Discreet, loyal, and brave, he merited the title bestowed upon him by his compatriots, "the Modern Bayard." B. in France, 1767; D. at Paris, 1847.

OUDINOT, Nicholas Charles Victor, a modern French general, and eldest son of the preceding. At first a page to the emperor Napoleon I., he was created lieutenant of hussars for the bravery exhibited by him at the passage of the Danube in 1809. His next employment was as aide-de-camp to Marshal Massena, in Portugal. Throughout the final campaigns of Napoleon, he signalized himself as the worthy son of a brave parent; and, at the abdication of the emperor, he took service under the restored Bourbon dynasty, and remained faithful to it during the Hundred Days. For this fidelity he was, after the fall of Napoleon, created commandant of the grenadiers of the Royal Guard. At the revolution of 1830, he tendered his resignation of his various appointments, and kept aloof from the government of Louis Philippe until the year 1835, when he was appointed to the command of an African brigade. After the revolution of 1848, he was nominated to the command of the army of observation at the foot of the Alps. In that command he was succeeded by Marshal Bugeaud, in 1849; but was soon afterwards sent, at the head of a French expeditionary corps, to compel the Romans to accept the authority of the pope. The city was stoutly defended by Garibaldi, and only submitted after an obstinate struggle. Created a grand cross of the Legion of Honour after the fall of Rome, he returned to France, and took his seat in the Legislative Assembly. At the coup d'état, he was arrested, and remained for some time a prisoner in the fortress of Vincennes. After his liberation, he retired into private life. He has written several valuable works on military tactics, and upon cavalry. B. in France, 1791.

OUEN, ST., oo'-a, the name of numerous parishes and villages in France, none of them with a population above 2,500.—The most famous is 4 miles from Paris, where, on the 2nd May, 1814, Louis XVIII. signed the declaration of St. Ouen.

OUFA, or UFA, oo'-fa, a city of Asiatic Russia, capital of the government of Orenburg, on the Bielaya, near its junction with the Oufa, 200 miles from Orenburg. It has seven churches and two convents. The neighbourhood is inhabited by a race of Tartars. Pop. 6,000. Lat. 54° 42′ N. Lon. 56° 18′ E.—Also a RIVER rising in the Ural Mountains, and, after a course of 400 miles, joining the Bielaya near Oufa.

OUGHTRED, William, ow'-tred, an English divine and mathematician, was educated at Eton, whence he was elected to King's College, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship. About 1603 he was presented to the living of Aldbury, Surrey; after which he devoted himself to mathematical pursuits, and wrote several treatises, particularly his "Clavis," the plan of which was adopted by Sir Isaac Newton. In the Rebellion he suffered considerably for his adherence to the royal cause; indeed, according to Fuller, he died of joy at hearing of the restoration of Charles II. Fuller states that "this aged Simeon had a strong persuasion, that before his death he should behold Christ's anointed restored to the throne; which he did accordingly, to his great joy, and then had his 'dimittis' out of this mortal life." Oughtred enjoyed the very highest reputation in his day, and was called "the prince of mathematicians." B. at Eton, Buckinghamshire, 1573; D. in Sussex, 1660.

OULOU-BEG, oo'-loo-beg, grandson of Tamerlane, to whose empire he succeeded in 1446. He resided at Samarcand, where he erected a fine observatory. Passionately fond of astronomical pursuits, he compiled a series of tables in Persian, and likewise produced some other writings upon astronomical science. B. 1394; killed, 1449.

OUNDLE, oun'-del, a market-town of Northampton, on the Nen, 13 miles from Peterborough. It has a spacious church, two ancient grammar-schools, a market-house, and a union workhouse. Pop. 3,300.—It has a station on a branch of the London and North-Western Railway.

OURAL, or URAL MOUNTAINS, oo'-ral, a lofty and extensive range, the central ridge of which forms the boundary between Northern Asia and Russia in Europe. They extend from the Arctic Ocean on the N., through Orenburg on the S., which gives a range of 18° of lat. If, however, they are to be considered as traversing the islands of Nova Zembla, and ending in the elevated grounds between the Aral and Caspian seas, they cover an extent of 30° of lat. The Urals are rich in gold and other metals.

OURG, oorg, a city of Mongolia, on the grand route from Kiachta to Peking, 165 miles from Kiachta. It is the seat of the deified lama of the Mongols. Pop. about 6,000.

OURIQUE, oo'-re-kai, a town of Portugal, in Alentejo, 30 miles from Beja. Pop. 2,400.—Here, in 1139, Alphonso I. defeated the Moors.

OURO-PRETO, oo-ro-prat'-to, a city of Brazil, capital of the province of Minas Geraes, 200 miles from Rio de Janeiro. Pop. of district, 9,500.—In its neighbourhood are gold-mines, worked by English companies.

OUSE, ooz, a river of England, which forms the principal branch of the Humber, and the main drain for all the waters in the north-eastern district of Yorkshire. It flows through Yorkshire, and, after a course of 60 miles, unites with the Trent from Lincolnshire, to form the Humber.—2. OUSE, GREAT, a river of Northamptonshire, which, after a course of 160 miles, falls into the sea at Lynn Regis.—3. OUSE, LITTLE, rising in Suffolk, and falling into the Great Ouse.

OUSE, a river of Upper Canada, which, after a course of 130 miles, falls into Lake Erie at Sherbrooke.

OUTRAM, Sir James, oo'-tram, a modern British general, who, after passing through his collegiate career at Aberdeen with considerable distinction, obtained an appointment as military cadet in India, whither he proceeded in 1819. He had not long been there when his abilities and energy attracted the attention of his immediate superiors, and he was appointed lieutenant and adjutant of the Bombay native infantry, which he subsequently quitted, in order to assume the command of the Bheel Corps, for organizing and disciplining which he obtained great commendation. Afterwards, he became political agent in Guzerat, British resident at Hyderabad, Sattara, and Baroda, and, eventually, succeeded the late Sir William Sleeman as commissioner at Lucknow. In 1856 he was sent to Persia, armed with diplomatic powers as commissioner, with the forces sent thither, enjoying, at the same time, the local rank of lieutenant-general. He was present at the capture of Bushire, and gained the victory at Koosahb, in 1857. Returning to India shortly before the outbreak of the mutiny, he was appointed resident at Rajpootana, and a provisional member of the Council of India. The chivalrous part which he played during the outbreak of the mutiny, as the colleague of Havelock, Lawrence, and Lord Clyde, as well as his controversy with the late Sir Charles James Napier, relative to the cause of the ameers of Scinde, need no more than a passing allusion here. In India, long before the mutiny, he was well known to fame as an officer of long experience and high distinction, and had earned for himself the title of the "Bayard of the Indian army, sans peur et sans reproche." In 1836 he was nominated a civil knight commander of the Bath, and in the following year a military grand cross of the same order. His later honours were a baronetcy and the appointment of lieutenant-general of her majesty's Indian forces, and a member of the council of the governor-general of India. B. in Derbyshire, about 1802.

OVENDEN, ov'-en-den, a township of the West Riding of Yorkshire, 2 miles from Halifax. Manf. Chiefly woollens. Pop. 13,000.

OVEN'S RIVER, uv'-ens, a river of S.E. Australia, which unites with the Hume to form the Murray.

OVERBECK, Frederick, o'-ver-bek, an eminent German artist, who, with Cornelius, J. Von Schnorr, and other painters, created as great a revolution in German art as we have seen occur in England at a later period, in consequence of the efforts of Millais and his fellow "Pre-Raphaelite" brethren. At the beginning of the 19th century, the pictorial art of his country was under the domination of French taste, combined with an imitation of the later masters of the Italian schools. With Cornelius, he took up his residence at Rome, in 1811, and devoted himself to Christian art, adopting the principle enunciated by Schlegel, that in all religious themes the treatment should be spiritual and symbolic, rather than human and dramatic. Four years after his journey to Rome, he embraced the doctrines of the Roman Catholic church. His best works are illustrative of scriptural subjects; the most important of them being,—"The Raising of Lazarus," "Moses and the Daughter of Jethro at the Well," "The Ascent of Elijah," "The Child Christ in the Temple," and "St. John Preaching in the Wilderness." As a colorist, he is pale and cold; but his powers of design and of invention are of the highest order. Although he has worked chiefly in fresco, he has produced numerous fine works in oil, and has, likewise, made numerous drawings for engraving. In this latter walk he has given to the world, among fine collections of drawings, the "Passion of Our Lord," published at Paris in 1813, and "Forty Illustrations from the Gospels." B. at Lübeck, 1789.

OVERBURY, Sir Thomas, o'-ver-ber-e, an English writer, who received his education at Queen's College, Oxford; whence he removed to the Temple; but, after a short time, he went abroad, and on his return proceeded to Scotland, where he met with Carr, then a page to the earl of Dunbar. Carr accompanied Overbury to London, and shortly afterwards attracted the favourable notice of King James I., who is said to have made him his favourite, in order to teach him the Latin language. The handsome but uneducated Carr rose rapidly, and became Viscount Rochester. Overbury at first shared in Carr's good fortune, and was in 1608 knighted. He subsequently assisted the unprincipled favourite in his intrigue with the countess of Essex; but, at a later period, he opposed the marriage with such acrimony, that he incurred the hatred of both. On a frivolous charge, he was sent to the Tower, where, by the contrivance of Somerset and his wife, as is almost positively ascertained, he was poisoned. Two years afterwards, the circumstances of Overbury's death were discovered, and Carr, now earl of Somerset, with his wife, the former countess of Essex, were, with the king's consent, arrested. The hypocritical monarch is said to have kissed his favourite affectionately at parting; but when he had left the apartment, exclaimed, "Now the deil go with thee, for I will never see thy face more." Somerset and his wife were found guilty; but, though the minor accomplices were executed, the noble delinquents received the royal pardon. Sir Thomas was the author of several pieces in verse and prose. A most curious and interesting work, containing the whole of this strange story in detail, and entitled "The Great Oyer of Poisoning: the Trial of the Earl of Somerset for the Poisoning of Sir Thomas Overbury," was published by Mr. Amos in 1846. D. in Warwickshire, 1581; poisoned in the Tower, 1613.

OVERFLACQUE, o'-ver-flak, an island of the Netherlands, in the province of South Holland, situate between two arms of the Rhine, at their entrance into the North Sea. Ext. 25 miles long, with a breadth of 7.

OVERSKOU, Thomas, o'-ver-skoo, a modern Danish dramatic writer, who was intended for his father's trade of an upholsterer; but having been overtaken by a severe illness, he occupied his leisure during convalescence, in reading the works of Oehlenschläger and Holberg. Subsequently, under considerable difficulties, he taught himself several languages, and supported himself by playing small parts upon the stage at Copenhagen. In 1826 he produced a drama, which met with great popularity, and gave its author a position in his country. In 1846 he established at Copenhagen a theatre, and was, ten years afterwards, appointed director of the Theatre Royal. He has written, translated, or adapted, more than a hundred dramatic pieces, and in 1856 he produced a "History of the Danish Stage." B. at Copenhagen, 1798.

OVERSTONE, Samuel Jones Loyd, first Lord, o'-ver-stone, a modern political economist, whose father, a Welsh dissenting minister, married the daughter of John Jones, a rich merchant of Manchester, and afterwards established with him the banking firm of Jones, Loyd, and Co., in Lothbury, London. The future Lord Overstone was educated at Eton and Trinity College, Cambridge, and in 1819 became the parliamentary representative of Hythe. In 1826 he left the House of Commons, but was afterwards frequently consulted by the government on fiscal questions. In 1850 he became a peer, with the title of Lord Overstone. He was a member of the commission of inquiry relative to the practicability of a system of decimal coinage; was an opponent of the Limited Liability Act, and was one of the warmest advocates of the principle of the Bank Charter Act, passed in 1844. B. 1796.

OVERTON, o'-ver-ton, several parishes of England, none of them with a population above 1,600.

OVERTON, a county on the N. side of West Tennessee. Area, 525 square miles. Pop. 12,600.

OVERTON, a parish of Flintshire, N. Wales, 15 miles from Chester. Pop. 1,500.

OVERWEG, Dr. Adolf, o'-ver-veg, a modern German traveller, who was in 1849 selected as the naturalist of the expedition sent to Lake Tchad, in Central Africa, by the English and Prussian governments. In company with Mr. Richardson and Dr. Barth, he set out from Tripoli in March, 1850, and after encountering great dangers, reached Lake Tchad in April, 1851. The three travellers carried with them, over the burning sands of Africa, a light boat, which had been built at Malta expressly for the purpose of navigating the great lake. The English geographer had died when the party were within a few miles of Lake Tchad; but Dr. Overweg and his companion were well received by the sultan of Bornou. In June of the same year, the boat was launched, and in it he visited many of the islands upon the lake. The country east of the lake was subsequently explored, as well as the kingdom of Baghirmi, to the south-eastward, and in the direction of the sources of the White Nile. The chief object of the expedition was to traverse in a south-westerly direction the country between Lake Tchad and the shores of the Indian Ocean; but whilst awaiting the arrival of Dr. Vogel, who, with two volunteers from the corps of sappers and miners, was to be sent out to him, he was attacked with fever at Maduari, upon the western shore of Lake Tchad, and died towards the close of the year 1852. D. at Hamburg, 1822. His companion, Dr. Barth, subsequently reached Timbuctoo, in September, 1853, and after being detained there nearly twelve months, set out upon his return to Kouka, meeting Dr. Vogel at Bundi, a small town about 230 miles west of Kouka. (See the articles AFRICA and DR. BARTH.)

OVERYSSEL, o-ver-ys'-sel, a province of the Netherlands, having Guelderland on the S.W., and on the E. a part of Hanover and Westphalia. Area, 1,280 square miles. Desc. Level, low, and containing large tracts of marshy ground. Rivers. The Yssel, the Zwarte Water, the Vechte, the Schiepbel, and the Linde; all slow streams, and more like large canals than rivers. Pro. Rye, buckwheat, hemp, and fruits. Manf. Linen and cotton twist, wicker-wares, mats, and iron goods. Pop. 214,000.

OVID, Publius Ovidius Naso, ov'-id, a celebrated Latin poet. Being intended for the law, he was sent, at an early age, to Rome, to receive his education under the best teachers. He made considerable progress in eloquence; but poetry had more charms for him than the art of pleading. On settling at Rome, his accomplishments procured him many friends, particularly Augustus, who, however, ordered him to be banished to the banks of the Euxine Sea, in the year 8 A.D. The occasion of his disgrace is variously related: some assert that it was for writing his "Art of Love;" others say that it was for an intrigue with Livia, the wife of Augustus; and there are those who maintain that the true cause was Ovid's attachment to the emperor's own daughter Julia. Despite the most earnest entreatics of the poet and his friends, Augustus would never consent to his recall. The works of Ovid extant are his "Metamorphoses," "The Art of Love," Elegics, Epistles, and Fragments. They are characterized by sweetness of style, glowing expression, and elegance of description, mixed, however, with much licentiousness. The best translation of the "Metamorphoses" is that of Dryden, Addison, Congreve, and others, which was published in 1717. Both Dryden and Congreve have translated "The Art of Love," and there are many translations, both in prose and verse, of his other works. B. at Sulmo, 43 B.C.; D. at Tomi, on the Euxine, 18 A.D.

OVIEDO, o-ve-ai'-do, an inland town of Spain, in the Asturias, at the confluence of the Ovia and the Nora, 60 miles from Leon. It is of great antiquity, and has an elegant cathedral, built in the Gothic style, and rich in vases, relics, and other ornaments. The church of St. Salvador is also well built. It has, besides, other churches, a university, an ancient aqueduct, an episcopal palace, a collegiate chapter, monasteries, convents, hospitals, a theatre, and schools. Manf. Leather, hats, and arms. Pop. 11,000.—During the early dominion of the Moors in Spain, this place was the principal refuge of the Christians.

OVIEDO Y VALDEZ, Gonzalo Fernandez de, o-ve-ai'-do e val'-daith, a celebrated Spanish historian, who, in his 12th year, became page to Prince John of Castile, son of Ferdinand, king of Aragon, and Isabella, queen of Castile. He accompanied Columbus on his first voyage to Hispaniola. In the war of Naples he rendered great services to Spain, for which Ferdinand appointed him inspector-general of the commerce of the New World; in which capacity he went to Hispaniola, where he made a vast collection of materials for the work which he subsequently produced, with the title "General History of the Indies." It is a book of immense learning, although it has been denounced by Las Casas "as full of lies, almost, as pages." There is also another important work by him, relating to the genealogy, revenues, &c., of the grandees of Spain; but it remains in MS., and is preserved in the National Library of Madrid. B. 1478; D. about 1558.

OVOCA. (See AVOCA.)

OWAIN, o-wain', son of Cadwygan ab Bleddyn, a prince of Powys. Having carried off Ness, the wife of Gerald, constable of Pembroke, he and his father were obliged to fly to Ireland; but they afterwards returned to their own country. Owain succeeded his father in 1110, and, the year following, was in Normandy with Henry I., who knighted him. He was killed by Gerald, the husband of Ness, in 1114.

OWAIN, the son of Maxen Wledig, an eminent character in the Welsh annals. He broke off the connection between Britain and the Romans, and was, in consequence, chosen sovereign of the country. He was also accounted a saint in the British church.

OWAIN, commonly called Sir OWEN Tudor, lord of Penmynydd, in Mona, or Anglesea, and said to be the descendant of the ancient sovereigns of Wales. He studied the law, which profession he quitted, and went abroad. Catherine, the wife of Henry V., after her husband's death, fell in love with Owain, and privately married him, in 1426. They had three children, one of whom, Edmund, became earl of Richmond in 1452, and was the father of Henry VII. After the death of Catherine, Owain was confined in Newgate; whence he effected his escape, but was retaken: however, he soon obtained his liberty, and died on his estate. B. about 1385.

OWAIN CIVEILOG, kiv'-e-log, a prince, warrior, and poet, who made war against Hywel ab Cadwygan and Rhys ab Grufydd. Some poetical pieces by him are preserved in the Welsh Archæology. D. 1197.

OWEN, John, o'-en, a Latin epigrammatist, who was educated at Oxford; whence he is sometimes styled Oxoniensis; after which he became schoolmaster, first at Trylegh, in Monmouthshire, and next at Warwick. His Latin epigrams possess great point, and are inferior only to those of Martial. B. in Wales, about 1560; D. 1622.

OWEN, George, a physician, was educated at Oxford, and became fellow of Merton College in 1519. Henry VIII., to whom he was physician, left him a legacy of one hundred pounds. He served in the same capacity to Edward VI. and Queen Mary. He was the author of a work entitled "A Meet Diet for the New Ague." D. 1558.

OWEN, John, a learned Independent divine, educated at Queen's College, Oxford. During the civil wars he was a zealous advocate for the parliament against the king. Cromwell made him his chaplain, and took Dr. Owen with him on his expedition to Ireland. He afterwards appointed him to the deanery of Christ Church, Oxford, where he served the office of vice-chancellor in 1652, and the year following took his doctor's degree. He is said to have been of tolerant principles, though a rigid Calvinist. At the restoration he was deprived of his deanery; on which he retired to his estate in Essex. Dr. Owen was a very voluminous writer. His greatest works are, "An Exposition of the Epistle to the Hebrews," "Discourse on the Holy Spirit," and "Treatise on Original Sin." Clarendon, in his "History of the Rebellion," extols Dr. Owen's mild disposition, and declares him to have been one of the most learned and rational men of his time. B. at Stadham, Oxfordshire, 1616; D. at Ealing, Middlesex, 1683.

OWEN, Richard, a celebrated English naturalist, who at first served as midshipman in the royal navy, but quitted it upon the conclusion of the war with America in 1814. After resuming his studies, he was sent to the university of Edinburgh, in order to take a degree in medicine. In 1825 he repaired to London, and became a student of St. Bartholomew's Hospital. In the following year he received his diploma as member of the Royal College of Surgeons; and, resolving to again enter the naval service, he called on his late professor, Dr. Abernethy, to bid him farewell. "What is all this?" said Abernethy.—"Going to sea, sir." "Going to sea?—going to the devil!"—"I hope not, sir." "Go to sea! you had better, I tell you, go the devil at once," reiterated the downright doctor, who insisted upon another interview at the close of a week. Owen revisited his rough but honest friend at the expiration of that time, when Abernethy proposed an appointment at the College of Surgeons. This was accepted; the youthful anatomist found himself happily associated with one congenial mind, and so the navy lost a good officer, and science gained one of her brightest ornaments. His first labours in the Royal College of Surgeons, with which he has ever since been connected, was the preparation of a complete and accurate catalogue of the great museum of John Hunter, which had been obtained by the institution. That work cost Owen thirty years of incessant toil, but it enabled him to become the greatest anatomist of the age. During more than twenty years he held the Hunterian professorship at the College of Surgeons; he received the Royal and Copley medals of the Royal Society, a pension and residence from her majesty, and became a member of almost every learned body in Europe and America. The limits of this notice will not permit of even the bare enumeration of the titles of his many invaluable works. That information may be found in the "Bibliographia Zoologiæ et Geologiæ," published by the Ray Society. These works are the true records of his life,—a life of devotion to science, wherein he has fairly earned the title which has been bestowed upon him; viz., the "Newton of Natural History." B. at Lancaster, 1804.

OWEN, Robert Dale, a modern English philanthropist, and the founder of the political system called "Socialism." He was the son of parents in a humble condition of life, but who, nevertheless, gave him a fair education. After filling the situation of draper's assistant at Newton, Montgomeryshire, and at Stamford, he repaired to the metropolis, and there so distinguished himself by his business talents, that, at 18, he was enabled to become a partner in a small cotton-mill. His success increasing, he removed to the Charlton Mills, near Manchester, which, under his management, became a very prosperous establishment. In 1797 he married Miss Dale, the daughter of David Dale, a wealthy and influential manufacturer of Glasgow. He soon afterwards became part proprietor and sole manager of his father-in-law's works, the "New Lanark Twist Company," the management of whose mills upon his own peculiar principles soon spread his name far and wide. In this factory, where not only cotton-spinning, but other branches of manufacture were carried on, as many as 4,000 persons were at one time employed. Over that large number of individuals he presided with a highly benevolent care; built schools and improved dwellings; taught the children various practical arts; provided both parents and offspring with the means of healthful recreation, and promoted by every possible means the welfare of his great charge. From 1810 to 1815 he published his "New View of Society; or, Essays on the Formation of the Human Character," which, with his practical exemplification of his theories, introduced him to such men as Mr. Wilberforce, Mr. Zachary Macaulay, the first Sir Robert Peel, Mr. James Mill, Sir James Mackintosh, Mr. Malthus, and Lord Brougham. As he said himself, "From these political economists, often in animated discussion, I always differed; but our dissensions were maintained to the last with great goodfeeling, and a cordial friendship. They were liberal men for their time, friends to the national education of the poor." Mr. Owen was now fairly launched before the world as a social reformer. In 1817 he addressed memorials to the sovereigns assembled at the Congress of Aix-la-Chapelle, confiding their presentation to Lord Castlereagh, and became a celebrity. Among other notable persons who visited his infant-school at New Lanark, was the late emperor Nicholas, of Russia, then the grand-duke. At that time there was great commotion about the doctrines of Malthus, and Mr. Owen relates that, "in a two hours' conversation with the grand-duke, before he left me, he said, 'As your country is overpeopled, I will take you and two millions of population with you, all in similar manufacturing communities.'" This was in reference to the establishment at New Lanark, and was certainly a most extraordinary offer on the part of the most arbitrary despotic monarch in the world; for Mr. Owen's community was based upon "liberty, equality, fraternity." Mr. Owen, however, declined, as he thought his hands were full enough at the time. In 1823 he quitted the factory at New Lanark and went to North America, where, in the state of Indiana, he purchased a large tract of land, and founded a community called by him "New Harmony." It proved a failure, however, and in 1827 he returned to his native country. His later experiments at carrying out his new view of society were an establishment at Orbiston, in Lanarkshire; another at Tytherley, in Hampshire; and a labour-exchange in London; but all were complete failures. In his later years, as his mind began to fail, he accepted the doctrine of spirit-rapping, and lectured and published works upon that delusion. The last appearance of the philanthropist was at the Social Science Congress of Liverpool. He was a gentleman of ample means, and disposed of a large fortune in promulgating his principles. Whatever opinion may be held as to his theories, there can be but one, and that the very highest, with respect to his energy, moral integrity, business talents, and disinterested philanthropy. B. at Newton, Montgomeryshire, 1771; D. 1858.

Owen, two counties in the United States.—1. In Kentucky. Area, 289 square miles. Pop. 11,000.—2. In Indiana. Area, 450 square miles. Pop, 13,000.

Owen Glendower. (See Glendower, Owen.)

Owenson, Sidney. (See Morgan, Lady.)

Owram, o'-ram, two contiguous townships of the W. Riding of Yorkshire, 2 miles from Halifax. Pop. united, 24,000.

Owyhee, or Hawaii, o-wi'-he', an island in the N. Pacific Ocean, the most E., and by much the largest of the Sandwich islands. It is of a triangular shape. Area. Estimated at 4,100 square miles. Desc. Mountainous and volcanic. It has several lofty peaks; among which is Mauna Roa, an active volcano, which has an elevation of 13,120 feet above the level of the sea. In some parts there are volcanic appearances, the ground being everywhere covered with cinders and intersected in many places with black streaks, which seem to mark the course of a lava stream that has flowed not many ages back, from the mountains to the shore. Pro. Sugarcane, bread-fruit, sandal-wood, and numerous tropical productions. Pop. Estimated at from 80,000 to 100,000. Lat. of S. point, 19° 32′ N. Lon. 154° 54′ W. It was on this island that the celebrated Captain Cook fell a sacrifice to a misunderstanding, or sudden impulse of revenge in the natives, on Sunday, the 14th of February, 1779. It has since been frequently visited by different navigators.

Oxenford, John, ox'-en-ford, a modern English littérateur, who was at first articled to a solicitor, but quitted law for literature and the drama. He is a member of the Philological Society, the dramatic critic of the Times newspaper, and has written a number of plays, several of them of a superior order. He is an excellent German scholar, and has produced a translation of Göthe's "Conversation with Eckermann," the "Hellas" of Jacob's, and a portion of the Autobiography of Göthe." He is also understood to have been the author of a fine article in the "Westminster Review," entitled "Iconoclasm in German Philosophy." B. at Camberwell, near London, 1812.

Oxenhope, ox'-en-hope, a hamlet of England, in the W. Riding of Yorkshire, 8 miles from Bradford. Manf. Worsted. Pop. 3,000.

Oxenstierna, Axel, Count, ox'-en-sti-ev'-na, a celebrated Swedish minister, who received his education in Germany. On his return to Sweden, he entered upon a career of diplomacy, and was employed by Charles IX. When Gustavus Adolphus ascended the throne, in 1611, he nominated him his chancellor or prime minister; and to that monarch Oxenstierna rendered the greatest services by his statesmanship. When Gustavus was killed at the battle of Lutzen, in 1632, he put himself at the head of the Protestant coalition, and, by his sagacious measures, brought success to the league during two years. After the battle of Nordlingen, in 1634, he went to Paris to hold an interview with Richelieu; and, in 1648, he directed from Stockholm the preliminary negotiations which, by producing the peace of Westphalia, put an end to the Thirty Years' War. His son was one of the envoys who signed that treaty; and it was to him that the count wrote, in answer to a letter wherein the young man betrayed diffidence because of his inexperience in diplomatic affairs, this answer, since become proverbial:—"Nescis, mi fili, quantilla prudentia homines regantur." ("You do not yet know, my son, how little wisdom is exhibited in ruling mankind.") While Queen Christina was in her minority, he was at the head of the council of regency; and, after she assumed the government, he resumed his old office of prime minister; but, not succeeding in dissuading the queen from abdicating her crown, he retired into private life. The second volume of the "Swedo-Germanic War" is attributed to his pen. B. at Fanö, Upland, 1583; D. at Stockholm, 1654.

Oxford, ox'-ford, Earl of. (See Harley.)

Oxford, Bishop of. (See Wilberforce, Samuel.)

Oxford, a city of Oxfordshire, the chief town of the county, and greatly celebrated as a seat of learning, 55 miles from London. It is delightfully situate on a gentle eminence, at the confluence of the rivers Isis and Cherwell, which nearly encompass the city, and which are crossed by numerous bridges. It was formerly surrounded by a wall, very little of which now remains. From Magdalen Bridge, which crosses the Cherwell, the High Street extends W., under different names, through the whole length of the city. At Quatre Vois, or Carfax Church, this is crossed at right angles, by St. Giles's, the other principal street; and from these main branches, most of the other minor streets diverge in different directions. The High Street is elegant and spacious; the minor streets are less spacious, and the houses are extremely crowded. Of the public buildings and institutions, the university claims the first notice. It consists of twenty colleges and four halls, each of which forms an establishment within itself, having its own students and teachers, and its own revenues and regulations; while they are all united under the government of the university, of which they form the members. The university acts as a corporate body, under a charter which received the royal assent in the reign of Charles I. The officers by which the university is immediately governed, are the chancellor, the high steward, the vice-chancellor, and two proctors, each of whom has several duties relative to the interests of the university. The duty of the chancellor is, under the queen, to superintend, in every respect, the interests of the university; for which purpose he is endowed with ample powers. It is the duty of the high steward to assist the chancellor, vice-chancellor, and proctors, and, executively under the chancellor, to defend the privileges and laws of the university. The vice-chancellor's duty is to superintend the due performance of university regulations; to call convocations, congregations, and courts; to license taverns, expel delinquents, &c. He chooses four deputies, termed pro-vicechancellors, one of whom supplies his place in the case of sickness or absence. The two proctors assist the vice-chancellor in convocations and congregations. There are various other officers to see that due order and discipline are preserved. There are, besides, public lecturers and professors of divinity, Hebrew, Greek, civil law, medicine, modern history, botany, natural philosophy, astronomy, geometry, ancient history, anatomy, music, Arabic, poetry, Anglo-Saxon, common law, and chemistry. There are, in all, 23 professors and readers, some of whom lecture in the "schools," for which new buildings have been recently constructed. There are four terms kept in the year at the university; and degrees are taken in divinity, law, physic, music, and the arts. The names of the colleges are All Souls, which was founded in the year 1437, by Henry Chichele, archbishop of Canterbury, for a warden, 40 fellows, two chaplains, and six clerks and choristers. It consists chiefly of two spacious courts: one of these contains the chapel and hall on the southern side, and the splendid library of 40,000 volumes on the north. Balliol College, of which Wickliffe was once master, was begun about the year 1263. Brazenose College was founded in 1509. It derives its name from a large brazen face, which was fixed on the door of an ancient hall in the college, to serve as a knocker. Christchurch College was founded by Cardinal Wolsey, in 1525. The buildings consist chiefly of the cathedral, two spacious quadrangles, and two smaller courts: the architecture of the two quadrangles is classical and august. Christchurch Cathedral is one of the most interesting objects in the college. The chief parts of the building can be traced to the reign of Henry I., and the style of architecture is that of a much earlier period. It has a tower, containing the "Great Tom," a bell weighing 17,000 lbs.; a magnificent hall, and picture-gallery. Corpus Christi, founded in 1516, by Bishop Fox, consisted at first of one spacious quadrangle, with its chapel, hall, and library; but various additions have since been made. Exeter

College was founded in 1314; Hertford College in 1312; Jesus College in 1571, by Queen Elizabeth; Lincoln College in 1427. Magdalen College is one of the noblest institutions and most interesting buildings in the university: it was founded in 1458, by William Waynflete, bishop of Winchester. The whole has an air of venerable grandeur. The chapel is a beautiful Gothic structure, and its hall has been the banqueting-room of many English sovereigns. Merton College is the most ancient incorporated establishment in the university. It was founded in 1264, by Walter de Merton, bishop of Rochester and chancellor of England in the reign of Henry III. The chapel is one of the finest Gothic specimens of which the university can boast. New College was founded in 1379, by William of Wykeham, bishop of Winchester. It consists of a spacious quadrangle, with attached chapel, hall, and library, a fine range of consecrated cloisters, and a series of buildings for the use of students. Oriel College was founded in 1324, by Adam de Brom, archdeacon of Stow; Pembroke College in 1620; Queen's College in 1340, by Robert Eglesfeld, confessor of Queen Philippa, consort of Edward III. St. John's College in 1555, by Sir Thomas White: it is formed of two quadrangles, mostly in the Gothic style. Trinity College, by Sir Thomas Pope. University College has been ascribed to King Alfred as its founder, in 872: it was revived in 1249. Wadham College was founded in 1611: it consists of a single quadrangle, 130 feet square. Worcester College in 1714, by Sir Thomas Coke, of Bentley, in Worcestershire. The architecture of the whole buildings is of a noble and chaste character. The halls of the university were originally private houses, erected by citizens of Oxford, and rented by the students for their accommodation. After the foundation of colleges, they diminished in number, and sunk into neglect: four, however, still remain, and have been improved by benefactions; viz., St. Alban's, St. Edmund, St. Mary Magdalen, and New Inn. Of the other buildings connected with the university, the public schools form, together with the Bodleian Library and the picture-gallery, a splendid quadrangle. In these schools, which were erected in the 15th century, the professors read lectures in the several sciences. The Bodleian, or public library, founded by Humphrey, duke of Gloucester, and restored and greatly augmented by Sir Thomas Bodley, now contains, probably, one of the most valuable collections in Europe: it consists of upwards of 220,000 volumes and 20,000 MSS. The theatre is a magnificent building, on the plan of the theatre of Marcellus, at Rome. The Clarendon printing-house is a large and massy edifice, built in 1711: here is the Clarendon or University press. The Radcliffe Library is one of the most splendid ornaments of the university, founded by Dr. Radcliffe, and completed in 1749. The Ashmolean Museum was founded in 1682, by Elias Ashmole, for the reception of rare productions, both natural and artificial. The astronomical observatory is an elegant structure. Besides St. Mary's Church, in which the chief members of the university attend divine service, Oxford contains many other churches, and places of worship for Roman Catholics, Quakers, Methodists, and Baptists. The other principal public buildings are the town and county hall and gaol, the city bridewell, the Radcliffe Infirmary, the music-room, and the general market. There are also several charity schools, in which large numbers of children are clothed and taught. Pop. 28,000. Lat. 51° 45′ 52″ N. Lon. 1° 15′ 29″ W.—The early history of Oxford is involved in obscurity; and no credit can be given to any accounts of it before the reign of Alfred.—It has a station on the Great Western Railway and branch.

OXFORD, a county in the W. of Maine, U.S. Area, 1,870 square miles. Pop. 40,000.—The name also of various townships, none of them with a population above 4,000.

OXFORDSHIRE, one of the central counties of England, bounded on the E. by Buckinghamshire, W. by the county of Gloucester, S., S.W., and S.E. by Berkshire, N. by Northamptonshire, from which it is separated by the river Cherwell, and N.W. by Warwickshire. Area, 756 square miles. Desc. Considerably diversified. In its S. districts it possesses a pleasing alternation of hill and valley; but in its central division it loses, in a great measure, that inequality of surface. On the N. (and particularly on the W. part), stone fences supply the places of thick-set hedges, and the eye is often fatigued by a rude and frigid monotony of scene. Rivers. The Thames, the Isis, the Cherwell, the Evenlode, the Glym, the Ray, and the Windrush. All these unite at different points, and eventually constitute the Thames. Pro. Grain of all sorts, with turnips and grass. Among the crops only partially cultivated are lentils, rape, cabbages, carrots, potatoes, and chicory. Rhubarb is grown near Drayton. The meadow lands, for the richness of which this county was wont to be famed, have been greatly circumscribed by the progress of cultivation. Oxfordshire is said by Camden to have been anciently famous for its woods; and even at present it is better supplied with trees than most other counties of England. Large numbers of sheep are raised. Minerals. Unimportant. Medicinal springs are frequent; among which the various orders of the chalybeate chiefly prevail. Manf. Lace, gloves, and blankets. Its trade is facilitated by the Oxford Canal, which traverses the county from N. to S., and connects the Thames with the Coventry Canal, which again is connected with the Mersey, Severn, and Trent. The Great Western Railway also traverses a portion of this county. Pop. 175,000.—Oxfordshire does not offer such a field for antiquarian research as several other counties. Some curious British coins have, however, been found within its limits. Its original inhabitants were the Dubuni, who are said to have given a welcome to their Roman conquerors, and who had the happiness of always living contentedly under them.

OXIA, ox-i'-a, one of the smaller Ionian islands, off Cape Skropha, Acarnania. Ext. 4 miles long, with a breadth of 2.

OXUS, or AMOO, ox'-us, a-moo', a river of Central Asia, running principally through independent Tartary. It rises in the high ridge and table-land of Pamer, which forms the boundary between Tibet and Great Bukharia. Flowing through the vast plain of Bukharia and an extensive desert of Tartary, it falls, after a course of more than 1,200 miles, into the Aral Sea. It formed the N. limit of the dominions of Cyrus and Alexander the Great.

OYSTER BAY, ois'-ter, a township of Long Island Sound, Long Island, U.S. It has constant steam communication with New York, for the citizens of which it forms a pleasant summer resort. Pop. 7,000.

OYSTER CREEK, two rivers in N. Carolina and New Jersey, both of which run into the Atlantic.

OZARK, o-zark', a mountain-chain of N. America, running parallel with the Apalachians from the Missouri, near the Osage, to the Red River.

OZIERI, ods-zi-air'-e, a town of the island of Sardinia, 29 miles from Sassari. It has a college, an hospital, and several convents. Pop. 8,000.

OZORKOV, o-zor-kof', a town of Poland, on the Burza, 76 miles from Warsaw. Pop. 5,200.

P.

PABBA, păb'-ba, the name of three small islands of the Hebrides, Scotland, none of them with a population above 30.

PABO, pā-bo', a British prince and warrior, who was defeated, and sought refuge in Wales, where he was hospitably entertained by the king of Powys, who gave him a small territory. He afterwards led a religious life, and was accounted a saint. He founded a church in Mona, where his monument, with an inscription, yet remains. Lived in the 5th century.

PACCA, Cardinal, pak'-ka, minister of Pius VII., who drew up the bull of excommunication promulgated against Napoleon in 1809. He retired from Rome shortly afterwards, and remained at Fenestrella until 1813, when he rejoined Pius VII. at Fontainebleau. He returned to Rome in 1813, and in 1816 re-established there the order of the Jesuits. He left behind some interesting "Memoirs of his Life and Times." B. at Benevento, 1756; D. 1854.

PACE, Richard, paice, a learned English divine, and dean of St. Paul's, London, was employed by Henry VIII. in several embassies; but Wolsey, being jealous of his rising merit, procured his disgrace. He was held in great esteem by the most learned men of his time, particularly Erasmus, Sir Thomas More, and Cardinal Pole. Some Commentaries upon the Scriptures were written by him. D. 1532.

PACHECO, John de, pa-chai'-ko, marquis de Villena, the favourite and prime minister of Henry IV., king of Castile. His authority was so great, that he disposed at pleasure of all places in the kingdom. Louis XI. of France corrupted him by a pension, and this perfidious minister betrayed his master's interests in the peace of 1443, by many articles prejudicial to the kingdom of Castile. Henry, having discovered his treachery, reproached him with it, which so provoked Pacheco that he conspired against him, and proclaimed Prince Alphonso king of Castile, in 1465. But this unscrupulous minister caused the young king to be poisoned soon afterwards, and was reconciled to Henry, whose favour he retained till his death, in 1473.

PACHECO, Francis, a celebrated Spanish painter and censor of pictures. In 1594 he painted two flags for the Spanish fleets of New Spain. They consisted of crimson damask, and were each 30 yards by 50, bearing, besides rich borders and other decorations, St. Iago and the royal arms of Spain. The decorations of the cathedal of Seville at the funeral of Philip II. were also from his brush. In 1618 he received the appointment of censor of pictures by the Inquisition, it being one of his duties to prohibit the sale of pictures containing any nude figures. Says Mr. Ford, "Nothing gave the holy tribunal greater uneasiness than how Adam and Eve in Paradise, the blessed souls burning in purgatory, the lady who tempted St. Anthony, or the last day of judgment, were to be painted; circumstances in which small clothes or long clothes would be highly misplaced." Pacheco was nevertheless an accomplished personage; and it is to his lessons that the great Velasquez owed much of his great skill as a painter. A portrait of Cervantes was one of his best works. B. at Seville, 1571; D. at the same city, 1654.

PACHETE, pa-chet'-te, a district of British India, in the presidency of Bengal. Area, 4,792 square miles. Desc. Diversified with hill and dale, and covered with forest and jungle. Pro. Rice, and other crops. Pop. Unascertained. Lat. between 22° 56′ and 23° 54′ N. Lon. between 85° 46′ and 87° 10′ E.

PACHYMERUS, George, păk'-i-meer'-us, a Greek writer, whose talents procured him the favour of Michael Palæologus, who conferred on him several offices in church and state. He wrote a valuable History of the East, which is inserted in the collection of Byzantine historians, and was published at Rome in 1669, with a Latin translation. B. at Nicæa, about 1250; D. 1310.

PACIFIC, pā-sif'-ik, a name given by the Spaniards to the sea which lies between Asia and America. At the equator, which is its widest part, it is 10,000 miles across. Its area is computed at upwards of 70,000,000 square miles, which is more than all the dry land on the globe.

PACORUS, păk'-o-rus, son of Orodes, king of Parthia, signalized himself by the defeat of Crassus, whose army he nearly cut to pieces, B.C. 53. He embraced the cause of Pompey, and declared himself for the assassins of Cæsar. After ravaging Syria and Judæa, Ventidius defeated Pacorus, who was slain in the battle, B.C. 39.

PADDINGTON, păd'-ding-ton, a parish of Middlesex, forming a N.W. suburb of London, 3¼ miles from St. Paul's. It contains the terminus of the Great Western Railway. Pop. 47,000.

PADERBORN, pa'-der-born, a town of Prussian Westphalia, 40 miles from Minden. It is the seat of a bishopric, and has an ecclesiastical seminary and a gymnasium. Pop. 11,000.—Charlemagne some time resided here.

PADSTOW, pad'-sto, a market-town of Cornwall, with a harbour considered the best on the northern Cornish coast. It is 30 miles from Falmouth, and imports iron and coal, and exports slate, tin, and sand. Pop. 2,300.

PADUA, pad'-u-a (Ital. PADOVA, pa'-do-va), a delegation or province of Italy, in the government of Venice, surrounded by the delegations of Vicenza, Treviso, Venice, Rovigo, and Verona. Area, 860 square miles. Pop. 270,000.—It is watered by the Brenta, the Bacchiglione, and several smaller streams.

PADUA, a city of Austrian Italy, the capital of the delegation of the same name, in the government of Venice, situate near the junction of the Brenta and the Bacchiglione, 22 miles from Venice. It is surrounded by a mound and broad ditch, and is traversed by several canals; but the streets are narrow, dark, dirty, and ill-paved. The houses are, however, in general lofty and well-built, and several of the public edifices are of magnificent architecture. The town-house is in the form of an oblong quadrangle, and is supported by galleries resting on marble pillars. The interior contains some fresco paintings and a bust of Livy. Near the town-house is the palace of the Podesta, remarkable for its saloon of the Doric order, and for its valuable paintings. The palace of the commandant is a model of architecture. The churches, monasteries, and convents are numerous, whilst the cathedral is less remarkable for its architecture than for its paintings and interior decorations. The university, founded in the 13th century, was, at one time, celebrated throughout Europe. Its buildings may be classed among the finest of the kind in Europe. There are here, also, other literary and scientific institutions, in particular the Academy of Sciences, founded by the senate of Venice. Manf. Woollens, silk, ribbons, and leather. Pop. 53,000.—At the university here, Tasso and Columbus were educated. It is the birthplace of Livy and Belzoni, the traveller. In 1857 an earthquake overthrew a large part of the town and destroyed many of the inhabitants. It has a station on the railway between Vicenza and Venice.

PAER, Ferdinand, pa'-air, a celebrated Italian composer, who produced an opera, entitled "Circe," at Venice, when only in his 10th year. After visiting Padua, Naples, and Rome, in each of which cities he composed musical works, he returned to Parma, where the grand-duke bestowed a pension upon him. In 1795 he repaired to Vienna, and afterwards to Dresden, where he was appointed chapel-master. Having been introduced to Napoleon, after the battle of Jena, the emperor took him into his service, and, at a subsequent date, nominated him imperial composer and conductor of chamber music to the empress Maria Theresa. At the restoration of the Bourbons he became director of the Italian Opera of Paris; but lost the post in 1818, through professional intrigue. Paer was a voluminous composer; some of his works, such as "Griselda" and "Agnesi," ranking very high. He was a member of the French Institute. B. at Parma, 1774; D. at Paris, 1839.

PAGAN, Blaise Francis, Count of, pa'-ga, a celebrated French mathematician and military engineer. He bore arms in his youth, and demonstrated great valour during the campaigns in Italy and Flanders. Louis XIII. made him a general, and sent him as envoy to Portugal in 1642. The same year he became entirely blind, by the loss of his eye at the siege of Montauban, having before been deprived of the sight of the other by illness. He then turned his attention to mathematical studies, and wrote a treatise on Fortifications, "Geometrical Theorems," "Theory of the Planets," "Astronomical Tables," "An Historical Relation of the River of the Amazons." His treatise on Fortification is, even at the present day, the best work upon the subject of which it treats; but his mathematical works have lost their value. B. at Avignon, 1604; D. at Paris, 1665.

PAGANCIO, pa-gan'-cho, the name of several towns in Italy, none of them with a population above 2,200.

PAGANI, Gregorio, pa-ga'-ne, an eminent Italian painter, of Florence, whose pictures have been sometimes taken for those of Michael-Angelo Buonarotti. B. at Florence, 1558; D. at the same city, 1605.

PAGANINI, Nicholas, pa-ga-ne'-ne, a celebrated Italian violinist, whose talents were so precocious, that, at the age of 8 years, he played in a church at Genoa, and at the public concerts. He was subsequently placed under Costa, an eminent violoncellist, and received lessons in harmony from the composer Paer. He was next invited to Lucca by Eliza Bacciochi, sister of Napoleon I., to assume the direction of the court concerts. Subsequently he made a tour over Europe, exciting everywhere the greatest enthusiasm. After producing an enormous sensation at Paris, in 1831, he went to London, where he demanded, and occasionally received, enormous sums for his services. His great power over the violin was only excelled by his thirst for gold: in one instance, his avarice led him to demand £1,000 for three performances, which terms were rejected. Paganini was a marvellous performer: the purity of his tone, his feeling, harmony, and expression, were perfection; but his habit of playing upon one string, although an extraordinary feat, savoured too much of sleight-of-hand to be creditable to so great an artist, who could have done much better with the four which naturally belong to the instrument. His harsh and eccentric character would seem to have made him many enemies. At Vienna he was charged with having murdered his wife; but he demanded proofs of his ever having had one; then he was accused of having stabbed his mistress, which charge he also refuted. At his death he left a fortune of upwards of £200,000, which devolved upon his son, sisters, and mother. B. at Genoa, 1784; D. at Nice, 1840.

PAGET, William, first Lord, pa'-jet, was the son of a serjeant-at-mace in the reign of Henry VIII., who, taking favourable notice of the son, made him clerk of the signet, afterwards of the council, and of the privy seal. In these employments he conducted himself with so much discretion and skill, that Henry sent him as ambassador to the French court, and on his return conferred upon him the honour of knighthood. He also made him secretary of state, and appointed him one of the executors of his will. At the beginning of the reign of Edward VI., he was sent on an embassy to the emperor Charles V.; and on his return received fresh dignities, of which he was deprived and sent to the Tower, in consequence of his connection with the duke of Somerset. Paget was reinstalled in his employments by Queen Mary, and continued in favour during the reign of Elizabeth. D. 1564.

PAGI, Anthony, pa'-zhe, a French monk, who undertook the laborious work of examining and correcting the "Ecclesiastical Annals" of Cardinal Baronius. The first volume of his work appeared at Paris in 1689; the three remaining volumes were printed after his death, at Geneva. B. at Rogues, Provence, 1624; D. at Aix, 1690.

PAGI, Francis, nephew of the preceding, whom he assisted in his editing Baronius, and published the three posthumous volumes. He was also the author of a History of the Popes.—There was a Jesuit of this name, who was a nephew of the last-mentioned, and wrote a "History of Cyrus the Younger," and the "Retreat of the Ten Thousand Greeks," 1736; and a "History of the Revolutions in the Low Countries."

PAGO, pa'-go, an island in the Adriatic, in the Gulf of Quarnero, opposite to the coast of Croatia. Area, 106 square miles. It exports wine and salt. Pop. 4,700.—Also the name of the principal town, with a population of 2,000.

PAGO, a town of Naples, 12 miles from Ariano. Pop. 2,400.

PAHANG, pa-hang', a town and state of Malacca, on the E. coast, 12 miles from the sea, on a river, the mouth of which is in lat. 3° 45′ N. Pop. Unascertained.—The state has a population estimated at about 50,000, and exports the precious metals. Lat. between 2° and 4° N. Lon. between 103° and 104° E.

PAHLIMPORE, pa-lim-por', a small state of India, in the presidency of Bombay, producing wheat, rice, and sugar. Lat. between 23° 57′ and 24° 41′ N. Lon. between 71° 51′ and 72° 45′ E.—Also a town of India, in Guzerat. Pop. 30,000.

PAINE, Thomas, pain, an English writer, who was the son of a Quaker, and was brought up to the trade of a staymaker. After working for some time at this occupation in London, he obtained a place in the excise, at Sandwich, in Kent. About the year 1761 he found employment as teacher in a school in the suburbs of London, but quitted that post to again enter the excise. Having drawn up a statement of grievances under which his fellow excisemen laboured, it was submitted to one of the commissioners, who was so struck by the excellence of the style in which the paper was written, that he gave Paine a letter of introduction to Benjamin Franklin. The latter recommended him to emigrate to America. Thither he accordingly went; and, after contributing articles to the periodicals for a short time, became editor of the "Philadelphia Magazine" in 1775. In the following year he produced a work entitled "Common Sense," of which Burke afterwards spoke as "that celebrated pamphlet which prepared the minds of the people for independence." This small work was the means of obtaining for its author the sum of £500 from the legislature of Pennsylvania, the M.A. degree from the university of that province, and the membership of the American Philosophical Society. Whilst the American war was in progress, he produced a series of patriotic appeals to the people; and in 1781 he was chosen to accompany Colonel Lawrence to France, in order to negotiate a loan. In this affair he was perfectly successful, and, upon his return to America in 1785, he obtained the appointment of clerk to the Assembly of Philadelphia, a gift of 3,000 dollars, and a small estate near New Rochelle. Upon the conclusion of the war, he engaged in some mechanical speculations, the prosecution of which led him first to Paris and afterwards to London. There he remained during several years, and in 1791-2 published his "Rights of Man," in answer to Burke's "Reflections on the French Revolution." This work was proclaimed as a "false, scandalous, malicious, and seditious libel," and Paine, as its author, was brought to trial in the court of King's Bench. Notwithstanding an eloquent defence made for him by the Hon. Thomas Erskine, he was found guilty. (See ERSKINE.) Paine, however, contrived to effect his escape to France, where he became a member of the National Convention; but, having written a pamphlet in favour of preserving the life of Louis XVI., he was thrown into prison by Robespierre; upon whose fall he was restored to liberty. He remained in France until the year 1802, his pen constantly engaged in producing social, political, and theological works, the title of one of which may be given, as affording a notion of the Utopian character of at least a portion of Paine's efforts. It was called, "Agrarian Justice opposed to Agrarian Law and to Agrarian Monopoly; being a plan for meliorating the condition of man, by creating in every nation a national fund, to pay to every person, when arrived at the age of twenty-one years, the sum of fifteen pounds sterling, to enable him or her to begin the world; and also ten pounds sterling during life to every person now living of the age of fifty years, and to all others when they arrive at that age, to enable them to live an old age without wretchedness, and go decently out of the world." In 1802 his friend Mr. Jefferson, who had been elected president of the United States, offered Paine a passage to America in a sloop of war, which Paine accepted. The latter years of his life were spent in producing works upon the building of ships of war, iron bridges, &c. Several years after his death, Cobbett caused his remains to be brought to England, where he expected to find them greeted with enthusiasm; but the undertaking brought only ridicule upon himself. In his political writings, Paine displayed a clear and vigorous style; but his religious treatises are defaced by scurrility of language, and betray great ignorance. B. at Thetford, Norfolk, 1737; D. in America, 1809.

PAINSWICK, pains'-wik, an irregularly-built market-town of Gloucestershire, on a brook which runs into the Stroud, 7 miles from Gloucester. The church has a tower and spire 174 feet high. Manf. Woollen cloth. Pop. 3,500.

PAINT, paint, the name of numerous townships in the United States, none of them with a population above 3,000.

PAISIELLO, Giovanni, pai'-se-ail'-lo, a celebrated Italian composer. He was sent, at an early age, to the Jesuits' College of Tarento, to receive his education, and manifested such a decided taste for the musical art, that his father was prevailed upon to place him at the Conservatory at Naples, where the future composer made great progress under the tuition of the eminent musician Durante. Having composed a comic interlude, while a student of the above-named institution, he was employed to compose an opera for the Marsigli theatre at Bologna. This was the commencement of his professional career, and his reputation grew so high, that he was in a few years commissioned to write operas for nearly every great city in Italy. In 1776 he accepted an invitation from Catherine II. to go to Russia, where he resided during nine years. In 1785 he returned to Naples, where he remained, although he received flattering invitations from Russia, France, and England. Upon the decease of Hoche, the celebrated French general, he wrote a funeral symphony, for which Napoleon made him a rich present. In 1799 a revolution burst forth at Naples, which resulted in the establishment of a republican form of government, under which Paisiello became national director of music. At the restoration of the royal family, he lost all his former public employments, in consequence of that step, but was, however, reinstated in them after a short time. He subsequently became chapel-master to Napoleon when first consul; for whom, also, when he constituted himself emperor, Paisiello produced a coronation "Te Deum." After spending nearly three years in Paris, he returned to Naples, and when Joseph Bonaparte became king, he nominated the composer to several high appointments, affixing to them a high salary. Napoleon I. created him chevalier of the Legion of Honour, and the French Institute elected him an associate. Of this great composer, the Chevalier Le Sueur writes, "Paisiello was not only a great musician: he possessed a large fund of information, was well versed in the dead languages, and conversant in all the branches of literature. Endowed with a noble mind, he was above all mean passions; he knew neither envy, nor the feeling of rivalry." Two of his melodies, "Hope told a flattering tale," and "For tenderness formed," have attained to a world-wide popularity. Although his operas are now never heard upon the Italian stage in England, it is more than probable that, were they produced, they would be found to have lost nothing of that pathetic melody which captivated the last century. B. at Tarento, 1741; D. at Naples, 1816.

PAISLEY, paiz'-le, a manufacturing town of Scotland, on the White Cart, here crossed by three bridges, 7 miles from Glasgow. It stretches out on both sides of the river, which divides it into the Old and New towns. The Old town consists of a number of large and small streets; and the principal street of the New town is composed of elegant modern houses. From both sides several others strike off at different angles, and are again crossed at some distance by others; all the streets in this part being compactly built and fully inhabited. There are numerous churches, and places of public worship belonging to different denominations. The most ancient ecclesiastical structure, and the chief architectural ornament of the town, is the Abbey church, which has survived, although not without great injury, the revolutions of many centuries. The nave, with its aisles, is in good repair, and constitutes the church of the Abbey parish of Paisley a collegiate charge. The whole interior was, in 1789, fitted up in a style according with that of the building itself. The chapel is a great curiosity, and is remarkable for a sounding aisle, as it is called, for which it is much visited. It contains the ancient monuments of Marjory Bruce, daughter of King Robert II., and various other royal remains. The abbey was founded in 1160, by Walter, great steward of Scotland, as a priory for the monks of the order of Cluny. The other public buildings are the town-house, containing the prison; a county gaol, which includes within it a bridewell; the Coffee-room Buildings, ornamented with pilasters of the Ionic order; the markets, infirmary, a town hospital, and an almshouse. There are, besides, numerous charitable associations and institutions, a public grammar-school, founded by King James VI. in 1576, and numerous other schools, public libraries, and a barracks. Manf. Paisley has been long celebrated for all kinds of fancy goods in silk and cotton; its shawls and muslins have long been famous; and it is also celebrated for its threads, tapes, scarfs, and gauzes. It has, besides, iron and brass foundries, tanneries, distilleries, soap-works, and extensive bleach-fields. For its trade, considerable facilities are afforded by the river navigation and by the Ardrossan Canal. In the neighbourhood, coal, ironstone, and fine potter's clay are worked. Pop. about 70,000.—It is the birthplace of Wilson, the ornithologist, Professor Wilson, and Tannahill and Motherwell, the poets. A station on the Glasgow and Ayr Railway.

PAIXHANS, Henry Joseph, paix'-han, a celebrated French general of artillery, and the inventor of the guns and projectiles which bear his name. He was educated at the Polytechnic School, and selected the artillery, in which service he rose to the rank of general. The Paixhans guns are adapted to throw shells and hollow shot. These guns and projectiles were used on board the Russian fleet at the battle of Sinope, where the Turkish ships were annihilated by their deadly effects. General Paixhans wrote several works, chiefly upon the subject of his inventions. B. at Metz, 1783; D. near Metz, 1854.

PAKINGTON, Sir John Somerset, pāk'-ing-ton, a modern English politician, who, after completing his education at Oxford, was chosen as the representative of the borough of Droitwich in parliament, in 1837. From the outset of his political career he displayed strong Conservative views, and when Lord Derby formed a ministry upon those principles, in 1852, he was nominated colonial secretary. In 1858, upon the re-accession of the Conservatives to power, Sir John Pakington became first lord of the Admiralty; but retired with his party in the following year. His administration of the duties of the latter office was so good, however, that his successor declared that, for the purpose of improving, strengthening, and extending the British navy, he could do no better than follow in the path pointed out by the Conservative statesman. In 1869 he was appointed grand cross of the Bath. B. 1799.

PAKS, paks, a market-town of Hungary, on the Danube, 60 miles from Buda. Pop. 9,000.

PALÆMON, Rhemmius, pa-le'-mon, a celebrated Roman grammarian, was originally a slave in the reign of Tiberius; but, by attending his master's son to the academy, he acquired so much knowledge that his master gave him his freedom. He then became a preceptor, and gained great reputation as a rhetorician and poet. Flourished in the 1st century A.D.

PALÆPHATUS, pa-le'-fa-tus, a Greek philosopher, of whom remains a treatise "On Incredible Things," in which he endeavoured to explain the mythical fables. He lived before the Christian era, and after Aristotle.

PALAFOX, John de, pal'-a-fox, a Spanish prelate and historian, who studied at Salamanca, after which he was appointed a member of the council of war, and next of that of the Indies; but renouncing civil distinctions for the ecclesiastical state, he was made a bishop in Spanish America, with the title of judge of the administration of the three viceroys of the Indies. While there he administered justice with strict impartiality; but, through the intrigues of the Jesuits, he was compelled to return to Spain. He wrote the "History of the Siege of Fontarabia," "History of the Conquest of China by the Tartars," and some religious works. B. in Aragon, 1600; D. 1659.

PALAIS, St., pal'-ai, a town of France, in the island of Belleisle. It has a small port, defended by a citadel. Pop. 5,000.

PALAMEDES, pāl'-a-me'-dees, a Grecian chief, son of Nauplius, king of Eubœa. He was sent by the Greek princes going to the Trojan war, to bring Ulysses to the camp, who, to avoid the expedition, pretended insanity, and used to sow salt, instead of barley, in the furrows. The deceit was soon perceived by Palamedes, and, to demonstrate it, he took Telemachus, his son, and put him before the plough of his father. Ulysses showed that he was not insane, by turning the plough a different way, not to hurt his child. This having been discovered, Ulysses was obliged to attend the Greek princes to the war; but a mortal enmity arose between Ulysses and Palamedes. The king of Ithaca bribed one of his servants, and made him dig a hole in his master's tent, and there conceal a large sum of money. After this, Ulysses forged a letter, which King Priam was supposed to have sent to Palamedes, desiring that, according to the conditions which were previously agreed upon when he received the money, he should betray the Grecian army. This letter was carried before the Grecian princes. Palamedes was summoned, and protested his innocence, but vainly, as the money was discovered in his tent. He was found guilty by all the army, and stoned to death. Homer is silent as to the miserable fate of Palamedes. Palamedes was a learned man, as well as a soldier, and, according to some, he completed the alphabet of Cadmus by the addition of some letters. To him, also, is attributed the invention of chess and backgammon; and it is said that he was the first who ranged an army in regular line of battle, placed sentinels round the camp, and excited their vigilance and attention by giving them a watchword.

PALAMOW, pal'-a-mo, the capital of a district of the same name in Bengal, on the Coyle or Koel river. Lat. 23° 52′ N. Lon. 78° 10′ E. Pop. Unascertained. The DISTRICT has an area of 3,468 square miles, with extensive coal-fields and other mineral riches. It has, however, been little explored. Pop. Unascertained. Lat. between 23° 12′ and 24° 22′ N. Lon. between 83° 18′ and 84° 31′ E.

PALAPRAT, John de Bigot, pal'-a-pra, a French comic poet and lawyer. He distinguished himself at the bar, was made chief of the consistory in 1684, and was also employed in state affairs, which he discharged with reputation. B. at Toulouse, 1650; D. at Paris, 1721.

PALATINATE, LOWER, or PALATINATE OF THE RHINE, pā-lāt'-i-nat, an old division in the W. of Germany, situate chiefly on the W. side of the Rhine, having Mentz N., Alsace S., and Lorraine S.W.

PALATINATE, UPPER, the former name of a province of Germany, bordering on Bohemia, and now forming part of the circles of the Regen and the Upper Maine, in the kingdom of Bavaria.

PALAWAN ISLE, pal-a-wan', an island of the Asiatic archipelago, between the N. extremity of Borneo and the Philippines. Ext. 275 miles long, with a breadth of 30. Desc. Mountainous, with the coast flat. It produces gold and various kinds of fine wood. Pop. Unascertained. Lat. between 8° 37′ and 11° 30′ N. Lon. between 117° and 120° E.

PALAYE, N. de la Curne, pale', a French historical writer, who became a member of the French Academy, and that of Inscriptions and Belles-Lettres. He wrote "Memoirs of Ancient Chivalry," a work of curious research, and was also the author of a "Memoir upon the Chronicle of Glaber," in the Memoirs of the Academy of Inscriptions. B. at Auxerre, 1697; D. at Paris, 1781.

PALAZZUOLO, pa-lats'-oo-o'-lo, a town of Italy, on the Oglio, 14 miles from Bergamo. Pop. 8,400.—Near it are the remains of the ancient Acrue.

PALEARIUS, Aonius, pāl'-e-air'-i-us, a learned Italian writer, who, after studying at different places, became professor of Greek and Latin at Sienna; but being suspected of Lutheranism, he found it necessary to withdraw to Lucca, and thence to Milan, where he was arrested and sent to Rome. The Inquisition caused him to be burnt for heresy in 1570. He wrote a Latin poem on the "Immortality of the Soul," and some theological works, which were condemned by the council of Trent. B. at Veroli, near Rome.

PALEMBANG, pal-em-bang', a town in the island of Sumatra, extending 3 miles along the river Moosee, 50 miles from its mouth in Banca Strait. The city is intersected by several little branches of the river, which form a number of islands, said to be about twenty or thirty; whence it has also received the appellation of the "City of Twenty Islands." One of these contains the palaces of the former sultan and his son. The principal mosque is a pretty large building, nearly square, and covered with a pavilion roof of tiles. Adjoining is a high octagonal tower, from which the muezzin calls the people to prayers. The houses of the common people are made of bamboos, with mats, and thatched. The Dutch had a factory here, which was demolished. Pop. about 25,000. Lat. 2° 58′ 51″ S. Lon. 104° 54′ E.

PALENCIA, pa-len'-she-a (Sp. pa-len'-the-a), the chief town of a province in Spain, 115 miles from Madrid.

The only remarkable edifices are the cathedral and the church of St. Antolin. Manf. Leather and woollens. Pop. 1,000.

PALEOLOGUS, pai'-le-ol'-o-gus, the name of a celebrated royal house, which gave a monarch to Constantinople, in the person of Michael VIII., in 1260. Between this year and 1453, when the Greek empire fell, there reigned eight princes of this house; viz., Michael VIII., Andronicus III. and IV., John V., Manuel II., John VII., John VIII., and Constantine XII. Two members of the same family afterwards reigned at Patras and Argos, but were dethroned by Mahomet II. in 1458 and 1461.

PALERMO, pa-lair'-mo, a fortified city of Sicily, the capital of the island, situate on the N. coast, in a rich valley, presenting the appearance of a magnificent garden filled with fruit-trees and watered by rivulets. The principal streets are spacious and handsome, and the houses have in general something striking in their architecture. The two principal streets are the Cassaro and the Strada Nuova: they intersect each other at right angles, dividing the city, in a manner, into four equal parts. Their point of intersection forms an open octagonal space, called, from its shape, the Ottangolo. Each of the eight sides of this open space is formed by a beautiful building, three stories high, composed of the Doric, Ionic, and Corinthian orders. Of the other streets few are deserving attention; most of them being narrow, winding, and dirty, and built without the least regard to regularity. The most frequented of the public walks of Palermo is the Marina, a raised platform or terrace, extending above a mile along the bay. At the extremity of this walk there is a delightful public garden, called the Flora, to which people of all ranks are admitted. The public edifices are numerous; among which may be named the royal palace, a vast irregular pile; a statue of Philip IV. of Sicily, surrounded by four other statues; the mansions of the nobility, theatres, monasteries, and convents. In the magnificence of its churches, Palermo is second only to Rome. The cathedral was erected in the 12th century. The church of St. Giuseppe is profusely and richly ornamented, and contains some fine columns of grey Sicilian marble, nearly 60 feet high. There are several hospitals and numerous schools. The university is an extensive building, and was founded in 1806. There are professors in various branches of science. Manf. Cottons, gloves, straw hats, paper, and chemicals. The mole, forming its harbour, stretches above a quarter of a mile into the sea, and forms a port capable of containing 30 sail of the line and several hundred merchantmen. This enables the town to command an extensive foreign trade. Pop. about 180,000. Lat. 38° 9′ 2″ N. Lon. 13° 22′ 2″ E. Palermo is of great antiquity, having been in possession of the Carthaginians and Romans. The Saracens made it the capital of their Sicilian territories. The Normans took it in 1072, and in 1282 it was the scene of the massacre called the Sicilian Vespers. From 1806 to 1815 it was the residence of the court of Naples, and in 1860 was bombarded by the troops of the dictator Garibaldi. In October of the same year its inhabitants voted for annexation to Sardinia, and it was decreed, "That the bedroom occupied by General Garibaldi at Palermo, in the pavilion adjoining the royal palace, shall be perpetually preserved in its present state, and with the furniture it now contains. That the present decree shall be engraven on a marble tablet, and placed at the entrance of the said chamber, &c." The town has been notorious for swarming with beggars of the very lowest description. It has suffered repeatedly from earthquakes.

PALESTINE, or HOLY LAND, păl'-es-tine, a country of Asia, to the S. of Syria, and included within the limits of the Turkish empire. It forms the modern pashalics of Acre and Gaza, and the S. part of the pashalic of Damascus. Area, 11,000 square miles. Desc. The greater part of Palestine displays luxuriant fertility, and is traversed from N. to S. by the chain of Lebanon and Anti-Libanus. Judæa proper, the ancient kingdom of Judah, comprises the territory extending from Lake Asphaltites to the sea, and consists of hills and valleys of great beauty and fertility, where the sides of the mountains are adapted to the vine, the olive, the sycamore, and are crowned with natural groves of oak and cypress; while the earth is abundantly covered with aromatic plants. In proceeding eastward to the shores of the Dead Sea, the scene becomes more decidedly barren. Gloomy and naked rocks, stones, sand, and ashes, are the only objects which then present themselves. To the N. of ancient Judæa was Samaria, a mountainous district, but flourishing and well cultivated. To the N. of Samaria, but still communicating with Judæa by the banks of the Jordan, is Galilee, distinguished by its natural beauty and fertility. The plain of Esdraelon is described by Dr. Clarke as one vast meadow, covered with the richest pasture. He considers this as the richest part of all Palestine. The Lake of Tiberias, or Gennesareth, is surrounded by lofty and picturesque hills, the sides of which were once highly cultivated, and its banks covered with flourishing towns, now almost deserted. The regions beyond Jordan, though less noticed in history, include, however, many tracts once fertile and flourishing. Here are found the Hauran and Dschaulan, consisting of a vast plain, not watered by any great river; yet the inhabitants contrive, by collecting the torrents and rain-water into ponds, to obtain a sufficient supply for the purposes of agriculture; so that very extensive crops of grain are raised in the district. In many parts there are the remains of ancient ruins. Rivers. The Jordan is the principal. Lakes. Meron, or Huleh, Gennesareth, and the Dead Sea. Climate. Very fine in the dry season. Pro. Tobacco, wheat, barley, millet, and fruits. Pop. Unascertained, being inhabited by numerous tribes. Lat. between 30° 40′ and 33° 32′ N. Lon. between 34° 30′ and 36° 25′ E.—This is the country in which the principal events recorded in the Scriptures took place. When it was conquered by the Israelites, Joshua divided it among the ten tribes. Under the reigns of David and Solomon, it became one of the most flourishing kingdoms of Asia. It was conquered, however, by the kings of Nineveh and Babylon, who carried captive, first Israel and then Judah, into the eastern provinces of their empire. After the conquest of Babylon by Cyrus, the Jews were allowed to return to their country, to rebuild their temple, and re-establish their ecclesiastical constitution. Judæa continued thus a province of Persia till after the conquest of Alexander, to whom it submitted without resistance. The Jews were again exposed to oppression from some of the Ptolemies, who, having attempted to enforce the adoption of the Grecian idolatry, were met with the most determined resistance by the Maccabees, and Judæa now became an independent country. It subsequently fell under the dominion of Rome, who established the Herods as tributary kings. It was at this crisis that Judæa became the theatre of those great events which form the foundation of the Christian faith. The Jews, however, having repeatedly rebelled against the authority of the Romans, Titus entered Judæa with a large force, took Jerusalem, razed it to the ground, carried the whole nation captive, and dispersed them through the different provinces of the empire. The country remained in possession of the Romans till the conversion of the empire to Christianity, when Judæa became an object of religious veneration, and the Holy Land was now enriched by the crowd of pilgrims who resorted thither from every part of the Christian world. In the 6th century it fell under the sway of the Mahometans, and afterwards of the Turks, which gave occasion to the Crusades. Jerusalem was taken by the European forces, and was, under Godfrey of Boulogne, erected into a Latin kingdom, which endured for above eighty years, during which the Holy Land streamed continually with Christian and Saracen blood. In 1187 Judæa was conquered by Saladin, on the decline of whose kingdom it passed through various hands, till, in 1517, it was finally swallowed up in the Turkish empire.

PALESTRINA, John Peter Louis, pa'-lais-tre'-na, a celebrated Italian composer, whose musical education was completed under Claude Goudimel, an eminent French musician, and a Huguenot, who was one of the victims of St. Bartholomew. In 1551 Palestrina became chapel-master to Pope Julius III., but lost the post when Paul IV. obtained the tiara, in 1555. After remaining for some time in a poor and neglected condition, he obtained the office of director of chapel music, to Santa Maria Maggiore. The council of Trent having resolved to reform the music of the Church, by getting rid of the vulgar melodies which had crept into the sacred service, Palestrina was engaged to write a mass of a grand and solemn nature. He entered upon his task with religious enthusiasm, and produced a work which set a great example for later musicians to follow, and which is one of the most beautiful masses to be found in the whole catalogue of Roman Catholic church music. Ranke, in his "History of the Popes," thus speaks of the work, which was called the "Mass of Pope Marcellus:"—"By this one great model, the question was for ever set at rest; a path was opened, in following which, the most beautiful, the most touching works, even to those who are not of the Church, were produced." Soon after he had completed this mass, he was reinstated in his former post at the Vatican. The subsequent years of his life were spent in composing sacred music for the Romish church. Dean Aldrich adapted three of his motets to the 44th, 63rd, and 115th Psalms, the first and third of which are frequently heard in English cathedrals; viz. "We have heard with our ears," and "Not unto us." After death, his remains were interred in St. Peter's, and were attended by the most distinguished persons in Rome. B. near Rome, 1524; D. in the same city, 1594.

PALESTRINA, a town of Italy, on a narrow island of the Lagunes, 6 miles from Venice. It is built on the site of the temple of Fortune erected by Sylla. Pop. 6,000.

PALESTRO, pa-lais'-tro, a town of Italy, situate on the left bank of the Sesia, opposite Robbio. Pop. Unascertained.—Here, in 1859, a sanguinary engagement took place between the Austrians and Piedmontese. The former were defeated.

PALEY, Dr. William, pai'-le, a learned English divine and theological writer, who received his elementary education under his father, who was master of Giggleswick school, in Yorkshire. He was afterwards sent to Christ's College, Cambridge, where, in 1763, he took the degree of B.A., and was elected fellow in 1766. He distinguished himself as a tutor, and became the friend of Dr. Law, bishop of Carlisle, who gave him a living in Cumberland, and afterwards that of Appleby, in Westmoreland. He also obtained a prebendal stall in the cathedral of Carlisle, with the living of Dalston. About 1780 he became chancellor of Carlisle. In 1785 he published his "Elements of Moral and Political Philosophy." His next work was "Horæ Paulinæ," or Observations upon the Epistles of St. Paul; in which he establishes a comparison between the epistles and the history of the apostle as given in the Acts; and from the terms the "undesigned coincidences," seeks to prove the genuineness of revealed religion. His "Evidences of Christianity" appeared in 1794. After this, Dr. Paley obtained a prebend of St. Paul's from the bishop of London, the sub-deanery of Lincoln from the bishop of that diocese, and the living of Bishop-Wearmouth from the bishop of Durham. To the last-mentioned prelate he dedicated his book entitled "Natural Theology," which was given to the world in 1802. This work, one of the best-known and delightful in the English language, was edited and annotated by Lord Brougham and Sir Charles Bell in 1845. Lord Brougham, in his preliminary discourse, states that he undertook the task of producing an edition of Paley, in consequence of an observation that he had often made, that scientific men are apt to regard the study of revealed religion as little connected with philosophical pursuits. "Many of the persons to whom I allude," he says, "were men of religious habits of thinking; others were free from any disposition to scepticism; but the bulk of them relied little upon natural theology." B. at Peterborough, 1743; D. 1805.

PALFIN, John, pal'-fin, an eminent Dutch surgeon, who wrote an excellent work on Osteology, and another entitled "Anatomy of the Human Body," which was translated into French by Devaux. A forceps used in accouchements was likewise invented by him. B. 1649; D. 1730.

PALGRAVE, Sir Francis, pal'-graiv, an eminent English historian and historical antiquary, who first became known in literature as the editor of some learned works published under the sanction of the commissioners of public records. In 1831 he produced a valuable little work, entitled "History of England,—Anglo-Saxon Period," for the series named "The Family Library;" and in the following year was knighted for his services to constitutional and parliamentary literature. His valuable "Rise and Progress of the English Commonwealth,—Anglo-Saxon Period; containing the Anglo-Saxon Policy and the Institutions arising out of the Laws and Usages which prevailed before the Conquest," was produced in the same year. In the preliminary inquiries which led to the reform act of the municipal corporations of England and Wales, he took an energetic and distinguished part, and was soon afterwards created deputy keeper of her majesty's records. Whilst worthily filling that post, he published a series of works of the greatest value to the students of English literature; some of the most important of which were, "Calendars and Inventories of the Treasury of the Exchequer," "Documents illustrating the History of Scotland," and "Truths and Fictions of the Middle Ages." The first volume of his greatest work, the "History of Normandy and England," was given to the public in 1851. The work is to be completed in six volumes, and will end with Stephen of Blois and Henry Plantagenet. B. in London, about 1802.

PALINURUS, pal-i-nu'-rus, a skilful pilot of the ship of Æneas. He fell into the sea in his sleep, and was three days exposed to the tempests and agitation of the sea, and at last came safe to the sea-shore, where the cruel inhabitants of the place murdered him. Æneas, when he visited the infernal regions, saw Palinurus, and assured him that though his bones were deprived of a funeral, yet the place where his body was exposed, should be adorned with a monument, and bear his name.

PALISSOT DE MONTENOY, Charles, pa'-lis-so, a French historian, who went to Paris in his 19th year, and endeavoured to obtain the production of some plays upon the stage; but meeting with no success, he at first employed himself with writing against the philosophers, and subsequently devoted himself to historical composition. His most important work was "Memoirs towards the History of French Literature." B. at Nancy, 1730; D. at Paris, 1814.

PALISSY, Bernard, pa'-lis-se, a celebrated French potter and chemist, who, for his ingenuity in painting on glass and other works, was patronized by Henry III., who endeavoured to persuade him to become a Roman Catholic. But Palissy was an inflexible Calvinist, and would not comply; for which he was, in his old age, imprisoned in the Bastille. He wrote several works upon natural philosophy, and upon subjects connected with the art of pottery. The best edition of his works, which are full of valuable and curious experiments, is that of Paris, 1848, with the notes of M. Faujas de St. Fond. His pottery has become celebrated, and few things are more prized by the connoisseur than the famous "Palissy ware." B. about 1500; D. in the Bastille, 1589.—Mr. Morley has written an interesting biography of "Palissy the Potter."

PALLADIO, Andrew, pal-la'-de-o, a celebrated Italian architect. He at first commenced the study of the art of sculpture, but Trissino the poet advised him to apply himself to architecture, and sent him three times to Rome, where Palladio studied and designed after the ancient monuments of that city. In these pursuits he discovered the true principles of an art, which, in his time, was buried in Gothic barbarity. Among the noble structures which this illustrious architect built, one of the principal is the theatre called the Olimpico, at Vicenza. He published a valuable treatise on architecture in 1570, in folio, with plates; and after his death was published a work of his on the antiquities of ancient Rome. B. at Vicenza, 1518; D. 1580.

PALLADIUM, păl-lā'-di-um, a celebrated statue of Pallas (or Minerva), representing the goddess as sitting and holding a spear in her right hand, and in her left a distaff and spindle. Some of the poets state that it fell down from heaven near the tent of Ilus, as that prince was building the citadel of Ilium. Others give it a different origin; but, however discordant their opinions are, it is universally agreed, that on the preservation of the statue depended the safety of Troy. This fatality was well known to the Greeks during the Trojan war; and therefore Ulysses and Diomedes were commissioned to steal it away, which they effected by, it is asserted, the assistance of Helenus, the son of Priam, who proved in this unfaithful to his country. Minerva was displeased with the violence offered to her statue, and, according to Virgil, the Palladium itself appeared to have received life; and, by the flashes from its eyes and sudden leaps from the earth, indicated the resentment of the goddess. Some affirm that the true Palladium was not taken by Ulysses and Diomedes, but that Æneas carried it with him into Italy.

PALLADIUS, Rutilius Taurus Æmilianus, pal-lā'-di-us, a Latin writer and physician, who lived after the decline of letters at Rome, but in what year is uncertain. He left a treatise upon agriculture, which is extant.

PALLADIUS, an early Christian father, who became a hermit in 388, and in 401 was chosen bishop of Helenopolis, in Bithynia. For his attachment to St. Chrysostom, he was greatly persecuted, and driven from his diocese. At the desire of Lausus, governor of Cappadocia, he wrote the "History of Anchorets." There is also attributed to him a Life of Chrysostom, in a dialogue, Greek and Latin.

PALLAS, păl'-lăs, a freedman of the emperor Claudius, over whom he had so great an ascendancy, as to persuade him to espouse Agrippina, his niece, and to adopt Nero for his successor. Pallas, in concert with Agrippina, is charged with having hastened the death of Claudius by poison. Nero subsequently caused him to be secretly put to death, confiscated his treasure, amounting to upwards of two millions sterling; but erected a superb monument to his memory. Pallas was brother to the Felix before whom St. Paul pleaded.

PALLAS, a name of Minerva. (See MINERVA.)

PALLAS, Peter Simon, pal'-las, a celebrated German naturalist and traveller, who was educated for the medical profession. In his youth he likewise evinced a great aptitude for the acquirement of languages, and for any knowledge bearing upon the natural sciences. After visiting the universities of Halle, Göttingen, and Leyden, he proceeded to London in 1761, and there assiduously studied the collections of natural history. In 1763 he went to the Hague, and published a work upon zoology, which acquired him great reputation, and led to an invitation from the empress Catherine to St. Petersburg. Thither he proceeded in 1767, and was appointed professor of natural history in the Imperial Academy of Sciences. Shortly afterwards he formed a member of the expedition dispatched to Northern Russia and Siberia, for the purpose of investigating the natural history of those regions. After an absence of six years, during which his companions and himself penetrated as far as the frontiers of China, he returned to St. Petersburg in 1774, with a large mass of notes and observations, to arrange and publish which, cost him several years of intense application. For his services he was ennobled, and appointed preceptor to the grand-dukes Alexander and Constantine. In 1794 he proceeded to the newly-conquered province of the Crimea, where he resided during fifteen years, busily engaged in accumulating facts and preparing his scientific works for publication. At length, feeling the advance of age, he requested permission to return to Germany; and, this being granted, he arrived at Berlin after an absence of forty-two years. Pallas was an untiring observer of natural phenomena, and a most voluminous writer. His works, says Cuvier, "have placed the name of their author in the first rank of naturalists, who are constantly referring to and quoting from every page of them. They are also read and consulted with equal interest by the historian, the geographer, and the student of languages or of nations." The most valuable of his works are: "Travels through different Provinces of the Russian Empire;" an uncompleted work on the animals of European and Asiatic Russia, entitled, "Zoographia Rosso-Asiatica;" a "History of the Mongolian Nations;" and "Travels through the Southern Provinces of the Russian Empire." He likewise contributed a number of papers on geology and natural history to the Transactions of the Academy of St. Petersburg, and to those of the Royal Society of London and the Institute of France, of which learned bodies he was a member. B. at Berlin, 1741; D. at the same city, 1811.

PALLAVICINO, Sforza, pal'-la-ve-chē'-no, an eminent Italian cardinal. Though the elder son of a noble family, he renounced the advantages of birth, and entered the order of the Jesuits. After his novitiate, he professed philosophy and theology in his society. Innocent X. employed him in several important affairs, and Alexander VII. made him cardinal. His principal work is a "History of the Council of Trent," written in opposition to that of Father Sarpi. The style is good, but the book is partial. He was also the author of a treatise on Style in Written Composition, and a philosophical treatise on Happiness. B. at Rome, 1607; D. at the same city, 1667.

PALLAVICINO, Ferrante, an Italian writer. He became a canon regular of the order of St. Augustine; but, having written some severe satires against Pope Urban VIII. and his relatives the Barberini, he found it expedient to retire to Venice, as a price was set upon his head. A Frenchman, who pretended to be his friend, persuaded him to go to France, promising him a brilliant career. Ferrante followed his advice, but was no sooner out of the Venetian territory than he was seized and conducted to Avignon, where he was put to death. The man who had betrayed him was assassinated some time afterwards by a friend of Pallavicino. His works were printed at Venice. The principal is entitled, "The Celestial Divorce; or, the Separation of Christ from the Roman Church." B. at Parma, 1615; executed 1644.

PALLISER, Sir Hugh, păl'-li-ser, an English admiral, who early in life distinguished himself in the navy, and was made post captain in 1746. He was at the taking of Quebec, and was made comptroller of the navy, and created a baronet in 1773. Serving as second in command under Admiral Keppel, in the famous engagement off Ushant, July, 1778, a misunderstanding arose between them, and Sir Hugh preferred a charge against Admiral Keppel, who was acquitted. Sir Hugh was then tried in his turn and reprimanded. He was, however, a brave and experienced officer, and became governor of Greenwich Hospital. B. 1721; D. at Greenwich, 1796.

PALLISER'S ISLANDS, a cluster of islands in the South Pacific Ocean. Lat. 15° S. Lon. 145° W.

PALK STRAIT, palk, is that portion of the Indian Ocean which separates Ceylon from the mainland of India. Its narrowest part is 40 miles across.

PALMA, pal'-ma, an island off the coast of Africa, forming one of the group of the Canaries. Area, 330 square miles. Desc. Elevated; the centre is often covered with snow, and contains extensive pine forests, as well as good timber for shipbuilding. The coasts are very fertile. Pro. The vine, almonds, honey, wax, and silk, of which there are manufactures. The sugar-cane is also successfully cultivated, and the inhabitants are engaged in the fishery on their coasts. Pop. 35,000. Lat. 28° 45′ N. Lon. 17° 50′ W.

PALMA, the capital of the island of Majorca, in the Mediterranean, at the bottom of a large bay, formed by the two capes Blanco and Cala Figuera. It is surrounded by walls flanked with bastions. Some of the streets are narrow and ill-paved, but those in the lower part of the town, and all the squares, are spacious and regular. Of the public buildings the most conspicuous is the cathedral, a large and handsome Gothic building, and the church of St. Michael is still more ancient, and served for a mosque under the Moors. There are, besides, the government house, containing a chapel-royal; an arsenal, barracks, a state prison, the house appointed for the meetings of the merchants' and trades, a town-house, and hospitals. Manf. Woollens and silk. The harbour has a mole of nearly three quarters of a mile in length. Pop. 40,000. Lat. 42° 49′ 57″ N. Lon. 1° 39′ 28″ W.

PALMA, a town of Sicily, on the sea-coast, 12 miles from Girgenti. It is noted for the quantity of sulphur made in its vicinity. Pop. 8,000.

PALMA, a town of Andalusia, on the Xenil, 30 miles from Cordova. Pop. 5,500.

PALMA, a city of New Granada, in the province of Tunja, on the Magdalena, 26 miles from Huelva. Pop. 4,000.

PALMAS, CAPE, päl'-mas, a promontory of Western Africa, forming the entrance from the north into the Gulf of Guinea. Lat. 4° 22′ N. Lon. 7° 44′ W.

PALMAS, CIVIDAD DE LAS, capital of the island of Grand Canary, and which carries on all its commerce. The convents are numerous. Pop. 18,000.

PALMER, Samuel, pa'-mer, a learned printer, who exercised his profession with great reputation in London, and in whose office the celebrated Dr. Franklin was employed. He was the author of a "History of Printing." D. 1732.

PALMER, John, an eminent English actor, whose father was door-keeper at Drury-Lane theatre; by which means the son had every opportunity of gaining an inclination for the stage. After pursuing the life of a strolling and provincial actor during some years, he went to London, and was engaged first at the Haymarket, and next at Drury Lane, where he rose to the first rank as a comedian. He died suddenly, while playing in the "Stranger," at Liverpool, in 1798. B. 1741.

PALMERSTON, Henry John Temple, Viscount, pa'-mer-ston, a modern English statesman, whose family, the Temples, are descended from a Saxon earl, anterior to the Conquest, although the title belongs to the Irish peerage. Sir William Temple, the diplomatist, friend of William III., and patron of Dean Swift, is one of the most famous members of the same family. The future prime minister was sent first to Harrow school, afterwards to the university of Edinburgh, and finally to St. John's College, Cambridge; where, in 1806, he took an M.A. degree. In his 21st year he sought to enter the House of Commons, as the representative of the university of Cambridge, but was defeated by Lord Henry Petty, afterwards Marquis of Lansdowne. Shortly afterwards, however, he was returned to parliament for the borough of Bletchingley, and at a later period he succeeded in securing the suffrages of the university of Cambridge. From the very outset of his parliamentary career, his ability and business talents were conspicuous, and in 1807, although only in his 25th year, he became a junior lord of the Treasury in the Tory administration of the duke of Portland and Mr. Perceval. In the following year he made his first great speech in parliament, in opposition to a motion of Mr. Ponsonby for the production of papers relative to Lord Cathcart's expedition to Copenhagen. In 1809 he was appointed secretary at war, upon the resignation of Lord Castlereagh. In this office he remained through the various Tory administrations for nearly twenty years. But in this interval his political views had undergone considerable modification, and after Canning's death he found himself unfitted for co-operation with the Tories. Between May, 1828, and March, 1830, he was without office, and as an independent member, signalized himself so much upon foreign questions that, when the Whigs came into power, he received the appointment of foreign secretary, and kept it until the year 1834. After the fall of the Conservative ministry of Sir Robert Peel, in the following year, Lord Palmerston again resumed his functions in the Foreign Office. He remained in office until 1841, and it was during these six years that the name of Palmerston became so celebrated as a foreign minister. Throughout the continent, from Spain to Turkey, his name represented the power and influence of England,—an object of fear and execration with some governments, of admiration with others; synonymous with alertness, brilliancy, and foresight with all. At the same time, also, there sprang up those erratic political theorists, who, like Mr. Urquhart in England and Count Ficquelmont on the continent, maintained pertinaciously and absurdly that Lord Palmerston was the voluntary tool of Russia. Between the years 1841—1846, he was in opposition to the Conservative ministry of Sir Robert Peel; but in the last-mentioned year he was again appointed foreign secretary under the Whig administration of Lord John Russell. His too ready acknowledgment of the coup d'état effected by Louis Napoleon in 1851, led to serious differences between himself and his colleagues, and, in consequence, he was compelled to resign. His secession, however, speedily led to the fall of the Russell ministry, and upon the accession of the Coalition administration, in the following year, he took the office of home secretary. The mismanagement of affairs in the Crimea brought about the fall of the Coalition ministry in 1855; immediately after which Lord Palmerston reached the apex of power as first lord of the Treasury, and prime minister of Great Britain. His too great deference to the wishes of a foreign potentate, in the matter of the "Conspiracy Bill," introduced to the House of Commons shortly after the attempt upon the life of the emperor of the French by Orsini and others, aroused the strongest feelings in this country against his cabinet. Before that expression of public indignation he was compelled to retire, and to give place to the Conservative ministry of Lord Derby. In 1859, however, he overcame the Conservative party, and returned to power as premier, an office he still holds (1861). The tendency and results of his long political career may be studied with advantage in two works, entitled, respectively, "Opinions and Policy of the Right Hon. Viscount Palmerston, as Minister, Diplomatist, and Statesman; with a Memoir by G. H. Francis," and "Thirty Years of Foreign Policy: a History of the Secretaryship of the Earl of Aberdeen and Lord Palmerston." Of his light, ready, and sparkling speeches, no collected edition has yet been made. B. at Broadlands, Hampshire, 1784.

PALMYRA, pal-mi'-ra, two townships of the United States, neither with a population above 4,000.

PALMYRA, an ancient city of Asia, situate in the heart of the desert of Syria, now a mass of splendid ruins, 120 miles from Damascus. Its site was long unknown, until the spot was at last penetrated by some European travellers. It had an immense temple, dedicated to the sun, of which 60 columns out of 390 still remain. Lat. 34° 18′ N. Lon. 38° 13′ E.

PALO, PALOO, or PALU, pa'-lo, a town of Asiatic Turkey, on the Euphrates, 60 miles from Diarbekir. Manf. Cotton-weaving, dyeing, and tanning. Pop. 8,000.

PALO, a city of Naples, 10 miles from Bari. Pop. 4,800.

PALSGRAVE, John, päls'-grav, an English divine, who studied at Cambridge and at Paris, and became tutor in the French language to the Princess Mary, on her marriage with Louis XII. of France; and after his return to his own country he obtained some preferment. He translated a Latin comedy, called "Acolastus," into English. D. about 1550.

PAMIERS, pa'-me-ai, a town of France, on the Arriége, 10 miles from Foix. Manf. Woollens, cottons, caps, and hats. It has a cathedral and a castle. Pop. 8,000. This is the former capital of the comté Foix.

PAMIR, pa-mir', an extensive table-land of Central Asia. Its highest point, called by the natives the "roof of the world," in is lat. 37° 27′ N; lon. 73° 40′ E.

PAMLICO SOUND, păm'-li-ko, a large bay on the coast of N. Carolina, 86 miles long and from 10 to 20 broad. It is separated from the Atlantic by a beach of sand, hardly a mile wide, generally covered with small trees or bushes, through which are several small inlets. This sound communicates with Core and Albemarle sounds, and receives Pamlico, or Tar river, which has a length of about 40 miles.

PAMPAS, păm'-pas, extensive plains of S. America, in the province of Buenos Ayres. They extend from Patagonia over 27° of latitude, and comprise all the central part of the Plata confederation. In the N. they are covered with tropical palms and a luxuriant vegetation; in the centre they abound with grass, but are nearly destitute of trees; and in the S. they are swampy. Area. Estimated at 1,620,000 square miles.

PAMPAS DEL SACRAMENTO, vast plains of South America, to the E. of the Andes, which run in a direction nearly N. and S. through the province of Peru.

PAMPELONNE, pam'-pe-lon, a town of France, in the department of Tarn, 14 miles from Alby. Pop. 2,300.

PAMPELUNA, or PAMPLONA, pam-pai-loo'-na, a fortified town in the north of Spain, and capital of the province of Navarre, on the Agar, 100 miles from Madrid. It stands partly on an eminence, partly on a plain, and is surrounded by mountains at some distance from it. Its principal defence are two castles, one in the inside, the other on the outside of the walls: the latter is the citadel, and is of great strength. The principal edifices are the cathedral, churches, monasteries, and palaces of the viceroy. It has, besides, a promenade, and public fountains supplied by a splendid aqueduct. Manf. Coarse woollens, paper, and leather. Pop. 11,000.—In June, 1813, Pampeluna was the scene of obstinate fighting between the British and French, and surrendered to the former on 31st October.

PAMPHILUS, păm'-fi-lus, a painter of Macedon, who flourished under King Philip. He was the first who applied the laws of proportion and of perspective to his art, which he honoured by his manners and his talents. He founded a school at Sicyon, the most famous of all the ancient academies of painting, and procured an edict that none but those of noble birth should be instructed in painting. The same law was afterwards extended throughout Greece. Apelles was the disciple of this master. Flourished in the 4th century B.C.

PAMPHILUS, St., bishop and martyr, of Cæsarea, in Palestine; to which city he presented a library, consisting of most of the works of the ancients. He transcribed the Bible with his own hand, and with the utmost exactness. He was put to death about 309.

PAMPHILUS. (See EUSEBIUS.)

PAMPLONA, pam-plo'-na, a town of S. America, New Granada, in the department of Boyaca, 200 miles from Bogata. It has several churches and convents. Pop. 3,500.—In the neighbourhood are gold- and silver-mines.

PAN, păn, the god of shepherds, of huntsmen, and of all the inhabitants of the country, in the Grecian mythology. He was the son of Mercury, according to Homer. Pan, however, was a monster in appearance: he had two small horns on his head; his complexion was ruddy, his nose flat, and his legs, thighs, tail, and feet, were those of a goat. His education was intrusted to a nymph of Arcadia, but who, according to Homer, was so terrified at the sight of the monster, that she fled from him. He was wrapped up in the skin of beasts by his father, and carried to heaven, where Jupiter and the gods long entertained themselves with the oddity of his appearance. There Bacchus gave him the name of Pan. The god of shepherds chiefly resided in Arcadia, where the woods and the most rugged mountains were his habitation. He invented the flute with seven reeds, and was continually employed in deceiving the neighbouring nymphs, and captivated Diana by transforming himself into a beautiful white goat. The worship of Pan was well established, particularly in Arcadia, where he gave oracles on Mount Lycæus. His festivals, called by the Greeks Lycæa, were brought to Italy by Evander, and they were well known at Rome by the name of the Lupercalia. The worship and the different functions of Pan are derived from the mythology of the ancient Egyptians.

PANÆTIUS, pa-ne'-shi-us, a Stoic philosopher of Rhodes. He studied at Athens, under Diogenes the Stoic, with such credit as to be offered the rights of citizenship, which he refused, saying, "A modest man is content with one country." He afterwards went to Rome, where he had numerous disciples; among the rest, Lælius, Scipio, and Polybius. Panætius accompanied Scipio in his expeditions, and rendered eminent services to the Rhodians by his interest with that commander. Cicero mentions a work of his on the Duties of Man, which is lost. Flourished in the 2nd century B.C.

PANAMA, păn-a-ma', capital of the department of Istmo, on the Isthmus of Panama, S. America, at the bottom of a large bay of the Pacific Ocean. The streets are broad and paved, both in the city and its suburbs; but the houses of the suburbs are mostly of wood, intermixed with thatched huts. It has a cathedral, with churches, convents, monasteries, and an excellent hospital. Panama is remarkable for its fine bay, which is studded with islands. It has a trade in gold-dust, pearls, coffee, shells, and hides. Pop. about 10,000. Lat. 9° 0′ 30″ N. Lon. 79° 19′ W.

PANAMA, GULF OF, an inlet of the Pacific Ocean, on the S. side of the Isthmus of Panama, with a length and breadth of about 120 miles each way.

PANAMA, or DARIEN, ISTHMUS OF. (See DARIEN.)

PANARO, pa-na'-ro, a river of N. Italy, rising in the Monte Cimere, and after a course of 75 miles, falling into the Po, 12 miles from Ferrara.

PANCKOUCKE, Andrew Joseph, pan-kook', a French writer, who produced, among numerous other works, "Studies for Young Ladies," "History of the Counts of Flanders," "A Collection of Bon-mots," "Dictionary of French Proverbs," and "Essays on Philosophers." B. at Lille, 1700; D. at Paris, 1753.

PANCKOUCKE, Charles Joseph, son of the preceding. He was a publisher at Paris, and his knowledge of typography made him celebrated all over Europe. He established the "Moniteur" newspaper and the celebrated "Encyclopédie Méthodique." His works are, "Mathematical Memoirs," addressed to the Academy of Sciences; translations of Lucretius, of Tasso's "Jerusalem," and of the "Orlando Furioso" of Ariosto; a "Philosophical Discourse on Beauty," and another on "Pleasure and Grief." B. at Lille, 1736; D. at Paris, 1799.

PANCRAS, St., păn'-kras, a N. parish of Middlesex, in London, including a portion of the town of Highgate, and the suburbs of Camden-town, Kentish-town, and Somers-town. Pop. about 170,000. Its old church, now rebuilt, is supposed to stand on the site of one of the most ancient temples in Britain.

PANCSOVA, pan-cho'-vo, a fortified town of Hungary, at the confluence of the Temes and the Danube, 8 miles from Belgrade. Pop. 12,000.—It is a steam-packet station on the Danube.

PANDARUS, păn'-da-rus, a son of Lycaon, is remarkable for having broken the truce which had been agreed upon between the Greeks and Trojans; he also wounded Menelaus and Diomedes; but was at last killed by Diomedes. Æneas, then carried him off in his chariot, and, attempting to revenge his death, nearly perished by the hand of the furious enemy. There was another of the name, who was a native of Crete, and was punished with death for being accessory to the theft of Tantalus. What this theft was is unknown. Some, however, suppose that Tantalus stole the ambrosia and the nectar from the tables of the gods, to which he had been admitted, or that he carried away a dog which watched Jupiter's temple in Crete, in which crime Pandarus was concerned, and for which he suffered.

PANDORA, pan-do'-ra, the name of the first mortal female, according to Hesiod. She was fashioned of clay by Vulcan, at the request of Jupiter, who wished to punish the impiety of Prometheus by giving him a wife. When the clay statue became imbued with life, all the gods vied with each other in making her presents. Venus gave her beauty, the Graces the power of captivating; Apollo taught her music; Mercury instructed her in eloquence; and Minerva bestowed upon her the most splendid ornaments. From these presents, received from the gods, is derived her name, which signifies the recipient of every gift. Subsequently, Jupiter gave her a box to present to the man who married her, and Mercury then conducted her to Prometheus. But that subtle mortal, sensible of the deceit, would not allow himself to be captivated by her charms. His brother, Epimetheus, was not possessed of the same prudence. He married Pandora, and, upon opening the box which she presented to him, there issued from it a multitude of evils, which dispersed themselves over the world, and began to afflict the human race. Hope, however, remained at the bottom of the casket, to render, says the poet, troubles and sorrows less painful in life.

PANDROSOS, păn-dro'-sos, daughter of Cecrops, king of Athens, and the only one who had not the fatal curiosity to open a box containing Erichthonius, which Minerva had intrusted to the care of Cecrops's daughters.

PANIGAROLA, Francis, pa'-ne-ga-ro-la, an eminent Italian prelate, whom Sixtus V. created bishop of Asti, and sent with Bellarmine and Cardinal Gaetano to France, to strengthen the party of the League against Henry IV. On that occasion Panigarola displayed great zeal and eloquence. On his return, he set about reforming his diocese, which is said to have given such offence, that he was poisoned. He was the author of some fine sermons, which were printed at Rome; but his principal work is a treatise on the eloquence of the pulpit, under the title of "Il Predicatore." B. at Milan, 1548; D. 1594.

PANIN, Nakita Ivanowitz, pa-nin', Count de, a Russian statesman. His father, who was lieutenant-general in the service of Peter I., came originally from Lucca, in Italy. Panin commenced his career in the cavalry-guards of the empress Elizabeth; but having secured the patronage of the prince Kourakin, he became gentleman of the chamber. By his address he gained the favour of his sovereign, who sent him, in 1747, to Copenhagen, and afterwards to Stockholm, with the title of minister plenipotentiary. On his return he was made governor of the grand-duke Paul, and lastly prime minister to Catherine II. He was a man of considerable powers and enlarged views, and during his stay in Sweden he conceived a great admiration of the more liberal form of government existing in that kingdom, and which he afterwards attempted to introduce in Russia, but without success. B. 1718; D. 1782.

PANINI, Paul, pa-ne'-ne, a celebrated Italian painter who painted architectural subjects with great accuracy and beauty, and decorated the palace of the kings of Sardinia at Rivoli. B. at Piacenza, 1691; D. 1764.

PANIPUT, or PANEEPUT, pan-i-poot', the chief town of a district in India, 80 miles from Delhi. It had formerly a brick wall and round towers at the angles. It has a civil establishment, and is on the line of route between Western Asia, Affghanistan, and the Punjab on the one side, and Central and Eastern Hindostan on the other. Pop. 18,000.—The DISTRICT has an area of 1,379 square miles, and a population of 284,000. Lat. between 28° 50′ and 29° 18′ N. Lon. between 76° 40′ and 77° 16′ E.

PANIZZI, Antonio, pa-nit'-se, the librarian of the British Museum, was educated for the legal profession at Parma. Seriously compromised in the Italian troubles of 1821, he was compelled to seek an asylum in England, where, through the interest of Lord Brougham and Mr. Roscoe, he obtained the appointment of professor of Italian literature in the University of London. In 1831 he was nominated assistant-librarian at the British Museum; and in 1856 became principal librarian of the same institution, which, under his excellent supervision, has been vastly improved. Besides his services to literature and to the reading public, as head of the national library, he has earned the gratitude of students of Italian literature by his publication of several valuable works thereon. B. in the duchy of Modena, 1797.

PANMURE, Fox Maule, Lord, păn-mure', a modern British statesman, who, after completing his education at the Charterhouse school, entered the army, and served for a period in Canada. Soon after his return from that colony, he entered the House of Commons as member for Perthshire. He subsequently held office in the boards of Trade and of Control, and was for a short time secretary at war. He succeeded to the peerage upon the death of his father, in 1852, and in 1855 became secretary at war, under Lord Palmerston. In that office he displayed great energy and sound judgment, and his administration was attended with the best results during the Crimean war. He retired into private life upon the fall of the Palmerston ministry in 1858. B. at Brechin, 1801.

PANOLA, pa-no'-la, a county of the United States, in Mississippi. Area, 735 square miles. Pop. 12,000.

PANTELARIA, pan-tai-la-re'-a, the ancient Cossyra, a small island in the Mediterranean, belonging to Sicily, and situate between that island and the coast of Africa. It has a circuit of about 30 miles. Desc. Volcanic, and producing grapes of excellent quality, other fruits, and corn. It is also distinguished for a fine breed of asses. Pop. 7,000. Lat. 36° 45′ 40″ N. Lon. 8° 26′ 25″ E.

PAOLA, pa'-o-la, a town of Naples, in Calabria Citra, on a height near the sea, 12 miles from Cosenza. It is defended on the side of the sea by a fortress and two towers. Manf. Woollens, silks, and earthenware. Pop. 5,000.

PAOLI, Pasquale de, pa'-o-le, a celebrated Corsican patriot, whose father Hyacinth was, in 1735, elected one of the chief magistrates of the island, and subsequently acted as a leader in the revolt against the Genoese. On being compelled to quit Corsica, he retired to Naples with Pasquale, who was placed in the military college of that city. After serving for a short time as lieutenant in the Neapolitan army, he was invited by the Corsicans to become their captain-general. In 1755 he put himself at the head of his countrymen, and, during twelve years, waged a fierce war with the Genoese, who were in the end driven from almost every fort in the island. Meanwhile, Paoli had to contend against a powerful chief named Matra, who, bribed by Genoa, excited civil dissensions amongst the Corsicans; but the patriot at length defeated and killed him, and forced his brother to seek refuge in Italy. Paoli established a legislative assembly, in which sat 500 deputies, elected by the country. This assembly elected an executive body of nine members, of which Paoli was the president, with the title of general of the kingdom, and chief of the supreme magistracy of Corsica. He organized a well-trained militia of 30,000 men, and established a fleet, which constantly harassed the Genoese vessels. Genoa, however, gave up the island to France in 1768; and soon afterwards a large force was landed, under the command of Count Marbœuf, against whom Paoli and his followers fought desperately, and in two engagements defeated the French with great slaughter. But large reinforcements arriving to the French, the Corsicans were totally routed at Pontenuovo; whereupon the island submitted. Paoli went first to Leghorn and afterwards to England, where he remained until 1789, in which year, Mirabeau having moved in the National Assembly the recall of all Corsican patriots, Paoli repaired to Paris. He was received with enthusiasm in the French capital, and was created by Louis XVI. military commandant in Corsica. Whilst the government of France was monarchical, Paoli remained faithful; but, at the outbreak of the Revolution, he requested the assistance of the English in driving the French out of Corsica. The crown of the kingdom was subsequently offered to the king of Great Britain, and Sir Gilbert Elliot named viceroy. The Corsicans had desired that Paoli should have been appointed to that office; and, to avoid dissensions, the patriot quitted the island and went to England, where he resided until his death, living upon a pension allowed him by the British government. His remains were interred in Westminster Abbey, where there is a monument to his memory. B. at Rostino, Corsica, 1726; D. near London, 1806.

PAOLUCCIO, Paul Anateste, pa'-o-loo'-cho, the first doge of Venice, before whose time the republic was governed by tribunes chosen every year. The Venetians elected Paoluccio doge in 697. D. 717.

PAPA, pa-pa', a market-town of Hungary, 26 miles from Veszprin. It has several churches, convents, hospitals, and a gymnasium. Manf. Paper, glass, and stone-wares. Pop. 13,000.

PAPAGAYO, pa'-pa-ga-yo, a river of Mexico, which runs into the Pacific Ocean, 25 miles from Acapulco.—Also a gulf on the North Pacific Ocean, and on the west side of the Isthmus of Nicaragua.

PAPAL STATES. (See PONTIFICAL STATES.)

PAPA-STOUR, PAPA-STRONSAY, and PAPA-WESTRAY, three small islands, one of Shetland and two of Orkney.

PAPENBURG, pa'-pen-boorg, a town of Hanover, in the district of Osnabruck, 20 miles from Emden. Manf. Linen fabrics, chicory, and tobacco. Pop. 4,000.

PAPIAS, pai'-pe-as, one of the early Christian writers, and bishop of Hierapolis, in Phrygia. He is said to have been the disciple of St. John the Evangelist, and a millenarian, or believer in the visible reign of Christ upon earth one thousand years before the resurrection. He was the author of some commentaries upon Scripture, which are lost. Flourished at the commencement of the 2nd century.

PAPIRIUS, pa-pi'-ri-us, surnamed Cursor, or the Courier, from the swiftness of his course, was at first master of the horse to Crassus, and became dictator of Rome about 326 B.C. He defeated the Samnites several times, and appropriated the spoils to the building of a temple to Fortune. Livy declares Papirius Cursor to have been the most illustrious general of his time, and worthy of contending with Alexander the Great, had the latter turned his arms against Rome after the subjugation of Asia.

PAPIRIUS PRÆTEXTATUS, pre-tex-tai'-tus, a Roman youth, so called from a remarkable stratagem which he practised. He was the son of a senator, and, according to the custom of that period, was taken by his father to hear the debates. On his return, he was pressed by his mother to inform her what had passed in the assembly. After resisting her importunities for a long time, he, to avoid further questioning, told her that the question under the consideration of the senate was, whether it would not be more advantageous to the republic for every man to have two wives instead of one? The mother immediately revealed this important secret to the Roman ladies, who assembled in great numbers, and besieged the senate, uttering violent complaints. The senators were surprised; but, on being made acquainted with the stratagem made use of by Papirius, they passed a decree that, with the exception of himself, no youths should, for the future, be admitted into their assembly.

PAPPUS, Alexandrinus, păp'-pus, a philosopher and mathematician of Alexandria, whose most important writings are "Mathematical Collections," a Latin version of which appeared in 1588; a comment upon the "Almagest" of Ptolemy, "Description of the Rivers of Libya," "Treatise on Military Engines," "Commentaries on Aristarchus, concerning the Magnitudes and Distances of the Sun and Moon," a translation of which last was published by Dr. Halley. Flourished at the close of the 4th century.

PAPS OF JURA, păps, four mountains in the island of Jura, Hebrides, Scotland, seen at a great distance. The highest has an elevation of 2,470 feet above the level of the sea.

PAPUA, or NEW GUINEA, păp'-u-a, an island in the Eastern Archipelago, extending from the south end of Gilolo and the north coast of Ceram in a south-west direction. Area. Estimated at from 200,000 to 275,000 square miles. It is indented by such deep bays, that it resembles a chain of peninsulas, so near does the sea approach on each side. The coast, viewed from the sea, rises gradually into hills of considerable elevation; but there are no mountains seen of which the height is remarkable. The whole is covered with palm-trees and timber of a large size. Little of the country, however, is known. The inhabitants are partly a negro race, and have been denominated the "Papuan negro." On the S. side of the island the Dutch have an established fort, and a possession of about 120 miles of ground, which, from 1828, they have held in the name of the king of the Netherlands.

PARA, pa-ra', a maritime province of Brazil, comprising nearly the whole of the Brazilian territory. Area, 1,102,500 square miles. Desc. Covered with immense forests, and mostly unexplored. Rivers. The Amazon and the Rio Negro, and their tributaries. Climate. Excessively hot. Pro. Sugar, coffee, and cocoa; rice, cotton, manioc, cloves, gums, sarsaparilla, balsams, and medicinal plants. Manf. Shoes and other articles made from india-rubber. Pop. about 240,000, 10,000 of whom are supposed to be Indians.

PARA, or BELEM, the capital of the above province, is situate about 70 miles from the Atlantic, at the junction of the river Guama with the Para. This city is handsome, and has some beautiful edifices, and a citadel and castle at the entrance of the river. Pop. about 15,000. Lat. 1° 30′ S. Lon. 48° 33′ W.

PARA, a river of the above province, and, properly speaking, one of the mouths of the Amazon, about 40 miles wide. Lat. 20° S.

PARACELSUS, păr'-a-sel'-sus, an extraordinary individual of the 16th century, generally so called, but who styled himself Philippus Aureolus Theophrastus Paracelsus Bombast. His father was the natural son of a prince, and gave him an excellent education. Paracelsus, who had a fertile genius, applied himself to the study of medicine, in which he made great progress. He went to France, Spain, and Italy, for improvement, and on his return to Switzerland, settled at Basel, where he acquired great reputation by his practice, in which he first made use of those two powerful medicines, mercury and opium. His charges, however, like those of empyrics in general, were exorbitant, and, having cured a canon from a dangerous complaint, his demand was so great that the patient refused to pay it, which produced a hearing before the council, who ordered the canon to pay only the accustomed fee. This so irritated Paracelsus, that he left Basel and went into Alsace, where he became noted as an alchemist, and pretended to have found not only the philosopher's stone, but the elixir of life. He, nevertheless, died poor and at a comparatively early age. The best edition of his works is that of Huser, at Basel, 1590. Brande thus speaks of his labours: "His original discoveries are few and unimportant, and his great merit lies in the boldness and assiduity which he displayed in introducing chemical preparations into the Materia Medica; but though we can fix upon no particular discovery on which to found his merit as a chemist, and though his writings are deficient in the acumen and knowledge displayed by several of his contemporaries and immediate successors, it is undeniable that he gave a most important turn to pharmaceutical chemistry; and calomel, with a variety of mercurial and antimonial preparations, as likewise opium, came into general use." B. it is supposed, at Einsiedeln, Switzerland, 1493; D. at Salzburg, in the Tyrol, 1541.

PARACLET, par'-a-klai, a hamlet of France, in the department Aube, 3 miles from Nugent-sur-Seine. Here are the ruins of the convent founded by Abelard in the 12th century. Heloise was its abbess.

PARADISI, Agostino, Count, pa'-ra-de'-se, an eminent Italian poet, whose verses obtained for him admission to the academy of Reggio at the early age of 16. After visiting Genoa, Venice, and Bologna, he (1772) became professor of belles-lettres in the university of Mantua. In 1776 the duke of Mantua created him a count. His lectures were attended not only by his countrymen, but by distinguished persons from France and Germany. He returned to Reggio in 1780, and held a high official employment there, giving his leisure to literary pursuits, until his death. B. at Vignola, 1736; D. at the same place, 1783.

PARAGUAY, pă-ră-gwai', an independent state of S. America. It is bounded on the N. and E. by Brazil, on the W. by the Paraguay, and on the S. by the Parana. Area. Estimated at 75,000 square miles. Desc. The great natural features of this country are the numerous rivers, swamps, lakes, plains, and woods with which it abounds. It may, however, be briefly described as mountainous in the N.E., flat in the centre, and marshy in the S.W. Rivers. Its largest and most noted are the Paraguay and the Parana. These, in the rainy season, being swollen, overflow their banks, and inundate far and wide the adjacent country. Climate. In general moist and temperate, though in some parts cold. Zoology. The ostrich is seen in the plains of Paraguay, and is remarkable for its immense size, fine plumage, and swift motion. The wild animals are the jaguar or tiger, the puma or cougar, the black bear, the ant-bear, and the tapir, or river cow. Mosquitoes and an innumerable variety of insects infest both the waters and the land, with snakes, vipers, and scorpions. The great boa-constrictor is found in the moist places adjoining the rivers, and some parts are haunted by the vampire bat. Pro. The temperate parts abound with all kinds of grain, beans, pease, melons, cucumbers, and European vegetables and fruits. The other products are medicinal plants and the Paraguay tea, or matte, a plant an infusion of which supplies the inhabitants with a refreshing drink. The forests abound with a variety of woods, medicinal and aromatic, and many of them yielding useful dyes. The trade of Paraguay consists in the export of its tea, tobacco, sugar, cotton, hides, tallow, wax, honey, cattle, horses, mules, wool, leather, hemp, rice, and ornamental timber. Pop. Estimated at 260,000. Lat. between 17° and 27° S. Lon. between 54° and 58° W. Paraguay was first discovered by Sebastian Cabot, in the year 1526. In 1556 the Jesuits made their appearance, and, by the effect of gentleness and policy, succeeded in obtaining a great ascendancy over the minds of the natives, and in establishing settlements in different parts of the country. In 1768 they were expelled, and in 1811 the people rebelled against the yoke of Spain. In 1817, Francia was elected dictator, and until 1844, foreigners were excluded from the country. In 1852, its independence was recognized by the Argentine Republic, and in the following year by Great Britain.

PARAGUAY, a large river of South America, which has its source in lat. 13° S., and enters the ocean under the name of the Rio de la Plata. Its total course is estimated at 2,000 miles.

PARAIBA, pa-ra-e'-ba, the capital of a province of the same name, in Brazil, on the river Paraiba, about 10 miles from the sea, and 65 from Pernambuco. It is a handsome town, defended by three forts, and has a cathedral church and a large government warehouse. Pop. including the district, about 16,000.—The DISTRICT has an area of 19,770 square miles, and produces cotton, sugar, Brazil-wood, drugs, and timber. Breeds of European cattle are numerous, and it is watered by the Paraiba and Mangarape.

PARAIBA, a large river of Paraiba, which forms the great bay of Paraiba. It has a length of about 250 miles, but, in summer, its bed is quite dry about 60 miles from its mouth.

PARAIBA, a large river of Brazil, in the province of Rio Janeiro, which, after a course of about 500 miles, enters the Atlantic in lat. 21° 31′ 30″ S.—Also the name of a river of Guiana, which joins the Orinoco.

PARAMARIBO, pa-ra-ma'-re-bo, a town of Guiana, and the capital of Dutch Guiana, on the Surinam river, about 8 miles from its mouth in the Atlantic. It is built in the form of an oblong square, with the streets perfectly straight, and lined with orange, shaddock, tamarind, and lemon trees, which appear in everlasting bloom. They are finely paved with gravel. The houses, with few exceptions, consist of fine timber, and are, in general, elegantly furnished. The town-hall is an elegant building, covered with tiles. Here the different courts are held, and, underneath, are the prisons for European delinquents. There are, besides, various churches and a large military hospital. There is a noble road for shipping, the river before the town being about a mile in breadth. The town is protected by Fort Zelandia, in which the governor resides. Pop. 20,000, mostly blacks. Lat. 5° 49′ N. Lon. 55° 22′ W.

PARAMATTA, pa'-ra-măt'-ta, a town of New South Wales, at the head of Port Jackson harbour, 15 miles from Sydney. The river for the last seven or eight miles is only navigable for boats of twelve or fifteen tons burden. This town is built along a small fresh-water stream, which falls into the river. The public buildings are the church, the government-house, and an orphan hospital. Pop. 4,500.—Steamers and coaches daily ply between it and Sydney.

PARAMITHIA, pa-ra-mĭth'-i-a, a town of Albania, 19 miles from Joannina. Pop. 5,000.

PARAMO, Louis de, pa-ra-mo', a Spanish inquisitor, who published at Madrid, in 1598, a curious work, called the "Holy Office," a history of the Inquisition, written with great candour and accuracy. D. about 1619.

PARANA, pa-ra-na', a large river of S. America, and one of the principal which contribute to form the Plata. It rises by numerous heads in the Brazilian province of Minas Geraes, and after a course of 2,000 miles, in which it has joined the Paraguay, and next the Uruguay, it forms the estuary of the Plata.

PARANAGUA, pa'-ra-na-gwa', a maritime town of Brazil, 170 miles from Santos. It is mostly built of stone, and has an excellent port. Pop. 7,000.

PARATI, pa-ra'-te, a seaport of Brazil, on the W. coast of the Bay of Angra, 135 miles from San Paulo. It has several churches and a grammar-school, with an extensive commerce. Pop. 7,000.

PARCÆ, or FATES, par'-se, in the Grecian mythology, three powerful goddesses, who presided over the birth and life of mankind. They were three in number, and were named Clotho, Lachesis, and Atropos. Clotho, the youngest of the sisters, presided over the moment of man's birth, and held a distaff in her hand; Lachesis spun out all the events and actions of man's life; and Atropos, the eldest of the three, cut the thread of human life with a pair of scissors. The power of the Parcæ was great and extensive: by some they were held as subject to none of the gods, except Jupiter; while others assert that even Jupiter was obedient to their commands. According to the greater number of the poets, they were the arbiters of the life and death of mankind, and whatever good or evil befell humanity, was said to proceed immediately from the Fates. Their worship was established in Greece, and although they were inexorable, statues and temples were raised to them. They received the same worship as the Furies, and their votaries sacrificed to them yearly a black sheep. The Parcæ were generally represented as three old women, with chaplets made of wool, and interwoven with the flowers of narcissus. One held a distaff, another the spindle, and the third was armed with scissors, with which she cut the thread which her sisters had spun. Their dress is differently represented. By some, also, they were called the secretaries of heaven, and the keepers of the archives of eternity.

PARCÉ, par'-sai, a town of France, in the department of Sarthe, 12 miles from La Flèche. Pop. 2,500.

PARCHIM, or PARCHEN, par'-ken, a town of Germany, on the Elde, 20 miles from Schwerin. Manf. Woollen cloth, leather, chicory, straw hats, and tobacco. Pop. 6,500.

PARDIES, Ignatius Gaston, par'-de, an eminent French mathematician, who entered the order of the Jesuits at the age of 16, and afterwards became professor of rhetoric in the College Louis-le-Grand at Paris. His principal works are, "Dissertation on the Nature and Course of Comets," "Discourse on Local Motion," "Elements of Geometry," and "Discourse on the Knowledge of Beasts." D. 1636; D. 1673.

PARDOE, Miss Julia, par'-do, a modern English authoress, who, in her 19th year, composed a volume of verse, and shortly afterwards an historical romance, entitled, "Lord Morcar of Hereward," the action of which took place in the time of William the Conqueror. Her health being delicate, she was sent to Portugal, where she remained for some time, and, upon returning to England, produced a series of tales and sketches of the country, in a little work entitled, "Traits and Traditions of Portugal," which ran through several editions. Encouraged by this success, she resolved to devote herself to literature, and produced, in quick succession, "Speculation," and "The Mardens and the Daventrys." During the terrible reign of the cholera at Constantinople, in 1835, Miss Pardoe was a resident of the city. Of that sojourn the literary fruits were, "The City of the Sultan," "The Romance of the Harem," and "The Beauties of the Bosphorus." "The River and the Desert" was also the result of her Eastern experiences. An historical sketch of Hungary and its institutions subsequently emanated from her pen, under the title of "The City of the Magyar." Some historical works of a more ambitious character succeeded; the most important of which were, "Louis XIV.; or, the Court of France in the 17th century;" "The Life of Francis I.," and "The Life of Marie de Medici." These last, however, met with less success than her works of imagination, and to that path Miss Pardoe afterwards returned, producing "The Confessions of a Pretty Woman," "The Rival Beauties," "The Jealous Wife," &c. As a writer, she was always graceful and lively; but neither her invention or imagination was powerful enough to enable her to soar above the ordinary paths of novelists. B. at Beverley, Yorkshire, 1806.

Paré, Ambrose, pa'-rai, the most celebrated of the old French surgeons. After completing his education, he went into Italy with the French army, and served during several campaigns, gaining so great a reputation that, in 1552, Henry II. appointed him his surgeon. Though a Protestant, he was afterwards surgeon to Francis II., Charles IX., and Henry III.; and, at the time of the massacre of St. Bartholomew, Brantôme tells us that Charles IX. saved him by shutting him up in his own bedroom. Paré made several discoveries in anatomy, and wrote some esteemed books on surgery. B. 1509; D. 1590.

Paredes, Diego Garcia de, pa'-rai-dais, an eminent Spanish general, usually styled "the Spanish Bayard." Entering the army at an early age, he fought gallantly against the Moors at Baza, Velez, and Malaga, in 1485. When the Moorish war was concluded by the capture of Granada, in 1492, he sought further distinction on the battle-fields of Italy. He was appointed to a high rank in the army of Pope Alexander VI., and served with distinction under the papal banner during seven years. In 1501 he assisted at the capture of Cephalonia from the Turks, was taken prisoner, but contrived to effect his escape. During the war between the French and Spaniards in Naples, Paredes was one of the most undaunted and skilful soldiers in the ranks of the latter power. At the battle of Cerignola, he commanded the Spanish centre, and, during the fight, contended alone against a number of French knights until his own men came up. Some assert that he subsequently cruised in the Levant as a corsair; but this is doubtful. At the famous battle of Pavia, however, he greatly signalized himself, and, it is said, assisted in taking Francis I. prisoner. B. in Spain, 1466; D. 1530.

Paredon, pa'-re-don, an island of the W. Indies, lying to the N. of Cuba, in the old Bahama channel. Ext. 10 miles long, with a breadth of 2. Pop. Unascertained. Lat. 22° 25′ N. Lon. 78° 8′ W.

Pareja, Juan de, pa'-rai-ha, an eminent Spanish painter, who was a West-Indian half-caste, and became the slave of Diego Velasquez. In the absence of his master, Pareja laboured assiduously in drawing and copying his works; but secretly, for fear of giving offence. Philip IV., king of Spain, coming one day to visit Velasquez, Pareja contrived to place in his way one of his own pictures, with which his majesty was extremely pleased. The slave then fell on his knees, and besought the king to ask his master to forgive him. Philip not only did this, but obtained him his liberty. The faithful Pareja, however, would not quit Velasquez, and, after his death, continued to serve his daughter. His portraits are very fine, and were so close a copy of his master's style, that they could not be distinguished from them. B. in the West Indies, 1610; D. 1670.

Parennin, Dominic, pa-ren'-năi, a celebrated Jesuit, who was a missionary in China, where he was greatly esteemed by the emperor Kang-Hi, for whom he translated into Chinese several articles upon scientific subjects. A difference arising between the Chinese and Russian courts, Parennin was charged to negotiate a reconciliation, which he effected. After his death, his remains were magnificently interred by order of the emperor. In Duhalde's "China" are several curious maps and letters of this learned man. B. at Bussy, France, 1665; D. at Pekin, 1741.

Parent, Anthony, pa'-rawng, an eminent French mathematician, who was educated for the law, which he renounced for science, and became a member of the Academy, whose Memoirs he enriched with many valuable papers. His most important works are "Mathematical and Philosophical Researches," "Theoretical and Practical Arithmetic," "Elements of Mechanics and Natural Philosophy." B. at Paris, 1666; D. 1716.

Parent-Duchatelet, Alexander John Baptist, doo-shat'-e-lai, an eminent French physician and writer, who, upon the conclusion of his medical studies, commenced the practice of his profession at Paris, in 1814. After spending some years in that pursuit, his attention was directed to questions concerning the public health. With great devotedness to this task, he laboured during fifteen years, and through his exertions, some of the most useful and efficient reforms in the sanitary arrangements of Paris were due. He wrote extensively on subjects connected with the public health, and, in 1824, produced a great work upon the common sewers of the French capital, and another upon the cholera. B. at Paris, 1790; D. at the same city, 1836.

Parenzo, pa-rain-dzo', a town of Austria, on a peninsula in the Adriatic, with a fine cathedral, a good harbour, and a trade in wine. Pop. 2,500.

Parga, par'-ga, a seaport on the coast of Albania, opposite to the S. point of the island of Corfu, 35 miles from Arta. It stands near the mouth of a river, the Acheron of the ancients. Pop. 4,000.—Parga, being independent of Ali Pasha, the tyrant of Albania, afforded an asylum to refugees from his violence. He accordingly marched against it, but the inhabitants defended themselves, and received assistance from the British in Corfu. It was afterwards, however, surrendered to Ali, on his agreeing to pay a pecuniary indemnity to those of the inhabitants who should refuse to remain after a change of government. The evacuation took place in 1819, and most of the inhabitants removed to the Ionian islands.

Paria, pa-re-a', the capital of a province in Buenos Ayres, 210 miles from La Plata. Lat. 18° 50′ S. Lon. 68° 20′ W.

Paria, Gulf of, an inlet of the Caribbean Sea, S. America, lying between the island of Trinidad and the mainland. From these two lands on the north, two points jut out, with two islands intervening, which leave four openings, called the Mouths of the Dragon, by which the gulf communicates with the Caribbean Sea. This part is about 13 miles wide, and contains several islands. The length of the gulf is estimated at 100 miles.

Parimé Sierra, pa'-re-mai, a mountain system of South America, inclosed by the great band of the Orinoco river, and connected on the E. with the Sierra Pacaraima. It lies between lat. 3° and 8° N., and lon. 58° and 68° W.

Parini, Joseph, pa-re'-ne, an eminent Italian poet, whose pursuit of knowledge in early life was performed under considerable difficulty. In his 23rd year he produced a volume of poems, which attracted the notice of the Borromei family, in which he became tutor. His next work was the first portion of a poem entitled "Il Giorno," a famous piece in Italian literature. This gained him the patronage of Count Firmian, the Austrian minister in Lombardy, and through his influence Parini subsequently became professor of eloquence in the college of the Brera at Milan. When Bonaparte entered Milan at a later period, he caused him to be chosen magistrate; but the poet soon retired from the office. B. 1729; D. at Milan, 1799.

Paris, păr'-is (Fr. pa'-re), the capital of France, and one of the finest cities in the world, situate on a plain on the banks of the Seine, and two islands in its centre. It is surrounded by a great circular wall, erected in 1785, which has, with recent fortifications, a circuit of 22 miles. The oldest and worst-built parts of the city are to the eastward; viz., the insulated spot called the Cité, the suburb of St. Antoine, and the quarter of the Marais. From the Cité the streets were, in the course of ages, extended N. towards the Temple, and S. towards the Pantheon, but without acquiring width or elegance, until the labours of the builder were extended to the Tuileries N., and the suburb of St. Germain S. Of the streets adjoining the Cité, whether to the north or south, the houses are of an inconvenient height; several of them are long and narrow. The suburb of St. Germain contains la rue de l'Université, la rue des Augustins, la rue de Bourbon, and a number of other streets straight and well paved. The suburbs of Paris still preserve their names, but they are now united to the main part of the city, in the same way as Westminster and Southwark are to London. Formerly, the streets of Paris were lighted by reflecting lamps, suspended at a great height in the middle of the street, but now gas has been introduced. The Boulevards, occupying the space appropriated to the defence of the town in former ages, have been converted, with a large number of small and ill-built streets, into one spacious and magnificent street, which almost encircles the capital, from 200 to 300 feet wide, and planted with trees for a great length. Paris contains various squares, of which the finest is the Place Vendôme, an octagonal space, surrounded by elegant stone buildings, and having in its centre a triumphal bronze column erected by Napoleon I.; the Place Royale, a square in the E. of Paris. The others are the Place des Victoires, a central and busy spot; the Place de Grève, the scene of many revolutionary executions, in the centre of Paris. The Place du Carousel is a spacious oblong between the Tuileries and the Louvre, and having the long picture-gallery on its S. side. The Place de Louis XV. is situate to the W. of the garden of the Tuileries. The Champ de Mars is an oblong park on the S.W. of Paris, extending from the military school to the river, and bordered on each side by several rows of trees. The Palais Royal, situate towards the centre of Paris, forms a large pile of building, entered in three distinct parts by as many portals or archways, and bearing less the appearance of a princely residence than of a place of business. The façade fronting the rue St. Honoré was built in 1781, and is ornamented with Doric and Ionic pillars, surmounted by a finely-sculptured fronton. At the back of these courts, and at a distance from the main building, is the garden of the palace, a spacious oblong, nearly 250 yards in length, having in its central part a basin with jets d'eau, and at either end a shrubbery. The Seine, flowing from E. to W., intersects Paris nearly in the middle, and is crossed by the Pont Neuf, built in the 17th century; the Pont Royal, near the Tuileries, built by Louis XIV.; and the Pont de Louis XVI., finished in 1790. Lower down the river, and opposite the Champ de Mars, is the Pont de Jena, or des Invalides, a stone bridge; and, higher up, opposite the Jardin des Plantes, is the Pont d'Austerlitz, an iron bridge; both elegant structures, and both erected under Bonaparte. Lastly comes the Pont des Arts, opposite to the Louvre, a neat but slight iron bridge, appropriated to foot-passengers. Within the limits of the city, the Seine is crossed by no fewer than 23 bridges in all. The public buildings are numerous. The Tuileries, long the residence of the kings of France, and the scene of many of its most remarkable events, was begun in the 16th century, and finished, after various interruptions, in the 17th. It is a noble and venerable structure. The Louvre was formerly nearly a quarter of a mile to the E. of the Tuileries; but Napoleon III. carried out the idea of the junction of these two palaces, and they now form one vast building. The form of the Louvre is square, with a large interior court, 400 by 400 feet. It was finished in the age of Louis XIV., and its magnificent halls are filled with objects of taste and art. The palace of the Luxembourg, situate in the S. of Paris, is distinguished by the symmetry of its proportions. The Palais Bourbon, on the left bank of the Seine, on the W. side of Paris, is a splendid building. The other buildings worthy of note are the Hôtel des Invalides, a large and elegant structure with a dome, in the centre of which is a church, containing the tombs of Napoleon I., Vauban, and Turenne; the Military School, which forms one end of the Champ de Mars; the Palace of the Legion of Honour, nearly opposite to the Tuileries; the Bourse, in rue Vivienne; the Bibliothèque Impériale, containing upwards of 800,000 volumes; and the Pantheon, occupying the highest part of Paris, and appropriated to the remains of distinguished Frenchmen. On the same side of the Seine, but more towards the centre of Paris, stand the buildings of the Institute and the Mint, or Hôtel des Monnaies. Among the old structures, the principal are the Hôtel de Ville and the Palais de Justice; and, in the busy part of the town, near the street of Montmartre, there is an elegant and extensive exchange. Notre Dame, the metropolitan church, is a large Gothic building, situate in the Isle de la Cité. There are, besides, the church of St. Sulpice and the church of St. Eustache. The other churches are in general well built, but have nothing striking. The mansions, or, as they are termed, the hotels, of great families, are spread all along the W. part of the town, particularly in the suburb of St. Germain, and correspond to the town residences of the English nobility. The private houses are considerably higher than the generality of those in London, having frequently six and seven stories. The most striking of the public monuments is the column of the Place Vendôme erected by Bonaparte, to commemorate his successes in Germany in 1805, and already noticed. It is a brazen pillar, with a diameter of 12 feet and a height of 133; its form an imitation of Trajan's pillar at Rome. After this comes the triumphal arch in the Place du Carousel, near the Tuileries, erected in 1806; the Arc de Triomphe de l'Etoile, outside of the barrier of Neuilly; the Porte, or gate of St. Denis, a large triumphal arch, erected by Louis XIV.; and the Porte St. Martin; the column of Luxor (ancient Thebes), transported from that place, and now erected in the Place de la Concorde. The public fountains of Paris are extremely numerous, and several of them are deserving of high admiration. The hospitals of Paris are also numerous and well-managed. The largest is the Hôtel Dieu; after it come those of Charité, St. Antoine, Beaujon, Des Enfans Malades, and several others. Distinct from these are the hospices, or establishments where the aged, the infirm, the lunatics, are received and supported, on paying a small sum. The prisons of Paris, also, are much amended in their management since the beginning of the present century. The catacombs are subterraneous quarries, excavated in the course of ages for the building of Paris, and converted, in the latter part of the 18th century, into a great burying repository. They stretch along the S. part of the city, are of great extent, and, being easily traversed with the aid of a guide, form a prominent, though certainly not an attractive, object of attention to travellers. In literary, scientific, and educational institutions, Paris is not excelled by any other city in the world. The principal of these are the College of France, with 28 professors; the University, Academy of Paris, and various societies of medicine, of agriculture, of sciences and arts, &c.; the Athénée, the school of medicine, an elegant and capacious building, has halls for public lectures, large and generally crowded. At the Jardin des Plantes are classes for botany, zoology, geology, mineralogy, chemistry, &c.: to these are to be added the school for painting, sculpture, and architecture. There are also a number of celebrated schools for particular professions. The military school is for the education of youths, generally the sons of officers who have fallen in the service of their country. The École Polytechnique is for the education of engineers. The veterinary school at Alfort, near Paris, has classes on zoology, rural economy, the care of animals, &c. With libraries Paris is also well supplied: there are 32 altogether, and the Great National is a magnificent institution. It is divided into five sections:—1. Printed works and pamphlets, of which there are nearly 1,500,000, including duplicates. 2. Manuscripts, of which there are about 130,000 volumes. 3. Medals and antiquities. 4. Prints. 5. Maps and charts. Amidst the collections of interest to artists, those of the Louvre hold, unquestionably, the first rank. Of the ground floor of that spacious building, a great part is appropriated to statues and other specimens of sculpture, ancient and modern, distributed in spacious halls, and arranged with much taste. From these a magnificent staircase leads to the gallery of paintings, a collection still so large and so valuable, that the spectator has difficulty in believing that it can ever have been more rich or more splendid. Next to these, the object of greatest interest in Paris is the museum of natural history, in the buildings belonging to the Jardin des Plantes. Next comes the Jardin des Plantes itself, exhibiting, in miniature, groups of plants of almost every region in the globe; also a collection of animals of the most different latitudes,—lions, elephants, bears, &c. In a large building in the central part of Paris is the Museum of French Monuments, a collection of statues and other sculptured ornaments. The Conservatory of the Arts and Trades is appropriated to mechanical improvements, and contains models of almost all ingenious machines. The chief theatres are the Opéra, or Academy of Music, the Théâtre Français, Opéra Comique, and the Odéon; but the others are also much frequented, and conducted with taste and ingenuity. Of the public gardens and walks, the finest and most frequented are those of the Tuileries, which extend, in a beautiful oblong, to the westward of the palace. On the S. side of Paris are the gardens of the Luxembourg, less regular, but scarcely less attractive. The Champs Elysées afford very pleasant walks; the Boulevards, in the summer evenings, present a strikingly animated scene; and the beautiful Bois de Boulogne, leading to the palace of St. Cloud, forms one of the most charming promenades in the world. Manf. These consist chiefly of articles of taste or nice workmanship; such as jewellery, watches, clocks, porcelain, cabinet ware, mathematical instruments, silks, artificial flowers, plate-glass, and ornamental articles in bronze; also cottons, carpets, &c. The well-known manufactory of the Gobelins exhibits imitations of beautiful pictures, in webs of the finest silk and worsted. That of Sèvres is equally noted for the richness of its porcelain. Paris is, besides, almost exclusively the seat of the wholesale bookselling and printing business of France. Its commerce is greatly facilitated by the navigation of the Seine, its connection with many canals, and by railways to many of the principal towns in France. Pop. about 1,300,000. Lat. 48° 50′ 13″ N. Lon. 2° 20′ 24″ E.—Paris was originally a Roman station, and, in the year 360, was the winter quarters of Julian. In 508 it was constituted the capital of the kingdom. It was surrounded with walls in the end of the 12th century, and, after the Revolution, it received many embellishments. The new line of fortifications was begun in 1840, and finished in 1848. Francis I. was the first French monarch who endeavoured to render Paris worthy of being the capital of France; under Henry IV. it increased, and to Mary de' Medici and to Cardinal Richelieu it owed much of its progress. Louis XIV. greatly embellished it. Napoleon I. was anxious that it should eclipse all other cities, and Napoleon III. has vigorously carried out a system of well-considered improvements.

PARIS, the name of several townships in the United States, none of them with a population above 4,500.

PARIS, Matthew, an English historian, was a monk of the order of Benedictines, at St. Albans. He was a man of great knowledge and integrity, and was employed by the pope in reforming the monasteries of Norway, which service he discharged with wisdom and zeal. His principal work is a "History of England from the Conquest to the Death of Henry III." It was published by Archbishop Parker, at London, in 1571. B. at the close of the 12th century; D. at St. Albans, 1259.

PARIS, John Ayrton, an eminent English physician, who commenced the study of medicine in his 14th year, at the Westminster Hospital. He next passed to Caius College, Cambridge, and there graduated M.D. In his 23rd year he became physician to Westminster Hospital, but subsequently went to Penzance, in Cornwall, where he remained in the exercise of an extensive practice until the year 1817. About two years later, he published a "Treatise on Diet," which, although superseded at the present time by works embodying the discoveries of eminent chemists, was a valuable treatise at the period of its production, and attracted much attention from the public. Upon the death of Sir Henry Halford, in 1844, he became president of the Royal College of Physicians. Among many other works, he was the author of the "Life of Sir Humphrey Davy," and "Philosophy in sport made Science in earnest." B. at Cambridge, 1785; D. in London, 1856.

PARIS, Counts of, a French title created by Charlemagne in the 8th century. After remaining extinct during eight centuries, it was revived by Louis Philippe, and bestowed upon his grandson, son of the duke of Orleans.

PARIS, also called Alexander, one of the most celebrated characters of the mythic age, was the son of Priam, king of Troy, by Hecuba, and, says Homer, was destined, even before his birth, to become the ruin of his country. When his mother, in her pregnancy, had dreamed that she should bring forth a torch which would set fire to her palace, the soothsayers foretold her offspring would prove the destruction of Troy. Priam, to prevent so great an evil, ordered his slave Archelaus to destroy the child as soon as born. The slave, touched with humanity, spared his life, but exposed him on Mount Ida, where the shepherds found him, and educated him as their own. Paris gave early proofs of courage, and from his care in protecting the flocks of Mount Ida against the wild beasts, he obtained the name of Alexander (helper or defender). Here he gained the favour of Œnone, a nymph of Ida, whom he married; but their conjugal peace was soon disturbed. At the marriage of Peleus and Thetis, the goddess of discord, not being invited to the entertainment, showed her displeasure, by throwing among the gods, at the celebration of the nuptials, a golden apple, on which were written the words "To be given to the fairest." All the goddesses claimed it as their own; but only Juno, Venus, and Minerva were allowed to dispute the right to the apple. The gods appointed Paris to adjudge the prize of beauty. The goddesses appeared before him without any ornament, but each tried to influence his judgment. Juno promised him a kingdom; Minerva, military glory; and Venus, the fairest woman in the world for his wife. Paris at length adjudged the prize to Venus. This decision of Paris in favour of Venus drew upon him and his family the resentment of the two other goddesses. From some subsequent circumstances, the birth and the manner of preservation of Paris were discovered, and Priam finally acknowledged him as his son, forgetful of the alarming dream which had influenced him to meditate his death. Paris then equipped a fleet, with the pretended motive of rescuing Hesione, whom Hercules had carried away, and obliged to marry Telamon. He recollected that he was to have Helen, the fairest woman of the age, whom Venus had promised him. On these grounds, he visited Sparta, the residence of Helen, who had married Menelaus, and was received kindly; but he abused the hospitality of Menelaus, and while the king was absent in Crete, carried off Helen to Troy, where Priam received her in his palace. Upon this, all Greece took up arms. Agamemnon was chosen general of the combined forces, and a regular war was begun. Paris, meanwhile, armed himself, with his brothers, to oppose the enemy; but is said to have fought with little courage, and at the sight of Menelaus he retired from the front of the army. In a combat with Menelaus, he would have perished, had not Venus protected him from the resentment of his adversary. He nevertheless wounded, in another battle, Machaon, Euriphilus, and Diomedes, and according to some, killed the great Achilles. (See ACHILLES.) The death of Paris is differently related. Some of the poets relate that he fell by one of the arrows of Philoctetes, which had formerly belonged to Hercules, and was tended in his last moments by his wife, the nymph Œnone.

PARIS-DUVERNEY, Joseph, a celebrated French financier in the 18th century, who reduced the national debt of France by nearly one half. In 1724 he proposed a measure for the abolition of pauperism, and afterwards suggested to Louis XV. the marriage with Maria Leczinska. In 1726 he was imprisoned in the Bastille; but afterwards regained his liberty, and was reinstated in the favour of the court. This capitalist helped both Voltaire and Beaumarchais to make considerable fortunes.

PARK, Mungo, pärk, a distinguished African traveller, was the son of a substantial Scotch farmer, who gave him a good education. Mungo, while a boy at the parochial school of Selkirk, was indefatigable in his application, and was always at the head of his class. "Even at that age," says his biographer, "he was remarked for being silent, studious, and thoughtful; but some sparks of latent ambition occasionally broke forth, and traces might be discovered of that ardent and adventurous turn of mind which distinguished him in after-life." In his 15th year he was apprenticed to a surgeon at Selkirk, and remained in that capacity for three years. In 1789 he went to the university of Edinburgh, and after completing his professional education there, repaired to London, where, through the introduction of Sir Joseph Banks, he obtained an appointment as assistant surgeon to the Worcester, East Indiaman. In this vessel he sailed for Sumatra in 1792, and upon his return, in the following year, he published an account of some new fishes which he had observed upon that coast. Soon afterwards, Sir Joseph Banks introduced him to the African Association, by whom Park was engaged to solve a problem which was engaging the minds of geographers; viz., the existence and course of the river Niger. In 1795 he left England, and reached Pisania, some 200 miles up the river Gambia, at which place he stayed several months, acquiring the Mandingo language. Setting out at length, he penetrated as far as Yarra, a frontier town of Ludamar, where he was detained by the chief for five months; at the end of which time he made his escape, with a horse, a few articles of clothing, and a pocket compass. Thus scantily equipped, he pushed on to Sego, and thence explored the river Johba down to Saba; after which he proceeded as far as Kamalia, a Mandingo town 500 miles from any European settlement. (See AFRICA.) There he was prostrated by fever, which passed away in a month; but it was five more before Park could obtain the means of travelling to Pisania. This last place was reached, however, after an absence of nineteen months, and he was there received by a friend "as one risen from the dead." After his return to London, where he was warmly received by the scientific public, he commenced the preparation of a narrative of his travels. The work was completed and published in 1799, and was highly successful. In 1801 he commenced practice as a surgeon at Peebles, in Scotland; having in the meanwhile married the daughter of his old master at Selkirk. In 1805 the government sent him to Africa, in command of an expedition, the object of which was to prove whether the Congo and the Niger were one stream. Park proposed to cross from the Gambia to the Niger, and then to sail down that river to the ocean. In May, 1805, Park and his party, consisting of his brother-in-law, a surgeon, a draughtsman, five artisans from the royal dockyards, thirty-five privates of the Royal African corps, under the command of Lieutenant Martyn, and a Mandingo guide, left Pisania. After penetrating beyond the Gambia, the party went on to Foulah Dougou, by which time eleven white men had died. In an eight days' march from Foulah Dougou to Sego, twenty-six men were lost by the rains, damps, &c. Upon his departure from Sansanding, Park wrote to the colonial secretary: "I am sorry to say that of forty-four Europeans who left the Gambia in perfect health, five only are at present alive; viz., three soldiers (one deranged in his mind), Lieutenant Martyn, and myself. We had no contest whatever with the natives, nor was any one of us killed by wild animals or any other accidents. Your lordship will recollect that I always spoke of the rainy season with horror, as being extremely fatal to Europeans; and our journey will furnish a melancholy proof of it." After leaving Sansanding, Park proceeded towards Haoussa, and, from that time, neither he nor his companions were ever again seen. Their fate was narrated by their guide, who declared that, after Park had quitted Yaouri, the chief of that place falsely stated that the white men had gone away without leaving the usual present. The king became enraged at this, and put the guide, who had been left behind, in prison, and sent a number of armed men to intercept Park and his companions at the narrows of the river. When the guide obtained his release, he gathered from a slave who had been with Park, that the white men's boat had been drawn into a rapid whilst they were endeavouring to effect their escape from a party of the natives who were attacking them. Mungo Park was possessed of many qualities calculated to raise him to high distinction as a traveller, had his career not been so unhappily and so prematurely brought to an end. He was of an athletic frame, had a fair share of scientific knowledge, was cool, courageous, and self-possessed, and, above all, was scrupulously veracious in his observations. D. at Fowlshiels, near Selkirk, Scotland, 1771; D. at Boussa, 1805.

PARKANY, par'-ka-ne, a market-town of Hungary, on the Danube, where, in 1683, the Turks were defeated by the imperialists and the Poles. Pop. 1,400.

PARKE, park, a county of Indiana, U.S. Area, 428 square miles. Pop. 15,000.

PARKER, Matthew, par'-ker, an eminent English prelate, who was educated in Corpus-Christi College, Cambridge, of which he became fellow. Through the interest of Anne Boleyn, he was made chaplain to Henry VIII., and, in the succeeding reign, was chosen master of his college; but in that of Mary he was deprived of his preferments. On the accession of Elizabeth, Dr. Parker was preferred to the archbishopric of Canterbury. The archbishop was zealous in promoting the Reformation and in restraining the encroachments of the Puritans. He superintended the improved translation of the Scriptures, called the Bishops' Bible, which was completed in 1568. He was particularly versed in Saxon literature and the early English history, and published an edition of Matthew Paris, a treatise on the Antiquities of the English Church, and other works. B. at Norwich, 1504; D. 1575.

PARKER, Samuel, an English prelate, who received his education at Wadham College, Oxford. His father was a member of the High Court of Justice, and one of the barons of the Exchequer during the Commonwealth; but, at the Restoration, he became king's serjeant-at-law. The son followed his example, by complying with all changes. He was at first a zealous Puritan, but conformed to the Church of England, and obtained preferment. In the reign of James II., he was made, for his servility to the king's arbitrary measures, bishop of Oxford and privy counsellor. He was also constituted president of Magdalen College, in violation of the privileges of that society. He wrote the "History of His Own Time." Andrew Marvell, in his "Rehearsal Transposed," held Parker up to ridicule. The bishop replied, but with little effect. He is said to have contemplated, with James II., the placing of the English church under the authority of the pope. B. at Northampton, 1640; D. at Oxford, 1687.

PARKER, Theodore, an eminent American theologian, who received his education at Cambridge, Massachusetts, and afterwards became pastor of a Unitarian congregation at Roxbury. Between the years 1840—1843, he contributed extensively to the "Christian Examiner," and about 1844, formed a collection of his most important articles, which were published under the title of "Critical and Miscellaneous Writings." He shortly afterwards gave to the public a "Discourse on Matters of Religion," wherein he declared his views relative to the authority of the Church, the infallibility of the Scriptures, and as to the divine attributes of our Saviour. For this expression of his sentiments, the Unitarian communions of Boston rejected him; upon which, he placed himself at the head of a congregation called the Twenty-eighth Congregational Society of Boston. A rationalist minister belonging to no sect, a theoretical politician belonging to no party, his sermons, delivered occasionally to very large congregations, were filled with allusions to every possible topic,—questions of politics or morality, political or domestic economy, war, reform, or slavery. In 1852 he published "Sermons of Theism, Atheism, and popular Theology," and "Discourses, Addresses, and occasional Sermons." His latest works were, "Ten Sermons on Religion," and "Old Age." D. at Lexington, Massachusetts, 1810; D. at Florence, 1859.

PARKER, Sir William, a modern English admiral, who entered the navy at a very early age, and, in 1798, assisted in the attack made upon St. Domingo. In 1801 he obtained post rank; a few years after which, he, with the Amazon frigate, engaged the Belle Poule, in which, after an obstinate fight, he had the advantage. Other acts of bravery—the taking of Ferrol in 1809 particularly—won for him the order of the Bath. In 183( he became rear-admiral, and was sent with an English fleet to the Tagus. Between the years 1834—1841, he acted as lord of the Admiralty, but in the latter yea succeeded Admiral Elliot in the command of the naval operations in China. With the co-operation of Lor Gough, he captured Chusan, Ningpo, and, forcing th entrance of the Yellow river, appeared before Nankin For these services he was created a baronet in 1841 During the revolutions of 1848, he commanded the Mediterranean fleet, and in the autumn of 1849 wa sent with an English fleet to the Dardanelles, to encourage the sultan in his resistance to the demands o Austria and Prussia, with respect to the Hungarian refugees. In 1854 he became port-admiral at Plymouth B. at Almington Hall, Staffordshire, 1781.

PARKER, Richard, an English seaman, who wa the chief of the mutineers at the Nore in 1797. He was a native of Exeter, and had received a good education; after which he entered the navy, and became a midshipman, but was reduced in rank for some misconduct. Having a good address and great fluency of speech, he was chosen principal of the delegates, when the sailors rose on account of their wages and prize money; on which occasion he assumed the comman of the fleet, and was called Admiral Parker. He ruled with great authority for some time, to the alarm of the nation; but when the insurrection was suppressed, he was tried and executed on board the Sandwich, in 1797.

PARKHURST, John, park'-hurst, a learned English divine, who was educated at Cambridge, and afterwards settled at Epsom, in Surrey. He was the intimate friend of Bishop Horne, with whom he shared in admiring the opinions of Hutchinson. He published a Greek and English, and a Hebrew and English lexicon, and wrote an answer to Dr. Priestley, on the Pre-existence of Christ, and a pamphlet against John Wesley. B. at Catcsby, Northamptonshire, 1728; D. at Epsom, Surrey, 1797.

PARMA, Alexander, Duke of. (See FARNESE, Alexander.)

PARMA, Don Philip, Duke of, par'-ma, was the fourth son of Philip V. of Spain, and married Elizabeth of France, daughter of Louis XV. By the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, which terminated the war of the Austrian Succession, the duchy of Parma was assigned to him. B. 1720; D. 1765.

PARMA, a former duchy of the N. of Italy, bounded on the N. by Lombardy, E. by Modena, and S. and W. by Tuscany. Area, 2,766 square miles. Desc. Partly mountainous and partly level, and fertile in the plains. Rivers. The principal are the Po, the Taro, the Trebia, the Lenza, and a number of smaller streams, all taking their rise in the Apennines, and discharging themselves into the Po. Climate. Temperate and healthy, except on the banks of the Po. Pro. Maize, wheat, fruit, tobacco, wine, and silk, in the plains; in the hilly region, corn; and the pastures and forests are extensive. Chestnuts, and cheese from the milk of goats, are the principal articles of food among the inhabitants. Manf. Silk fabrics, earthenware, glass, paper, straw hats, and gunpowder. Pop. about 590,000. Lat. between 44° 19′ 30″ and 45° 7′ 45″ N. Lon. between 9° 23′ and 10° 40′ E.—Under the French, this duchy formed most part of the department Taro. In 1860 it voted for unity with the rest of Italy.

PARMA, a city of Italy, and the capital of the duchy of the same name, divided by the Parma into two unequal parts, 72 miles from Milan. Its circumference is about three miles, inclosed by walls, and entered by five gates. The streets are broad, straight, and tolerably clean. In the centre of the town is a handsome square, surrounded with arcades or piazzas. The cathedral, built in the Gothic style of architecture, is remarkable chiefly for its dome, painted by Correggio. The ducal palace is not a separate edifice, but an extensive range of buildings, extending, without plan or taste, along a square and adjoining streets. Connected with it is the great theatre, an edifice on the plan of the ancients. The university was suppressed in 1831; but there is still a school of four faculties. The museum, however, contains several masterpieces of Correggio, Parmegiano, Schidone, and others. There are, besides, numerous scientific establishments and military hospitals. Manf. Silk, and, to a small extent, hats and fustians. Pop. 42,000. Lat. 44° 48′ 7″ N. Lon. 10° 20′ 8″ E. —Parma was founded by the ancient Etrurians, and has never changed its name.

PARMENIDES of Elis, par-men'-i-dees, a Greek philosopher, and the disciple of Xenophanes. He asserted the rotundity of the earth, which he placed in the centre of the system. He also maintained that heat and cold were the principles of all things. In metaphysics, he held that ideas are real, and have no dependence on the will. Xenophanes composed his system in verse, fragments of which have been published by Stephens. Flourished about the 5th century B.C.

PARMENIO, par-mē'-ni-o, a celebrated Macedonian general under Philip and Alexander, who contributed to the victories of the Granicus and Issus, and served with fidelity until advanced in years. After the battle of Arbela, Parmenio was appointed governor of Media; but his son Philotas having been accused of conspiring against the king's life, was put to the torture, and stoned to death. Orders were next sent to the subordinates of Parmenio to put him to death, which was done by Cleander, one of his officers, 329 B.C.

PARMENTIER, John, par-man'-ts-ai, a French navigator, who was the first who conducted vessels to the coast of Brazil. He was well skilled in astronomy, and drew several good maps. D. at Dieppe, 1494; D. at Sumatra, 1543.

PARMENTIER, James, a French historical and portrait painter, who settled in England, and resided chiefly in Yorkshire; and executed, among other works, the altar-piece of St. Peter's, at Leeds. B. 1658; D. 1730.

PARMIGIANO. (See MAZZUOLI FRANCISCO.)

PARNAHAIBA, par'-na-ha'-e-ba, a town of Brazil, on the bank of a river of the same name, near its mouth. It is an entrepôt for leather and cotton. Pop. 10,000. —The RIVER, after a course of 700 miles, enters the Atlantic by several mouths, in lat. 2° 50′ S., lon. 41° 35′ W.

PARNASSUS, par-nas'-sus, a famous mountain of Greece, in Phocis, to the N.W. of Mount Helicon. Height, 8,060 feet. Lat. 38° 35′ 57″ N. Lon. 22° 27′ 30″ E. —This mountain is celebrated as being the seat of the Muses, for its Corycian cave, and its Castalian stream, which runs between it and a neighbouring peak.

PARNELL, Thomas, par-nel', an Irish poet and divine, who was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, where he took his degree of M.A. and entered into orders. He obtained a living in Ireland, and the archdeaconry of Clogher. He was the friend and correspondent of Pope, Swift, Gay, Arbuthnot, and other eminent wits of the time of Queen Anne. Dr. Parnell wrote the Life of Homer for Pope's translation. His poems were published in one volume; the principal is that entitled the "Hermit." He also wrote some papers in the "Spectator." B. at Dublin, 1679; D. at Chester, 1717.

PARNY, Evariste Désiré Desforges, par'-ne, a French poet, usually styled "the Tibullus of France." He was destined for the church, but entered the army, became captain of dragoons, and, as aide-de-camp, accompanied the governor-general of the French East Indies to Pondicherry. In 1786 he quitted the military service and retired to an estate in France, where he gave himself up to depicting, in verse, an all-absorbing passion for a young and beautiful creole lady. On her side, however, the attachment was of an evanescent nature; for she shortly afterwards married a planter, who had more money than the poet. Parny's chief works were included in a collection of the French classics made by Lefevre, in 1827. B. in the Isle of Bourbon, 1753; D. in France, 1814.

PAROS, pa'-ros, an island in the central part of the Grecian archipelago, to the W. of Naxos. Area, 100 square miles. Desc. Mountainous, but tolerably fertile, and in some places well cultivated. Pro. Cotton, corn, wine, fruit, and vegetables. In ancient times, Paros owed its chief celebrity to its marble, so famed for its whiteness and solidity. Pop. 6,000. Lat. of Mount St. Elias, 37° N. Lon. 25° 11′ E.—Port Nassau, in this place, is one of the best harbours in the archipelago.

PARR, Catherine, par, sixth wife of Henry VIII., was the daughter of Sir Thomas Parr, and received, according to the custom of that age, a learned education. She was a friend of the Reformation, on which account Bishop Gardiner and other zealots of the Romish church endeavoured to effect her ruin; but, by her prudence, she preserved the king's favour till his death. In 1547 she married Sir Thomas Seymour, lord admiral of England, who is said to have treated her so ill as to cause her death. She wrote Prayers, Meditations, and other religious pieces. D. 1548.

PARR, Thomas, a Shropshire peasant, who lived to the age of 152 years and 9 months. At the age of 100 he did penance for an illegitimate child, and at 120 he married a second wife, by whom he had issue. In 1635 he was brought to London by Lord Arundel, and introduced at court to King Charles I.; but the change of air, and mode of living, particularly drinking wine, occasioned his death the same year.

PARR, Samuel, a learned English divine, who was destined for the profession of surgery; but a decided inclination for the study of the ancient classics induced his father to send him to Cambridge, where he pursued a very brilliant career, which was, however, cut short by the death of his parent, in 1767. He next became assistant in Harrow school, and after the death of the master, Dr. Sumner, offered himself as candidate for the appointment. He was unsuccessful, and this led him to retire to Norwich; after which, he, in 1786, settled at a small living in Warwickshire, where the remainder of his life was spent. He was a man of vast learning and strong political views; but, although he left a mass of writings of great erudition, no great work emanated from his brain. B. at Harrow-on-the Hill, 1747; D. 1825.

PARRAS, par'-ras, a town of the Mexican Confederation, near a lake of the same name, 32 miles from Mapimi. Pop. 7,000. Lat. 26° 35′ N. Lon. 105° 12′ W.

PARRET, par'-ret, a river of England, rising near Beaminster, in Dorsetshire, and, after a course of 40 miles, runs into the Bristol Channel at Bridgewater Bay.

PARRHASIUS, par-rai'-se-us, a celebrated Greek painter, who was a native of Ephesus, but became a citizen of Athens, and was the contemporary and rival of Zeuxis. He studied under Socrates; by which means he was enabled to give to his figures the expression of strong passions. In an allegorical picture, he represented the people of Athens with all the distinctive traits of their national character; for which he was crowned "Prince of Painters." Flourished about the 5th century B.C.

PARRHASIUS, John Paul, an eminent grammarian, whose real name was Parisio, which he altered, according to the pedantic custom of the age, to Parrhasius. He was the founder of the Cosentine College in his native city, and taught grammar and rhetoric at Milan with great reputation. Some commentarics upon Horace, Ovid, and Cicero came from his pen. B. at Cosenza, near Naples, 1470; D. 1533.

PARROCEL, Joseph, par'-ro-sel, an eminent French painter and engraver, who studied first under one of his brothers, and afterwards under Bournignon, the famous battle-painter. He was a member of the French Academy of Painting. Parrocel painted portrait, history, and battles; he also engraved in a good style. B. at Brignolls, Provence, 1648; D. 1704.—His son Charles was an excellent painter, a member of the Academy, and depicted the conquests of Louis XV. D. 1752.

PARROCEL, Peter, nephew and pupil of Joseph. He was an historical painter of great merit. D. at Avignon, 1739.

PARRY, par'-re, the name of several capes in Greenland and the Arctic Ocean. Also of a group of islands in the Pacific Ocean. Lat. 27° 41′ 5″ N. Lon. 142° 7′ E.

PARRY, Sir William Edward, an eminent English navigator, who, in 1803, entered the royal navy on board the Ville de Paris flag-ship, of the Channel fleet. After seeing a good deal of service in the Baltic, in the northern seas, and upon the American coast, he became lieutenant, returned to England in 1817, and shortly afterwards was appointed to the command of the Alexander, one of two ships sent out under Captain Ross, for the purpose of ascertaining the probabilities of a north-west passage from the Atlantic to the Pacific. The expedition set sail from the Thames in April, 1818, and, on the 30th of August, in the same year, reached Lancaster Sound, which was found to be free from ice; but, instead of proceeding, Ross retraced his course, and set sail for England. The Admiralty subsequently discovered that Lieutenant Parry's views were totally opposed to those of his late commander; whereupon he was appointed to the command of another expedition, during which he discovered Barrow Strait, Melville Island, Prince Regent's Inlet, and the Wellington Channel. He also gained a reward of £5,000 for penetrating within the Arctic circle. In November, 1820, he reached England, and was soon afterwards promoted to the rank of commander, and created F.R.S., &c. His experiences were given to the world in the following year, in a work entitled "Journal of a Voyage for the Discovery of a North-West Passage," which was produced under the authority of the lords of the Admiralty. In May, 1821, he went out in command of a second expedition to the Arctic regions, during which he discovered the Fury and Hecla Strait, and, after an absence of nearly three years, returned to England. A record of this voyage was given in his work entitled "Journal of a Second Expedition for the Discovery of a North-West Passage." About the same time he received the appointment of acting hydrographer to the Board of Admiralty. In 1824 he again sailed northward as commander of a third expedition, which, however, met with much less success than his former ones. He was absent little more than a year, during which one of the two exploring vessels was wrecked. In 1826 Captain Parry published his third journal, and soon afterwards became hydrographer to the Admiralty. In 1827 he submitted a proposal for reaching the north pole by means of a land expedition in flat-bottomed boats, and was accordingly sent out in command of the Hecla, in 1827. When the expedition reached Treurenberg Bay, on the north coast of Spitzbergen, two flat-bottomed boats were dispatched across the ice, one under the orders of himself, the other under Lieutenant Ross. After undergoing great hardships, the boats were drawn over the ice until the latitude of 82° 45′ was attained,—the nearest point to the pole yet reached. After an absence of 61 days from the ship, the boats returned, and shortly afterwards the Hecla sailed for England. A narrative of this expedition, which closed the labours of Captain Parry in the Arctic regions, was published in 1827, with the title "Narrative of an Attempt to reach the North Pole in Boats fitted for the purpose." In 1829 he went out to Australia as commissioner of the Agricultural Company of that colony, and remained there until the year 1834. Meanwhile he had been created a knight, and, in 1837, was appointed to supervise the packet service between Liverpool and Ireland. Between the years 1837—1846, he acted as comptroller of the steam machinery for the royal navy. In 1852 he was promoted to the rank of rear-admiral of the white, and, in 1853, became lieutenant-governor of Greenwich Hospital, an office he filled until his death. He received the degree of D.C.L. from the university of Oxford at the same time as the gallant Sir John Franklin. B. at Bath, 1790; D. at Ems, Germany, 1855.

PARSEVAL-DESCHENES, Alexander Ferdinand, par'-se-val dai-shain', a modern French admiral, who entered the navy in 1804, and in the following year served on board the Bucentaur, at the battle of Trafalgar. After many years of gallant service, he became rear-admiral in 1840, and six years later attained the grade of vice-admiral; the appointments of maritime prefect at Toulon, inspector-general of the navy at the ports of Toulon, L'Orient, and Cherbourg, following in rapid succession. In 1854 he received the command of the French Baltic fleet, and, together with the English armament under Sir Charles Napier, destroyed the fortresses at Bomarsund. At the close of the same year he was created admiral, and in virtue of his rank became a member of the senate. In 1844 he was nominated grand officer of the Legion of Honour. M. Deschenes was a thorough seaman, and a man of large scientific acquirements. B. at Paris, 1790.

PARSONS, or PERSONS, Robert, par'-sons, a celebrated English Jesuit, who was educated at Balliol College, Oxford, of which he became bursar and dean in 1572, but being charged with embezzling the college money, he went to Rome and turned Catholic. He there obtained leave from the pope to establish a seminary for the education of English students designed for missionaries for the propagation of the Roman Catholic faith in their native country. Parsons frequently visited England, where he endeavoured to foment sedition, and a price was set upon his head. He was a subtle disputant, and wrote several polemical books, and others on practical divinity. B. in Somersetshire, 1546; D. at Rome, 1610.

PARTANICO, par-ta-ne'-ko, a town in the N.W. of Sicily, Val di Mazzara, 14 miles from Palermo. Manf. Woollen and silk fabrics. Pop. 11,000.

PARTANNA, par-tan'-na, a city of Sicily, 19 miles from Trapani. Pop. 8,000.

PARTHENAY, par'-te-nai, a town of France, in the department of the Two Sévres, on the Thoue, 24 miles from Poitiers. Manf. Cloth and leather. Pop. 5,100.

PARTHENAY, Anne de, an accomplished lady of the illustrious French noble house of Parthenay, was the wife of Anthony de Pons, count de Marennes. She was one of the brightest ornaments of the court of Renée, daughter of Louis XII. of France, and duchess of Ferrara, and, as well as that princess, was a zealous Protestant. This lady was an excellent musician, and well versed in the Greek and Latin languages. D. 1631.

PARTHENAY, Catharine de, niece of the preceding, and heiress to the lordship of Soubise, was married in 1568 to the baron de Pons, and in 1575 to René, Viscount Rohan. The famous duke de Rohan, who so courageously defended the Protestant cause in France during the civil wars of Louis XIII., was her eldest son. Catharine, one of her daughters, who married the duke of Deux-Ponts, made the following answer to Henry IV., who solicited her favours: "I am too poor, sire, to be your wife, and too proud to be your mistress." Catharine de Parthenay was at Rochelle in the time of its siege, and when the place surrendered, she and her daughters were sent to the castle of Niort. She published poems in 1572, and two years afterwards, a tragedy, entitled "Judith," was performed at Rochelle. She also translated the "Precepts of Isocrates" into French, and wrote some other pieces. B. 1554; D. 1631.

PARUTA, Paul, pa-roo'-ta, a Venetian noble, who became historiographer to the republic, and also discharged several great offices and embassies with honour. He wrote, in Italian, "Notes upon Tacitus," "A History of Venice," "Political Discourses," and other works. B. at Venice, 1540; D. at the same city, 1598.

PAS, Manasses de, marquis de Feuquières, pa, a French general and diplomatist, was the posthumous son of Francis de Pas, who was slain at the battle of Ivry, and distinguished himself as an able general and negotiator. At the siege of Rochelle, he was taken prisoner, and continued in confinement nine months. He was afterwards appointed ambassador to Sweden and Germany, where he showed great talents. In 1635 he commanded the army in conjunction with the duke of Saxe-Weimar. B. at Saumur, 1590; D. 1639.

PAS, Anthony de, marquis de Feuquières, grandson of the preceding, was one of the greatest generals of his age. He signalized himself at the battle of Stasardo, at the taking of Suza, and other places in Italy; but he was so severe a disciplinarian that it was usually said, "He must be the bravest man living, since he slept every night in the midst of a hundred thousand enemies." His memoirs have been printed. B. 1648; D. 1711.

PASCAL, Blaise, pas'-kal, a celebrated French philosopher, whose father, the president of the Court of Aids in Auvergne, superintended his education; but though he was himself a mathematician, he interdicted his son from that study. Young Pascal, however, in secret applied to geometry, and, without any assistance, demonstrated one of the most difficult propositions in Euclid. His father then permitted him to pursue his inclination, and, at the age of 16, the youth published his treatise on conic sections, which Descartes could not believe to be the production of a mere youth. At 19 he invented an arithmetical machine, which, though simple, was unequalled. The Toricellian experiment next engaged his attention, and at the age of 24, he made considerable improvements upon it. Not long afterwards, he solved a problem proposed by Mersennus, which had perplexed all the mathematicians in Europe. His great mind was now suddenly diverted to religious studies. Becoming more abstracted from the world, he retired to the congregation of the Port-Royal, where he applied to the reading of the Holy Scriptures. But he was not altogether indifferent to the passing scenes of society. He espoused the cause of the Jansenists, and exposed their enemies, the Jesuits, to ridicule, by his work entitled "Provincial Letters," in which the principles and practices of that celebrated order were laid open in a fine strain of ridicule, and with the irresistible force of truth. Boileau and Voltaire have pronounced them the finest productions in the French language. The life of this remarkable man was written by his sister, Madame Perier. The first complete edition of his works was produced at Paris by M. Fougère, in 1844. Pascal was justly called by Bayle "one of the sublimest spirits in the world." B. at Clermont, Auvergne, 1623; D. at Paris, 1662.

PASCHAL I., Pope, pas'-kal, was a Roman, of the name of Paschasius, and succeeded Stephen V. in 817. He crowned Lothaire, the emperor, at Rome. D. 824.

PASCHAL II. was a native of Tuscany, and succeeded Urban II. in 1099. He had a contest with the emperor Henry IV., and also with Henry I., king of Eng respecting the right of investitures. The former visited Rome to be crowned by the pope, who refused to perform the ceremony unless he yielded the matter in dispute. On this, Henry caused Paschal to be seized by his troops, which gave so much offence to the Romans, that they rose in behalf of their pontiff, and Henry retired from Rome, but carried the pope with him. Paschal, after a captivity of two months, conceded his claim to the investitures. This concession was afterwards cancelled in two councils. D. 1118.

PASCHAL III. became pope in opposition to Alexander III., in 1165, through the influence of the emperor Frederick I. He remained in possession of the papal chair while Alexander was absent at Benevento. D. 1168.

PASCO, pas'-ko, the principal mining town of Peru, 130 miles from Lima. It is the highest city in the world, being 13,720 feet above the level of the sea. Pop. varies between 5,000 and 12,000.

PASCUARO, pas-koo-a'-ro, a town of the Mexican Confederation, 125 miles from Mexico. Pop. 6,000. Lat. 19° 29′ 30″ N. Lon. 101° 21′ W.

PAS DE CALAIS, pa'-de(r)-kăl'-ai, a department in the N.E. of France, bounded on the E. by French Flanders, on the W. by the department of the Somme, and on the N. it has the Straits of Dover. Area, 2,624 square miles. Desc. Mountainous, and watered by several small streams,—the Aa, the Lys, the Scarpe, the Canche, the Lianne, and the Authie. Pro. Wheat, hemp, lint, tobacco, and oleaginous plants. Manf. Beet-root sugar, linen and linen thread, cotton, lace, woollens, leather, paper, and earthenware. Pop. 700,000.

PASITANO, pa'-se-ta'-no, a town of Naples, in the Principato Citra, 18 miles from Naples. Pop. 4,000.

PASKEWITCH, Ivan Fedorowitch, pas'-ke-vitch, a Russian general, who was descended from an ancient Polish family, but was educated at St. Petersburg, and afterwards became aide-de-camp to the emperor Paul. His first service in the field was at the battle of Austerlitz, in 1805; in the following year he was the bearer of the Russian ultimatum to the Porte, and narrowly escaped death at Constantinople. At the assault of Brailov he was left for dead; but was picked up, and was shortly afterwards promoted to the rank of colonel for his gallantry. In 1812 he fought against the French at Borodino; was subsequently nominated to the command of a division of the Russian army, amounting to 30,000 men, and, after sharing in the campaign in Germany, assisted at the capture of Paris. Subsequently to the peace, he made a three years' tour in Europe, as the companion of the grand-duke Michael; and, after the accession of the emperor Nicholas, was appointed to the command of the Russian army on the Persian frontier. War broke out between Russia and Persia about the same time, and Paskewitch defeated the shah's army at Elizabethpol and at Erivan. The treaty of Turkmanchai restored peace between the belligerents; but war against Turkey almost immediately followed. In 1828 he took Kars, and, in the following year, Erzeroum; for which services the emperor Nicholas created him field-marshal. In 1830 he fought against the Circassians, and, in the year following, succeeded Marshal Diebitsch as commander of the Russian army acting against the Poles. His invariable good fortune attended his efforts, and he was soon the master of Warsaw. Elevated to the rank of prince of Warsaw, and created governor-general of Poland, he spent the subsequent sixteen years in crushing the nationality of that country, and in converting Warsaw into a strong fortress capable of overawing the Poles. In 1849 he went into Hungary as commander of a powerful Russian army, and was soon afterwards able to commence his dispatches to Nicholas with the words "Hungary is at your feet." When war broke out between Turkey and Russia, Paskewitch was summoned to the field; but was slightly wounded at the repulse of the Russians at Silistria. He was shortly afterwards seized with an illness, which terminated in his death. As a military commander, he was held, by the most competent judges, to be only mediocre; but the large and well-equipped armies he led against the Persians, and, at a later period, against the exhausted Hungarians, enabled him to achieve successes which were little dependent upon his own skill in warfare. B. at Pultown, 1782; D. at Warsaw, 1856.

PASLEY, Sir Charles William, pā'-le, an eminent British engineer officer, who at first served in the artillery, but subsequently exchanged to the engineers. He was at the defence of Gaeta in 1806; at the siege of Copenhagen in the following year; was aide-de-camp to Sir John Moore in Spain in 1808-9; and chief engineer to the marquis of Huntley's division in the Walcheren expedition. At the siege of Flushing he received a wound in the thigh and an injury to the spine. He subsequently served in the Peninsular war. Among his most important publications may be mentioned—"Course of Military Instruction, for the Use of the Royal Engineer Department," "Exercise of the New-decked Pontoons," invented by himself; "Rules for Conducting the Practical Operations of a Siege," and a very valuable work to architects and many sections of the general public, entitled "Observations on Limes, Cements, Mortars, Stuccoes, Concretes, &c." In 1853 he was named colonel-commandant of the royal engineers, having previously been created lieutenant-general, and a knight commander of the Bath, as well as receiving the degree of D.C.L. from the university of Oxford. B. about 1782.

PASQUIER, Stephen, pas'-ke-ai, an eminent French lawyer, who pleaded so ably against Versoris, the defender of the Jesuits, that Henry III. made him advocate-general to the Chamber of Accounts. His works are, "Researches relative to the History of France," an authority upon the civil history of the old French monarchy; letters, portraits, epigrams, and epitaphs. The most celebrated of his poems is that called "Puce," occasioned by the author's seeing a flea on the bosom of a lady. B. at Paris, 1529; D. at the same city, 1615.

PASQUOTANK, pās-quo-tănk', a river of the United States, North Carolina, rising in the Dismal Swamp, and running into Albemarle Sound.—Also a county in N. Carolina. Area, 240 square miles. Pop. 9,000.

PASSAIC, pās-sai'-ik, a river of the United States, rising in New Jersey, and, after a course of 70 miles, falling into Newark Bay.—Also a county in New Jersey. Area, 198 square miles. Pop. 23,000.

PASSAMAQUODDY BAY, pās'-sa-ma-quo.d'-de, a bay which forms part of the boundary between the British province of New Brunswick and Maine, one of the United States of America. Ext. About 6 miles from N. to S., and 12 from E. to W.—The RIVER of the same name flows into this bay.

PASSARO, pas-sa'-ro, a small barren island in the Mediterranean, 24 miles from Syracuse.—The CAPE of this name is on the S.E. coast of Sicily.

PASSAROUANG, pas'-sa-roo-ang', a small town and fort on the northern shore of the island of Java, 576 miles from Batavia. Pop. Unascertained.

PASSAROWITZ, pas'-sa-ro-witz', a town of European Turkey, in Servia, near the Morawa, 33 miles from Belgrade. Pop. Unascertained.—Here a treaty of peace was concluded between the Turks and the imperialists in 1718.

PASSAU, pas'-sou, a town of Bavaria, at the confluence of the Inn and Danube, 92 miles from Munich. It consists of three parts, connected by long wooden bridges, and occupies a picturesque defile. Its fortifications are of considerable strength. The principal public edifices are the cathedral, the bishop's mansion, and the old abbey of St. Nicholas. Manf. Brewing, tobacco, and some trade, from its command of river navigation. Pop. 11,000.—From the treaty of Passau, in 1552, the Protestants of Germany received their religious liberty.

PASSEMANT, Claude Simeon, pas'-mont, a French mechanician, who was bred to trade, but having a great inclination to scientific pursuits, he devoted himself to the construction of mathematical instruments. He published an account of a large reflecting telescope, made by him in 1738, and also constructed an astronomical pendulum surmounted on a celestial sphere, which he presented to Louis XV. B. at Paris, 1702; D. 1769.

PASSERI, John Baptist, pas'-se-re, an eminent Italian painter and poet, was the disciple of Domenichino. He wrote, "Lives of the Painters, Sculptors, and Architects" of his time, a work containing thirty-six lives. B. at Rome, about 1610; D. 1679.

PASSERONI, John Charles, pas'-se-ro'-ne, an eminent Italian poet, who was educated under the Jesuits at Milan, and was afterwards ordained a priest. He went to Rome with Lucini, the papal nuncio, but constantly refused all preferment, choosing rather to live a studious life in a condition almost bordering upon destitution. Returning to Milan, he became a member of the Institute of the Cis-Alpine Republic, and wrote a poem entitled "The Cicerone," in which he ridiculed the follies and vices of society. The poem is highly original in style and treatment, and is so flowing and natural, that its author has been compared to Ovid. He also wrote several volumes of fables in verse, after the manner of Æsop, Phædrus, and others. B. at Condamini, in the county of Nizza, 1713; D. at Milan, 1803.

PASSIONEI, Dominic, pas'-se-o-nai-e, an eminent Italian cardinal, was of an illustrious family at Fossombrone, in the duchy of Urbino. He formed a rich library and collection of manuscripts. In 1706 he went to Paris, where he was much respected, particularly by Montfaucon: thence he went to Holland, and was at the congress at Utrecht in 1712. He was employed in various negotiations, particularly in Switzerland; of which he published an account, under the title of "Acta Legationis Helveticæ." He pronounced the funeral oration of Prince Eugene, and was made archbishop of Ephesus. His library was purchased by the Augustine monastery, which, thus increased, became one of the finest at Rome. B. 1682; D. at Frascati, 1761.

PASSY, pas'-se, a market-town of France, on the Seine, 2½ miles from Paris. It is inclosed within the new fortifications, and has a shot-mill, a sugar-refinery, and an earthenware manufactory. Pop. 11,500.

PASTA, Judith, pas'-ta, a celebrated Italian singer, who was of Hebrew extraction, and studied music at the Conservatoire of Milan. In 1816 she appeared at the Italian Opera of Paris, and afterwards passed to London, but obtained only a small amount of success in both these cities. This partial failure caused her to return to Italy for the purpose of increasing her musical knowledge. In 1820 she again sang at several of the principal Italian opera-houses, and everywhere met with an enthusiastic reception. At Paris, where she re-appeared in the following year, she achieved the greatest triumphs as a vocalist, and when she repaired to London, was greeted with a brilliant reception. After reigning as the queen of song during fifteen years, she, in 1836, retired to a magnificent villa on the Lake of Como. B. near Milan, 1798.

PASTAÇA, pas-ta'-sa, a river of S. America, rising in the Andes, and, after a course of 400 miles, joining the Amazon.

PASTO, pas'-to, the capital of a district of New Granada, 80 miles from Popayan. Pop. 7,000. It stands at the foot of a volcano in the line of the great pass from Popayan to Quito.

PATAGONIA, or LAND OF MAGELLAN, păt-a-go'-ni-a, a country of S. America, bounded N. by the territories of La Plata, E. by the Atlantic, S. by the Straits of Magellan, and W. by the S. Pacific Ocean. Area. Undetermined, but extensive. Desc. This country has been little explored, but was first discovered in 1519, by Ferdinand Magellan. The people are reported to be of gigantic stature, barbarous, and in their manners completely savage. Some of the inhabitants seen by Commodore Byron, in the year 1764, he supposed to be about 7 feet in height. Captain Wallis, in the year 1766, measured one of the tallest, and found his height to be 6 feet 7 inches; but he says the greatest part of them were from 5 feet 10 to 6 feet. Pop. Unascertained. Lat. Extending from 38° 45′ S. to La Plata.

PATANY, pa-ta'-ne, a port of Asia, on the eastern coast of the Malay peninsula. Pop. Estimated at 100,000. Lat. 6° 50′ N. Lon. 101° 40′ E.

PATEL, Peter, pa'-tel, an eminent French painter, commonly called by his countrymen the French Claude, from his imitation of that master. His landscapes are very beautiful. B. in France, 1654; killed in a duel, 1703.

PATER, or PEMBROKE DOCK, pai'-ter, a town of S. Wales, in Milford Haven, 1 mile from Pembroke. It has a government dockyard covering 60 acres, and in it some of the largest ships in the navy have been constructed. Pop. 6,400.

PATERCULUS, Caius Velleius, pai-ter'-ku-lus, a Roman historian. He commanded the cavalry in Germany under Tiberius, and was rewarded with the prætorship. He wrote an epitome of the Roman history, which is extant, and which commences with a period anterior to the foundation of Rome, and concludes with the times of Tiberius and Sejanus. B. about 19 B.C.; D. it is supposed, 31 A.D.

PATERNO, pa-tair'-no, a city of Sicily, at the foot of Mount Etna, 10 miles from Catania. It has a trade in wine, oil, flax, and hemp. Pop. 11,000.

PATERSON, William, pāt'e-r-son, the originator of several celebrated projects in the 17th century. Of his early life scarcely anything is known: by some he is stated to have belonged to the clerical profession; to have acted as missionary in the West Indies, and afterwards as a buccaneer. He first came into notice as the projector of certain schemes in trade and banking, which he submitted to the merchants of London, after having proposed them, without success, to the trading communities in the Low Countries. His banking projects are said to have been the foundation of the Bank of England, which was incorporated in 1694; but it is asserted that the rich capitalists quarrelled with and discarded him, after they had availed themselves of his suggestions. His next scheme was the famous Darien expedition, for the purpose of establishing, on that isthmus, a trading colony, which should rival the English East-India Company. Paterson obtained an act of the Scottish parliament, in 1694, for the incorporation of "The Company of Scotland trading to Africa and the Indies." The scheme was stoutly opposed in England, and as warmly supported in Scotland, where it became quite a national speculation. The principles upon which the company proposed to trade, appear to have been sufficiently sound, and likely to render Scotland, as was represented in the English parliament, "the general storehouse for tobacco, sugar, cotton, hides, and timber;" but the selection of the Isthmus of Darien as a central point where the commerce of the East and the West was to meet, proved a most disastrous choice; for the expedition ended in total failure. Paterson was deeply afflicted at the unfortunate termination of his scheme, and returned to Scotland in a condition bordering upon insanity. His after-life was spent in obscurity. B. in Scotland, about 1660; D. unrecorded when.

PATKUL, John Reinhold, pat-kul', a Livonian gentleman, who defended the liberties of his country against the oppressions of Sweden with great firmness, and in 1689 was deputed to address a memorial on behalf of the distressed people of Livonia to Charles XI., who took it as an act of treason, and caused a process to issue against Patkul, who was condemned to be beheaded. Thereupon he fled to Russia, and afterwards to Poland. When Charles XII. forced Augustus to make peace, he made it one of the conditions that Patkul should be delivered up; and this brave and unfortunate man was broken on the wheel in 1707.

PATMORE, Coventry, pāt'-mor, a modern English poet, who in 1846 became known to the public by a volume of poems, written with considerable grace and feeling. He subsequently produced a similar volume, with the title of "Tamerton Church Tower," and in 1855 published "The Angel in the House," a domestic poem. He is understood to be a contributor to the Edinburgh and North British Reviews, and since the year 1846 has acted as assistant librarian to the British Museum. B. at Woodford, Essex, 1823.

PATMOS, or PATIMO, pat'-mos, a small island of the Grecian archipelago, near the coast of Asia Minor, 20 miles from Samos. It has a circuit of about 30 miles, and is famous as the place to which St. John was banished by Domitian, and where he wrote the book of Revelation. Lat. 37° 30′ N. Lon. 26° 40′ E.

PATNA, pat'-na, a celebrated city of India, and capital of a district supposed to be the Palibothra of the Greeks, 32 miles from Bahar. It is situate on the Ganges, is about 4 miles in length by 1 in breadth, and is inclosed with a brick wall, having small round bastions. It contains some mosques and temples, but few of the houses exceed one or two stories in height. It also possesses a small citadel. Every article, either European or Asiatic, may be procured in its bazars. It was at this city that the English first established a factory in the eastern provinces. Its markets are well supplied, and it has a large trade in rice, wheat, opium, nitre, indigo, and sugar. Pop. 286,000. Lat. 25° 37′ N. Lon. 85° 15′ E.—The DISTRICT has an area of 1,828 square miles and a population of 1,200,000.

PATNA, a raj of India, with an area of 1,158 square miles. Pop. 55,000. Lat. 20° 40′ N. Lon. 83° 15′ E.

PATON, Joseph Noel, pat'-ton, a modern Scotch painter, who studied at the Royal Scottish Academy, and first attracted notice by his cartoon of "The Spirit of Religion," which obtained one of the £200 premiums given at the cartoon competition at Westminster Hall in 1845. Two years later, he won the second class prize of £300 for his paintings "Christ bearing the Cross," and "The Reconciliation of Oberon and Titania." His best works were "Quarrel of Oberon and Titania," purchased for the Scottish National Gallery for £1,100; "Dante Meditating the Episode of Francesca," "The Pursuit of Pleasure," and "Home." B. at Dunfermline, Fifeshire, 1823.

PATRAS, pa-trās', a seaport of Greece, in the north-west of the Morea, at the entrance of the Gulf of Lepanto, 65 miles from Corinth. It is built on the ascent of an eminence, and is commanded by a fort. The places of worship are a synagogue, and churches of the Greek faith. It has still some remains of antiquity, and a large trade in currants. Pop. 8,000. Lat. 38° 33′ N. Lon. 21° 43′ E.

PATRAS, GULF OF, an inlet of the Ionian Sea, between the Morea and W. Greece. Ext. 22 miles long, with a breadth of 13. It receives the rivers Fidari and Karninitza.

PATRICK, St., the apostle of Ireland, is asserted by some to have been a native of Scotland, and by others, of Wales. In the "Catalogue of British Saints," he is said to have been principal of a college in Wales; but was taken captive by some pirates of Ireland, the inhabitants of which country he converted to Christianity. It appears certain that he was a bishop, and founded many churches and schools of learning. D. towards the close of the 5th century.

PATRICK, Peter, a native of Thessalonica, who was employed by Justinian in important negotiations, for which he was made master of the palace. He wrote "The History of Ambassadors," in the collection of Byzantine historians. Flourished in the 8th century.

PATRICK, Simon, a learned English prelate, who was educated at Queen's College, Cambridge, and, on entering into orders, obtained the living of Battersea, in Surrey, and afterwards that of St. Paul, Covent Gardon. During the plague of 1665, he continued in London, administering the offices of religion to his parishioners. He became dean of Peterborough in 1678, and, in 1689, bishop of Chichester; whence he was translated to Ely, in 1691. He is well known for his valuable commentary on the Old Testament, usually published with Lowth on the Prophets, and Whitby on the New Testament. He was also the author of some controversial tracts against the Romanists and dissenters, and several books of practical divinity. B. at Gainsborough, Lincolnshire, 1626; D. 1707.

PATRIZI, Francis, pa-treed'-ze, an Italian philosopher, who taught at Ferrara, Padua, and Rome, with great reputation. Patrizi, who was a vehement opponent of Aristotle's philosophy, published an edition of the works attributed to Mercurius Trismegistus, and wrote "Paralelli Militari," or a parallel between the ancient military art and the modern. He likewise distinguished himself as an orator, geometrician, and poet. B. at Cherso, Istria, 1529; D. at Rome, 1597.

PATROCLUS, pa-tro'-klus, one of the Grecian chiefs during the Trojan war, son of Menœtius, who, having fled from Opus, where his father reigned, retired to the court of Peleus, king of Phthia, where he was kindly received, and where he contracted the most intimate friendship with Achilles, the monarch's son. When the Greeks went to the Trojan war, Patroclus also accompanied them. He was the constant companion of Achilles; and when his friend refused to appear in the field, Patroclus imitated his example, and, by his absence, was the cause of the overthrow of many Greeks,

But, at last, Nestor prevailed upon him to return to the war, and Achilles permitted him to appear in his armour. He soon routed the victorious armies of the Trojans, and obliged them to fly within their walls for safety. Apollo, who interested himself on behalf of the Trojans, instigated Hector to attack him. The engagement was obstinate; but, at last, Patroclus was slain by Hector, with the interposition of Apollo. His arms became the property of the conqueror, but his body was recovered and carried to the Grecian camp, where Achilles received it with the greatest lamentations. His funeral was observed with the greatest solemnity. Upon the death of Patroclus, Achilles forgot his resentment, and entered the field to avenge the death of his friend.

PATRU, pa-troo', Oliver, an eminent French lawyer, whose talents procured him a place in the French Academy in 1640; on which occasion he made an eloquent speech, which gave rise to the custom for all new members to deliver introductory orations. The critical judgment of Patru was so great that he was called the Quintilian of France; it also gained him the friendship of Racine and Boileau. His works consist of Memoirs, Letters, and Discourses. B. at Paris, 1604; D. 1681.

PATTI, pat'-te, a town of Sicily, near the fine bay of Patti, standing on a height 18 miles from Milazzo. The principal public building is the cathedral. Manf. Earthenware. Pop. 8,000.—The GULF of the same name is a circular bay, 20 miles across, between Cape Calava and the promontory of Milazzo.

PATURAGUEZ, pa-too'-rai-gai, a town of Belgium, in the province of Hainault, 4 miles from Mons. Pop. 7,000.—In its neighbourhood are coal-mines.

PAU, po, a well-built town of France, in the department of the Lower Pyrenees, on the Gave de Pau, 56 miles from Bayonne. It contains little that is interesting, with the exception of a public library and an academy of arts and sciences. The old castle is now converted into a prison and barracks. Manf. Linens; and it has a trade in hams and Jurançon wine. Pop. 17,000.—In the old castle Henry IV. was born. It is also the birthplace of Gaston de Foix and General Bernadotte, who became king of Sweden.

PAUCTON, Alexis, poke'-tawng, a French mathematician. He received his education in the mathematical and naval academy at Nantes, after which he went to Paris, where his integrity and talents procured him patronage and a place. His works are, "Metrology; or, a Treatise on the Weights, Measures, and Moneys of all Countries, Ancient and Modern,"—a much-esteemed volume; "Theory of the Laws of Nature, with a Dissertation on the Pyramids of Egypt." B. in France, 1736; D. 1798.

PAUL, pole, the name of numerous parishes and villages in France, none of them with a population above 2,000.

PAUL I., Pope, was the successor of Stephen, in 757. He engaged in disputes with Desiderius, king of the Longobards, but was taken under the protection of Pepin, king of the Franks. D. 768.

PAUL II. succeeded Pius II. 1464. He sought to organize a league of the Christian princes against the Turks, who, at the time, threatened to invade Italy, and also endeavoured to establish peace among the different Italian states. He had a great dislike to profane learning, and shut up an academy which had been formed at Rome for the cultivation of Greek and Roman learning, many members of which were imprisoned and tortured. D. 1471.

PAUL III.—His name was Alexander Farnese, and he was elected to the papal chair, in succession to Clement VII., 1534. In his reign the council of Trent was called. He established the Inquisition, confirmed the society of Jesuits, condemned the Interim of Charles V., and acted with rigour against Henry VIII. of England. D. 1549.

PAUL IV., John Peter Caraffa, was elected in 1555, at the age of 80. He was a bigoted prelate, and when Queen Elizabeth announced to him, by the English ambassador, her accession to the throne, he haughtily declared that the kingdom was a fief of the Holy See, and that she had no right to assume the crown without his leave, particularly as she was illegitimate. In 1559 he issued a bull against heretics. D. 1559.

PAUL V., Camillo Borghese, was elected in 1605, after the death of Leo XI. He had a dispute with the senate of Venice, over which he pretended to have a right; but it was so firmly resisted, that the pope excommunicated the doge and senate. He also raised forces against the republic; but by the interference of the emperor and other states, peace was restored in 1607. He embellished Rome with many excellent works of sculpture and painting, and an aqueduct. He was the founder of the Borghese family one of the wealthiest in Italy. D. 1621.

PAUL I., emperor of Russia, was the son of Peter III. and Catherine II. He married Wilhelmina, daughter of the landgrave of Hesse-Darmstadt, who died two years after their union, in 1776. Paul took for his second wife the princess of Wurtemberg, niece of the king of Prussia. Upon the death of Catherine II., in 1796, he succeeded to the throne, and for some time gave promise of proving a great prince: he released Kosciuszko, the Polish patriot, Niemcewicz, and others who had been confined during the previous reign; but his real character soon afterwards displayed itself. In 1799 he entered into an alliance with Austria against France, and sent Suwarrow with a large army into Italy; suddenly changing his views, he recalled his forces, formed a northern confederacy, and seized the persons and property of the English in his dominions. His conduct to his subjects also became capricious and violent, and just as the northern coalition had been dissolved by Lord Nelson's destruction of the Danish fleet at Copenhagen, a plot was formed among the officers of his court. The conspirators entered the emperor's apartments at night, and presented to him an act of abdication for his signature. On his refusal, a scuffle ensued, and Paul was strangled. When the people of St. Petersburg heard of his death, there were general rejoicings. B. 1754; strangled, 1801.

PAUL, deacon of Aquileia, who wrote "The History of the Lombards," "Lives of the Saints, and of the Bishops of Metz;" also a work called "Historia Miscella," a History of Rome in 24 books. He was secretary to Desiderius, king of the Lombards, and was afterwards in the service of Charlemagne. The prince of Benevento invited him to his court, and on the death of that prince, Paul embraced the monastic life. B. at Friuli, about 740; D. at Monte Casino, about 799.

PAUL, surnamed the Abbé, a learned French writer, who was at first professor of belles-lettres in various colleges belonging to the Jesuits, of which order he was a member; but subsequently quitted it to devote himself to the translation of Latin classical works. B. 1740; D. 1809.

PAUL DE LOANDO, St., a seaport town of Africa, and capital of the Portuguese dominions in W. Africa. In the 17th century it was celebrated for its fine churches, now in ruins. Lat. 8° 48' S. Lon. 13° 13' E.

PAUL DE SANTA MARIA, a learned Spanish Jew, who is said to have been converted to Christianity by reading the works of Aquinas. After the death of his wife, he entered into orders, and became preceptor to John II., king of Castile, who made him bishop of Carthagena, and afterwards of Burgos. B. at Burgos, about 1375; D. 1445.—His three sons were baptized with him; the eldest became bishop of Burgos, and wrote a History of Spain; the second was bishop of Placentia; and the third, Alvarez, wrote "The History of John II., King of Castile."

PAUL, FATHER. (See SARPI, Peter.)

PAUL OF SAMOSATA, an heresiarch of the 3rd century, who received his surname from the place of his birth, a city on the Euphrates, and became patriarch of Antioch in 260. Being entertained at the court of Zenobia, queen of Syria, he endeavoured to gain her to the Christian faith, by explaining away its mysteries. For this purpose, he held that Christ was a mere man, and that the Trinity consisted not of persons but attributes. His errors were condemned by the council of Antioch, A.D. 270, and Paul was excommunicated. His disciples were called Paulinists. Lived in the 3rd century.

PAUL, St., the great apostle of the Gentiles, originally called Saul, was born of Jewish parents, and educated in the school of the Pharisees, under Gamaliel. He at first pursued the Christians with so much furious zeal that he is spoken of as "breathing out threatenings and slaughter," and in A.D. 34 was present at the martyrdom of Stephen. He was subsequently commissioned by the Sanhedrim to go to Damascus to persecute the Christians. But on the road he was overpowered by the appearance of our Saviour, and Saul entered Damascus a disciple, and was received into the Church by the name of Paul. After this he became a distinguished preacher of Christianity, and was denominated the Apostle of the Gentiles. His eloquence was so great that it made Felix tremble, converted Dionysius the Areopagite at Athens, and drew from Longinus expressions of admiration. The epistles of St. Paul are models of pathetic remonstrance and close reasoning. A tradition of the Church declares that he was beheaded at Rome, A.D. 66.

PAUL, ST., a fine bay of the island of Malta, about 8 miles from Valetta. In it St. Paul is supposed to have been shipwrecked.

PAUL, ST., a town of Brazil, and capital of a district of the same name, to the west of Rio Janeiro, about 36 miles from the sea, and 190 miles from Rio Janeiro. It stands on a pleasing eminence, washed at the base by rivulets, which almost insulate it in rainy weather. The streets are, in general, remarkably clean. Here are several squares and numerous places of religious worship, the greater part of which, as well as of the whole town, is built of earth. The houses in the principal streets are two or three stories high, and stuccoed in various colours. The inhabitants make a beautiful kind of network for hammocks, which are fringed with lace, and form an elegant piece of furniture. The situation of the town was chosen for the gold which abounded in the neighbourhood. The country around, however, is now exhausted of this precious metal, and the inhabitants have been compelled to cultivate their fertile soil for a subsistence. Pop. Unascertained. Lat. 23° 30′ S. Lon. 46° 56′ W.

PAUL THE SILENTIARY, so called from an office which he held in the palace of the emperor Justinian, at Constantinople. He is supposed to have been a Christian. A History, in Greek verse, of the Church of St. Sophia, and Epigrams, were written by him. Flourished in the 6th century.

PAUL VERONESE. (See VERONESE, Paul.)

PAUL'S ISLAND, ST., lies in the strait between Newfoundland and Cape Breton islands. Another in Behring Sea, and another in the Indian Ocean. They are all small.

PAULA, St., pa'-oo-la, an eminent Roman lady, who was descended from the Scipios and the Gracchi. On becoming a widow, she retired to Bethlehem, where she founded a monastery and houses of hospitality, of which St. Jerome had the management. She practised the severest austerities and self-denial, which Jerome in vain endeavoured to moderate. She was acquainted with the Scriptures in the original Hebrew, in which she had Jerome for her master. B. 347; D. 407.

PAULDING, James Kirke, pawl'-ding, an eminent American writer, who, in 1807, began a career of authorship in collaboration with his brother-in-law, Washington Irving. With this gentleman he wrote a series of satirical papers, entitled "The Salmagundi." In 1813 he produced a burlesque poem, called "The Lay of a Scotch Fiddle," and soon afterwards published a brilliant reply to some aspersions cast upon the American people in the "Quarterly Review." His next effort was an imitation of Swift, in a work entitled, "The Diverting History of John Bull and Brother Jonathan," published in 1816. During the subsequent twenty years he continued to labour industriously with his pen, and in 1837 was appointed secretary of the navy, under the presidency of Van Buren. Upon the death of that president in 1841, Paulding resigned the post, and again took up his pen. His best works are "Letters from the South," "The Dutchman's Fireside," "The Old Continental," "John Bull in America," "The New Pilgrim's Progress: a Satire," and "Tales of a Good Woman, by a Doubtful Gentleman." One of his finest novels, descriptive of life in the back-woods, and entitled "Westward Ho," was published in 1832. This title has since been taken by Mr. Kingsley; but there is no further resemblance between the works. B. at Pawlings, Duchess county, New York, 1779.

PAULINA, paw-li'-na, the wife of the philosopher Seneca, who attempted to kill herself when Nero condemned her husband to death. The emperor, however, prevented her, and she survived for several years after, in the greatest melancholy.

PAULINE, Bonaparte. (See BONAPARTE, Pauline.)

PAULINUS, pou-li'-nus, a learned German missionary, whose real name was John Philip Werdin. He studied at Prague, and acquired a knowledge of some of the Oriental languages at Rome. In 1774 he went as missionary to the court of Malabar, where he remained during fourteen years. After his return to Rome, in 1790, he was employed in superintending the printing of religious works for the use of missionaries to Hindostan. He wrote a Sanskrit grammar, and various works upon the religion and literature of India. B. in Austria, 1748; D. at Rome, 1806.

PAULINUS, St., bishop of Nola. He discharged the office of consul in 373, and about the same time married a Spanish lady, by whose means he embraced Christianity. He then retired to Spain with his wife, where Paulinus bestowed his goods in charity, and led a life of mortification. In 393 he entered into orders, and going to Italy, was chosen bishop of Nola. He was the author of some Discourses on practical charity, some Poems and Letters. B. at Bordeaux, 353; D. 431.

PAULINUS, St., patriarch of Aquileia, distinguished himself at the council of Frankfort in 794. He wrote a treatise on the Trinity. D. 804.

PAULMIER DE GRENTEMESNIL, Julian de, pole'-me-ai grant'-mai-ne, a celebrated French physician, was the disciple of Fernel; and when all the other physicians had reduced Charles IX. to a very low condition, he succeeded in restoring him. He was afterwards attached to the duke of Anjou, whom he accompanied to the Low Countries, where he distinguished himself in his own profession and as a soldier. He composed several treatises upon medical subjects. B. about 1530; D. at Caen, 1588.

PAULMIER DE GRENTEMESNIL, James, son of the preceding, was educated in the principles of the Reformed religion. His works are, "Description of Ancient Greece;" "Poems; Greek, Latin, French, Italian, and Spanish." B. 1587; D. 1670.

PAULMY, Mark Antony René de Voyer, Marquis of, pole'-me, minister of state, and a member of the French Academy, was the son of the Marquis d'Argenson. He collected one of the most magnificent libraries in Europe, which was sold to the Count d'Artois, brother to Louis XVI. M. de Paulmy published "Mélanges d'une grande Bibliothèque," in 69 volumes. To him also is attributed a work entitled "Essays in the Style of those of Montaigne." B. at Valenciennes, 1722; D. 1787.

PAULUS, Ægineta. (See ÆGINETA, Paulus.)

PAULUS, Æmilius. (See ÆMILIUS, Paulus.)

PAUSANIAS, paw-say'-ni-as, the son of Cleombrotus, king of Sparta, governed the kingdom for his cousin Pleistarchus during his minority. He also displayed great skill and valour in the war against Athens, which city he took, and expelled the ten tyrants. Pausanias afterwards served against the Persians with equal glory, but being discontented with his country, he entered into a secret treaty with the king of Persia, which being discovered by the Ephori, he, to avoid the punishment due to his treason, fled into the temple of Minerva, which being held sacred, the Lacedæmonians blocked it up with stones, the first of which was placed by the mother of Pausanias. He was there starved to death, B.C. 467.

PAUSANIAS, a Greek historian and orator, who settled at Rome in the reign of Antoninus the Philosopher. Pausanias wrote, "Travels in Greece," wherein he most minutely describes the buildings, monuments, statues, and paintings, as they existed 500 years after the most flourishing period of Greek art. Fuseli thus speaks of this valuable work: "The minute and scrupulous diligence with which what fell under its author's eye is there described, amply satisfies us, although there is a want of method and judgment. His description of the pictures of Polygnotus at Delhi, and of the Jupiter of Phidias at Olympia, are perhaps superior to all that might have been given by men of more assuming powers. They are inestimable legacies to our arts." Flourished in the 2nd century.

PAUSIAS, paw'-si-as, a painter of Sicyon, who studied under Pamphilus, and was the fellow-pupil of Apelles and Melanthius. He worked in colours upon wood and ivory, according to the method now called encaustic painting. He drew a beatiful picture of his mistress Glycere, which was bought by Lucullus for two talents (about £132). After his death, the Sicyonians sold his pictures to Scaurus, the grandson of Scylla, who built a gallery for them at Rome. Flourished about 360 B.C.

PAUW, Cornelius, pou, a learned Dutch writer, who is known by his discourses on the Greeks, the Americans, the Egyptians, and the Chinese. These works are curious, and show considerble ability, but they are too conjectural. B. at Amsterdam, 1739; D. at Xante, 1799.—There was another of this name who lived at Utrecht, and published several valuable editions of Greek authors, particularly Anacreon, in 1732.

PAVIA, pa'-ri-a, a town of Italy, in the government of Milan, on the Ticino, 4 miles above its discharge into the Po, and 80 miles from Mantua. It has a dull and deserted appearance, though many of the buildings are good. It contains several squares, and some ancient towers of extraordinary height, the remains of the Gothic ages, are yet to be seen in different parts of the town. It is still surrounded with fortifications; but they are falling to decay. A marble bridge, built in the 14th century, connects it with the suburb on the opposite side of the Ticino; and the church of the Augustinians contains the tomb of the well-known Boetius. The cathedral, a Gothic building in decay, has been rebuilt, and the university, recently restored, is said to be the most ancient in Europe, having been founded by Charlemagne, in 791. There are, besides, a gymnasium, a theatre, a chamber of commerce, and numerous charitable institutions. Some trade in silk is carried on with Turin, Genoa, and Lyons. Wine is sent to Milan and Lodi, and rice to various parts of Italy: the excellent cheese made in the district is likewise exported in considerable quantities. Silk is the only manufacture. Pop. 26,000.—Pavia is very ancient, having been founded by the Gauls. It has often suffered from war; and near it, in 1525, Francis I., king of France, was conquered and made prisoner by the imperialists. In 1745 it was taken by the Spaniards, and, in 1796, by the French.

PAVLOVSK, paw'-lovsk, two towns of European Russia, neither with a population above 4,000.

PAWTUCKET, paw-tuk'-et, a post-village of the United States, on the falls of the Pawtucket, 5 miles from Providence. It has several cotton-factories. Pop. 7,500.

PAX, păx, the allegorical divinity of peace among the ancients. The Athonians raised her a statue, representing her as holding Plutus, the god of wealth, in her lap, to intimate that peace gives rise to opulence. She was represented among the Romans with the horn of plenty, and also carrying an olive branch in her hand. The emperor Vespasian built in her honour a celebrated temple at Rome, which was consumed by fire, in the reign of Commodus.

PAXO, pax'-o, one of the seven Ionian islands, near the entrance of the Adriatic, 10 miles from Corfu. Area, 35 square miles. Pop. 6,000.

PAXTON, Sir Joseph, păx'-ton, an eminent modern gardener, the designer of the building for the Great Exhibition of 1851, and of the gardens, terraces, and fountains of the Crystal Palace of Sydenham. Born of parents in moderate circumstances, he devoted himself to the pursuit of gardening, and was fortunate enough to attract the attention of the duke of Devonshire, who employed him first at Chiswick, and afterwards at Chatsworth. He subsequently became, besides chief gardener at Chatsworth, manager of the duke of Devonshire's large estates in Derbyshire. At Chatsworth he constructed a grand conservatory of iron and glass, which covers an acre of ground; and when the building committee of the Great Industrial Exhibition of 1851 seemed almost to despair of getting an appropriate design, Mr. Paxton submitted one prepared on similar principles: this design was accepted, and, with some slight modifications, carried out. The new style of architecture, which he had thus created, was, from the outset, immensely popular. He afterwards prepared an improved design for the reconstruction of the same glass palace at Sydenham: there, also, he laid out gardens, terraces, and fountains, which are unequalled, as a whole, throughout the world. For his services he received the order of knighthood, and, in 1854, was returned to parliament as member for Coventry, without opposition. He has written many works on horticultural subjects, the chief of which are "Paxton's Flower-Garden" and "The Pocket Botanical Dictionary." B. near Woburn, Bedfordshire, 1803.

PAYEN, Anselm, pa'-en, a modern French chemist. The son of a gentleman largely engaged in industrial enterprises, he was sent to study chemistry under Vauquelin and Chevreul. About 1815 he assumed the directorship of a large manufactory of sugar from beet-root, and subsequently applied himself to the discovery and application of new manufacturing processes, by which he greatly contributed to reduce the price of many articles of food ordinarily used. Between the years 1827-44 he acted as member and reporter of juries on French industry. In 1836 he was appointed member of the council and professor of the school of arts and manufactures, and afterwards received a similar appointment at the Conservatoire des Arts et Métiers. In 1847 he was created officer of the Legion of Honour. M. Payen has written extensively on subjects more or less intimately connected with agricultural or industrial chemistry. Among his most important works are "Course of Applied Chemistry," "Memoirs on Vegetable Development," and "Manual of Organic Chemistry, as applied to Agriculture and Industry." He has also been a valuable and industrious contributor to the "Revue des Deux Mondes," and others of the leading French periodicals. B. at Paris, 1795.

PAYNE, Roger, pain, an English bookbinder, who was remarkable for the elegance and strength of his binding. He was chiefly employed on scarce books, for the binding of which he received extraordinary prices. For an Æschylus, bound by him for Earl Spencer, he was paid fifteen guineas. Payne lived in a cellar, and never worked while he had any money. He made all his own tools, and would never suffer any person to see him at work. D. in London, 1797.

PAZZI, THE, pat'-se, a celebrated Ghibelline family of Florence, which was possessed of immense wealth, and was the determined enemy of the Medici. When the latter family threatened, by the excess of their power, to destroy the republic, the Pazzi affected great zeal for their country, and Francis (nephew of James Pazzi, the head of the house), who was established as a banker at Rome, formed a conspiracy with Jerome Riario, nephew of Pope Sixtus IV., and, under the auspices of the courts of Rome and Naples, prepared to assassinate the heads of the Medici, and to destroy the power of that family in the republic for ever. The conspiracy, known in Florentine history as that of the Pazzi, was only partly successful. Giuliano de' Medici was killed, but Lorenzo escaped. James and Francis Pazzi were hanged, the name and arms of the family were suppressed, and its members banished. Pope Sixtus IV. and the king of Naples next proposed to invade Florence; but, through the boldness and judgment of Lorenzo, the war was brought to a termination at the end of 1479. This stirring episode in Florentine history forms the subject of one of Alfieri's finest tragedies. The "History of the Conspiracy of the Pazzi" was written by Poliziano.

PEACE RIVER, peece, a large river of British N. America, rising in the Rocky Mountains, in lat. 54° 24′ N. and lon. 121° W., and, after a total course of 800 miles, falling into the Frozen Ocean, in lat. 70° N. and lon. about 135° W.

PEACOCK, Reginald, pe'-kok, an English prelate, was successively bishop of St. Asaph and Chichester, by the favour of Humphrey, the good duke of Gloucester; but he was deposed for resisting the papal authority, and denying transubstantiation, with other articles of the Roman Catholic faith. He was obliged to recant his views, and his books were publicly burnt. He then retired to an abbey, where he died, about 1486.

PEARCE, Nathaniel, peerce, an English traveller, who spent many years in Africa, and lived for several years at Abyssinia. His manuscripts, which he bequeathed to Mr. Salt, contained much valuable information relative to the manners and customs of the last-named country. B. near London, 1780; D. at Alexandria, 1820.

PEARCE, Zachary, peerce, a learned English divine, who received his education at Westminster school, whence he was elected to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he wrote some papers for the Guardian and Spectator. He published an excellent edition of Longinus in 1724, and, the same year, obtained his doctor's degree. When Woolston attacked the miracles of our Saviour, he was replied to by Dr. Pearce in an anonymous pamphlet, entitled "A Vindication of the Miracles of Jesus," which went through several editions. He was preferred to the deanery of Winchester in 1739, advanced to the see of Bangor in 1748, and, in 1756, translated to Rochester, with the deanery of Westminster annexed. Some time before his death he solicited leave to resign his preferments; as this, however, was unusual, it was refused with respect to the bishopric, but he was permitted to give up the deanery. Besides the above, he published "A Review of the Text of Milton," "On the Origin of Temples," "An Account of Trinity College, Cambridge," and other works. After his death were published his "Commentary on the Gospels and Acts," and Sermons. B. in London, 1690; D. at Little Ealing, 1774.

PEARL, perl, a river of the United States, in the Mississippi territory, rising in lat. 87° 30′ N. and lon. 32° 20′ W., and forming, by several mouths, the Rigolets, east of Lake Ponchartrain, and ultimately falling into the Gulf of Mexico.

PEARL ISLANDS are situate in the Bay of Panama, 60 miles from Panama. They are mostly small.

PEARSON, Edward, peer'-son, a learned English divine, who was educated at Cambridge, and afterwards became fellow and tutor of Sidney College, in that university. He wrote largely, but is chiefly known for his controversial works, wherein he wrote against Dr. Paley's theories as to moral obligation. He was likewise a stanch opponent of Calvinism, and entered into a long controversy thereupon with Mr. Simeon, of the university of Cambridge. B. at Ipswich, about 1760; D. 1811.

PEARSON, John, an eminent English bishop, who received his education at Eton, whence he was elected to King's College, Cambridge. He was promoted to the bishopric of Chester in 1673. Bishop Pearson is principally known by his valuable "Exposition on the Creed," of which there have been several editions. He also wrote a "Defence of the Epistles of St. Ignatius," and other learned works. B. in Norfolk, 1612; D. 1686.

PECCHIO, Joseph, pek'-ke-o, a modern Italian author, who was educated for the law, and afterwards became assistant councillor of finances at Milan, which post he lost at the Austrian occupation in 1814. Seven years afterwards he was forced to fly, on account of the part he had taken in a conspiracy against the Austrian rulers of Milan. He travelled a great deal upon the continent; but eventually repaired to England, where, in 1825, he was commissioned by the Philhellenic committee to convey a large sum of money to the Greeks, then struggling against the Turks. He subsequently married an English lady, and devoted himself to literature, composing, among other valuable works, a series of sketches of English habits and manners, which were as humorous as they were just and discriminating. B. at Milan, 1785; D. at Brighton, 1835.

PECHANTRE, Nicholas de, pe'-kantr, a French poet, who three times gained the poetical prize from the Académie des Jeux Floraux. His tragedy of "Geta" was performed at Paris in 1687, with great applause. This was followed by "Jugurtha," "The Death of Nero," and some others. B. at Toulouse, 1638; D. 1709.

PECHLIN, John Nicholas, pek'-lin, a Dutch physician, who became professor of medicine at Kiel, and first physician to the duke of Holstein-Gottorp, by whom he was appointed preceptor to the hereditary prince. He wrote several treatises in Latin upon physiology, and a "Panegyric on Tea." B. at Leyden, 1667; D. at Stockholm, 1706.

PECHMEJA, John, pek'-mai-zha, a French writer, who became professor of elocution in the college of La Flèche. His eulogy on Colbert was crowned with the approbation of the academy in 1773; but he is principally known by a work in poetic prose, called "Telephe." B. at Villefranche, 1741; D. 1785.

PECK, Francis, pek, an eminent English antiquary, who received his education at Cambridge, where he took his degrees in arts. He obtained the living of Godeby, in Leicestershire, where he remained until his death. He wrote, among many other learned works, "The Annals of Stamford," "The Life of Milton," "Memoirs of Cromwell;" and published a collection of historical tracts, entitled "Desiderata Curiosa." B. at Stamford, Lincolnshire, 1692; D. at Godeby, Leicestershire, 1743.

PECKHAM, pek'-ham, a village of England, in the county of Surrey, forming a suburb of London, about 4 miles from St. Paul's Cathedral. Pop. about 20,000. —The Nunhead cemetery adjoins Peckham Rye or Common.

PECKWELL, Henry, pek'-wel, an English divine, who became a popular preacher among the Calvinistic Methodists, and obtained the rectory of Bloxham, in Lincolnshire, but lived chiefly in London, where he studied anatomy and physic, that he might be the more serviceable to the sick of his society. Whilst dissecting the body of a young person who died of a putrid fever, he slightly wounded himself in the hand, and this turning to a mortification, he died in 1787. B. 1747.

PECORONE, Giovanni Fiorentino, pek-o-ro'-nai a Florentine novelist of the 14th century, who, according to some, was a notary, and to others, a Franciscan monk. He belonged to the party of the Guelphs, and was an ardent follower of the pope. His "Novelli," which have been often reprinted, are little inferior to Boccaccio, and are valuable for the insight they afford as to the opinions and manners of his time. D. about 1380.

PECQ, LE, pek, a parish and village of France, 7 miles from Versailles.—At this place the allied army of 1815 crossed the Seine.

PECQUET, John, pek'-ai, an eminent French physician, who discovered the lacteal vein that conveys the chyle to the heart, and which is therefore called the reservoir of Pecquet. In 1654 he published a work entitled "Experimenta Nova Anatomica," and, in 1661, another, "De Thoracis Lacteis." B. at Dieppe, 1622; D. at Paris, 1674.

PEDEE, GREAT, pe-de', a river in South Carolina, falling, after a course of 415 miles, into Winyaw Bay, immediately below Georgetown.

PEDERNEIRA, pai'-dur-nai-eer'-a, a seaport of Portugal, in the province of Estremadura, 5 miles from Alcobaza. A sanctuary near it is much resorted to by pilgrims.

PEDRO I., Don Antonio, pe'-dro (pai'-dro), emperor of Brazil, was the son of the regent of Portugal, afterwards John VI. In the interval between 1808-21, his father found a refuge in Brazil, having been driven from Portugal by Napoleon I.; but, a year after John had left the country for Portugal, Brazil declared itself independent, and elected Don Pedro as its emperor. The death of John VI., in 1826, left Don Pedro the crown of Portugal: he soon afterwards established a liberal government in that country, and granted it a charter. After abdicating the crown of Portugal in favour of his daughter, Donna Maria, he nominated his brother, Don Miguel, regent; but scarcely had he quitted Portugal, than Don Miguel took possession of the throne. In 1831 he was compelled to abdicate the throne of Brazil in favour of his son, Don Pedro II. Returning to Europe, he raised troops in France and England, with which he, in 1833, drove Don Miguel from the throne of Portugal, and placed the crown upon the head of his daughter. He was twice married; his first wife being Maria-Leopoldine, archduchess of Austria, and the second, Amelia, daughter of Prince Eugene de Beauharnais. B. 1798; D. 1834.

PEDRO II., Don John Charles, emperor of Brazil, was son of the preceding, who abdicated the throne in his favour when he was only in his 6th year. Until 1841, Brazil had been governed by a council of regency; but, at that period, he was compelled to ascend the throne in his 15th year. The beginning of his reign was much troubled; but Jose Feliciano, the last of the insurgents, was totally defeated in 1842, after which time he reigned in peace. In 1851 the war between Brazil and Buenos Ayres was terminated with the fall of Rosas. Under Don Pedro II. the Brazilian empire has made rapid advances both in the arts of peace and commerce. B. 1825.

PEDRO V., king of Portugal, was the son of Donna Maria II. and Fernando of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha, king consort. After visiting France and England during his father's regency, he ascended the throne in 1855. In 1857 he married the Princess Stephanie Wilhelmina Antoine, of Hohenzollern Sigmaringen, who died two years afterwards. B. 1837.

PEDRO, ST., a large river of Mexico, which enters the Rio del Norte.—Also rivers of Veragua, of New Granada, of Brazil, and of the Caraccas.

PEEBLES, pee'-bels, the county town of Peeblesshire, on the Tweed, over which there is a bridge of five arches, 21 miles from Edinburgh. It is divided into the Old and New towns by the Eddleston Water. In the Old town are the ruins of an ancient monastery. The principal buildings are, the High Church, said to have been built in the 12th century, now in ruins, a town-hall, gaol, reading-room, grammar-school, and subscription library. Manf. Stockings; weaving and brewing are also carried on. Pop. 2,000.

PEEBLESSHIRE, or TWEEDDALE, a county of Scotland, bounded on the E. and S.E. by Berwick and Selkirk shires, S. by Dumfriesshire, W. by Lanarkshire, and N. by the county of Mid-Lothian. Area, 319 square miles. Desc. It consists of various chains of mountains, running in all directions, with well-watered valleys intervening. The Dale or Valley of Tweed forms the great body of this shire; and thence many narrow vales branch off in different directions. In general, the hills and dales in the north and north-west districts are the most fertile and agreeable. River. The Tweed. Pro. Mostly sheep and cattle, the industry being almost entirely directed to pastoral purposes. Minerals. Coal, lime, white and red freestone, marl, fuller's-earth, and slate, with veins of iron ore, are found in several districts. Manf. Woollen, some linen, and cotton goods. Pop. 11,000.

PEEL, or PEEL TOWN, peel, a town on the W. coast of the Isle of Man, at the mouth of Peel river, 12 miles from Douglas, chiefly noted for the ruins of its castle and cathedral. St. Patrick's church stands to the west of the cathedral, but nothing remains of it but the walls. Peel has become a place of little trade. Pop. 2,500.

PEEL, Sir Robert, first baronet, and father of the British statesman. He was brought up to the cotton trade, and in 1773, he being then in his 23rd year, entered into partnership with Mr. William Yates, at Bury, in Lancashire. Ten years afterwards, he married the daughter of his partner, and from that time his career was one of uninterrupted prosperity. In 1790 he entered the House of Commons as member for Tamworth. Seven years afterwards, when the capitalists of the nation were called upon to subscribe to the "Loyalty Loan," the firm of which he was the head contributed the considerable sum of £10,000. He also distinguished himself by his zeal in the volunteer movement of the period, and was appointed lieutenant-colonel of the Bury Loyal Volunteers, consisting principally of his own workmen. In 1800 he was created a baronet, and shortly before had made a speech in parliament, advocating the union with Ireland, which was published, and circulated in large numbers throughout that country. He retired from parliament in 1820, and went to reside on his estate of Drayton Park, Staffordshire. His large landed property was entailed upon his eldest son, the great statesman, to whom also he left, it is supposed, about half a million of money. To his younger sons he left £150,000, and to his daughters £50,000 each. He had previously allowed his eldest son an annual income of £9,000, and had settled upon his other children about £240,000. B. at Peel's Cross, near Lancaster, 1750; D. at Drayton Park, Staffordshire, 1830.

PEEL, Sir Robert, second baronet, a distinguished British statesman, was eldest son of the preceding. His early education was received under the eye of his father, a man of great energy and clearness of intellect. When he arrived at a sufficient age, he was sent to Harrow, where he showed himself a docile and submissive schoolboy, but, at first, by no means an advanced one. After a short time, however, he progressed rapidly and securely, and soon left all competitors behind. Lord Byron, his contemporary at Harrow, has given the following record of his school-days:—"Peel, the orator and statesman (that was, or is, or is to be), was my form-fellow, and we were both at the top of our remove. We were on good terms, but his brother was my intimate friend. There were always great hopes of Peel amongst us all,—masters and scholars; and he has not disappointed them. As a scholar, he was greatly my superior; as a declaimer and actor, I was reckoned at least his equal. As a schoolboy, out of school, I was always in scrapes, and he never; and, in school, he always knew his lesson, and I rarely; but when I knew it, I knew it nearly as well." When Peel had completed his 16th year, he became a gentleman commoner of Christ Church, Oxford, where he took his degree of A.B. with unprecedented distinction, taking the honours of a double first class,—first in classics, first in mathematics. In the year 1809 he attained his majority, and also entered the House of Commons as member for Cashel, in Tipperary. He began his parliamentary career as a supporter of Mr. Perceval. In the following year he seconded the address in answer to the speech from the throne, and had so greatly distinguished himself among the Tory party, that he soon afterwards entered office as under-secretary of the Home department. He continued in the Home department, until the death of Mr. Perceval, in 1812, when certain changes in the ministry took place, and Mr. Peel was appointed chief secretary to the lord-lieutenant of Ireland. In the same year he was elected for Chippenham, in Wiltshire. He held the secretaryship of Ireland for six years, during which he introduced several measures tending to preserve peace in that country, and also established the constabulary force. In 1817 he was chosen as one of the parliamentary representatives of the university of Oxford. Two years later, he sat as chairman on the celebrated committee which resulted in the return to cash payments. On the retirement of Lord Sidmouth, in 1822, Peel became home secretary. When Canning became premier, in 1827, Peel retired, in consequence of still retaining his opinion that the demands made by the Roman Catholics should be resisted. In the following year, however, he again entered the ministry, this time under the duke of Wellington. Both the duke and himself were subsequently brought to see that the claims of the Catholics could no longer be withstood, and he accordingly moved the Relief Bill, which was carried, after a long and arduous struggle, in 1829. In the following year he succeeded to the baronetcy, upon the death of his father. In the great Parliamentary Reform Bill, which was carried about this period, he took no share further than to oppose it with all his power. Under the reformed parliament the Tory party was in a decided minority; but Sir Robert was, nevertheless, summoned to form a Conservative ministry. Much against his own inclination, he did so; but, as he had predicted, the Conservatives held power for a few months only. This happened in the early part of the year 1835. The Whig party having gained office, Sir Robert went into opposition, and devoted himself to the careful organization of his forces, so as to take advantage of the first great check the Whigs might receive. In 1839 the Whig ministry resigned; Sir Robert Peel was "sent for," and submitted to her Majesty a list of his coadjutors, at the same time requesting that certain ladies of the bed-chamber, who were near relatives of the Whigs, should be removed. This request was not acceded to; whereupon Sir Robert abandoned his idea of forming a cabinet. The Whigs, accordingly, retained power until 1841, when, having been repeatedly defeated in the House of Commons, they resigned, and made way for their great opponent, who became first lord of the treasury, the duke of Wellington accepting a seat in his cabinet without office, but taking the leadership of the House of Lords. The limits of this article preclude anything like a detailed account of the great events which followed, and which caused Sir Robert Peel to be regarded by the British nation as the greatest and most disinterested statesman she has ever had. Sir Robert Peel's ministry was formed on the strictest protectionist principles; but, nevertheless, the leader of that great and powerful party contrived to effect considerably more than could be even attempted by the Whigs, who were supposed to be the more liberal and more progressive party. Sir Robert Peel, during his celebrated tenure of office, between the years 1841-46, effected the repeal of the corn laws, the relaxation of the whole commercial code; passed the Bank Charter Act, and established the general financial policy of the country on a firmer basis than was ever before the case. For these great services, which were only effected by a fundamental change of the policy to which he had hitherto pledged himself, Sir Robert Peel incurred the odium of his party, most of the members of which abandoned him. In 1846 he was compelled to resign office; but from that period until his death he continued to assist the Whig administration. Henceforth he never sought to weaken any of the existing parties in the house, but continued to give his adherence to whatever measure he thought best calculated to advance the general good. "He had known enough of place and power," it has been said; "he was jealous of his influence, and cared for little beyond. Time had chastened the few prejudices he possessed, and his clear head was undisturbed by any of those clouds with which the passions or promptings of the heart obscure the judgments of most public men. On the night before the occurrence of the fatal accident which terminated the life of Sir Robert Peel, the House of Commons, which for more than forty years had witnessed his triumphs and reverses, was filled with an extraordinary assemblage, anxious for the result of a great political crisis." That result would, most probably, have been the return of the great statesman to the power he no longer coveted; but, on the very next day, while riding through St. James's Park, his horse suddenly shied, and threw Sir Robert over its head. He was taken up, and conveyed to his residence in Whitehall Gardens, where, three days afterwards, he breathed his last. This notice of the great statesman's life is necessarily short and meagre; but students of his career may find every detail requisite for the full comprehension of his policy in all its bearings, in two works, entitled respectively, "The Political Life of Sir Robert Peel," by Thomas Doubleday; and "The Life and Acts of Sir Robert Peel," by M. Guizot, a translation of which work was published by Mr. Bentley. After an able characterization of Sir Robert's political genius, M. Guizot thus concludes:—"He was a great and honest servant of the state; proud with a sort of humility, and desiring to shine with no brilliancy extrinsic to his natural sphere; devoted to his country, without any craving for reward. . . . Severing himself from the past without cynical indifference, braving the future without adventurous boldness; solely swayed by the desire to meet the necessities of the present, and to do himself honour by delivering his country from peril or embarrassment. He was thus, in turn, a Conservative and a Reformer, a Tory or Whig, and almost a Radical; popular and unpopular; using his strength with equal ardour, sometimes in making an obstinate resistance, sometimes in yielding concessions, which were perhaps excessive; more wise than provident, more courageous than firm, but always sincere, patriotic, and marvellously adapted, in a period of transition like ours, to conduct the government of modern society as it has become, and as it is becoming more and more, in England as elsewhere, under the influence of the democratic principles and feelings which have been fermenting in Europe for fifteen centuries." And again:—"God seldom accords to a man so many favours. He had endowed Sir Robert Peel at his birth with the gifts of intellect as well as the gifts of fortune. He had placed him in an age where his great qualities could be employed with success on great objects. When success was achieved, He recalled him suddenly to Himself, in the fulness of his strength and glory, like a noble workman who has performed his task before the close of the day, and who goes to receive his final reward from the master whom he has well served." B. at Chamber Hall, Bury, Lancashire, 1788; D. in London, 1850.

Peel, Sir Robert, third baronet, and eldest son of the preceding. He received his education at Harrow and Cambridge, and, in 1844, entered upon a diplomatic career as an attaché to the embassy at Madrid. In 1846 he became secretary of legation in Switzerland, and shortly afterwards was appointed chargé d'affaires, which he retained until 1850. The death of his father, in the last-mentioned year, recalled him to England, where he was chosen to succeed the late statesman as the parliamentary representative of the borough of Tamworth. In 1852 and 1857 he was re elected for the same place. In 1855 he became attached to the ministry of Lord Palmerston as one of the lords of the Admiralty. At the coronation of the czar Alexander, he accompanied Lord Granville on a mission to Moscow. Upon his return he seceded from the ministry, and afterwards took little part in public affairs, further than delivering an occasional speech, chiefly against the aggressive designs of the emperor of the French, or against the, to his mind, absurdity of the volunteer movement. B. in London, 1822.

Peel, Frederick, second son of the statesman, and younger brother of the preceding, was educated at Harrow and Cambridge, and was called to the bar in 1849. In the latter year he entered the House of Commons as member for Leominster; but was returned for Bury three years afterwards. In 1851 he was appointed under-secretary for the colonies; but resigned upon the accession of the Derby cabinet in the following year. From the close of 1852 to the early part of 1855 he, however, filled his former post under the Coalition ministry. He afterwards held the appointment of under-secretary at war. B. in London, 1823.

Peel, Sir William, was the third son of the statesman, and entered the navy in 1838, as midshipman on board the Princess Charlotte, in which vessel he took part in the bombardment of Acre. After serving on board other vessels in the China seas and elsewhere, he, in 1844, passed his examination for lieutenant in so brilliant a manner as to call forth the warmest eulogiums of Sir Charles Napier and Sir Thomas Hastings. In the same year he became lieutenant of the Winchester, on the Cape of Good Hope station. In 1846 he was promoted to the rank of commander, and remained upon the North American and West-India stations until the commencement of the war with Russia. During that war he greatly distinguished himself in the naval brigade before Sebastopol. In 1856 he went out to the China station as captain of the Shannon frigate; but had scarcely arrived there when he was ordered to Calcutta with troops, to afford assistance in suppressing the mutiny in India. Upon his arrival he organized a naval brigade, and went ashore with 24- and 68-pounder guns, with which he and his sailors performed great deeds of skill and bravery at Cawnpore and Lucknow. At the storming of Lucknow he was severely wounded; but was recovering from this hurt when he was attacked with small-pox, which, to the profound grief of the English nation, carried him off. "There was something about Peel which, it is said, recalled the great Nelson. He had the daring and the dash, the frankness of heart and buoyant courage of the hero of Trafalgar: it was impossible not to love him. Brawny seamen wept bitterly when they heard that he was wounded, and young midshipmen longed for the honour of serving under his flag. Sir William Peel, in short, like Nelson, was a popular hero." For his distinguished services during the Crimean war he was created C.B., and afterwards K.C.B. for his Indian exploits. He was also an officer of the French Legion of Honour, and had received the war medal of Sardinia. B. 1825; D. at Cawnpore, 1858.

Peele, George, peel, an English dramatic writer, who was student of Christchurch College, Oxford, where he took his degree of M.A., in 1579. After leaving the university, he went to London, where he gained a poor and precarious subsistence as an actor and writer for the stage. He was a good pastoral poet, and his plays were acted with great applause in the university. B. it is supposed in Devonshire, about 1550; D. about 1597.

Pegalaxar, pai-ga-lax'-ar, a town of Spain, 9 miles from Jaen. Pop. 3,000.

Pegasus, peg'-a-sus, a winged horse, sprung from the blood of Medusa, when Perseus had cut off her head. As soon as born, he flew up to heaven, or rather, according to Ovid, fixed his residence on Mount Helicon, where, by striking the earth with his foot, he instantly raised a fountain, thence called Hippocrene.

He became the favourite of the Muses, and, being tamed by Neptune or Minerva, he was given to Bellerophon, to conquer the Chimæra. This monster being destroyed, Pegasus threw off his rider, because he attempted to fly to heaven. Pegasus, however, continued his upward flight alone, and was placed among the constellations by Jupiter.

PEGO, pai'-go, a town of Spain, in Valencia, 41 miles from Valencia. Pop. 6,000.

PEGU, pe-gu', or pe-goo', a very ancient city, and formerly the capital of a kingdom, on the Setang river, 58 miles from Rangoon. The destruction of this city occurred at its capture, in 1757, by the Birman emperor Alompra, who caused parts of the walls to be levelled, destroyed the houses, and dispersed, or led into captivity, all the inhabitants. The religious edifices were the only buildings that escaped his fury; and the magnificent temple of Shoemadoo still exists as a monument of the greatness and devotion of its ancient monarchs. Pop. Unascertained.—The province of Pegu comprises all the delta of the Irrawadi, and was, in 1853, formally annexed to British India.

PEIGNOT, Stephen Gabriel, pain'-yo, a learned French bibliographer, who was educated for the legal profession, but who became, in 1813, librarian to the college at Dijon, and devoted his life to the production of valuable and important works connected with the history and classification of books. His "Manual of Bibliography," "Philological Amusements," and "Dictionary of Suppressed Works," are of considerable importance. B. in France, 1765; D. at Dijon, 1845.

PEI-HO, pai-ho', 'white river,' China, in the province of Chi-li. It rises near the great wall, and passes E. of Peking, and enters the Gulf of Pe-chi-li, in lat. 38° 33′ N. It is navigable for boats to within 20 miles of Peking.—According to Sir J. Bowring, Pei-ho may be the name of any river to the N. of any locality in which we may be in China. The Taku forts on this river were taken by the British in 1860, and a former repulse, achieved by treachery on the part of the Chinese, avenged.

PEÏPUS, LAKE OF, pai'-e-poos, a large lake of European Russia, discharging its surplus waters into the Gulf of Finland by the Narova. Ext. 80 miles long, with a breadth of 32. Lat. between 57° 52′ and 59° N. Lon. between 26° 55′ and 27° 55′ E.

PEIRESC, Nicholas Claude Fabri, Seigneur de, pai'-resk, an eminent French antiquary and learned writer, who studied at first under the Jesuits; after which he visited various universities, and took the degree of doctor of laws at Aix in 1604. His thesis on that occasion was greatly admired. Visiting Paris soon afterwards, he obtained the friendship of the most learned men in that city, particularly De Thou and Casaubon. In 1606 he went to England in the suite of the French ambassador, and was received with marks of distinction by James I. He next went to Holland, and became acquainted with Julius Scaliger and Grotius. On his return to France, he was admitted a counsellor of the parliament of Aix. The learning of Peiresc was various and profound; and he particularly excelled in the knowledge of medals. He wrote extensively on mathematics, medallic science, languages, and antiquities, and was a great collector of literary treasures, which he generously distributed among the learned of his acquaintance. B. in Provence, 1580; D. at Aix, 1636.

PEITZ, or PEIZ, pitzė, a town of Prussia, 35 miles from Frankfort. Pop. 3,000.

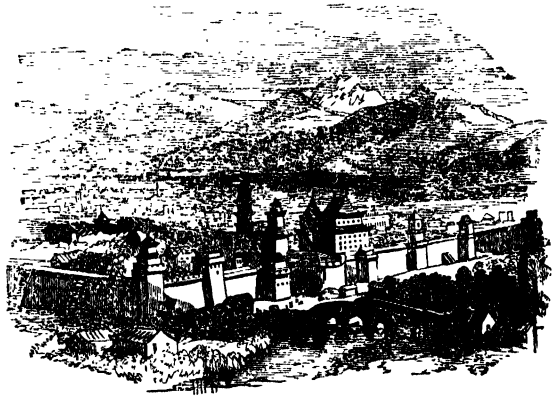
PEKAH, pe'-ka, king of Israel, was captain in Pekahiah's army; but, having slain that monarch, he ascended the throne in 758 B.C. He entered into an alliance with Rezin, king of Syria, and made war upon Ahaz, king of Judah, whom he defeated and killed.



In the twentieth year of his reign, Hosea formed a conspiracy against him and slew him. B. 738.

PEKAHIAH, pek-a-hi'-a, king of Israel, succeeded his father Menahem 760 B.C. Very little mention is made of him in the Holy Scriptures, further than that he "departed not from the sins of Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, who made Israel to sin." After a reign of only two years, he was slain by Pekah, a captain of his army. Killed 758 B.C.

PEKALONGAN, pek-a-lon-gan', a district and town of Java, on the N. side of the island. Pop. of residency, 225,000. Lat. 6° 55′ S. Lon. 109° 40′ E.

PEKING, or PEKIN, pe-kin', a city of Asia, and the capital of the empire of China, situate in a sandy plain, between the Pei-ho and the Hoen-ho, 50 miles from the great wall of China. Like most other Chinese cities, it is laid out by the square and line. The streets are in general narrow, and many of them can only be considered as lanes. They are all unpaved, and covered with sand and dust; but they are kept very clean, and frequently watered. The principal consist almost entirely of rows of shops, which are painted, gilded, and adorned with much magnificence. They are peculiarly crowded, in consequence of the number of trades that are carried on in the open air. The numerous movable workshops of tinkers and barbers, cobblers and blacksmiths; the tents and booths where tea, fruit, rice, and other eatables, are exposed to sale; the wares and merchandise arrayed before the doors; the troops of dromedaries laden with coals from Tartary; the wheelbarrows and hand-carts stuffed with vegetables, leave only a very narrow space unoccupied. Jugglers, conjurers, fortune-tellers, mountebanks, quack-doctors, comedians, and musicians, help to complete the motley scene. Peking is surrounded with walls about thirty feet high, and twenty-five feet thick at their base, and perforated by sixteen gateways. Of the ornamental buildings, the most conspicuous are those commonly called triumphal arches. They consist of a large central gateway, with a smaller one on each side, all covered with narrow roofs; and, like the houses, are very splendidly gilded, varnished, and painted. Besides these, there are numerous pagodas, a beautiful mosque, Greek church, and convent. Outside of the city are open suburbs. The imperial palace is an inclosure within the city, formed by what is called the Yellow Wall. The space contained within it, is artificially fashioned into an imitation of rude and romantic nature. A number of lakes and eminences are represented. On the eminences are placed the edifices destined for the accommodation of the emperor; while the loftiest summits are crowned with pavilions, kiosks, and other buildings devoted to pleasure and refreshment. The whole has almost the effect of enchantment. The imperial palace of Yuen-mien, situate without the city, presents the same scene on a much more extended scale. The buildings, however, have only an outward show of magnificence. The very dwelling of the emperor, and the grand hall of audience, when divested of their colours and gilding, are little superior to the barns of a substantial English farmer. Manf. Coloured glass, idols, and other articles. There is, besides, a large printing and book trade. Pop. Estimated at 2,000,000. Lat. 39° 54′ 12″ N. Lon. 116° 28′ 54″ E.—The river Pei-ho is navigable by boats to within 20 miles of the city, and communicates with the Grand Canal, by which the inhabitants are supplied with provisions.

PELAGIUS I., pe-lai'-ji-us (popo), was a native of Rome, and ascended the papal chair, in succession to Virgilius, in 555. He endeavoured to reform the clergy; and when Rome was besieged by the Goths, he obtained from Totila, their general, many concessions in favour of the citizens. D. 560.

PELAGIUS II. ascended the papal chair, in succession to Benedict I., in 578. He opposed John, patriarch of Constantinople, who had assumed the title of œcumene or universal bishop. D. of the plague, 590.

PELAGIUS, the founder of Pelagianism, in the 5th century. He is supposed to have been a native of Britain. His real name was Morgan, which he changed to the Greek appellation of Pelagius. He went to reside at Rome about 400, where he denied the doctrine of original sin, and maintained free will. He afterwards retired, with his friend Celestius, to the Holy Land, but subsequently returned to his native country. His opinions were condemned by the council of Carthage. B. in Britain, towards the close of the 4th century; D., it is supposed, in Wales, about 432.

PELAGO, pai-la'-go, a central town of Italy, in Tuscany, 12 miles from Florence. Manf. Woollen goods. Pop. of district, 7,000. In the neighbourhood is the sanctuary of Valambrosa, the richest convent in Tuscany.

PELAYO, pai'-la-e-o, first king of the Asturias, was the chief of the Gothic Christians, who, after the sanguinary battle of Guadalete, in 711, fled from the resentment of the Moors to the mountains of the Asturias. In 718 the Moslems attacked him and his followers, but were signally defeated at Covadonga. He then took the title of monarch; and, in 722, drove the Moors out of the city of Leon, where his successors reigned. After firmly establishing the small kingdom of Asturias by many victories over the Moors, he died, 737.

PELEUS, pe'-le-us, a king of Thessaly. He married Thetis, one of the Nereids, and was the only one among mortals who married an immortal. Being accessory to the death of his brother Phocus, he retired to the court of Eurytus, who reigned at Phthia. He was purified of his murder by Eurytus, who gave him his daughter Antigone in marriage. Peleus subsequently killed Eurytus by accident, while in the chase of the Calydonian boar. This event obliged him to retire to Iolchos, when the wife of Acastus, king of the country, brought certain charges against him, which caused him to be tied to a tree on Mount Pelion, that he might become the prey of the wild beasts of the place; but Jupiter, aware of the innocence of Peleus, ordered Vulcan to set him at liberty. Peleus afterwards revenged himself upon Acastus, by driving him from his possessions, and putting to death his wife. After the death of Antigone, Peleus fell in love with Thetis, who rejected his suit because he was a mortal. Having offered a sacrifice to the gods, Proteus at length informed him, that to obtain Thetis he must surprise her asleep in her grotto, near the shores of Thessaly. This advice was followed; and Thetis, unable to escape from the grasp of Peleus, at last consented to marry him. Their nuptials were celebrated with the greatest solemnity by all the gods, who made them each the most valuable presents. The goddess of discord was the only one of the deities who was not present. From the marriage of Peleus and Thetis was born Achilles. The death of Achilles was the source of so much grief to Peleus, that Tnetis, to comfort her husband, promised him immortality, and commanded him to retire to the grottos of the island of Leuce, where he would see and converse with the manes of his son.

PELEW ISLANDS, or NEW PHILIPPINES. (See CAROLINE ISLANDS.)

PELHAM, pel'-ham, the name of several parishes in England, none of them with a population above 800.

PELIAS, pe'-li-as, the twin brother of Neleus, was son of Neptune, by Tyro, the daughter of Salmoneus. His birth was concealed by his mother. He was exposed, but his life was preserved by shepherds, who named him Pelias, from a spot of the colour of lead in his face. Tyro subsequently married Cretheus, king of Iolchos. Meantime Pelias visited his mother; and, after the death of Cretheus, he unjustly seized his kingdom, which belonged to the children of Tyro. But Jason, the son of Æson, the eldest of the children of Cretheus, afterwards boldly demanded the kingdom which he had usurped. Pelias then told him he would voluntarily resign the crown if he went to Colchis to avenge the death of Phryxus, whom Æetes had cruelly murdered. This expedition, which was likely to be attended with much glory, was readily undertaken by Jason. (See JASON.) Upon the return of Jason from Colchis, the four daughters of Pelias solicited Medea to restore their father to youth, as she had Æson, her father-in-law (see MEDEA); but after the Peliades had, by her directions, cut their father's body to pieces, and had drawn all the blood from his veins, on the assurance that Medea would replenish them by her incantations, Medea suffered the flesh to be totally consumed in a caldron of boiling water, and refused to give the Peliades the promised assistance. After this parricide, they fled to the court of Admetus, where Acastus, the son-in-law of Pelias, pursued them, and took their protector prisoner.—A Trojan chief, wounded by Ulysses during the Trojan war. He survived the ruin of his country, and followed the fortunes of Æneas.

PELISSIER, Aimable Jean Jacques, pe-lis'-se-ai, marshal and duke of Malakoff. He was the son of a respectable farmer, and, after receiving a liberal education, was sent, in 1814, to the military school of St. Cyr, which he left, to join the army as sub-lieutenant during the Hundred Days. Precluded from active employment by the peace which soon afterwards ensued, he devoted himself assiduously to the study of his profession. In 1823 he took part in the Spanish campaign, and won several orders and crosses for his bravery and efficient conduct in the field. In 1828 he became captain in the King's Guards, and, two years later, formed a member of the great Algerian expedition. After two years of service in Algeria, his health gave way, and he was compelled to return to France. During the subsequent seven years he was employed in the offices of the War department at Paris, and, in 1840, was again sent to Africa. His bravery and capacity during the different campaigns which took place, gained for him the rank of colonel in 1845. In that year he was sent in pursuit of one of the most fierce of the Kabyle tribes. Being closely pressed, the Arabs took refuge in their caves: Pelissier summoned them to surrender, offering to spare their lives if they would come forth from their retreat. The Arabs refused; whereupon he ordered fascines to be lighted and placed close to the mouths of the caves, in order to compel them to come out: still they remained stubborn. He next sent in to them some Arabs, and afterwards a flag of truce, which was fired upon. Thereupon the lighted fascines were pushed still closer to the cavern mouths, and kept burning for some time. In the end, nearly 600 dead bodies were found in the caves, and about 200 more Arabs died after being drawn out. This operation excited general horror throughout Europe, and was strongly denounced by Marshal Soult, at Paris; but Marshal Bugeaud defended his subordinate, and termed the dismal act "a necessity of war." Notwithstanding this affair, Pelissier was created lieutenant-colonel in 1848, and remained in Algeria until 1855, when he was ordered to take the command of a division of the French army in the Crimea. At first, second in command under General Canrobert, his superior energy led to differences between himself and his chief. Shortly afterwards, Canrobert asked to be allowed to resign, which request was conceded, and Pelissier was nominated to the chief command. The expedition to Kertch, the advance upon the Tchernaya, and many bold and successful attacks upon the Russian works, were all carried out under his command, which was brought to a triumphant termination by the storming and carrying of the great fort of the Malakoff, the key of the Russian position on the south side of Sebastopol. For these services the emperor Napoleon created him marshal of France, grand cross of the Legion of Honour, and duke of Malakoff; Queen Victoria also conferred upon him the grand cross of the Bath. In 1858, during a period of some diplomatic difficulty, he replaced M. Persigny as ambassador of France at the court of St. James's; but after filling that post for a short period, during which, however, he secured the highest opinions of those with whom he came in contact, by his frank and cordial bearing, he retired. B. near Rouen, 1794.

PELL, John, pel, an eminent English mathematician and divine, who was educated first at Cambridge, and afterwards at Oxford. In 1643 he went to Amsterdam, to assume the professorship of mathematics there; but he afterwards removed to Breda, upon the invitation of the prince of Orange. In 1652 he returned to England, and was sent by Cromwell as resident to the Protestant cantons of Switzerland. In 1661 he was ordained by the bishop of Lincoln, and, the same year, was presented to the rectory of Fobbing, in Essex. He wrote "An Idea of the Mathematics," "A Table of 10,000 Square Numbers," "Demonstration of the Second and Tenth Books of Euclid," and other works. B. at Southwich, Sussex, 1610; D. in London, 1685.

PELLEGRINI, Camillus, pel-lai-gre'-ne, a celebrated Italian antiquary, who was the first to collect into a regular series the scattered, partial, and isolated histories and chronicles of the middle ages, which design was afterwards more completely carried out by Muratori and others. His sketch of the "Antiquities of Capua," and his "History of the Lombard Kingdom," are among the most valuable works treating of the middle ages of Italy. B. at Capua, 1598; D. 1663.

PELLERIN, Joseph, pel'-le-răn, an eminent French numismatist, who was commissary-general, first clerk of the French marine, and afterwards commissioner of the navy. He devoted his leisure to the collection, arrangement, and classification of medals. His cabinet of medals, in the purchase of which he was assisted by the king, was very large and valuable. He published nine quarto volumes illustrative of medals, with plates. B. near Versailles, 1684; D. at Paris, 1782.

PELLICO, Silvio, pel'-le-ko, an eminent Italian writer, who was the son of an official in the department of war at Milan, and afterwards at Turin. After spending some time in France, he joined his father at Milan, and was appointed professor of the French language in the seminary for military orphans in that city. Ardently devoted to literature and to liberty, he formed the acquaintance of Ugo Foscolo, the poet, and others, and likewise allied himself with a number of distinguished men, who hoped to free Lombardy from Austrian domination. In 1819 he wrote a tragedy, entitled "Francesca da Rimini," which was enthusiastically received in the chief cities of Italy. After writing other works, he, in 1819, established, with the assistance of Manzoni, Sismondi, and others, a journal intended to be conducted upon liberal principles, entitled "Il Conciliatore." This print was, however, soon afterwards suppressed by the Austrian government. Towards the close of the year 1820, he was suddenly arrested on the charge of plotting against established order. He was at first confined in the prison of Santa Margherita, at Milan; but was afterwards sent to a dungeon on the island of San Michele, near Venice. While there, in 1822, he was tried and condemned to death, which sentence was, however, commuted to fifteen years of "carcero duro" (severe imprisonment) in the fortress of Spielberg. Speaking of this sentence, he says, "Those condemned to 'carcero duro' are obliged to labour, to wear chains on their feet, to sleep on bare boards, and to eat the poorest food. Those condemned to 'carcero durissimo' (very severe imprisonment) are chained more heavily, and with a band of iron round the waist, the chain being fastened to the wall; so that they can only walk just by the side of the boards which serve them for a bed. Their food is the same, though the law says only bread and water." For the first eighteen months of his imprisonment he was fortunate enough to be placed under an indulgent gaoler, by whom he was permitted the use of pen, ink, and paper, and to read the Bible, Homer, Dante, Petrarch, Shakspere, Göthe, Scott, Byron, Schiller, and other authors; but this personage having been sent to another prison, his situation became very severe during the four subsequent years, and almost led to the complete destruction of his health. Between the years 1827-30 he was treated with more clemency; and in the latter year he received the intimation that he was to regain his liberty, which, in reality, followed soon afterwards. In 1831 he produced a work entitled "Le Mie Prigioni" (My Prisons), which was written in a style of touching simplicity, was translated into every language of Europe, and was everywhere admired. After his release he repaired to Turin, where his parents were residing, and devoted himself to literary composition, producing, among other works, three tragedies, and a prose treatise on the Duties of Man. After his death, his memoirs, correspondence, and inedited works, were published. B. at Salazzo, Piedmont, 1789; D. at Turin, 1854.

PELLISSON-FONTANIER, Paul, pel'-lees-sawng-fon-ta'-ne-ai, a French historian, who was educated for the legal profession, but quitted it for a life of retirement in the country, where he occupied himself with literary studies. Having written the history of the origin of the French Academy, he was chosen a member. Subsequently, the minister Fouquet became his patron; but, when he was disgraced, Pellisson was sent to the Bastille, where he was confined during four years. On his release he received a pension, and became a favourite of Louis XIV., whom he attended in his campaigns. He wrote "The History of Louis XIV.," "The Life of Anne of Austria," "History of the Conquest of Franche-Comté," "Historical Letters," Poems, "Reflections on Differences in Religion," and "Treatise on the Eucharist." B. at Béziers, France, 1624; D. at Versailles, 1693.

PELOPIDAS, pe-lop'-i-dăs, a Theban general, who inherited from his father Hippoclas a large fortune, which he disposed of liberally among his fellow-citizens. Between himself and Epaminondas there existed the closest friendship, from which the Thebans derived the most important benefits. When the Lacedæmonians gained the sovereignty of Thebes, Pelopidas went to Athens, where he assembled a number of his exiled countrymen, with whom, in 379 B.C., he returned, seized upon Thebes by night, and threw off the Spartan yoke, by which it had been oppressed. He afterwards defeated the Lacedæmonians at Tegyræ; and, with Epaminondas, shared the great victory of Leuctra, 371 B.C. He was next sent by his countrymen on an embassy to Artaxerxes, king of Persia, who received him with honour, and, through his means, entered into a treaty with the Thebans, very advantageous to them. On his return, he persuaded his countrymen to make war against Alexander, tyrant of Pheræ, but fell shortly after in battle, 364 B.C.

PELOUZE, Théophile Jules, pe-looze', a modern French chemist, who, after studying pharmacy, went to Paris, and there became assistant in a laboratory. In 1830 he was chosen professor of chemistry at Lille, where he made some important investigations relative to the composition of beet-root sugar. He was subsequently chosen to fill the chair of chemistry in the Polytechnic School. In 1851 he became commander of the Legion of Honour, and was afterwards appointed president of the imperial mint at Paris. B. in France, 1807.

PEMBERTON, pem'-ber-ton, a township of England, in Lancashire, 2 miles from Wigan. Manf. Cotton goods. Pop. 5,500.—It has a station on the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway.

PEMBERTON, Henry, a learned English physician, who was fellow of the Royal Society, and distinguished himself by an excellent work, entitled, "A View of Sir Isaac Newton's Philosophy." He was also the author of a treatise on Chemistry, Lectures on Physiology, &c. B. in London, 1694; D. 1771.

PEMBROKE, pem'-broke, one of the southern counties of Wales, bounded on the E. by Carmarthenshire, N.E. by Cardiganshire, N. and W. by the Irish Sea, and S. by the Bristol Channel. Area, 610 square miles. Desc. Its form is extremely irregular, and greatly diversified with hill and dale, but none of the hills are of any considerable elevation. The soil is various. Rivers. The Teify and the Cleddy. Pro. Wheat, barley, and oats. Rye is cultivated in some parts, also turnips and pease. A considerable quantity of butter is made for home consumption, and for exportation. Minerals.

Lead, limestone, coal, slate, and marl. Manf. Unimportant, but the fisheries are valuable. Pop. about 95,000.—It abounds with objects of antiquarian curiosity and interest, of almost every kind and era; such as Druidical circles and cromlechs. Single stone monuments are also numerous; but the most important antiquities are its castles, of which there are 19, formerly belonging to princes and great barons.

PEMBROKE, a borough and market-town of S. Wales, in the above county, on a neck of land dividing the small estuary of Down Pool, which flows from Milford Haven, 210 miles from London. The vast ruins of its magnificent castle still give it an appearance of grandeur. The houses are ranged principally in one long street, at the end of which is the castle. The public buildings are a town-hall, a free grammar-school, and two parochial churches, dedicated to St. Mary and St. Michael. Pop. 1,200.—The Pembroke docks are at Pater, which see.

PEMBROKE, the name of several townships in the United States, none of them with a population above 3,000.

PENANG, PINANG, or PRINCE OF WALES ISLAND, pe-nang', an island, belonging to Great Britain, in the Straits of Malacca. Area, 160 square miles. Desc. Well wooded, and hilly in some parts. Pro. Rice, cocoa-nuts, areca, indigo, cotton, tobacco, coffee, sugar, betel, and ginger. Pop. 132,000. Lat. of flagstaff, 5° 25′ N. Lon. 100° 19′ E.

PENATES, pe-nai'-tees, certain inferior deities among the Romans, who presided over houses and the domestic affairs of families. According to some, the gods Penates were divided into four classes; the first comprehended all the celestial, the second the sea gods, the third the gods of the infernal regions, and the last all such heroes as had received divine honours. The statues of the Penates were generally made of wax, ivory, silver, or earth, according to the affluence of the worshipper; and the offerings they received were wine, incense, fruits, and sometimes the sacrifice of lambs, sheep, and goats. Some have confounded the Lares and the Penates; but they were different. (See LARES.)

PENDLETON, pen'-del-ton, a large and populous suburb to the towns of Manchester and Salford, 2¼ miles from Manchester. Manf. Cotton goods; and there are are collieries in the neighbourhood. Pop. 15,000.

PENDLETON, the name of two counties in the United States.—1. In the central part of Virginia. Area, 620 square miles. Pop. 6,000.—2. In Kentucky. Area, 286 square miles. Pop. 7,000.

PENELOPE, pe-nel'-o-pe, a celebrated princess of Greece, daughter of Icarius of Sparta, and wife of Ulysses, king of Ithaca. She became mother of Telemachus, and was obliged to part, with great reluctance, from her husband, when the Greeks obliged him to go to the Trojan war. (See PALAMEDES.) The continuation of the war rendered her melancholy; but when Ulysses did not return, like the other princes, her fears were increased, and she was soon beset by a number of suitors, who wished her to believe that her husband was shipwrecked. She received their addresses with disdain, but flattered them with hopes, and declared that she would make choice of one of them as soon as she had finished a piece of tapestry then in hand; but she baffled their eager expectations, by undoing by night what she had done in the day. This artifice of Penelope has given rise to the proverb of Penelope's web, which is applied to whatever labour can never be ended. The return of Ulysses, after an absence of twenty years, however, delivered her from her dangerous suitors.

PENICUICK, or PENNYCUICK, a borough of barony and parish of Scotland, on the North Esk, 10 miles from Edinburgh. The town has a church and a subscription library. Manf. Paper and gunpowder. Pop. of parish, 3,200.

PENINSULA, pe-nin'-su-la, a name generally given to the Iberian or Pyrenean peninsula. (See SPAIN.)

PENN, Sir William, pen, an English admiral, who commanded the fleet, and Venables the land forces, at the taking of Jamaica from the Spaniards, in 1655. The same year he was elected member of parliament for Weymouth. He was sent to the Tower by Cromwell, for quitting his command without leave, but was soon released. After the Restoration he became a knight, commissioner of the navy, and a vice-admiral. Under the duke of York, he fought in the naval action in which the Dutch were defeated, in 1665. In the following year he retired from the service. B. at Bristol, 1621; D. at Wanstead, Essex, 1670.

PENN, William, an eminent Quaker, and founder of the state of Pennsylvania, was the son of the preceding. He received a good education, which was completed at Christ Church, Oxford; but he disappointed his father's expectations by turning Quaker, and was discarded by him. Sir William afterwards relented, and sent his son abroad. Young Penn visited France and Italy, and returned to his native country in 1664. He spent two years in the study of the law at Lincoln's Inn, and was then sent to Ireland to manage his father's estates; but, happening to hear a discourse at

WILLIAM PENN.

Cork, by Thomas Loe, a leading Quaker, he reverted to his former opinions, and travelled to propagate this new faith. He was taken up for preaching, and sent to prison; but was released through the interest of his father. After his return to England, he was sent to the Tower, on account of a book which he had written; and, while there, he composed his principal work, entitled "No Cross, no Crown," intended to show the benefit of suffering. On his release, he resumed his former labours, and was apprehended with some others, and tried for preaching at a conventicle in Gracechurch Street. The jury persisted in finding them not guilty, and were fined for acting contrary to the dictates of the judge. Admiral Penn was reconciled to his son before his death, and left him all his property. He continued firm in his attachment to the Society of Friends, and, in 1677, went on a mission to Holland and Germany, with Fox and Barclay. In 1681 he obtained from the crown, in lieu of the arrears due to his father, the grant of the province in North America now called Pennsylvania. Penn sailed with a colony of Quakers, and founded Philadelphia; but before he entered upon possession, he made a treaty with the Indians. The code of laws which he formed for the government of his province was simple, but would have done honour to the profoundest legislators. After spending about two years in the administration of the new colony, he returned to England in 1684. Upon the death of Charles II. Penn attracted to himself the favour of James II.; and this intimacy led to his being several times arrested after the king had been dethroned. His accusers charged him with being a Papist and a Jesuit; but although he, during several years, remained in seclusion, and did not refute the calumnies of his enemies, he, at length, defended himself before William III. and his council, and was honourably acquitted. In 1696 he married his second wife, and, three years afterwards, again set sail for Pennsylvania. In 1701 he returned to England, and, being encumbered with debts, endeavoured to negotiate the sale of Pennsylvania to the crown for £12,000. This negotiation was interrupted in 1712, through his being attacked by an apoplectic fit, which, happening twice afterwards, greatly impaired his mental faculties. He survived for six years longer, but with a constitution much shattered, and quite unfitted for any serious employment. Lord Macaulay, in his History, charges Penn with uttering "something very like a lie, and confirming it with something very like an oath;" with being a species of court agent for the sale of pardons; with endeavouring to persuade the fellows of Magdalen College, Oxford, to accede to James II.'s illegal acts, with seeking to bring about the king's return by means of a foreign army; and with other "scandalous acts." These charges, however, have been met by Mr. Hepworth Dixon, in his biography of William Penn. In one instance he shows the great historian to have been wrong; viz., that in which he declares Penn to have sold pardons to the maidens at Taunton who had been condemned for presenting the duke of Monmouth with a standard. Mr. Dixon proves that it was not William Penn, but George Penne, who pursued that kind of traffic. The question is a most important one, and may be studied by a perusal of the 3rd and 4th vols. of Macaulay's History, and in the Historical Biography above mentioned. After Penn's death, his sons held the proprietary governments of the state of Pennsylvania. After the American revolution, the claims of his descendants upon the state of Pennsylvania were bought up for £130,000. Montesquieu calls Penn "the modern Lycurgus." Penn wrote a number of works, which were collected and published in two vols. in 1728. B. in London, 1644; D. at Ruscombe, Berkshire, 1718.

PENNANT, Thomas, pen'-nant, an eminent British naturalist and antiquary, who, after receiving his grammatical education at Wrexham school, was sent to Oxford, where he principally applied himself to the study of natural philosophy. After travelling over England, he went abroad, and was introduced to Voltaire, Buffon, Linnæus, and other eminent men. In 1750 he published "The British Zoology," a work of considerable merit. In 1771 appeared his "Tour in Scotland," which passed through several editions. This was followed, at different periods, by a number of similar works; as "A Tour in Wales," "A Journey from Chester to London," "An Account of London," &c. He also published "Genera of Birds," "Arctic Zoology," "Literary Memoirs;" and, at the time of his death, was engaged on a description of India, of which one volume was printed. B. at Downing, Flintshire, 1726; D. at the same place, 1798.

PENNAR, pen'-nar, the name of two rivers in India. 1. In the presidency of Madras, rising in Mysore, and, after a course of 360 miles, falling into the Bay of Bengal, 100 miles from Madras.—2. Also in Mysore, rising in the Nundydroog Hills, and, after a course of 245 miles, falling into the Bay of Bengal, in lat. 11° 45′ N., lon. 79° 51′ E.

PENNE, pen, two towns and parishes of France, neither with a population above 4,500.

PENNEFATHER, Major-General Sir John Lysaght, pen'-ne-fa'-ther, entered the army in 1818, rising through the various grades until, in the year 1839, he became lieutenant-colonel. In 1843 he served as brigadier under Sir Charles James Napier, and greatly contributed to the victory over the Ameers of Scinde at Meanee, where he received a severe wound. Upon the outbreak of the Russian war in 1854, he was appointed to the command of the first brigade of the second division, and was mentioned in the most flattering terms by Lord Raglan for his bravery at the Alma. At Inkermann he commanded the entire division, in the absence of Sir De Lacy Evans, who was ill on board ship. In that battle he maintained his high reputation for skill and bravery, and contributed in no mean degree to the victory which was gained over the Russians. He was shortly afterwards appointed to the permanent command of the division, was created a major-general, a knight-commander of the Bath, and also received from the emperor of the French the order of the Legion of Honour. B. in Tipperary, Ireland, 1800.

PENNETHORNE, James, pen'-ne-thorn, a modern architect, who holds the appointments of architect and surveyor of her Majesty's parks, palaces, and public buildings, and architect and surveyor of land revenues in London. After spending some time in the office of Mr. Nash, the eminent architect, he was placed with Augustus Pugin, with whom he remained two years. In 1825 he went abroad, and spent two years in studying the architecture of Italy and Sicily. In 1828 he became an assistant to Nash, under whom he was engaged upon the works at Carlton-House Terrace, the walks and gardens of St. James's Park, &c. In 1830 he left Nash, and soon became extensively employed in designing mansions for the nobility and gentry. In 1840 he received the appointments of surveyor of land revenues in London, under the department of the Woods and Forests. In this capacity he carried out a number of improvements in the metropolis, such as New Oxford-Street, Cranbourn Street, the Victoria Park, the Battersea Park, &c. He designed the building for the Museum of Practical Geology in Piccadilly and Jermyn Street, and also the additions to the Ordnance-office in Pall Mall and those to Somerset House. For these latter, some hundred members of the architectural profession subscribed to present him with a gold medal of Sir William Chambers, the architect of Somerset House. B. at Worcester, 1801.

PENNETHORNE, James, younger brother of the preceding, and the author of several important works relative to the mathematical principles of Greek architecture. The principal of these are, "An Investigation of the Principles of Greek Architecture," and "The Principia of the Greek Architects and Artists." B. about 1803.

PENNI, John Francis, pen'-ne, an eminent Italian painter, who was the disciple of Raffaele, to whom he became steward; on which account he obtained the title of Il Fattore. Dr. Waagen considers that many parts of the Raffaele cartoons at Hampton Court were executed by him. B. at Florence, 1488; D. at Naples, 1528.

PENNICUIK, Alexander, pen'-ne-kuke, a Scotch physician, who, after spending his youth abroad, returned to his native country, and occupied himself with literature. He wrote a topographical account of Tweeddale, and a number of poems characteristic of the manners of the gentry and peasantry in his time. He is also said to have given to Allan Ramsay the plot of his "Gentle Shepherd," the scenes of which were laid on his estate of New-hall. B. 1652; D. 1722.

PENNINGHAME, pen'-ning-ham, a parish of Wigtonshire, Scotland, comprising the town of Newton Stewart. Pop. 4,300.

PENNINGTON, pen'-ning-ton, a township of Lancashire, 10 miles from Manchester. Manf. Cotton goods. Pop. 5,000.

PENNINGTON, Isaac, was one of the first and most zealous disciples of George Fox, and wrote several pieces in defence of Quakerism. He also suffered imprisonment several times. D. 1617.

PENNINGTON, Isaac, lord mayor of London in 1640, who headed most of the riots against Charles I., and was one of that king's judges. At the Restoration he was tried and condemned, but respited, and died in the Tower.

PENNISTON, pen'-nis-ton, a market-town and parish of the W. Riding of Yorkshire, 7 miles from Barnsley. Manf. Woollen and cotton goods. Pop. 6,500.—It has a station on the Manchester and Sheffield Railway.

PENNSYLVANIA, pen-sil-vai'-ne-a, one of the United States, bounded on the N. by New York; E. by the river Delaware, which separates it from New Jersey; S. by Delaware, Maryland, and Virginia; and W. by Virginia and Ohio. Area, 46,000 square miles. Desc. It is intersected by different ridges of the Alleghany Mountains, which traverse it from north-east to south-west. Some of those mountains admit of cultivation almost to their summits; and between their numerous ridges there are delightful valleys, with a very rich soil. The other parts are generally level, or agreeably diversified with hill and dale. Rivers. The principal are the Delaware, the Schuylkill, Lehigh, Susquehannah, and Alleghany. There are, besides, numerous small rivers, creeks, and springs. Pro. Wheat, Indian corn, buckwheat, rye, barley, oats, flax, hemp, beans, pease, and potatoes: cherries, peaches, apples, and cider are abundant. There are large dairies in many parts, and there is an excellent breed of horses. Sheep are numerous; and the Merino breeds have been introduced, and thrive well. Wood is plentiful: in the western parts are found the oak, chestnut, beech, sugar-maple, ash, black walnut, bass-wood, elm, hickory, white ash, butternut, hemlock, and locust. Of birds, the most useful are the wild turkey, which inhabits the hilly and mountainous parts: there are, besides, pheasants, partridges, pigeons, ducks, &c. The eastern creeks abound with a white fish called salmon, and trout, shad, herring, carp, eels, rock-fish; the western waters with cat-fish, yellow perch, trout, rock-fish, and pike; and the ponds and smaller streams with excellent trout. Minerals. Iron ore is distributed in large quantities over many parts of the state, and, in some places, copper, lead, and alum are found. Here are also numerous limestone-quarries and various kinds of marble; whilst, in the middle and western parts, there is abundance of coal. Manf. This exceeds all the other states in the extent and variety of its manufactures, which consist chiefly of woollen and cotton fabrics, iron, lead, glass, marble, pottery, paper, gunpowder, bricks, paints, dyes, soap, carriages, and ironmongery of all descriptions. Pop. 2,400,000. Lat. between 39° 44′ and 42° N. Lon. between 74° 40′ and 80° 35′ W. —This state was, in 1681, by James II., granted to William Penn; and its present constitution was framed in 1838.

Penobscot, pe-nob'-skot, a county of Maine, U.S., bounded E. by Washington and Hancock counties, S. by Hancock county, and W. by Kennebeck and Somerset counties. It is watered by the Penobscot. Pop. 64,000.—Also a seaport-town of Maine, on Penobscot Bay, 210 miles from Boston. Pop 2,000.

Penobscot, a large river of Maine, U.S., falling, after a course of 100 miles, into the head of Penobscot Bay, between the towns of Penobscot and Prospect.

Penobscot Bay is on the S. coast of Maine, and contains many islands. Ext. Between the Isle of Holt and Owl's Head, at its entrance, it has a width of 18 miles. Its length from N. to S. is about 30.

Penon de Velez, pai'-none vai'-laith, a fortified town, standing on an elevated rock on the African side of the Strait of Gibraltar, 80 miles from Ceuta. It belongs to Spain, and was founded by Pedro of Navarre, in 1508. In the 16th century it was taken by the Moors; but, in 1664, retaken by the Spaniards. Pop. Unascertained.

Penrith, pen'-rith, an irregularly-built market-town of Cumberland, 15 miles from Carlisle. It has a church, containing some ancient monuments; a free grammar-school, charity schools, and a Sunday school for boys and girls, supported by voluntary contributions; also a public subscription library, a museum of natural curiosities, a market-place, assembly-room, and a union workhouse. Manf. Checks and hats. Pop. 7,500. —It has a station on the Lancaster and Carlisle Railway.

Penryn, pen-rin', a market-town of Cornwall, at the head of a creek which runs into Falmouth harbour, 2 miles from Falmouth. It consists chiefly of one principal street, from which some others diverge at right angles. The market-house and town-hall stand in the principal street; and here are also assembly-rooms and a good custom-house and quay. A considerable trade is carried on in the curing of pilchards, and it exports granite. Pop. 4,000.

Pensa, or Penza, pen'-sa, the capital of a government of the same name in Russia, at the confluence of the Pensa and Sura, on a height, 130 miles from Saratov. It contains a large number of churches and two monasteries. Pop. 11,000.—The Government has an area of 14,662 square miles, and a population of 1,088,000. Lat. between 53° and 55° N. Lon. between 42° 30′ and 43° 30′ E.

Pensacola, pen'-sa-ko'-la, a town of West Florida, in the United States, on the Gulf of Mexico, at the head of a delightful bay, formed by the Escambia and some other rivers in Pensacola Bay, 55 miles from Mobile. It is of an oblong form, and about a mile long. Since the Spaniards conquered it from the English in 1781, it has gradually declined. In 1794, the population did not exceed 400, exclusive of the military and the retainers of the government. It was occupied in 1818 by an American force. A few miles below the town is a U.S. naval yard, inclosed by a brick wall. Lat. 30° 28′ N. Lon. 87° 12′ W.

Pentenisia, pen'-te-nis'-i-a, a group of islands in the Gulf of Ægina, Greece, 10 miles from Ægina.

Pentland Firth, pent'-land, the strait which separates the mainland of Scotland from the Orkney Isles, and connects the Atlantic with the German Ocean. It is only 8 miles over; but, in it, the sea runs with impetuous force by the meeting of so many tides; and there are, besides, several whirlpools and islands, which increase the danger; so that no wind is able to support a vessel against the current.

Pentland Hills, a range of hills in Scotland, about 4 miles west of Edinburgh, and extending about 14 miles towards the western borders of Mid-Lothian. From these hills Edinburgh is supplied with water.

Pentland Skerries, certain small islands at the east end of the Pentland Firth, on the largest of which is a lighthouse, 4 miles from Duncansby Head.

Penzance, pen-zance', a market-town of Cornwall, on the north-west side of Mounts Bay, 9 miles from the Land's End. It has a church, national school, grammar-school, school of industry, a guildhall, market-house, union workhouse, public library, and baths. Its trade is considerable, and consists chiefly in pilchards and other fish, and in shipping lead, tin, and copper, which abound in the vicinity. The pier has been extended to upwards of 800 feet in length, and has a lighthouse. Pop. 9,500.—In 1778, Sir Humphrey Davy was born in the parish.

Pepe, William, pai'-pai, a modern Italian general, who, in 1799, entered the ranks of the republican army, formed in Naples by the French, when they proclaimed the Parthenopean republic; but was taken prisoner, and banished at the restoration of Ferdinand, which shortly afterwards followed. (See Ferdinand IV.) He next served in the Italian legion of the French army, but was permitted to return to Naples in 1801. Under Murat he was appointed officer of the ordnance, and, in 1810, served in the campaign of Catalonia, under Marshal Suchet, who created him general of brigade. He was made a baron by Murat, in 1814. After the death of Murat, he remained at Naples; but became one of the chiefs of the great secret society called the Carbonari, which, in 1821, compelled Ferdinand IV. to grant a constitution similar to that of Spain, and to convoke a parliament at Naples. The Austrian government took umbrage at these measures, and sent two armies towards Naples. Pepe, at the head of some ill-disciplined volunteers, met them, but suffered a defeat, and, being abandoned by his followers, was compelled to fly. He went first to Spain, and afterwards to England, in both of which countries he endeavoured to raise corps of volunteers in the cause of Italian liberty. During his absence he was condemned to death; but he remained safe in London, where he married a rich heiress. In consequence of certain expressions made by Lamartine in his "Last Canto of Childe Harold," relative to the national character of the Italians, General Pepe sent a challenge to the poet, who was wounded in the duel which followed. In 1848 the amnesty permitted him to return to Naples, and the king, submitting to the popular feeling, appointed him to the command of an army sent to co-operate with Charles Albert of Piedmont against Austria; but, shortly afterwards, recalled his troops. Pepe, however, instead of obeying, led the Neapolitans to assist in the defence of Venice. After covering himself with glory by his heroic defence of the fort of Malghera, he, upon the capitulation of Venice, made his escape to Corfu on board a French vessel, and subsequently repaired to Paris; but, having little sympathy with the character of the French people, he shortly afterwards left their capital to take up his residence at Nice, where he resided until his death. He was the author of several works, chiefly descriptive of the events in which he had participated. His "Historical, Political, and Military Memoirs of the Revolution in the Kingdom of Naples" was published at London in 1823, and his Personal Memoirs at Turin, in 1850. B. in Calabria, 1782; D. at Nice, 1855.

PEPE, Florestan, a modern Italian general, and brother of the preceding. At the proclamation of the Parthenopean republic, he took service under its flag. In 1806 he was with the Neapolitan brigade in Spain, and, in the Russian campaign, he covered the retreat of the French rear-guard with his Neapolitan cavalry. Severely wounded, he became, notwithstanding an obstinate resistance, prisoner to the Russians; but was shortly afterwards liberated. Murat created him lieutenant-general in 1815, and, after serving against the Austrians in Upper Italy, he returned to Naples, which he held until the arrival of the latter. Subsequently to the Neapolitan revolution of 1820, he retired from his native country, and remained abroad during several years; but returned at a later period. He took no part in the events of 1848, but continued to live as a private citizen. B. in Calabria, 1780.

PEPIN THE SHORT, pe'-pin, king of France, was the first of the Carlovingian kings. He was at first Mayor of the Palace under Childeric III.; but in 750 he dethroned that monarch, and confined him in a monastery. Having requested and obtained the sanction of the pope, Pepin was constituted king. He assisted Pope Stephen III. against the Longobards, defeated the Saxons, Bavarians, and other German nations, and united Aquitaine to his crown. After a reign of 17 years, he D. at St. Denis, 768. His son Charlemagne succeeded him as king of the Franks.

PEPIN, grandson of Charlemagne, and son of Louis le Débonnaire, became king of Aquitaine in 817. D. 838 or 839.

PEPUSCH, John Christopher, pe'-poosh, an eminent Prussian musician, who, at the age of 15, had the honour of teaching the prince royal. He afterwards settled in England, and was engaged as composer at Drury-lane theatre. The university of Oxford conferred on him the degree of doctor of music. He acquired a considerable fortune by teaching, and by his marriage with an Italian singer. He adapted the music, and composed an overture for the "Beggars' Opera," and wrote a treatise on Harmony. B. at Berlin, 1667; D. in London, 1752.

PEPYS, Samuel, peps, an English writer, who was secretary to the Admiralty in the reigns of Charles II. and James II., having been nominated to a clerkship in that establishment through the interest of his relative the earl of Sandwich. His knowledge of naval administration was very large, and it was to his energy that the affairs of the Admiralty were reduced to order and method. His "Memoirs relating to the Navy" is a well-written work, and his collection of MSS., with his library, now at Magdalen College, Cambridge, is an invaluable treasure of naval knowledge. In 1684 he became president of the Royal Society. But his celebrated "Diary" forms his best claim to remembrance. This work, after lying undeciphered in shorthand characters during 150 years, was published by Lord Braybrooke, in 1825. It is one of the most delightful books in the English language, and a perfect treasury of facts and incidents relative to the times of Charles II. B. in London, 1632; D. in the same city, 1703.

PERA, a suburb of Constantinople. (See CONSTANTINOPLE.)

PERAK, pe-rak', a state of the Malay peninsula, extending along its W. coast, and producing rice, rattans, and tin. Pop. 35,000. Lat. between 3° 40' and 5° N.

PERCIVAL, Thomas, per'-se-val, an English physician and philosophical writer, who received his education in the Warrington grammar-school; after which he went to Edinburgh, where he applied himself to the study of physic. In 1764 he was chosen fellow of the Royal Society, and about the same time went abroad. Having passed some time at Paris, Hamburg, and other places, but principally Leyden, where he took his doctor's degree, he returned, in 1765, to England, and in 1767 settled at Manchester, where he continued in considerable practice till his death. His most important works were, "Instructions to his Children," "Moral and Literary Dissertations," "Medical Ethics," essays, chemical and medical, and several excellent papers in the Memoirs of the Manchester Society, of which he was one of the principal founders and ornaments. B. at Warrington, 1740; D. at Manchester, 1804.

PERCEVAL, Spencer, an English statesman, who was the second son of the earl of Egmont, lord of the Admiralty. He was educated for the legal profession, and was returned a member of the house in 1797. His advance was rapid. He became solicitor and attorney-general, and chancellor of the Exchequer, in quick succession. Finally, he, in 1809, attained the summit of power as first lord of the Treasury. He retained this office until the year 1812, when he was assassinated in the House of Commons by Bellingham. B. in London, 1762.

PERCY, the Family of, per'-se, one of the most distinguished in England. Its founder was William de Percy, who accompanied the Conqueror to England, and received several lordships in Lincoln and York. A descendant of his was one of the barons who obtained the Great Charter from King John. In the reign of Edward I., Henry de Percy obtained Alnwick and other possessions in Northumberland, with which county the name of Percy henceforth became intimately connected. In the reign of Edward III., a Henry de Percy married Mary of Lancaster, daughter of a grandson of Henry III. Another Henry de Percy was created earl of Northumberland by Richard II. in 1377. He distinguished himself against the Scots, and took Berwick. Some years later, the Scots, by corrupting the governor, again made themselves masters of it; on which the duke of Lancaster brought an accusation against the earl in parliament, and he was sentenced to lose his life and estates. But the king having revoked this sentence, the earl laid siege to Berwick and took it. When the duke of Lancaster assumed the crown, with the title of Henry IV., he created the earl constable of England. In the fourth year of that reign, the earl and his son, commonly called Hotspur, defeated the Scots at Halidown Hill, and took the earl of Douglas prisoner. Having demanded the pay due to him as keeper of the Marches, and not receiving a satisfactory answer, the earl took up arms against the king, and placed Hotspur at the head of his troops; but he was slain at the battle of Shrewsbury in 1403; upon which Percy made his submission and received the royal pardon. Notwithstanding this, he collected another army, but was defeated and slain in Yorkshire in 1408. Henry V. restored the title to a son of Hotspur. This second earl was slain at the battle of St. Albans, in 1455; and the third at Towton, in 1460. The fourth earl was killed 1489; the fifth died in 1527. The sixth earl died in 1537 without issue, and the title of Northumberland remained out of the family until it was restored to the Percies by Queen Mary. This earl was put to death by Queen Elizabeth, in 1572, and his brother, who succeeded him, was shot in the Tower. The eleventh earl, in whom the chief male line of Percy became extinct, died at Turin in 1670, in his 26th year. At that period several persons claimed to be of the blood of the Percies; and one of them, a trunkmaker at Dublin, endeavoured to obtain the family titles, but without success. Lady Elizabeth Percy, daughter of the eleventh earl, who married Charles Seymour, duke of Somerset, had a son Algernon, who was created earl of Northumberland in 1749. His daughter, Lady Elizabeth Seymour, married Sir Hugh Smithson, who took the name of Percy on becoming earl of Northumberland, at the death of his wife's father. He was created duke of Northumberland in 1766, and from him is descended the existing peer.

PERCY, Dr. Thomas, a prelate of the Irish church, and distinguished antiquarian, who received his education at the university of Oxford; and, upon entering orders, obtained a living. His first work was a translation of a Portuguese translation of a Chinese novel, which was followed by "Miscellaneous Pieces relating to the Chinese." Between the years 1761-63, he produced some translations of Icelandic poetry, and in 1764 a new version of the "Song of Solomon," with a learned commentary. His "Key to the New Testament" followed; in 1765 he produced the celebrated collection of old English ballad literature, known as the "Reliques of Ancient Poetry." In the following year he became chaplain to the duke and duchess of Northumberland, the name of whose family he boro; and, after receiving other preferments, was created bishop of Dromore in 1782. The "Northumberland Household Book," and "The Hermit of Warkworth," both connected with the history of the Percy family, were also published by him; his last work being a translation of M. Mallet's "Northern Antiquities." After he was ordained a bishop of the Irish church, he relinquished his pen, and devoted himself exclusively to the affairs of his diocese. B. in Shropshire, 1728; D. in Ireland, 1811.

Percy Isles are in the South Pacific Ocean, near the N.E. coast of Australia. They extend from about 21° 32′ to 21° 45′ S. lat.

Perdiccas, per-dik'-kas, the name of three kings of Macedonia, who reigned between the years 695—360 B.C. Perdiccas II. ruled at the commencement of the Peloponnesian war, and took part with Sparta against Athens. Perdiccas III. disputed the throne of Macedonia with Pausanias and Ptolemy Alorites, and, with the support of Iphicrates, the Athenian general, defeated his rivals.

Perdiccas, one of the generals of Alexander the Great, after whose death he aspired to the crown of Macedon; to accomplish which design he endeavoured to form a matrimonial alliance with Cleopatra, sister of Alexander. His project being discovered by Antigonus, he entered into a league with Antipater, Craterus, and Ptolemy, governor of Egypt, against Perdiccas, who marched to Memphis, but was slain in his tent by some of his soldiers, B C. 321.

Perekop, per'-e-kop, a town of Russia, on the isthmus which joins the Crimea to the continent, 85 miles from Simferopol. Near it are most productive salt lakes; but it is very unhealthy, and the inhabitants suffer greatly from fever. Pop. Unascertained. Lat. 46° 8′ 57″ N. Lon. 33° 42′ 0″ E.

Perefixe, Hardouin de Beaumont de, per'-e-fix, an eminent French prelate, who secured the patronage of Cardinal Richelieu, was admitted a doctor of the Sorbonne, and became a distinguished preacher. He was appointed preceptor to Louis XIV., and in 1664 obtained the archbishopric of Paris. He wrote a History of Henry IV., and other works. B. in Poitou, 1605; D. 1670.

Pereira, Jonathan, pe-ri'-ra, a distinguished English physician, who was apprenticed to a surgeon in his 14th year. At 18 he became a student at St. Bartholomew's Hospital, and about a year later, obtained the appointment of apothecary to the Aldersgate-street Dispensary, London. After spending several years as private tutor to medical students, he, in 1825, obtained his diploma from the Royal College of Surgeons. His great work, entitled "Elements of Materia Medica," was first published in 1839, and was founded upon the lectures he had delivered in the Aldersgate School of Medicine, while holding the appointment of chemical lecturer. In the meanwhile, he had lectured upon chemistry and botany at the London Hospital, of which institution he became assistant physician in 1840. Five years afterwards, he was elected fellow of the College of Physicians, before which time he had produced an important work upon "Food and Diet." His later appointments were physician to the London Hospital, examiner at the London University, and fellow of the Royal and Linnæan societies. His valuable life was brought to a sudden termination through a melancholy accident, which was thus described:—"He had been to consult Professor Quekett (of the College of Surgeons) on a scientific question, and whilst descending a staircase leading to the Hunterian Museum, made a false step, fell, and ruptured the rectus femoris muscle of both legs. In all probability at the same time some internal injury was sustained by the heart or larger vessels; but as only local inconvenience was experienced, no danger was apprehended; but whilst getting into bed on the 20th of January, he felt a violent throb in the region of the heart, when he became fully aware that a speedy termination of his life was at hand, and this impression was verified within twenty minutes after." B. at Shoreditch, London, 1804; D. in London, 1853.

Pereira, Nunez Alvarez, "the Portuguese Cid," was created counsellor of state by John I. of Portugal in 1383, and subsequently reduced several cities of Alentejo, for which services he was nominated constable of the kingdom. In 1385 he commanded a wing of the army at the battle of Aljubarrota, and at a later period rendered the most important services to his sovereign. After an energetic career, both military and diplomatic, he retired to a monastery in the year 1421, where he remained secluded from the world until his death. B. about 1360; D. 1431.

Pereira-Gomez, George, pai-rai-eer'-a go'-maith, a Spanish physician, who wrote a work to prove that brute animals are mere machines, and several other books upon medical subjects. B. at Medina del Campo, about 1500; D. about 1570.

Perejaslav, per'-e-jas-lav', a town of Russia, 140 miles from Poltava, with a trade in cattle, horses, raisins, and corn. Pop. 7,200.

Perez, Antonio, pai'-raith, a Spanish writer and statesman, was the natural son of Gonsalvo Perez, secretary of state to Charles V., and himself became secretary to Philip II. He was employed in state affairs, but afterwards fell into disgrace; on which he retired to England, and afterwards to France. His "Letters" and "Narrative," in which he gives an account of his transactions with Philip, and his subsequent trial and tortures, are curious and important. His works were printed at Paris in 1598. D. at Paris, 1616.

Pergamo, per'-ga-mo, a town of Asiatic Turkey, once a great capital, but now of little importance. Lat. 39° 11′ N. Lon. 27° E.

Pergolesi, John Baptist, pair-go-lai'-se, an Italian musical composer, who studied under Gaetano Greco, one of the ablest musicians in Italy; after which the prince of Stigliano took him under his protection. His countrymen style him the Domenichino of music. His "Salve Regina," "Stabat Mater," and "Gloria in Excelsis," are his most admired compositions. B. at Casoria, near Naples, 1704; D. near the same city, 1734.

Periander, per-i-ăn'-der, the tyrant of Corinth, who was called, by his flatterers, one of the seven sages of Greece. He began with overturning the constitution and liberty of his country, and usurping the sovereignty, B.C. 628. The commencement of his reign was mild, but he soon showed himself a thorough despot. He committed fearful cruelties on the Corinthians, put to death his wife Melissa, and banished his son Lycophron for lamenting her fate. According to Aristotle, he is the first ruler who reduced despotic government to a system. D. 585 B.C.

Pericles, per'-i-klees, a celebrated Athenian, who distinguished himself as a general, statesman, and orator. Having acquired great popularity among his countrymen, he prevailed upon them to alter their government; and caused Cimon, and his other rivals, to be banished; thus constituting himself sole master of Athens. He commanded the army in the Peloponnesus, and gained a great victory, near Nemæa, over the Sicyonians. He next took Byzantium and Samos, at the siege of which place were invented several warlike machines. Pericles advised the Athenians to continue the war against Sparta, for which he was censured and disgraced; but he recovered his popularity and the government, and died of the plague which desolated Athens, B.C. 429. Pericles was the great patron of arts, letters, and, indeed, luxury. In his age, all three flourished to their highest extent.

Perigueux, per'-i-gu, a town of France, in the department of the Dordogne, on the Ille, 40 miles from Angoulême. It has a cathedral and a town-hall, besides several Roman antiquities. Manf. Cutlery and nails; it has also tanneries and woollen-factories. Pop. 14,000. This place was several times taken and retaken by the English and French in the 13th, 14th, and 15th centuries.

Perim, pe'-rim, an island off the Arabian coast, in the Strait of Bab-el-Mandeb. It has a length of 5 miles, and belongs to the British. Lat. 12° 38′ N. Lon. 43° 23′ E.

Peringskiold, John, per-ing-ske'-old, a learned Swede, who became secretary of antiquities, counsellor to the king of Sweden, and professor at Upsal. His works are, a "History of the Kings of the North," "History of the Kings of Norway," and "Historical and Chronological Tables from Adam to Jesus Christ." He was also the editor of the works of Messenius. B. in Sudermania, 1654; D. 1720.

PERIZONIUS, James, per'-i-zo'-ni-us, a learned Dutch writer, who studied first at Deventer, and afterwards at Utrecht, under Grævius, by whose means he obtained the rectorship of the Latin school at Delft, and the professorship of history and eloquence at Francker. In 1693 he removed to Leyden, where he filled the chair of Greek and history with reputation. Among other works, he wrote "Animadversiones Historicæ," and "Dissertations on several Points of Ancient History." B. at Dam, Holland, 1651; D. at Leyden, 1715.

PERKIN WARBECK. (See WARBECK, Perkin.)

PERKINS, William, per'-kins, an English divine, who received his education at Christ's College, Cambridge, of which he became fellow. He was a rigid Calvinist, and published several works on that form of faith; some of which, being translated into Dutch, were replied to by Arminius, and occasioned those famous disputes for the settling of which the synod of Dordt was called. B. at Marston, Warwickshire, 1558; D. 1602.

PERM, perm, a government or province of Russia, situate chiefly in European, but partly in Asiatic Russia, and adjacent to the government of Viatka on the W., and Tobolsk on the E. Area. Estimated at 130,000 square miles. Desc. Three parts of it are covered with woods, and the rest of the soil so sterile as almost to be incapable of culture. Rivers. The Tobol in Asia and the Kama in Europe. Minerals. Gold, copper, platinum, iron, and salt. Pop. 1,690,000. Lat. between 55° 40′ and 62° N. Lon. between 53° 10′ and 65° E.—This province was, in the 13th century, ruined by the Mongols. Previous to that it was the centre of a flourishing empire.

PERM, the chief place of the preceding government, on the Kama, 240 miles from Viatka. It has some neat public buildings, and carries on an active traffic in metals, wrought in surrounding country. Pop. 12,000.

PERNAMBUCO, per'-nam-boo'-ko, a province of Brazil, bounded N. and E. by the Atlantic Ocean, S. by Bahia, and E. by the desert territory. Area. Estimated at 100,000 square miles. It abounds in sugar-cane, cotton, and Brazil-wood. Pop. Unascertained; probably 300,000. Lat. between 7° and 14° 35′ S. Lon. between 34° 50′ and 47° 20′ E.

PERNAMBUCO, or ST. ANTONIO DO RECIFE, a town of Brazil, and capital of the province of the same name, which consists of three divisions, Recife, St. Antonio, and Boa Vista. The two first of these are situate on two flat sand-banks, surrounded by the sea, and connected together by a bridge. St. Antonio is connected with Boa Vista, on the continent, also by a wooden bridge. The greatest part of the extent of sand between Olinda, a town about 3 miles distant, on the same sandbank as Recife, and the latter, remains uncovered, is open to the sea, and the surf there is very violent. The tide enters between the bridges, and encircles the middle compartment. The first division of the town is composed of brick houses, of three, four, and even five stories in height: most of the streets are narrow, and there are no public buildings that require notice. St. Antonio, or the middle town, is composed chiefly of large houses and broad streets. Here are the governor's palace, treasury, town-hall and prison, the barracks, Franciscan, Carmelite, and Penha convents; and several churches, the interiors of which are very handsomely ornamented. This, which is the principal division of the town, comprises several squares, and has, to a certain degree, a gay and lively appearance. The river Capibaribe discharges its waters into the channel between St. Antonio and Boa Vista. The harbour belonging to Recife, called the Mosqueiro, situate on the outward bank, is formed by a reef of rocks, which runs parallel with the town, at a very small distance. The town is defended by several forts. Pop. about 25,000. Lat. 8° 3′ 6″ N. Lon. 34° 51′ 7″ W. (See OLINDA.)

PERNAU, per'-nou, a fortified town of Russia, on the Gulf of Riga, 105 miles from Riga. It is defended by a citadel, and comprises an old and a new town, with two suburbs. It has a trade in flax, flax, and grain. Pop. 7,000.

PERNES, pairn, a parish and town of France, in the department Vaucluse, 4 miles from Carpentras. Pop. 5,500.

PERONNE, pe-ron', a fortified town of France, in the department of the Somme, on the Somme, 20 miles from Cambray. It is a place of strength, and bore the name of Pucelle until the 26th of June, 1815, when it was stormed by a body of British. Manf. Linen, cotton, and cambric. Pop. 5,000.

PEROSA, pe-ro'-sa, a town of Sardinia, Piedmont, 8 miles from Pinerolo. Pop. 2,500.

PEROTE, pe-ro'-tat, a market-town of the Mexican Confederation, 88 miles from Vera Cruz, on the route to Mexico. Near it is a lofty mountain of the same name. Pop. 2,500.

PEROUSE. (See LA PEROUSE.)

PERPIGNAN, pair'-peen-yawng, a town of France, in the department of the Eastern Pyrenees, on the Tet, 35 miles from Narbonne. It is a place of strength, and accounted one of the keys of the kingdom on the side of Spain. The citadel is very strong. The cathedral is the only building worth notice. Manf. Woollen, silk, soap, paper, and hats. Pop. 22,000.—In the 15th and 16th centuries, this place was taken by the French; and in 1793 a battle was fought in its neighbourhood between the Spaniards and the French, in which the former were defeated.

PERRANZABULOE, per'-ran-zab-u-lo, a parish of Cornwall, near its N. coast, 6 miles from Truro. For centuries its church was buried in sand, and exhumed in 1835. In its neighbourhood are tin and copper-mines. Pop. 3,200.

PERRAULT, Claude, per'-rolte, a celebrated French architect, who studied medicine, and wrote some works on that subject, but did not practise. His taste for the fine arts, particularly architecture, drew him from his first profession. He designed the east front and colonnades of the Louvre, the Observatory at Paris, the grotto at Versailles, and other great works. He also translated Vitruvius into French, which he illustrated with fine designs of his own. Perrault was admitted a member of the Academy of Sciences, though Boileau had satirized him as a physician turned mason. His other works are "An Abridgment of Vitruvius," "Description of Machines of My Invention," "On the Ancient Columns of Architecture and their Ornaments," "Memoirs for a Natural History of Animals." B. at Paris, 1613; D. in the same city, 1688.

PERRAULT, Charles, brother of the preceding. He had, from his youth, a fine taste for literature, particularly poetry. Colbert appointed him comptroller-general of the public buildings; and Perrault made use of the influence he had with that minister in promoting the arts and assisting worthy men. He became a member of the French Academy, and was one of the institutors of that of Belles-lettres and Inscriptions. He also contributed to the Memoirs of the Academy of Painting, Sculpture, and Architecture. After the death of Colbert he was discharged from his post; on which he devoted himself wholly to letters. His poem on the Age of Louis the Great, in which he exalted the modern authors over all the ancients, was highly censured and ridiculed. He then ventured to publish his "Parallel of the Ancients and Moderns," which gave still more offence, and occasioned a violent controversy between him and Boileau. The celebrated fairy tales, known in England as "The Stories of Mother Goose," are said to have been written by him, although they are usually ascribed to his son, Perrault d'Armancourt. B. at Paris, 1628; D. 1703.

PERRON, James Davy du, per'-rawng, a celebrated cardinal, was born of Calvinist parents, and was educated under his father, acquiring a great knowledge of the Latin, Greek, and Hebrew languages, as well as of the mathematics, philosophy, and history. His proficiency was such that Philip Desportes, abbot of Tryon, reported him to Henry III. of France as a prodigy of memory. Having renounced the Protestant religion, he entered into orders, and became famous as a preacher, but more as a controversialist. His success in converting Protestants was great; and among others whom he brought over to his church, were Henry and John Spondanus. In 1593 he became bishop of Evreux, and, in 1600, he had a conference on matters of religion with D'Aubigné and Mornay, in the presence of the king, in which Perron was equally matched. This conference procured him the dignity of cardinal. He was employed on several important negotiations, and was made grand almoner of France and archbishop of Sens. Du Perron was a man of great policy and ambition, and his learning was various and profound. His favourite authors were Rabelais and Montaigne. He wrote a treatise on the Eucharist, another against King James I. of England; letters, &c.; which were all collected into 3 vols., with his life prefixed. B. 1556; D. at Paris, 1618.

PERRONET, John Rodolphus, per'-ro-nai, an eminent French engineer, who was instructed by Beausire, architect to the city of Paris, under whom he made great progress. About 1745 he became inspector of the school of engineers, of which he was afterwards director. France is indebted to him for several of its finest bridges and best roads, the canal of Burgundy and other great works. For his public services he was honoured with the order of St. Michael, was admitted a member of the Academy of Sciences at Paris, of the Royal Society of London, and of the Academy of Stockholm. He wrote a description of the bridges which he had constructed, "Memoirs on the Method of constructing Grand Arches of Stone from 200 to 500 feet." B. at Surônes, 1708; D. 1794.

PERROT, Nicholas. (See ARLANCOURT.)

PERROT, Sir John, per'-rot, an eminent English statesman, was one of the knights of the Bath at the coronation of Edward VI., who had a great partiality for him. At the beginning of the reign of Mary he was sent to prison for harbouring Protestants; but, by the good offices of friends, he was discharged. He assisted at the coronation of Elizabeth, who sent him, in 1572, to Ireland, as lord-president of Munster, which was in a state of rebellion, but, by his promptitude, was quickly reduced to obedience. He was afterwards appointed admiral of a fleet on the coast of Ireland, which was threatened with invasion by the Spaniards; and he continued cruising there till the reason for such an enterprise was over. In 1593 he was made lord deputy of Ireland, where he carried things with so high a hand as to give great offence, and he was recalled in 1588, and sent to the Tower. In 1592 he was tried by a special commission, found guilty of high treason, and sentenced to death. The queen, however, was persuaded of his innocence, and respited him; but he fell ill, and died in confinement the same year. B. in Pembrokeshire, 1527.

PERRY, James, per'-re, an eminent political writer, who received his education at the grammar-school and Marischal College, Aberdeen. After being employed in an advocate's office at Aberdeen, he went to Edinburgh, and next to Manchester; finally, he repaired to London in 1771, where he obtained employment upon the newspapers. Subsequently he became part proprietor and editor of the Morning Chronicle, which, under his management, assumed very great importance among the London newspaper press. In 1810 he was brought to trial before Lord Ellenborough for alleged libel; but, after eloquently defending himself, was found not guilty. Besides his numerous excellent contributions to the Morning Chronicle, he wrote some spirited pamphlets and pleasing pieces of poetry. He was the friend of most of the literary celebrities of his time. B. in Aberdeenshire, 1756; D. at Brighton, 1821.

PERRY, John, an English engineer, who was invited to Russia by Peter the Great, and was there employed in forming a communication between the Volga and the Don; also in making the river Veronise navigable, and improving the Russian navy; for which services he was badly requited. In 1712 he returned to England, and was engaged in stopping the Dagenham breach, in Essex, of which he published an account. He was also the author of "The present State of Russia." D. 1733.

PERRY, the name of several counties in the United States, with populations varying between 7,500 and 30,000. They are in the states of Alabama, Illinois, Indiana, Pennsylvania, Missouri, Ohio, and Tennessee. —Also the name of several townships, none of them with a population above 5,000.

PERRY BAR, a hamlet of Staffordshire, 4 miles from Birmingham. Pop. 2,000.—It has a station on the London and North-Western Railway.

PERSAIM, per-saim', a town of the Birman empire, in the province of Pegu, on the Irrawadi, here called the Persaim, 100 miles from Rangoon. Pop. about 3,000. Lat. 16° 50′ N. Lon. 95° E.

PERSAUTE, per-so'-te, a river of Prussia, falling, after a course of 70 miles, into the Baltic, at Colberg.

PERSEPOLIS, per-sep'-o-lis, the ancient capital of Persia, 30 miles from Shiraz. Its ruins may be numbered among the most remarkable monuments of early magnificence.

PERSERIN, or PRISEREND, per'-se-rin, a town of European Turkey, in Romania, 80 miles from Scutari. It has a large number of mosques, a citadel, and is the residence of a Turkish governor. Manf. Firearms. Pop. 25,000.

PERSEUS, per'-se-us, a celebrated mythological hero, son of Jupiter and Danaë, was no sooner born than he was cast upon the sea, with his mother Danaë; but the boat which carried them was driven upon the island of Seriphos, one of the Cyclades, where they were found by a fisherman, and carried to Polydectes, the king of the place. They were treated with great humanity, and Perseus was intrusted to the care of the priests of Minerva's temple. His rising genius soon displeased Polydectes, who wished to offer violence to Danaë, yet feared the resentment of her son. Polydectes, however, resolved to remove every obstacle. He invited to an entertainment a number of friends, each of whom had to present the monarch with a beautiful horse. Perseus was among the guests, as Polydectes knew that he could not receive from him the expected present. Perseus told the king, that as he could not give him a horse, he would bring him the head of the Gorgon Medusa. The offer was doubly agreeable to Polydectes, as the attempt might end in the ruin of Perseus. But the innocence of Perseus was patronized by the gods. Pluto lent him his helmet, Minerva her buckler, and Mercury his wings and a short dagger. With these arms, Perseus traversed the air, conducted by Minerva; and having discovered from the Graiæ, the sisters of the Gorgons, the place of their residence, he instantly flew to it. According to Hesiod and Apollodorus, it was beyond the Western Ocean. Having found them asleep, he approached them, and cut off Medusa's head at one blow. The noise awoke the two sisters; but Pluto's helmet rendered Perseus invisible. The conqueror made his way through the air, and from the blood of Medusa's head sprang those innumerable serpents in the deserts of Libya. Chrysaor also, with his golden sword, arose from the drops of blood, as well as the horse Pegasus. Meantime Perseus had crossed the deserts of Libya; but the approach of night obliged him to alight in the territories of Atlas, king of Mauritania, where the monarch refused Perseus hospitality. Perseus, finding himself inferior to Atlas, showed him Medusa's head, and instantly he was changed into a large mountain, which bore the same name, in Africa. Perseus continued his flight; and as he passed over Libya, he discovered, on the coasts of Æthiopia, the naked Andromeda, exposed to a sea monster. He was struck at the sight, and offered her father, Cepheus, to deliver her if he obtained her in marriage. Cepheus consented, and immediately Perseus flew towards the monster, then advancing to devour Andromeda, plunged his dagger in his right shoulder, and destroyed him. This happy event was attended with the greatest rejoicings, and the nuptials were celebrated with the greatest festivity. The universal joy, however, was soon disturbed. Phineus, Andromeda's uncle, attempted to carry away the bride; a bloody battle ensued, and Perseus again employed the Gorgon's head against his adversaries, who were instantly turned to stone, each in the attitude in which he then stood. After this adventure, he retired to Seriphos, where he arrived at the moment that his mother fled to the altar of Minerva to avoid Polydectes, who attempted to offer her violence. Polydectes met the same fate as Atlas and Phineus; and Dictys, who had formerly saved the life of Perseus and Danaë, was placed by Perseus on the throne of Seriphos. He then restored the armour he had received from the gods, having placed the Gorgon's head on the ægis of Minerva. After these exploits, Perseus embarked for the Peloponnesus with his mother and Andromeda. When he reached the coast, he was informed that Teutamias, king of Larissa, was then celebrating funeral games in honour of his father. This intelligence drew him to Larissa, to signalize himself in throwing the quoit, of which, according to some, he was the inventor. But here he was attended by an evil fate, and had the misfortune to kill his grandfather Acrisius with a quoit; whereby the oracle was fulfilled. This unfortunate event greatly depressed the spirits of Perseus. By the death of Acrisius he was entitled to the throne of Argos; but he refused to reign there, and exchanged his kingdom for that of Tirynthus, and the maritime coast of Argolis. Having settled in this part of the Peloponnesus, he determined to found a new city, which he made the capital of his dominions, and which he called Mycenæ, because the pommel of his sword, called by the Greeks myces, had fallen there. The time of his death is unknown, yet it is universally agreed that he received divine honours, like the rest of the ancient heroes.

PERSEUS, king of Macedon, succeeded his father, Philip V., B.C. 179. He endeavoured to form an alliance of the Greek states against the Romans, who thereupon marched an army into Macedonia. In 168 B.C., the Romans, under Paulus Æmilius, met Perseus, who was totally defeated at Pydna. The king fled to Thrace, but afterwards surrendered to the Romans, and was conveyed to Rome. He is said to have subsequently died in confinement. His son Philip is stated to have acted as scribe to the township of Alba, in the mountains of Marsi, near Lake Fucinus.

PERSHORE, per'-shor, a market-town of Worcestershire, on the Avon, 9 miles from Worcester. It was once famed for its abbey, of which there are now but few vestiges. A considerable part of the church, known by the name of the Holy Cross, still remains. Manf. Hosiery. Pop. about 3,000.

PERSIA, per'-she-a (Persian, ERAN, e-ran'), a country of Asia, which may generally be considered as the most opulent and powerful of any to the west of India. The region which seems to be most properly considered as Persia, is bounded on the W. by Asiatic Turkey, N. by Transcaucasia and the Caspian Sea, E. by Afghanistan and Beloochistan, and S. by the Persian Gulf and Arabian Sea. Divisions. These are thirteen, and are named Azerbijan, Irak Ajemi, Ardelan, Luristan, Khuzistan, Fars, Laristan, Kerman, Ghilan, Mazanderan, Astrabad, Khorasan, and Yezd. Area, 500,000 square miles. Desc. Mountainous, being intersected by the immense chain of Caucasus, which fills the interval between the Black Sea and the Caspian. Southwards are the mountains of Armenia and Koordistan, which connect themselves with Mount Taurus. These are very lofty, and form the frontier and debatable ground between the Persian and Turkish empires. The interior consists of an immense dry salt plain, traversed, however, by many mountains and streams, usually lost in the sands, or formed into lakes. These, however, are the means of producing all the fertility which the empire can boast; and, when they are abundant, render the plains through which they flow, beautiful and luxuriant in an extraordinary degree. That of Shiraz is considered the finest of Persia, and almost of the East. The plain of Ispahan is only second to it. The provinces on the Caspian, watered from the great chains of Caucasus and Elburz, are of very remarkable fertility. Rivers. These belong mostly to the frontier. The Euphrates and Tigris are entirely included within the pashalic of Bagdad, whilst the Cyrus and Araxes are comprehended within the Russian frontier. The Oxus belongs properly to Tartary, and the Hindmend to Cabul. Zoology. There are few animals peculiar to the country. The domesticated include most of those common to Europe, with an excellent breed of mules, the camel, the ass, and the goat, from which a valuable wool, similar to that of Tibet, is obtained. Its wild animals are lions, bears, tigers, wild boars, jackals, wolves, and hyænas. Pro. The centre and south of Persia being almost entirely destitute of trees, yet abounds in fruits; and the vine flourishes in several provinces. The mulberry in the northern provinces is so extremely abundant, as to render silk the staple produce of the empire. The rich and well-watered plains of Ghilan and Mazanderan yield the sugar-cane in considerable plenty; but a deficiency of water is, in general, the great want of the country. A vast extent of it is left in pasture, and tenanted by wandering shepherds, like those of Tartary and Arabia, who frequently resort to robbery for a subsistence, rendering both life and property insecure. Poppies are largely grown for the sake of opium, and roses for the highly-valued extract which they produce. A third of the country, however, is nothing more than a desert. Minerals. None worked of importance, except salt, which is abundant, the ground being everywhere more or less impregnated with it; also all the lakes. Naphtha, or bitumen, is found in pits 3 feet in diameter, and 10 or 12 deep, which fill of themselves, after a certain period. The mountains also produce turquoises and other precious stones. Manf. Important; the luxury and splendour of the great affording an extensive demand for the finer fabrics, and for works of ornament. In producing dyes, the Persians excel; and the wool of their flocks is manufactured into beautiful carpets and shawls. Silk is also a great staple, either by itself, or mixed with cotton and wool; and they particularly excel in brocade and embroidery. Arms are extensively fabricated; and large quantities of leather, paper, and porcelain, nearly equal to that of China. Inhabitants. The Persians are gay, lively, and active; ostentatious and profuse in their dress, lavishing upon their persons jewels and gold ornaments of all descriptions. There is no country where the beard is regarded with such veneration, it being repeatedly, during the day, washed, combed, and adjusted. They are the most learned people of the East; poetry and the sciences may even be considered as their ruling passion. In the former, their fame is decidedly superior to that of any other oriental nation; the names of Hafiz, Ferdusi, and Sadi are classic even in Europe; their effusions, however, are chiefly confined to love-songs, and are too sensual and hyperbolical for Europeans. Morality is much studied in Persia, though little practised. Religion. Mahometan, of the sect of Sunnites, or of the followers of Ali. Gov. Despotic, under a shah, whose subjects are considered as his slaves. Army. 100,000, mostly composed of irregular cavalry. But the defence of Persia rests mainly upon the wandering tribes, which, by a great effort, may be raised to 150,000 or 200,000 men: they receive no regular pay. Pop. Variously estimated; perhaps about 10,000,000. Lat. between 26° and 40° N. Lon. between 44° and 61° E. The Persians, as a nation, first rose into notice on the ruins of the great empires founded on the Euphrates. Babylon was taken by Cyrus, and his empire extended wider than any before established in the world. It comprised, on one side, the west of India; on the other, Asia Minor, Syria, and Egypt; and was only bounded by the prodigies of valour with which the Greeks defended their small territory. After a feeble struggle, it succumbed to the brave and disciplined armies of Alexander. It was then split into fragments by the decease of its founder; but Greeks and Greek sovereigns continued, during several centuries, to reign over Asia. About two centuries before Christ, Artaxerxes founded the monarchy of the Parthians; and, in the third century arose the dynasty of the Sassanides, who restored the name, with the religion and laws, of ancient Persia. They were overthrown by the Mahometan invaders, who suffered in their turn from the successive invasions by the descendants of Zingis, Timur, and by the Turks, who entirely changed the aspect of Western Asia. At length, in 1506, a native dynasty again arose, under Abbas, who placed himself on the throne. His posterity having sunk into voluptuousness, Persia, in the beginning of the last century, was overrun by the Afghans, who carried fire and sword through its remotest extremities, and reduced its proudest capitals to ashes. The atrocities of the Afghans were avenged, and the independence of Persia vindicated, by Nadir Shah; but though the victories of this daring chief threw a lustre on his country, after his death, it was almost torn to pieces by civil war, till the fortune of arms gave a decided superiority to Kerim, or Kurreem Khan. His death gave rise to another disputed succession, with civil wars as furious as before. At length, Aga Mahommed, a eunuch, raised himself, by crimes and daring, to the sovereignty, and not only swayed it during his lifetime, but transmitted it to his nephew, who assumed the title of Futteh Ali Shah.

PERSIA, two townships in the United States, neither with a population above 2,300.

PERSIAN GULF, called also the Sea of Ommon, and the Green Sea, an extensive bay of the Indian Ocean, which, stretching in a W.N.W. direction, divides the Persian from the Arabian shore, the two uniting at its head. Ext. Nearly 600 miles in length, and 220 at its greatest breadth; but the entrance at Cape Mussledoon is not broader than 55 miles. It contains numerous islands, but its shores are arid and sterile.

PERSIGNY, Jean-Gilbert-Victor-Fialin, per-seen'-ye, a modern French politician and diplomatist, whose father having experienced great losses by commercial speculations, entered the army, and was killed at Salamanca, in 1812. Victor Persigny, after studying at the college of Limoges and in the cavalry school at Saumur, received the appointment of quartermaster of the 4th hussars in 1828. At first a royalist, his political opinions underwent so decided a change, that in 1830 he was an active supporter of the revolution. These predilections, however, cost him his post in the army, and, in 1831, he found himself in the French capital, without either interest or fortune, but obtained employment as contributor to the Temps journal. About the year 1833 he dropped the patronymic Fialin, to assume the name and title of Viscount de Persigny, which had belonged to his family for 200 years. In the following year he was converted to the cause of Bonapartism, of which he became an energetic supporter. These views, persistently expressed in a journal which he had founded, secured for him the patronage of the ex-king, Joseph Bonaparte, and led to an introduction to Prince Louis Napoleon, at that period resident at Arenemburg. To Louis Napoleon he attached himself with the most complete devotion, and in his service travelled over France and Germany. He was the principal instigator of the attempt at Strasburg. (See NAPOLEON III.) He escaped capture, however, and for some time wandered about Germany, where he composed his "Narrative of the Enterprise of Prince Napoleon," in which he attributed the failure of the Strasburg plot to fatality. Four years later he was again the associate of the prince at the landing at Boulogne. For this attempt he was condemned to 20 years' imprisonment; but on his health becoming frail, he obtained almost complete liberty. Immediately after the fall of Louis Philippe, in 1848, he hastened to Paris, and devoted himself to the advancement of the Napoleonic interests; and it was to his unremitting zeal that the election of Louis Napoleon as president of the republic was in great part due. He was rewarded by the appointment of aide-de-camp to the president, and a high post in the staff of the National Guard. At the coup d'état, of which he was undoubtedly one of the chief instigators, he, at the head of an infantry regiment, took possession of the National Assembly. Napoleonism triumphant, Persigny was not left unrewarded. In 1852 he succeeded M. de Morny as minister of the interior; in which capacity he countersigned the decrees which confiscated the property of the Orleans family. In 1854 he resigned, in consequence of ill-health. In 1855 he went as ambassador to the court of St. James's, where he remained until the commencement of 1858, when he was replaced by Marshal Pelissier. In the meanwhile, he had married the daughter of the late prince of Moscow; upon which occasion he received a large marriage portion, and from the emperor the title of count. He subsequently returned to the British court, as ambassador of France, but returned to Paris to assume the office of minister of the interior; in which capacity he inaugurated several measures for relieving the restrictions under which the French press had hitherto lain. B. at St. Germain-Lespinasse, in the department of the Loire, 1808.

PERSIUS, Aulus Flaccus, per'-si-us, a Latin satirical poet, who studied, with Lucian, under Cornutus the Stoic, for whom he had a great regard. Persius wrote in the reign of Nero, whom he satirized with great severity. His works are enigmatic, and have been compared, in this respect, to the Greek Lycophron. They have been translated and annotated by Gifford, Dryden, Sir William Drummond, and others. B. at Volaterræ, Etruria, about 34; D. about 64.

PERSON, per'-son, a county of the United States, in N. Carolina. Area, 400 square miles. Pop. 11,000.

PERTH, perth, the capital of Perthshire, and formerly the metropolis of Scotland, stands on the Tay, over which is a fine stone bridge, 33 miles from Edinburgh. It is regular and well built, having, on the north and south, two beautiful green meadows, called Inches, each of which is about 1¼ mile in circuit. Adjoining the North Inch is a crescent, a place, and a terrace: here is also an elegant theatre and a barrack. The public buildings are the town-house, prison, adjoining which, facing the Tay, is an elegant building, containing halls for the public offices; the church of St. John the Baptist, a structure of very great antiquity; the Guildhall, and the Coffee-room. A little to the south and west of the new church is an old hospital, a considerable building, now used as warehouses, founded by James VI. At the extremity of the South Inch stands the depôt, built by government for the reception of prisoners of war, now used as a depôt for military stores; the Marshall monument, appropriated, with a large library, to the public; various schools, academies, and public charities. Perth is the general terminus of the Edinburgh and Perth, the Central, the Scottish Midland, Perth and Aberdeen railways: the Dundee Railway also crosses the Tay here. Manf. Coloured cotton stuffs, ginghams, cutlery, and shawls; besides bleachfields, breweries, distilleries, dye-works, ropewalks, foundries, and tanneries. Pop. of borough, 25,000. Lat. 56° 23′ 50″ N. Lon. 3° 26′ 20″ W.—Perth is a town of great antiquity. In the year 1210, King William renewed its charter at Stirling; and therein it is expressly stated that he confirms the privileges which the burgh enjoyed in the time of his grandfather, King David, who died in 1153, and adds to it new privileges. Prior to the reign of the Stuart family, it was the usual residence of the Scottish monarchs, and has been the scene of many important transactions recorded in Scottish history. Its vicinity is both beautiful and fertile.

PERTH, a district of W. Australia, between lat. 32° S. and lon. 116° E. On the W. it has the ocean, and on its other sides the districts of Murray, York, and Twiss.

PERTHES, Christopher Frederick, pairt'-es, an eminent German bookseller, who, after experiencing many difficulties in early life, established himself in business at Hamburg, in 1799. In 1822 he left his shop at Hamburg and went to Gotha, where he commenced the publication of the "Almanack de Gotha," and was employed to disseminate the works of Neander, Bunsen, and other celebrated writers. The "General History of the States of Europe," to which many of the first German writers contributed, also issued from his establishment. After organizing a most extensive business concern, he retired from the management about 1838. His correspondence with almost all the celebrities of his day has been published, and is very interesting. B. at Rudolfstadt, 1772; D. near Gotha, 1843.

PERTHSHIRE, an important county of Scotland, bounded on the E. by the county of Forfar; S.E. by the Firth of Tay and the counties of Kinross and Fife; S. by the Forth and the counties of Clackmannan and Stirling; S.W. by Dumbartonshire; W. by the county of Argyle; N.W. by the county of Inverness; and N. by a part of the same county, and that of Aberdeen. Area, 2,640 square miles. Desc. Mountainous; the Grampians extending in a N.E. direction through it. The southern front of these mountains has, in many places, a gradual and pleasing slope into a champaign country of great extent and fertility; and they are intersected in a thousand directions by winding valleys, which are watered by numerous rivers and brooks, clad with the richest pastures, and sheltered by thriving woods, that fringe the lakes and run along the streams. The highest summits are Benlawers, on the north side of Loch Tay, 3,945 feet high; Benmore, 3,197 feet high; Schihallion, 3,564 feet; Benledi, 2,863 feet; Beingloe, 1,040 feet; and Turleum, 1,400. To the south, and parallel to the Grampians, there run the Sidlaw and Ochil hills. Along the south side of the Grampians, and between the Ochil and the Sidlaw hills, a large valley or strath runs in the direction and along the whole length of the Grampian Mountains. This valley is of unequal breadth, from 10 to 15 miles, and upwards of 100 miles in length. It is intersected by various beautiful rivers, and is eminently fertile in every species of grain. Along the banks of all the rivers of this county, after they descend from the northern hills into the champaign country, there are extensive tracts of rich land, under high cultivation, adorned with elegant mansions and extensive plantations. The Carse of Gowrie, between the Sidlaw Hills and the Tay, is a level tract of rich clay or alluvial soil, deposited in the course of ages, highly cultivated and abundantly fruitful. The tract of country also watered by the Forth resembles the Carse of Gowrie. Rivers. The Tay and Forth, and their tributaries, the Lyon, Garry, Bran, Isla, Almond, Erne, Teath, Allan, and Devon. Lakes. The principal are Tay, Rannoch, Ericht, Erne, and Catherine. Pro. Wheat, barley, oats, beans, potatoes, turnips, and fruits. Minerals. Coal, limestone, granite, and freestone of the best quality. In Monteath there is a ridge of steatites or rock-soap, and a very valuable clay in great beds near Culross. Manf. Linen, woollen, and cotton stuffs, leather, and paper. Pop. 140,000.—This county, in its E. part, is traversed by railroads.

PERTINAX, Publius Helvius, per'-ti-nix, Roman emperor, who was the son of a dealer in charcoal. He, however, obtained a good education, and was some time an instructor of youth in Liguria; after which he entered the army, and by his bravery obtained rapid preferment. The emperor Aurelius made him consul, and on the death of Commodus, in 193, he was elected to the imperial dignity by the soldiers. He distributed his lands among the people, and sold the property accumulated by his predecessor to pay off the public debt. He also abolished the heavy imposts which had been laid on by Commodus. But although these virtuous acts pleased the senate and the people, the Prætorians rose against and killed him, after he had reigned only a few months.

PERTUIS, pairt'-we, a town of France, in the department of Vaucluse, 40 miles from Avignon. Pop. 4,800.

PERU, NORTH and SOUTH, pe-roo', a republic of S. America, having on its N. Ecuador, E. and S. Brazil and Bolivia, and W. the Pacific Ocean. Area, 580,000 square miles. Desc. The country is divided into High and Low, or North and South, and is traversed from north to south by the Andes. Between these mountains and the shore, lies the country of Low Peru, forming an inclined plane from 30 to 60 miles in breadth, and consisting, for the most part, of sandy deserts, without vegetation or inhabitants. The cause of this sterility is the total absence of rain. The only spots capable of cultivation are the banks of navigable rivers, or such as are within the reach of artificial irrigation. In this low tract the climate is sultry. The country between the two cordilleras is called the Sierra, or High Peru. It consists of barren mountains and rocks, interspersed with fertile and cultivated valleys. On these uplands vegetation flourishes, and, to the height of 10,000 feet, the climate is mild and temperate, being a mixture of perpetual spring and autumn. Beyond this, and at the height of 14,000 feet, commences the limit of perpetual snow, where everlasting winter reigns. Here are also many volcanoes, which are flaming within, while their summits, chasms, and apertures are involved in ice. Zoology. The llama, the guanuco, the vicuna, and the alpaco, or the different species of American camel, find their native climate in the cold districts; the jaguar, the cougar, or puma, and several other wild animals, inhabit the thick forests; while the elk, the ant-bear, deer, monkeys, the great black bear of the Andes, and armadilloes, are very numerous. The woods abound in beautiful birds, and numerous tribes of reptiles infest the warm districts of the coast, where venomous insects are also common. Fish and alligators are plentiful not only in the rivers, but likewise at their mouths. Pro. In the hotter regions, maize, cotton, indigo, yams, cocoa, tobacco, fine fruits; with bark, vanilla, sarsaparilla, and other drugs. The mines, however, are the principal source of wealth. Minerals. The mountainous districts abound in metallic riches. They are interspersed with veins of gold, and of heavy silver ores, in which pieces of pure silver, solid copper, and lead ore occur, frequently intermixed with white silver ore and virgin silver, in threads. In many parts there are rich veins of gold ore in quartz, and gold is obtained by washing; whilst silver and other metallic ores occur, of which no use is made. Quicksilver also abounds in many parts. Besides these, copper, tin, iron, coal, and nitrate of soda are found. Emeralds and other precious stones are also found, with obsidian, and the stone of the incas, a marcasite capable of the highest polish. Manf. Coarse woollen and cotton cloths, leather, iron wares, gold and silver articles, and jewellery. Manufactured goods are generally imported. Exp. Chiefly gold and silver, wine, brandy, sugar, pimento, Jesuits' bark, salt, vicuna wool, coarse woollens, and some other manufactures of little value. Imp. European goods, live stock, provisions, tallow, cacao, Paraguay tea, cocoa-leaf, indigo, timber, cordage, pitch, and copper. The commerce of Peru, however, is greatly impeded by the total absence of roads, canals, or bridges to facilitate the transport of goods between distant parts. Inhabitants. Formerly, all military, civil, and ecclesiastical employments were engrossed by the European Spaniards. The Creoles were excluded from all offices of trust and honour, and were a degraded class, compared with the European Spaniards. Many of their families have titles of nobility, and possess large estates. Some are descended from the ancient conquerors; others have risen into consequence from commerce, or from employments under the crown. The Mestizoes, or offspring of the Spaniards and Indians, are the next class in rank to the Spaniards, and the most numerous after the Indians. The Quadroons, or offspring of the Spaniards and Mestizoes, are hardly to be distinguished from Spaniards. The Cholos, on the contrary, sprung from the Indians and Mestizoes, are classed with the Indians. The Indians are the most numerous class, and are a poor, dispirited race, lazy, dirty, and improvident. Rel. Catholicism. Gov. Republican, framed in 1828, on the basis of the government of the United States. Army, 3,000 men. Pop. about 2,200,000. Lat. between 3° 30′ and 22° S. Lon. between 65° and 81° 20′ W.—Peru was invaded by Pizarro in 1513, and finally conquered in 1532. The Peruvians, at the time they were discovered by Pizarro, knew the arts of architecture, sculpture, mining, working the precious metals and jewels; cultivated their land, were clothed, and had a regular system of government, and a code of civil and religious laws. They had no just idea, however, of property, as their land was cultivated for the common benefit. In the arts of architecture, they had advanced far beyond the other nations of America. The immense obelisk of Tiahuacan, and the town of Chulunacus, with the mausolea of Chachapoyas, which are conical stone buildings, supporting large rude busts, are among the most singular, though, unfortunately, the least known of the Peruvian remains, and are equally curious as the great military roads, with their accompanying palaces or posts. In 1821 the Peruvians revolted from Spain, and achieved their independence.

PERU, the name of several townships in the United States, none of them with a population above 4,000.

PERUGIA, pai-roo'-ja, a city of Italy, in the States of the Church, standing near the Tiber, 10 miles to the E. of the lake of the same name. It is a clean and well-built town, but has, in general, an air of gloom, from the number of its churches and convents, which are by no means elegant. It has a cathedral, with some valuable paintings, a library, with rare MSS., and some ruins. The gate of the Piazza Grimana is of the time of the Romans; and at the gate of St. Angelo still stands a temple of Mars, adorned with pillars of oriental granite. The other subjects of interest are the town-house, the theatre, two public fountains, a university, and several hospitals. Manf. Velvet and other silk stuffs. Pop. 20,000.—The LAKE has a circumference of 30 miles, and contains three islands.—In 1860 a massacre of the inhabitants by the pope's mercenaries took place.

PERUGINO, Peter, pai-roo-je'-no, an eminent Italian painter. He was the disciple of Andrea Verocchio, but he is chiefly celebrated for being the master of Raphael. He was employed by Sixtus IV. to paint several pieces for his chapel. Perugino was very avaricious, and amassed considerable wealth, of which being robbed, the loss occasioned his death in 1524. There are two pictures by this master in the National Gallery, entitled, respectively, "The Virgin and Infant Christ," and "The Virgin Adoring the Infant Christ." B. at Perugia, 1446; D. 1524.

PERUWELZ, per'-oo-velz, a town of Belgium, 12 miles from Valenciennes. Manf. Linen goods; and it has some breweries and lime-works. Pop. 8,000.

PERUZZI, Balthasar, pai-root'-ze, a celebrated Italian painter and architect, who was employed at Rome by popes Julius II. and Leo X.; by the former in ornamenting his palace, and by the latter as one of the architects of the church of St. Peter. He was taken prisoner when Rome was sacked by Charles V., but obtained his liberty on painting a picture of the constable Bourbon. Two of his works are in the National Gallery. B. at Volterra, 1481; D. 1536.

PESARO, pai'-sa-ro, a fortified town of Italy, in the States of the Church, 34 miles from Ancona. Its streets are clean and airy, and the market-place is ornamented with a fountain and a marble statue of Pope Urban VIII. Some of its churches are remarkable for their paintings, others for their architecture. Pop. 12,000.

PESCARA, pais-ka'-ra, a town of Naples, at the mouth of the river Pescara, 40 miles from Aquila. Pop. 2,500. —This is the ancient Aternum.

PESCHE, pais'-kai, two market-towns of Italy, neither of them with a population above 1,600.

PESCHIERA, pais-ke-ai'-ra, a town and strong fortress of Austrian Italy, in the province of Verona, near where the Mincio issues from the Lake of Garda, 20 miles from Mantua. Pop. 2,600.—This place was taken by the Sardinian troops under Charles Albert, 1848.

PESCIA, pais'-cha, a town of Italy, 30 miles from Florence. It is surrounded by walls, and has a cathedral, several convents, a citadel, and hospitals. Pop. 5,000.

PESCO, pais'-ko, the name of several towns of Naples, none of them with a population above 4,500.

PESRI, pai'-sai'-e, a parish in the province of Tarentaise, in the Sardinian dominions, 15 miles from Moutiers. It has the largest lead- and silver-mines of Savoy. Pop. 2,000.

PESHAWUR, pesh'-our, an ancient city of Afghanistan, now included in the Punjab dominions, 40 miles from Attock. It stands on an uneven surface, and has its houses built generally of unburnt brick, in wooden frames, and mostly three stories high. The streets are narrow, but paved, with a kennel in the middle. There are many mosques; but none of them, or of the public buildings, are worthy of notice, except a fine caravanserai and the citadel. Some other of the palaces are splendid, but few of the nobility have good houses. Pop. about 60,000. Lat. 33° 32′ N. Lon. 70° 37′ E.—The PROVINCE in which it stands has an area of 2,400 square miles. It is watered by the Indus, Cabool, and Bara rivers, and is extremely fertile. Pop. Unascertained. Lat. between 33° 40′ and 34° 30′ N. Lon. between 71° 35′ and 72° 42′ E.

PEST, or PESTH, pest (Hung. pesht), a city of Hungary, on the Danube, opposite to Buda, with which it is connected by a bridge of boats three quarters of a mile in length, 134 miles from Vienna. Pest consists of the Old and New towns, the latter being the better built; but, throughout, the streets are tolerably spacious and regular, and the houses substantial, if not elegant. Of the public buildings, the principal are the Hospital of Invalids, the barracks, and a quadrangular edifice, begun in 1786 by Joseph II., and now occupied by the military. There are churches for various religious denominations; and the university is the only one in Hungary, and is richly endowed. Pest contains a botanical garden, and, on the Buda side of the river, an observatory, and a museum and public library unconnected with the university. The ancient structures of the Hungarian capital are all in Buda, and Pest is the new city. Manf. Silk, cotton, leather, jewellery, musical instruments, oil, tobacco, and meerschaum pipe-bowls. Pop. 110,000—Pest is supposed to stand on the site of the ancient Transacincum; and in a wide plain which surrounds it, the Hungarian diets were held for many centuries. It is a station for steam-packets.

PESTALOZZI, John Henry, pes-ta-lot'-se, a celebrated Swiss school-teacher, and the founder, upon the continent, of the mutual-instruction or monitorial system, which was, about the same time, inaugurated in England by Lancaster. (See LANCASTER, Joseph.) After completing his education, he devoted himself to the instruction of poor children, and established schools at several places in Switzerland, the last of which was founded at Yverdun, in the canton of Vaud, and became celebrated throughout Europe; but ultimately, through the dissensions of its teachers, it declined in prosperity. He was the author of a large number of works, more or less closely bearing upon education. B. at Zurich, Switzerland, 1746; D. at Brugg, Switzerland, 1827.

PETAU, Denis, pet'-o, an eminent French writer, who entered the society of Jesuits at the age of 22, and became a great ornament and defender of that order. His knowledge was general; but he particularly excelled in chronology, in which science he stood unrivalled. Philip IV. of Spain and Pope Urban VIII. solicited him to settle in their respective states, with the most flattering promises, which he declined, preferring a tranquil life in a monastery. His principal works are "De Doctrina Temporum," in which he applies chronology to history, ancient and modern; "Rationarium Temporum," an abridgment of the former; and the Psalms, translated into Greek verse. He had several controversies with Scaliger, Salmasius, and Casaubon; and published editions of some of the works of the ancient fathers. B. at Orleans, France, 1583; D. at Paris, 1652.

PETCHELEE, petch-e-le', an important province of China, being that in which Pekin, the capital, is situate. (See CHI-LI.)

PETCHORA, pet-cho'-ra, a river of European Russia, rising in the Ural Mountains, and, after a course of 900 miles, falling into the Arctic Ocean, in lat. 68° N., lon. between 53° and 54° E.

PETER, pe'-ter, commonly called the Wild Boy, was found in the woods near Hameln, in Hanover, in 1725. He was supposed to be then about 12 years of age, and had subsisted in those woods upon the bark of trees, leaves, berries, &c., for a considerable time. How long he had been in that state could never be ascertained; but, when found, the remains of a shirt-collar were about his neck. In the following year he was brought to England by order of Queen Caroline, but he could never be brought to speak. He was placed under the care of a farmer at North Church, in Hertfordshire, where he lived on a stipend of £35 a year allowed by government. Notwithstanding his remaining so long in a savage state, and his being quite an idiot, he was harmless and tractable. D. 1785.

PETER I., of Aragon, was proclaimed king after the death of his father, in 1094. He gained the battle of Alcaraz, and subsequently subdued Barbastro and other places. D. 1104.

PETER II., of Aragon, was the son and successor of Alphonso II., in 1196. He drove away the Vaudois, who had taken refuge in his kingdom, entered into an alliance with Alphonso IX. against Sancho VII., king of Navarre, and in 1212 defeated the Almahades at Tolosa. He was himself subsequently defeated, and slain by Simon de Montfort, at Muret, in 1213.

PETER III., king of Aragon, succeeded to the throne upon the death of his brother, James I., in 1276. He laid claim to the kingdom of Navarre, but was unsuccessful. Having married the daughter of Mainfroy, king of Sicily, he resolved to make himself master of that island, and, to effect his purpose, contrived the terrible massacre known as the "Sicilian Vespers," or the murder of all the French in the island at the hour of vespers, on Easter-day, 1282. For this crime, Pope Martin IV. excommunicated him, and the Sicilians laid Aragon under an interdict, and gave Sicily to Charles of Valois; but Peter defended himself successfully against Charles, as well as his own son James, king of Majorca, until his death, which occurred 1285.

PETER IV., king of Aragon, was son and successor of Alphonso IV. He dethroned James II. of Majorca, fought against the Moors of Portugal and Castile, between the years 1340-42, and in 1353 defeated the Genoese at sea, near Alghero. In 1369 he entered into an alliance with Peter the Cruel, king of Castile, against his brother, Henry of Transtamare. He founded the university of Huesca, but his reign was troubled by several revolts. D. 1387.

PETER ALEXIOWITZ I., czar of Russia, called the Great, was the son of Alexis Michaelowitz, and was placed on the throne after the death of his elder brother Theodore, or Feodor, to the prejudice of his other brother Ivan, who was as weak in his intellect as in his constitution. The Strelitzes, a militia which greatly resembled the janissaries of Turkey, being excited by the Princess Sophia, the sister of Peter, revolted in favour of Ivan; and, to avert a civil war, it was resolved that the two princes should reign in conjunction, with the ambitious Princess Sophia as regent. Russia was at that time in a condition little better than barbarism. In his 17th year Peter married; and when it became apparent that his wife was pregnant, Prince Galitzin rose in insurrection, but was defeated and banished, the Princess Sophia being also sent to a convent, where she remained for the rest of her life. He then commenced to reign alone, and his first acts were to reform the army and government, in which, notwithstanding the difficulty of the task, he had great success. In 1696 he took Azof, which he placed in a state of defence against the Tartars. He next turned his attention to the finances, and corrected many gross abuses. The year following he undertook a journey into various parts of Europe, for the purpose of acquiring a knowledge of arts, sciences, and mechanics. After passing through Germany, he visited Amsterdam, where he entered himself in the company of shipwrights in the dockyard, and worked with great diligence, under the name of Peter Zimmerman. In 1698 he went to England, and paid attention to manufactures and to every public institution. Having conceived the idea of forming a junction between the Don and the Volga, he engaged some English engineers to enter his service for the accomplishment of that great undertaking. From England the czar went to Vienna, intending to go to Italy; but the news of an insurrection in Russia obliged him to hasten home. Several of the insurgents were executed, and the greatest part of the Strelitzes decapitated or sent to Siberia. (See ORLOFF.) In 1699 Peter instituted the order of St. Andrew, by way of exciting a spirit of emulation among his subjects, and, in 1703, founded the city of St. Petersburg. The next year he declared war against Charles XII. of Sweden, but without success. This, however, did not discourage Peter, who said, "I knew that the Swedes would beat us at first; but they will, in time, teach us to beat them." This was verified in 1709, by the important victory of Pultawa, by which the greatest part of the Swedish troops were made prisoners, and their king obliged to seek an asylum in Turkey. Peter availed himself of this advantage to seize Livonia, Ingria, Finland, and part of Swedish Pomerania. Among the prisoners was a young girl, whose husband, a sergeant in the Swedish army, whom she had only married the day before, was killed. This young girl subsequently became first Peter's mistress, and afterwards his wife, she being declared czarina in 1711, under the name of Catherine Alexina. In the mean time, the Turks, at the instigation of Charles XII., broke their truce with the czar, whom they completely hemmed in, with his army, on the banks of the Pruth, in 1711. In this perilous situation, he was saved by the presence of mind of the Czarina Catherine. She secretly opened negotiations with the grand vizier, who consented to the terms, and a peace was settled. In memory of this event was instituted the female order of St. Catherine, of which the czarina became the head. At the close of 1713 he had taken all Pomerania, with the exception of Stralsund, from the Swedes. The restoration of tranquillity enabled the czar to make another tour in Denmark, Germany, Holland, and France. When in the latter country, he visited the tomb of Cardinal Richelieu, on the sight of which he exclaimed, "Great minister, why were you not born in my time? I would have given you one half of my dominions for teaching me how to govern the other." Meanwhile, Prince Alexis, his son, having joined a party of malcontents, who were displeased at the changes which had taken place both in ecclesiastical and civil matters, the czar caused him to be tried, and the judges sentenced him to death. This decree was not executed; but the prince soon after died, as was said, of an apoplexy. Some degree of suspicion, however, fell upon the father, which was not removed by the rigorous execution of several of the friends of Alexis. The Tartars having massacred a Russian garrison on the borders of Persia, Peter, in 1722, embarked on the Caspian Sea, and took the city of Derbent, with three provinces, which were afterwards recaptured by Nadir Shah. After this expedition, the czar devoted himself to the internal regulation of his empire; and of the many important establishments and improvements of which he was the author, the following were the principal: a reform among the clergy, and the abolition of the patriarchal dignity; the organization of a numerous army; the formation of a formidable navy; fortifications in all the principal towns, and an excellent civil government in the cities; an academy for naval education; colleges at Moscow, Petersburg, and Kiev; a college of physicians, and a dispensary at Moscow; public lectures in anatomy, a branch of science in which the czar himself had made great progress under Ruysch, at Amsterdam; an observatory, which was also a repository of natural curiosities; a botanical garden, stocked with plants from all parts of the world; printing-offices, and a royal library. But one of the most extraordinary acts of this great man was the founding, upon piles, in a morass, of the city of St. Petersburg. By his last will, he constituted the empress Catherine his successor. "He gave a polish," says Voltaire, "to his people, and was himself a savage; he taught them the art of war, of which he was himself ignorant; from the sight of a small boat on the river Moskwa he created a powerful fleet, made himself an expert and able shipwright, sailor, pilot, and commander: he changed the manners, customs, and laws of the Russians, and lives in their memory as the 'father of his country.'" After his death, Catherine was proclaimed empress, and ruled during two years. B. at Moscow, 1672; D. 1725.

PETER II., emperor of Russia, was the son of Alexis and grandson of Peter the Great. He succeeded, in 1727, the empress Catherine, who had declared him grand-duke of Russia the year preceding. The most remarkable event of his reign was the disgrace of the prime minister Menschikoff, who was banished to Siberia. B. 1714; D. 1730.

PETER III., the son of Charles Frederick, duke of Holstein-Gottorp, and of Anna Petrowna, daughter of Peter the Great, was declared grand-duke of Russia in 1742, by his aunt, the empress Elizabeth, whom he succeeded in 1762. He was a warm admirer of the character of Frederick the Great, king of Prussia, and would have imitated him, had his abilities been equal to his wishes. Peter was weak, passionate, and irresolute, and, a few months after his accession, was dethroned by his wife Catherine, who was proclaimed empress, and who caused him to be strangled by her favourite, Count Orloff. (See ORLOFF.) B. 1726; strangled, 1762.

Peter Nolasque, founder of the Order of Mercy for the Redemption of Captives. He was in the service of James, king of Aragon, and by his interest with that prince he instituted a religious and military order in 1223, whose province it was to rescue Christian slaves from the infidels. He was very successful in this good work. B. in Languedoc, 1189; D. 1256.

Peter of Abano, a celebrated Italian physician and astrologer, who was professor at Padua, but who, being accused of sorcery, was condemned to be burnt in 1316.

Peter of Blois, so called from the place of his birth. After studying at Paris and Bologna, he became preceptor and secretary to the king of Sicily. At the invitation of Henry II., he went to England, and obtained the archdeaconry of Bath. His letters, sermons, and other works were printed in 1667. D. in England, 1200.

Peter of Cluny, or Peter the Venerable, was of a noble family, but became a monk of the order of Cluny, and in 1121 was chosen general of that society. He entertained Innocent II. at Cluny in 1130, and afforded an asylum to Abelard. Among other works, he wrote a treatise on the Divinity of Christ, another against the Jews, and one on Infant Baptism. B. in Auvergne, about 1100; D. 1156.

Peter of Sicily, an historian, who wrote a History of the Manicheans, which contains many curious and important facts. Flourished in the 9th century.

Peter, St., the name of several parishes in England, none of them with a population above 3,000.—Also two in Orkney, Scotland, neither with a population above 2,400.

Peter, St., an apostle, was a fisherman with his brother Andrew, at Bethsaida, when called to be a disciple of Jesus Christ. Peter was remarkable for his zeal, which he displayed on many occasions, particularly in the garden, when his master was apprehended; on which occasion he drew his sword, and cut off the ear of the servant of the high-priest. But when he entered the hall of Caiaphas, and was recognized as one of the disciples, he repeatedly denied the charge, till the cock crew, and then, remembering our Lord's prediction that before the cock crew twice he would deny him thrice, Peter went out and wept. After the ascension of our Saviour, he preached a famous sermon at Jerusalem, by which some thousands were converted. Herod Agrippa threw him into prison, A.D. 44; but he was released by an angel. He was crucified with his head downwards, in the persecution under Nero, about A.D. 65. Two of his epistles are in the sacred canon.

Peter, St., bishop of Alexandria. He was regarded as one of the most illustrious prelates of his time, and suffered martyrdom in 311. He formed the penitential canons. Some of his letters have been preserved by Theodoret.

Peter the Cruel, king of Castile, succeeded his father, Alonzo XI., in 1350, and commenced his reign by several acts of wanton barbarity. He caused Leonora de Guzman, his father's mistress, to be put to death, and having married the daughter of Philip, duke of Bourbon, he repudiated her shortly afterwards, and sent her to prison, in order that he might renew his connection with Maria de Padilla, his former mistress, who in turn was abandoned, upon his seeking a marriage with Donna Juana de Castro, a noble lady, who was also cast off shortly after this union; whereupon her brother, a powerful Galician noble, headed a revolt against Peter. His cruelties provoked his subjects to take up arms against him in 1366, and after three years of sanguinary warfare, Henry of Transtamare, who was as cruel and cold-blooded as his brother, besieged him in the town of Montiel. Peter requested of Dugueselin, who had joined Henry's standard, to aid his escape; and upon the Frenchman's enticing the king to his tent, he was set upon and murdered by Henry, 1369.

Peter the Hermit, a French gentleman of Amiens, in Picardy, who renounced a military life to embrace that of a pilgrim. At the end of the 11th century, a general alarm was spread that the last day was approaching; on which numbers of persons flocked to the Holy Land from all countries, with a view of ending their days near the holy sepulchre. Peter was of the number, and on his return to Europe made so pathetic a representation of the state of the Christians in Palestine, to Pope Urban II., that he gave Peter leave to preach up the necessity of a crusade throughout Christendom. The appearance, zeal, and eloquence of the hermit, produced a prodigious effect, and all ranks and ages, of both sexes, pressed eagerly into the service. With a motley army, estimated at 100,000 men, Peter passed through Hungary. In his absence, his followers attacked Solyman's army at Nicea, and all, except a few thousands, perished, "and," says Gibbon, "a pyramid of bones informed their companions of the place of their defeat." Peter remained in Palestine, and was at the siege of Antioch in 1097; but on his attempting to make his escape, shortly afterwards, was brought back, and compelled to take a new oath of fidelity and obedience to the holy cause. Two years later he was present at the siege of Jerusalem, where he displayed great bravery, and when the place was taken, was made vicar-general. Peter, on his return to France, founded the abbey of Neu-Moutier, in the diocese of Liège, where he died, 1115.

Peterborough, pe'-ter-bur'-o, a city of Northamptonshire, on the Nen, 36 miles from Northampton. It contains many buildings of great neatness, and the streets are mostly regular. Of the public buildings the cathedral is by far the most remarkable. It extends 470 feet in length, and about 200 in breadth. It is built in the Norman style, and contains a monument to the memory of Catherine of Aragon, wife of Henry VIII., and another to the memory of Mary, queen of Scots, both of whom were buried here. There are, besides, a town-hall, market-house, infirmary, union workhouse, gaol, house of correction, and a theatre. Manf. Stockings. Pop. 8,700.—Here, in 1713, Dr. Paley was born. The see of Peterborough was founded by Henry VIII.

Peterborough, a post village of the United States, in Maddison county, New York.—Also a township in New Hampshire.

Peterborough, Charles Mordaunt, Earl of, an eminent English general, who entered the navy, and distinguished himself at Tangier, when it was besieged by the Moors. In the reign of James II. he went to Holland, attached himself to the prince of Orange, and accompanied him on his expedition to England in 1688. The year following he was created earl of Monmouth, and appointed first commissioner of the Treasury; from which post he was removed in 1690. In 1697, on the death of his uncle the earl of Peterborough, he succeeded to that title. In the reign of Queen Anne he displayed the greatest bravery and skill as commander of the English forces in Spain, where he took Barcelona, and brought several provinces to acknowledge Charles III. as their king. He was afterwards employed on various embassies, and in 1714 appointed governor of Minorca. Some of his letters are in the works of Pope, with whom he was intimate. It was said of him that he had "seen more kings and more postilions than any man in Europe." B. 1658; D. 1735.

Peterhead, pe'-ter-hed, a parish and seaport town of Scotland, in Aberdeenshire, 26 miles from Aberdeen. It is pleasantly situate, well aired, and well built, standing on a peninsula and small island, projecting into the German Ocean, and forming the eastmost point of land in Scotland. The public buildings are an elegant town-house, the established church, a coffee-room, and public rooms for the accommodation of those frequenting Peterhead during the summer season, for the benefit of the air and mineral waters. It has a set of excellent cold and warm baths, and its mineral wells are celebrated for their medicinal virtues. As a commercial town, Peterhead has made rapid advances. Its two harbours, formed by two spacious bays and two small islands, are situate on the most easterly point of Scotland. They are naturally excellent, and have been much improved by art. Shipbuilding is carried on here to a considerable extent, and the herring and other fisheries are valuable. Exp. These consist chiefly of provisions, such as grain, cod-fish, cheese, eggs, salted pork; also of threads, granite, kelp, and whale oil. Imp. Timber, lime, wool, groceries, flour, salt, and iron. Pop. 9,500. Lat. 57° 30′ 1″ N. Lon. 1° 46′ W.

Peter le Port, St., a market-town, and the capital of Guernsey, with a good harbour and pier, and defended by two castles. It has a government-house, court-house, town hospital, assembly-rooms, and a theatre. It is the residence of both civil and military governors, appointed by the Crown. Pop. 15,500. Lat. 46° 27′ 2″ N. Lon. 2° 32′ W.

PETERMANN, August Heinrich, pe'-ter-man, a modern German geographer, and superintendent of the celebrated map-establishment of Justus Perthes at Gotha. Destined for the church, he was educated at the college of Nordhausen; but a strong predilection for geographical science caused him to become, in 1839, a special pupil in the academy which the learned Berghaus had established at Potsdam. There he made the acquaintance, among other distinguished men, of Humboldt, for whom he executed the "Map of Central Asia." When it was resolved to issue an English edition of the celebrated "Physical Atlas" of Berghaus, Petermann was invited to Edinburgh, where he spent two years in preparing and revising the work. In 1847 he repaired to London, where he became a member of the Royal Geographical Society. He subsequently produced an "Atlas of Physical Geography," with the assistance of the Rev. Thomas Milner; an "Account of the Expedition to Central Africa," giving reports of the most recent explorations. To his efforts was in great part due the employment of his countrymen, Barth, Overweg, and Vogel, by the English government. In 1854 he accepted the invitation of the duke of Saxe-Coburg to occupy the chair of geography in the university of that place, and soon afterwards established the "Geographical Journal," which Sir Roderick Murchison declared, in 1857, as "exercising a powerful and salutary influence on the progress of geographical science." He is in correspondence with scientific men in England, Germany, and America, and is thus enabled, better than any other individual, to give the earliest and most reliable information with respect to all important explorations. B. at Bleicherode, Prussia, 1822.

PETERS, Hugh, pe'-ters, an English divine, who was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge; whence he was expelled for irregular behaviour. He afterwards went on the stage, where he acquired that theatrical action which subsequently distinguished him in the pulpit. He was ordained by Bishop Mountaine, and was for some time lecturer of St. Sepulchre's, London; but, having an intrigue with another man's wife, he fled to Rotterdam, where he joined the Independents. He went thence to New England; and, at the beginning of the Revolution, returned to London, where he became a zealous preacher in the cause of the parliament. For his activity in the Revolution, especially at the execution of Charles I., he was hanged and quartered in 1660. B. in Cornwall, 1599.

PETERSBURG, pe'-ters-berg, a borough and port of entry of the United States, in Virginia, on the Appomatox, 12 miles above its junction with James river. It is one of the handsomest towns in the state, being the emporium of both the exports and imports of a large district. It contains a court-house, gaol, an academy, and churches for different denominations of Christians. Manf. Woollen and cotton fabrics, ropes, and earthenware. Pop. 14,500.—Also the name of various townships.

PETERSBURG, ST., pe'-ters-berg (RUSS. PETERBURG, pai'-ter-boorg), a government or province in the N.W. of European Russia, at the eastern extremity of the Gulf of Finland. Area, including lakes, about 20,500 square miles. Desc. Mostly level, with a thin soil and a cold and damp climate. Rivers. The Luga, Plinsa, Volkhov, Siasi, Svir, and Neva. Pro. Oats, barley, wheat, hemp, and flax. Pop. about 700,000. Lat. between 58° and 60° 30′ N. Lon. between 27° 30′ and 33° 30′ E.

PETERSBURG, ST., a large city, and the modern capital of the Russian empire, at the eastern extremity of the Gulf of Finland, at the mouth of the river Neva, which divides it into two parts, 18 miles from Cronstadt. Previous to 1703, its site contained nothing but a couple of huts; and the spot on which Peter I. proposed to build a fortified seaport was a low marshy island, covered in summer with mud, and in winter presented nothing more than a frozen pool. After the battle of Pultawa, in 1709, and the permanent acquisition of Livonia, he enlarged his plan, prosecuted it with new ardour, and before his death, in 1725, it had assumed the proportions of a city. Since that time it has been progressively extended and embellished, particularly by the empress Catherine II., who first made it the permanent abode of the court. It is divided into four comprehensive divisions; viz., the Admiralty, or central quarter; the quarter between the Admiralty and the country to the south and east; the original Petersburg quarter, occupying an insulated tract on the north side; and the Vasili-Ostrov, another insulated tract to the north of the river. On the land side, St. Petersburg is almost entirely open; but the approach by sea is guarded by the fort of Cronstadt, and in the middle of the city is a citadel. The site of this capital is completely level, and so low that high tides cause considerable inundations. The Admiralty, or central quarter, is about two miles in length. The part adjacent to the river combines both fashion and business. Here is the winter palace of the czar, above twenty public buildings of magnitude, and the residences of the chief merchants. The second and third Admiralty quarters extend in lines parallel to the first, but more distant from the river. They are inhabited chiefly by merchants and tradesmen. The quarter between the Admiralty and the country to the south and east quarter is very extensive; and, though termed the suburbs, is in general very well built. The original quarter, distinguished by the name of St. Petersburg, comprises several islands, of which only the one adjoining the middle of the city is thickly inhabited. Its streets are straight and wide, but it contains no splendid edifices. Its most striking object is the citadel, a regular hexagon, on the north bank of the Neva. Its tower, above 360 feet in height, is seen from many points of the city, and serves as a landmark to strangers. This quarter still contains the cottage occupied by Peter I. during the building of the city. The Vasili-Ostrov is the seat of commerce, containing on the bank of the river the quay for loading and unloading merchandise, and, towards the sea, the harbour for galleys. Here is the exchange, the custom-house, and the warehouses of entrepôt. Petersburg is defended from an attack by sea, partly by the fortifications of Cronstadt, but more by the shoals in the channel from that city to the capital. There are several bridges over the main stream of the Neva and its branches: they are all of boats, and are removed whenever danger is apprehended from the ice rushing down the stream. The Neva, soon after entering St. Petersburg, sends off two branches, which fall soon after into the sea, and form the insulated tracts on which the northern part of the city is built. The main stream flows through the middle of the city, and has along its south side a quay several miles in length, and embanked with a wall, parapet, and pavement of granite. Close to the quay is the bronze equestrian statue of Peter the Great. There is also a granite monolith, 84 feet high, erected to the emperor Alexander. The southern part of the town is divided, not by branches of the river, but by canals, the finest of which is the Fontanka. No city in Europe can stand a comparison with St. Petersburg in the width and regularity of its streets, although its squares are less numerous than might have been expected. The streets are, for the most part, paved with stone; a few, however, are still floored with logs of timber. The houses, originally of wood, are now mostly of brick, stone structures being very rare in this capital. The chief public buildings are the winter palace of the czar, a building of great extent, approaching to the form of a square; the Hermitage, built by the empress Catherine; the marble palace, partly of marble, more of stone; the Taurida, a very large building, erected by Potemkin, and now belonging to the crown, with extensive galleries and fine gardens; and the Anitchkoff. In the Vasili-Ostrov is the Imperial Academy, the Academy of the Fine Arts, and the great building for the cadets, which contains a garden and an open space for military exercises. The Admiralty contains storehouses and large shipbuilding-docks; and, at no great distance from it are the senate-house, the post-office, the pawn-bank, and the office for foreign affairs. Among the other public edifices are the royal stables, the police-office, the medical college, and the foundling hospital, all in the second quarter of the Admiralty. In this quarter, also, is the town-house. In point of education and the state of knowledge, Petersburg was long in an extremely backward state. The university dates from 1819; but there are other educational establishments; such as schools for medicine, surgery, navigation, and mining; also several military colleges and charity-schools. Here are also several academies, one of sciences, another of the fine arts, and a third for promoting a knowledge of the Russian history and language. The Imperial Library contains about 500,000 volumes and MSS. The charitable institutions are various. The principal are the foundling hospital, infirmary, sailors' hospital, lazaretto, workhouse, house for inoculating, asylum for the blind, deaf, and dumb, Medico-philanthropic Institute, Humane Society, and an association of widows who attend sick persons in the hospitals or in their own houses. The religious structures are the cathedral of St. Isaac, that of our Lady of Kasan, built on the model of St. Peter's at Rome, and the cathedral of St. Peter and St. Paul, in which repose the remains of the Russian sovereigns. Manf. These are various. There is, on account of government, a grand tapestry-work, a mint, and assay-office in the citadel, a bronze-work, a foundry of metal, a foundry of cannon, powder-mills, and porcelain-factory; also, on account of individuals, manufactures of silk, cotton, woollen, paper and cards, wax-cloth, snuff, tobacco, leather, watches, glass, and printing-types. There are, also, mathematical and musical instrument-makers, coachmakers, jewellers and gold-smiths, shipwrights, potters, and soap-boilers. Exp. Hemp, flax, leather, tallow, iron, and the skins of hares and foxes from the forests; also canvas and other coarse linen, beeswax, linseed, linseed-oil, tar, potash, and tobacco. Imp. Colonial produce and manufactured goods. By means of its rivers and canals, its winter market is supplied with large quantities of the carcasses of cattle, sheep, and swine, besides heaps of fish, eggs, fowls, and butter frozen into solid lumps. Pop. about 600,000. Lat. 59° 56′ 5″ N. Lon. 30° 19′ E.—St. Petersburg has, when the weather permits, steam-packet communication with all the principal ports of Europe.

Petersen, Niels Matthias, pe'-ter-sen, a modern Danish antiquary, who, after completing his education at the university of Copenhagen, earned a subsistence as teacher; but, having gained the prize offered by the Society for the Promotion of Danish Literature for the best essay on the history of the Scandinavian languages, he resolved to devote himself to history and philology. In 1829 he obtained the appointment of assistant librarian to the university of Copenhagen. Among numerous valuable works written by him, may be quoted "History of Denmark in Heathen Times," "Handbook of Ancient Northern Geography," and "Voyages and Travels of the Icelanders at home and abroad." B. in the island of Funen, 1791.

Petersfield, pe'-ters-feeld, a market-town of Hampshire, 16 miles from Portsmouth. Pop. about 6,000.

Peterwardein, or Peter-Vara, pe'-ter-var'-dine, a strong town of Slavonia, on the Danube, 45 miles from Belgrade. It is the residence of the general commandant of the military frontier, and has a barracks for 10,000 men. It is strongly fortified, and derives its present name from Peter the Hermit, who here mustered his followers in the first crusade. Pop. 7,000.—In 1716 the Turks were here defeated by the Austrians, and lost their last hold on central Europe.

Petion, Alexander Sabes, pe'-ti-on, a negro, who became president of the republic of Hayti. He at first served in the French army during the revolt at St. Domingo, and rose to the grade of adjutant-general. He held the fort of Jacmel against Toussaint l'Ouverture, and, after the defeat of his party, repaired to France. He returned with the expedition under General Leclero; but afterwards quitted the French ranks to join General Dessalines, and became commandant of Port-au-Prince, under King Christophe, in 1806. In the following year he revolted against Christophe, and proclaimed himself president of Hayti, retaining the post until his death. B. 1770; D. 1818.

Petion, Jerome, was mayor of Paris at the outbreak of the French revolution, and was, for a time, the idol of the people of Paris; but was proscribed with the Girondins, in 1793. He escaped from Paris, and fled to the Landes of Bordeaux, where his body was afterwards found, half-devoured by wolves.

Petis de la Croix, Francis, pet-e', krwaw, an eminent French orientalist, who was the son of a professor of the oriental languages. Having been so fortunate as to attract the favourable notice of Colbert, he was sent, in his 16th year, to reside and study in the East. He lived at Aleppo, Constantinople, and Ispahan, and acquired, during his stay, the Arabic, Persian, and Turkish languages. Returning to Paris in 1680, he was attached to the embassy about to be sent to the sultan of Morocco, before whom he delivered an oration in Arabic, which excited the admiration of the court, in consequence of its fluency and purity. During two years he acted as interpreter to the French expedition against Algiers, and, indeed, acted as chief diplomatist in all the transactions which took place about that time between his native country and the eastern courts. In 1692 he received the appointment of Arabic professor at the Royal College of France, and, three years later, was nominated royal interpreter. He wrote extensively; but his works remain, for the most part, in manuscript. The most important of these were a History of the Conquest of Syria, translated from the Arabic; "History of the Ottoman Empire," a dictionary of the Armenian language, "The Antiquities and Monuments of Egypt," and a small work entitled "Ancient and Modern Jerusalem." B. at Paris, 1653; D. at the same city, 1713. His son Alexander was also an eminent orientalist.

Petit, John-Louis, pet-e', an eminent French surgeon, who studied under Lettre, Castel, and Marechal, and in 1726 was invited to attend the king of Poland, whom he cured, as he also did the prince of Spain in 1734. He was admitted a member of the Academy of Sciences, rector of that of Surgery, and was regarded as the first surgeon in Europe during his time. He invented several surgical instruments, and wrote "A System of Surgery," "Treatise on Diseases of the Bones," and dissertations in the Memoirs of the Academy of Sciences. B. at Paris, 1674; D. 1760.

Petit, Peter, a French mathematician, who became geographer to the king, and intendant of the fortifications of France, to which office he was appointed by Cardinal Richelieu. He was the intimate friend of Descartes, and was author of treatises on the Proportional Compass, on the Construction and Use of the Calibre of Artillery, on Sight, on Eclipses, on preventing the Inundations of the Seine, and on Comets. B. at Montluçon, 1598; D. 1677.

Petitot, John, pet'-e-to, an unrivalled painter in enamel, who was brought up to the trade of a jeweller; but having made several successful attempts at producing enamels for that branch of industry, he resolved to entirely devote himself to the pursuit. After studying in Italy, he visited England, where he was greatly patronized by Charles I., after whose death he went to France, and was employed by Louis XIV. He painted the face and hands of his portraits, and his brother-in-law, Bordier, added the drapery. The most celebrated works of this distinguished artist were portraits of Charles I. and his family, Charles II., Louis XIV., Anne of Austria, and Maria Theresa. Fifty-six of his portraits are in the museum of the Louvre, but his finest production is a copy of Vandyke's portrait of the countess of Southampton, in the collection of the duke of Devonshire. He was a zealous Protestant, and resisted the greatest efforts made by the eloquent Bossuet to cause him to embrace Romanism. B. at Geneva, 1607; D. at Vevay, in the canton of Berne, 1691.

Peto, Sir Samuel Morton, pe'-to, an eminent English contractor for the execution of engineering works, who either singly, or in conjunction with Messrs. Brassey and Betts, executed several important undertakings, the principal of which were the Western Railway of France, the Grand Trunk Railway of Canada, the tubular bridge over the St. Lawrence, 2 miles long, and the Royal Danish Railway. In 1854 he directed the construction of a railway between Balaklava and Sebastopol, for which service he received a baronetcy in the ensuing year. In 1859 he was returned to parliament as member for Finsbury. He likewise acted as one of the Royal Commissioners of the Great Exhibition of 1851. B. at Woking, Surrey, 1809.

PETOFI, Alexander, pet'-o-fe, a celebrated Hungarian poet. He was at first a strolling player, but had long been in the habit of composing songs for his own amusement. In 1843 he became acquainted with the editor of the "Pesth Athenæum," and was by him engaged to compose short lyrics for his paper. These poems soon attracted notice, and speedily became the favourites of the entire nation. Upon the outburst of the Hungarian revolution, he recited one of his songs, "Up, Magyars, up," to the students of the university of Pesth, who were thereby excited to enthusiasm. Two other of his songs, "Now or Never," and "Battle Song," stirred to fierce action the whole Hungarian people, during the same momentous period. Soon afterwards he became aide-de-camp to General Bem, with whom he served in the campaign against the Russians in Transylvania, and after a great battle there was never seen again. The Hungarian refugees in London declared that he was still living, but he was never afterwards heard of. A collection of his fine songs, under the title of "Sounds from the Past," was published at Leipsic, in 1851. B. in Hungary, 1823.

PETRARCH, Francis, pe'-trark, a celebrated Italian poet. On account of the dissensions which raged in his native country, his father removed with him to Avignon, and afterwards to Carpentras, where Petrarch began his education, which was completed at Montpellier and Bologna. He was intended for the law; but Virgil had more charms for him than Justinian. On the death of his parents he returned to Avignon, where, in 1327, he saw a young lady in church, and became passionately in love with her. The name of the lady was Laura de Noves: she was 19 years of age at the time, and the wife of Hugh de Sade, a gentleman at Avignon. Despite the poet's handsome person, impassioned pleading, and flattering verses, he could make no impression upon her heart. After struggling in vain to overcome his passion, he retired to Vaucluse, a romantic spot, where he poured out his amorous complaints in several pieces. He afterwards travelled in different countries; but with his return to Vaucluse his passion for Laura returned. Again he celebrated her charms, and the delights of his retreat. His name became famous; and he received invitations from the senate of Rome, from the king of Naples, and the university of Paris. He accepted the former, and on Easter-day, 1341, he was crowned with laurel in the Capitol, with great pomp: he was also declared a Roman citizen. In 1348 he received the news of the death of Laura. He was then at Parma; but immediately set out for Vaucluse, where he passed some time in grief. In his copy of Virgil he thus records the fact: "It was in the early days of my youth that Laura, distinguished by her virtues, and celebrated in my verses, first blessed my eyes in the church of Santa Clara, at Avignon, and it was in the same month of April, at the same time of the morning, in the year 1348, that this bright luminary was withdrawn from our sight, whilst I was at Verona, alas! ignorant of my calamity." In 1352 he returned to Italy, and, at Padua, obtained a canonry; but many years of his life were spent in accepting invitations to the courts of the pope and other great Italian potentates. The sonnets of Petrarch are tender and melodious to the greatest degree; but, besides being a great poet, he was a profound scholar and patron of learning. His Latin poems are inferior to the Italian; and he wrote extensively upon theological and philosophical subjects. B. at Arezzo, 1304; D. at Arqua, 1374.

PETRE, Sir William, pe'-ter, an eminent English statesman, whose abilities recommended him to Thomas Cromwell; by whom he was employed in state affairs, and appointed a member of the commission for visiting the monasteries. He obtained a large share of the church lands, which he contrived to retain even during the reign of Mary, to whom he was counsellor, as he had been to her father and brother. This complying courtier found means to ingratiate himself with Queen Elizabeth, who appointed him one of her secretaries of state, and member of the privy council. His manors in Essex were very considerable, and are possessed by Lord Petre, his descendant. B. at Exeter, about 1503; D. 1571.

PETRONIUS ARBITER, Titus, a Latin poet, who was said to be one of the favourites of Nero, and became proconsul of Bithynia; but being accused by Tigellinus, another of Nero's friends, of being engaged in a conspiracy against that tyrant, he sought a voluntary death by opening his veins as he sat in the bath conversing with his friends. One of his pieces, a supposed satire against Nero, is extremely well written, though very licentious. His other works are a poem on the "Civil War between Cæsar and Pompey," on the "Education of the Roman Youth," on the "Corruption of Eloquence," and on the "Causes of the Decline of the Arts," "The Shipwreck of Lycas," &c. The best edition of his works is that by Burman, 1743. The style of his writings is as good as their subject-matter is bad. Supposed to have been born near Marseilles, about the commencement of the 1st century A.D.; D. 65.

PETRONIUS MAXIMUS, pe-tro'-ni-us, emperor of Rome, was born of an illustrious family, and, after being a senator and consul, he seized the throne, by assassinating Valentinian III., in 455. He then married the widow of his predecessor, Eudoxia, who was, however, ignorant of his crime. On becoming acquainted with it, she applied to Genseric, king of the Vandals, who entered Italy with fire and sword, took Rome, and slew the usurper. The Romans were so enraged with Maximus, that they dragged his body about the streets, and threw it into the Tiber. B. 395.

PETROPAULOVSKI, pet-ro-paw-lov'-ski, a town of Russia in Asia, capital of Kamtschatka, on its E. coast, North Pacific Ocean. It was, in 1854, bombarded by the Anglo-French fleet. Pop. about 700.

PETROSAVODSK, pet-ro-sa-vodsk', a town of European Russia, 65 miles from Olonetz. Pop. 8,000.

PETROVSK, pet-rovsk', a town of Russia, 68 miles from Saratov. Pop. 7,000.—It was founded in 1607 by Peter the Great.

PETSCHORA. (See PETCHORA.)

PETSH, or IPEK, petsh, a town of European Turkey, 72 miles from Scutari. Manf. Arms to a large extent. Pop. 12,000.

PETTIS, pet'-tis, a county of Missouri, U.S. Area, 655 square miles. Pop. 6,000.

PETTY, Sir WM., pet'-te, a celebrated English writer on political economy, who was the son of a clothier. He received the first part of his education at the school of his native town; after which he went to the university of Caen, in Normandy. On his return to England he began the study of physic and anatomy, to perfect himself in which he went to Leyden, Amsterdam, and Paris. In 1647 he returned to England, and soon afterwards went to Oxford, where he became assistant to the professor of anatomy, and fellow of Brasenose College. He was also chosen one of the council of the Royal Society, upon its establishment. In 1652 he was appointed physician to the army in Ireland, where he became secretary to Henry Cromwell, lord-lieutenant of that kingdom. He was one of the commissioners for dividing the forfeited lands; but, in 1658, he was dismissed from his employments on a charge brought against him in the House of Commons. At the Restoration he was knighted, and made surveyor-general of Ireland. He wrote a great number of books on subjects of practical or political utility, the most important of which were, "Political Arithmetic," "The Political Anatomy of Ireland," and a treatise on Money. B. at Rumsey, Hampshire, 1623; D. 1687.

PETWORTH, pet'-werth, a well-built market-town of Sussex, on the Arun, 12 miles from Chichester. The streets are irregular. The church has a square tower, and is the place of interment for the Percies, earls of Northumberland. Petworth House, the magnificent mansion of the earl of Egremont, stands close to the town. Pop. 3,500.

PEUCER, Gaspard, poi'-ser, a German physician and mathematician, who became medical professor at Wittemberg, where he married Melancthon's daughter. He was imprisoned for ten years on account of his opinions; and, while in confinement, wrote his thoughts on the margins of old books, with ink made of burnt crusts soaked in wine. His principal works are, a treatise on Divination, and a History of his Imprisonment. B. at Bautzen, 1525; D. 1602.

PEUTEMAN, Peter, poi'-te-man, a Dutch painter, who, being employed to paint a picture of Mortality, went into an anatomical room where several skeletons were suspended from the ceiling, and bones and skulls lay on the floor. While there he fell asleep; and, being suddenly roused by the shock of an earthquake, he saw the skeletons moving in all directions, and the loose skulls rolling about the room, which struck him with so much horror that he ran home half dead; and, though the transaction was explained to him, he died shortly after. B. at Rotterdam, 1650; D. 1692.

PEVENSEY, pev'-en-se, a parish of Sussex, on a small river which falls into Pevensey Bay, 10 miles from Hastings. Its importance has declined, owing to the receding of the sea. Pop. 500.—It has a station on the South-Coast Railway.

PEYRAT, pai-ra', the name of several parishes and villages of France, none of them with a population above 3,000.

PEYRERE, Isaac, pai-rair, the author of a book endeavouring to prove that Adam was not the first man, for which he was sent to prison at Brussels. By the interest of the prince of Condé, to whom he was librarian, he obtained his liberty and went to Rome, where he abjured his errors. He also wrote a book on the Restoration of the Jews, an Account of Greenland, and other works. D. 1676.

PEYSSONNEL, Charles de, pai'-son-nel, a learned French writer, who accompanied the French ambassador to Constantinople, in 1785, as secretary, and afterwards travelled through Asia Minor, collecting medals and identifying the geographical positions of ancient places. He wrote several dissertations, inserted in the Memoirs of the Academy of Inscriptions, of which he was a member. He was also the author of an eulogy on Marshal Villars, a Discourse on Coral, and other pieces. B. at Marseilles, 1700; D. 1757.

PEYSSONNEL, Charles de, son of the preceding, became consul at Smyrna, and wrote, among other works, "Historical Observations on the Barbarous People who inhabit the Borders of the Danube and the Euxine," and "Treatise on the Commerce of the Black Sea." B. 1727; D. at Smyrna, 1790.

PEZENAS, pez'-e-na, a parish and town of France, 25 miles from Montpellier. Pop. 7,500.

PEZENAS, Esprit, a learned French Jesuit, who became professor of philosophy and hydrography at Marseilles. Among other works he translated Maclaurin's Algebra and Fluxions into French, "Baker on the Microscope," Ward's "Young Mathematician's Guide," Smith's Optics, and other works from the English. His own works consisted of several treatises upon mathematics and philosophy. B. at Avignon, 1692; D. at the same city, 1776.

PFEDDERSHEIM, fed'-er-shime, a town of Germany, Hesse-Darmstadt, 4 miles from Worms. Pop. 2,100.—Here, in 1525, a battle, which ended the "Peasants' War," was fought.

PFEFFEL, Christian Frederick, fef'-fel, an eminent German writer, who was engaged in various diplomatic employments by the courts of France and Saxony. He wrote, besides several other important works, an abridgement of the Public Law of Germany, "Historical Researches as to the Legal Rights of the Popes over Avignon," and "An Essay on the Public Law and New Constitutions of Poland." B. at Colmar, 1726; D. 1807.

PFEFFEL, Conrad, brother of the preceding, wrote several volumes of poetical works, besides tales and fables. He was blind from his 21st year. B. at Colmar, 1736; D. 1809.

PFEFFENHEIM, fef'-fen-hime, a town of France, in the department of the Upper Rhine, 7 miles from Colmar. Pop. 2,200.

PFEIFFER, Madame Ida, fi'-fer, a celebrated German traveller, who states that from her earliest years she was possessed with a longing for travel; but, having married, family cares and duties prevented her from gratifying her passion until she had attained the age of 47 years. At that time her husband was dead, and her two sons were established in life, one as an artist, and the other as a government official. Accordingly, in 1842 she set forth towards Palestine, that she might "have the ineffable delight of treading those spots which our Saviour had hallowed by his presence." In the following year a narrative of her journey was published, under the title of "Journey of a Vienna Woman in the Holy Land." She next went to Sweden, Norway, and Iceland, in 1845, and again published a narrative of her wanderings. In the summer of the following year she left Hamburg for her first journey round the world. Her route, courageously pursued through every form of danger incidental to such an undertaking, was from Vienna to Brazil, Chili, Tahiti, China, Hindostan, Persia, and Asia Minor. She had been absent from Vienna two years and three months, during which time she had travelled about 40,000 miles by water, and 2,760 by land. In 1850 she published her account of this great journey, in a work entitled "A Woman's Journey round the World," which was speedily translated into French and English. In 1851 she went to London, when, after witnessing the opening of the Great Exhibition of Industry, she left the Thames, on board a sailing-vessel, for the Cape of Good Hope. From the Cape she proceeded to Singapore, Borneo, the island of Sumatra, Java, the island of Celebes, Batavia, which last place she left for California. The "execrable city" of St. Francisco was visited; after which she proceeded to Panama and Lima, crossed the Andes, visited the sources of the river Amazon, and returned to Panama. New Orleans, the Mississippi, lakes Superior, Huron, Erie, and Michigan, and the falls of Niagara, were her subsequent wanderings; Canada and New York succeeded; till, at length, she crossed the Atlantic, and arrived in London at the commencement of 1855. "A Lady's Second Voyage round the World" contained the records of this journey, and, like its predecessors, found great favour with the reading public of France and England. Towards the close of the year 1856, having resolved to visit the island of Madagascar, she set forth upon one of the most perilous of her journeys. In a letter to a friend, she thus wrote:—"I often smile as I think what strange notions people, who only know me through my works, must form of me. Of course they picture me to themselves as more a man than a woman. How wrong they are! You, who are acquainted with me, know that instead of being six feet high, an Amazon, with pistols in my girdle, I am as simple, peaceable, and unassuming as the best of my sex who have never set foot beyond their native village." D. at Vienna, 1795.

PFORTZHEIM, forts'-hime, a town of Germany, in Baden, at the junction of the Wurm and the Nagold, 16 miles from Carlsruhe. Manf. Linen, trinkets, and hardware articles. Pop. 7,600.

PHÆDON, fe'-don, a disciple of Socrates, who purchased him of some pirates. After the death of his master, Phædon returned to Elis, his native country, where he founded a sect of philosophers called Elean. Plato affixed his name to a dialogue on the death of Socrates. Flourished in the 5th century B.C.

PHÆDRUS, fe'-drus, a Latin poet, was a native of Thrace, and appears to have been the freedman of Augustus. Under Tiberius he was persecuted by Sejanus, to which circumstance he has alluded in his Fables, which possess considerable merit, and are written with great purity of style, though they are evidently borrowed from the popular fables of the Greeks. Flourished about the 1st century A.D.

PHAETON, fai'-e-ton, according to Ovid, a son of the sun, or Phœbus. Venus became enamoured of him, and intrusted him with the care of one of her temples. This favour of the goddess rendered him vain, and led to his asking his father's permission to drive his chariot for one day. Phœbus represented the dangers to which this would expose him, but in vain: he undertook the aërial journey, and the explicit directions of his father were forgotten. No sooner had Phaeton received the reins, than he betrayed his ignorance of guiding the chariot. The flying horses became sensible of the confusion of their driver, and immediately departed from the usual track. Phaeton repented too late of his rashness, and already heaven and earth were threatened with a universal conflagration, when Jupiter, who had perceived the disorder of the horses, struck the rider with a thunderbolt, and hurled him headlong from heaven into the river Po. His body, consumed with fire, was found by the nymphs of the place.

PHALARIS, fal'-a-ris, the tyrant of Agrigentum, in Sicily, which city he took B.C. 570. From his youth he displayed a cruel and ambitious temper, and delighted in the invention of new instruments of torture. At his command, Perillus, an artist, made a brazen bull, which was hollow, and so contrived, that when a fire was kindled under the body, the cries of the unhappy victim within resembled the roarings of the animal it represented. Phalaris, after commending the work, ordered Perillus to be the first to make trial of it. The tyrant was himself put to death by his subjects in the same way, B.C. 564. The letters of Phalaris have caused several literary disputes, particularly that between Boyle and Bentley. The best edition of the letters (probably the work of a Sophist in the time of the Cæsars) is that of Schäfer, Leipsic. B. in Crete, in the 6th century B.C.

PHALSBOURG, fals'-boorg, a town of France, in the department of Meurthe, 30 miles from Strasburg. Pop. 5,200. It was, in 1814-15, besieged by the allies.

PHAON, fai'-on, a boatman of Mitylene, in Lesbos, who received a small box of ointment from Venus, with which he rubbed himself, and became one of the most beautiful men of his age. Many were captivated with him, and, among others, Sappho, the celebrated poetess. Phaon at first appeared to return Sappho's passion, but soon, however, conceived a disdain for her; whereupon, the mortified poetess threw herself into the sea.

PHARAMOND, far'-a-mond, a mythical personage, who, according to many of the older historians, was the first king of France, and reigned at Treves, about A.D. 420. He is, however, supposed by others to have been only the general of an army, or the chief of a military society of Franks. To him is attributed also the celebrated salique law, by which females were excluded from the succession to the throne.

PHARAOH, fai'-ro, the name borne in the Bible by ten kings of Egypt; the best known of which are, the monarch to whom Joseph explained his dream, and who loaded him with honours; he who commenced the persecution of the Hebrews, and who put to death all the male children; and he who was summoned by Moses to permit of the departure of the Hebrew people, and who was afterwards drowned, with all his host, in the waters of the Red Sea.

PHARNACES I., far'-na-sees, king of Pontus, was the son of Mithridates V., and grandfather of Mithridates the Great. He made war against the king of Pergamus, and reigned between 184—157 B.C.

PHARNACES, king of the Cimmerian Bosphorus, was son of Mithridates VI., king of Pontus, and revolted with the army against his father, who slew himself in despair, B.C. 63. Pharnaces cultivated the friendship of the Romans, and, in the war between Cæsar and Pompey, he remained neutral; but Cæsar declared war against and defeated him, B.C. 47, after a struggle of three days only. It was on that occasion that Cæsar wrote to the Roman senate, in allusion to his easy triumph: "I came, saw, and conquered" (Veni, vidi, vici). Pharnaces died shortly afterwards.

PHAROS, fa'-ros, a peninsula and anciently an island of Lower Egypt, on which stood a lighthouse. It forms the site of the modern Alexandria.

PHARSALIA, far-sai'-li-a, the ancient Pharsalus, and modern Satalge, a town of Thessaly, 18 miles from Larissa, in the neighbourhood of which the troops of Pompey were defeated by those of Julius Cæsar.

PHASIS, fai'-sis, a river of Asiatic Russia, from which the European pheasant derives its name, as originally imported from its banks. It rises in a spur of the Caucasus, and anciently was considered the boundary between Europe and Asia. It enters the Black Sea 34 miles from Batum.

PHEASANT ISLAND, fes'-ant, lies between Spain and France, in the Bidassoa river. Here the treaty of the Pyrenees was concluded in 1659.

PHERECRATES, fe-rek'-ra-tees, a Greek comic poet, was contemporary with Plato and Aristophanes. None of his comedies have come down to us in a complete form, and of the seventeen plays which he wrote, only some fragments have been preserved by Hertelius and Grotius. There is in Plutarch a piece of his on the music of the Greeks. Flourished in the 5th century B.C.

PHERECYDES, fer-e-si'-dees, a philosopher of the isle of Syros. He was the disciple of Pittacus, and the first who wrote upon natural science and the essence of the gods. He was the master of Pythogoras, who regarded him as a father. There are different accounts of his death: some assert that he died in the island of Delos, and others that he threw himself from the top of Mount Corycius, near Delphi. It is most probable that he died of extreme age. Diogenes Laertius ascribes to him the invention of proscdy. Flourished about 544 B.C. He is not to be confounded with another of this name who lived between 480 and 456 B.C., and wrote the History of Athens.

PHIDIAS, fid'-i-as, a sculptor of Athens, and one of the most celebrated artists of antiquity. He constructed a beautiful statue of Minerva; but being accused of embezzling some of the gold intrusted to him for that work, he was, according to one account, banished. On this he went to Elis, where, by way of revenge, he made a colossal statue of Jupiter Olympius, which infinitely surpassed his Minerva, and was deemed one of the wonders of the world. D. about B.C. 432.

PHILADELPHIA, fil'-a-del'-fe-a, a city and port of entry of the United States, in Pennsylvania, on the west bank of the Delaware, about 100 miles from the Atlantic, and 80 from New York. It is situate on the narrowest part of an isthmus, between the Delaware and the Schuylkill rivers, about 6 miles above their confluence. The buildings now occupy a space upwards of 5 miles long from north to south, and they extend from the Delaware to the Schuylkill. The streets are regular and spacious, and the squares are numerous. Many of the streets are shaded with trees, and the public buildings are mostly of white marble. These are the State-house, in which the independence of the Union was declared in 1776, the United States Bank, on the model of the Parthenon at Athens, the United States Mint, the Exchange, the United States Naval Asylum, the Gerard Bank and College, Masonic Hall, almshouses, penitentiary, and state prison. There are upwards of 100 places of worship, and several charitable institutions; among which may be noticed the anatomical museum, in which is a statue of Penn, and West's painting of "Christ healing the Sick." The houses of the city are generally constructed of brick, without much ornament, but have a striking appearance of convenience, comfort, neatness, and opulence. There are several large markets, learned institutions, libraries, and numerous academies and schools. The American Philosophical Society was founded by Benjamin Franklin and others in 1740, and the Philadelphia Museum is the best in the Union. Manf. Philadelphia exceeds all other towns in the United States in the variety and excellence of its manufactures. They consist of cotton, nails, rope, paper, glass, marble, and numerous other kinds. Pop. about 450,000. Lat. 39° 57′ N. Lon. 75° 10′ W.—Philadelphia is connected by railway with most of the principal towns of the Union.

PHILADELPHIA, Asia Minor. (See ALA-SHEHER.)

PHILADELPHIA, a county of the United States, in Pennsylvania. Area, 120 square miles. Pop. 410,000.

PHILÆ, fil'-le, an island of Upper Egypt, in the Nile, above the first cataract, 6 miles from Assouan. It contains some fine remains of antiquity.

PHILEMON, fi-le'-mon, a Greek comic poet, who was contemporary with, and the rival of, Menander, and is asserted to have been the author of 97 comedies. Plautus imitated some of his works. His death is said to have been occasioned, at the age of 97, by laughing at seeing an ass eat figs, B.C. 274.

PHILETAS, fi-le'-tas, a Greek grammarian and poet of Cos, and preceptor to Ptolemy Philadelphus. He wrote elegies and epigrams, which are lost. D. about B.C. 290.

PHILIP, fil'-ip, was the name borne by several kings of Macedon, the most celebrated of whom were:—

PHILIP II., the son of Amyntas, succeeded his brother Perdiccas 359 B.C. In his youth he displayed great military talents, which were improved by studying under Epaminondas at Thebes. At the beginning of his reign he had to oppose the Illyrians, Pæonians, and Thracians. The two former he disarmed by presents and promises, and the latter were not able to act against him. He then made war against Athens; and, having gained a great victory over the troops of that republic, he restored all the prisoners without a ransom, which generosity produced a peace. Philip then turned his arms against the Illyrians, whom he defeated. After this he took Crenides, a city belonging to the Thracians; and, having made himself master of the gold-mines near that place, he employed a number of men in working them, and was the first who had gold coin stamped with his name. His ambition now became boundless: he formed the design of subduing all Greece, and began by taking Olynthus, a city belonging to Athens, and, having corrupted the principal inhabitants, he obtained possession of the place. The Athenians were roused against Philip by the eloquence of Demosthenes; but all the efforts of the orator proved ineffectual when opposed to the arms and gold of the king of Macedon. After vanquishing Greece, Philip resolved to attempt the conquest of Persia, and was for that purpose elected commander-in-chief of the expedition in a general assembly of the Grecian states; but, while preparing for the enterprise, he was assassinated by Pausanias, one of his guards, leaving his vast designs to be accomplished by his son Alexander. Assassinated 336 B.C.

PHILIP V., king of Macedon, obtained the crown at the age of 17, upon the death of his cousin Antigonus, 220 B.C. The beginning of his reign was brilliant, owing to the conquests of his general Aratus, whom Philip, out of jealousy, caused to be poisoned. After the battle of Cannæ, 216 B.C., he joined Hannibal against the Romans; but the consul Lævinus marched into Macedon, and compelled Philip to sue for peace. The Roman senate being apprised of a secret treaty between Philip and Hannibal, sent Flaminius against the former, who was defeated, and obliged to yield to dishonourable terms. At the instigation of his son Perseus, he put to death his eldest son Demetrius, who was accused of designs upon the throne. D. 179 B.C.

PHILIP I., king of Spain, surnamed the Handsome, was the son of Maximilian I., emperor of Germany; and, by his marriage with the heiress of Ferdinand V., king of Aragon, and Isabella, queen of Castile, he obtained the Spanish crown. B. 1198; D. at Bruges, 1506.

PHILIP II. was the only legitimate son of Charles V. In 1554 he became king of Naples and Sicily, by the abdication of his father, and in the same year married Mary, queen of England. In 1556 his father resigned to him the crown of Spain, having in the previous year given him the government of the Netherlands. He declared war against France, and was present at the battle of St. Quentin, where it is said he made two vows, the one never again to hazard his person in an engagement, and the other to build a palace to the honour of St. Lawrence. This last he executed at the village of Escurial, near Madrid, and gave to the building the form of a gridiron, in commemoration of the instrument of the saint's martyrdom. In 1559 he made peace with France, and, on his return from the Netherlands to Spain, he caused an auto da fe to be celebrated, by which several unfortunate victims of the Inquisition were burnt alive. Resolved to extirpate heresy in his dominions, he employed fire and sword with unsparing bitterness in his Italian possessions; but the Netherlands resisted the attempt to establish the Inquisition, and, led by William the Silent, seven provinces succeeded, after a long and terrible struggle, in throwing off the Spanish yoke. (See ORANGE, Prince of.) In 1588 Philip fitted out his famous expedition called the Invincible Armada, for the invasion of England. This fleet, consisting of 130 ships in all, manned by troops, sailors, and galley-slaves, to the amount of nearly 30,000 men, together with 2,000 Spanish nobles and their retainers, was almost totally destroyed by the storm or the English ships. When Philip heard of the disaster, he said, "I sent my fleet to combat the English, not the elements; God's will be done." At the same time that he attacked England he gave his assistance to the Roman Catholic league in France, against Henry IV., hoping thereby to eventually subjugate that country. Philip is accused of sacrificing his son Don Carlos to what he called his "regard for the welfare of the state." The precise reasons for his conduct towards him are not established; but it is certain that the unfortunate young man perished miserably in a dungeon in his 23rd year. The greatest praise that can be accorded to this cold-hearted bigot is, that he gave a certain amount of encouragement to arts and sciences. B. 1527; D. 1598.

PHILIP III., the son of Philip II. and of Anne of Austria, succeeded his father at the age of 20. His reign was unfortunate and imprudent; the king himself being too indolent to rule his dominions, resigned the entire guidance of affairs to his favourite, the duke of Lerma. Spinola took Ostend, after a siege of three years, but with the loss of 80,000 Spaniards. The United Provinces, taking advantage of the exhausted condition of Spain, established their independence under the house of Nassau, and extorted from Philip an acknowledgement of their freedom. In 1609 he issued a decree that all the Moors should quit his kingdom in three days; by which Spain lost above a million of its most useful inhabitants. The lavish expenditure and confused management of the finances during this reign, were among the chief causes of the decline of the Spanish power. B. 1578; D. 1621.

PHILIP IV. succeeded his father, Philip III., at the age of 16. The same year war was renewed with Holland, and the Spaniards, under Spinola, gained some advantages; but at sea they were totally unsuccessful. In 1635, Philip, at the instigation of his favourite and minister, the Duke Olivarez, declared war against France, which proved very disastrous. He lost Artois; the Catalonians revolted, and put themselves under the protection of France; and Portugal, taking advantage of the distracted state of Spain, secured its independence, and placed on the throne the house of Braganza. Olivarez, by his negligence and mismanagement, the author of their disasters, was disgraced; and, in 1659, a disadvantageous peace was concluded with France. B. 1607; D. 1665. Lord Macaulay, in his fifth volume of the History of England, gives us a painfully real portrait of this last of a race of bigots:—"Sometimes he starved himself, sometimes he whipped himself. At length a complication of maladies completed the ruin of all his faculties. His stomach failed. Nor was this strange; for in him the malformation of the jaw, characteristic of his family, was so serious that he could not masticate his food. While suffering from indigestion, he was attacked by ague. Every third day his convulsive tremblings, his dejection, his fits of wandering, seemed to indicate the approach of dissolution. His misery was increased by the knowledge that everybody was calculating how long he had to live, and wondering what would become of his kingdoms when he should be dead."

PHILIP V., duke of Anjou, the second son of Louis, dauphin of France, and of Mary-Anne of Bavaria, assumed the crown of Spain in 1700, by virtue of the will of Charles II. His claim, however, was contested by the house of Austria, in favour of the archduke Charles. This produced the grand alliance, in which Austria was supported, against France and Spain, by England, Holland, Savoy, Portugal, and Prussia. The beginning of this war, memorable in history as the War of the Spanish Succession, was very disastrous to Philip, who lost Aragon, Gibraltar, and the islands of Minorca and Majorca, also Sardinia and the kingdom of Naples. In this extremity he was about to retire to Spanish America, when the duke de Vendôme arrived with succours, and by gaining the battle of Villaviciosa, gave a more favourable turn to affairs. The victories of that great general, and those of Marshal Villars, in Flanders, confirmed Philip on the throne, and restored peace to Europe by the treaty of Utrecht, in 1713. The war was renewed in 1717, and the Spanish fleet was defeated in the Mediterranean, by Sir George Byng. Peace was restored in 1720, after which, Philip became a victim to confirmed melancholy, and in 1724 abdicated the throne to his son Louis, and retired to a monastery. Louis died a few months after, of the small-pox, and Philip was compelled to resume the government. His subsequent conduct was characterized by greater spirit and judgment. In 1733 he entered into an alliance with France against the emperor, and his son Don Carlos conquered Sicily and Naples, of which he became king. In 1734 the royal palace was burnt, and a great number of fine paintings destroyed. In 1736 peace was concluded; but a new war broke out in 1739. B. 1683; D. 1746.

PHILIP I., king of France, succeeded his father, Henry I., in 1060, under the regency of Baldwin V., count of Flanders. Philip at the age of 15 lost his faithful guardian. The young king showed at first a warlike spirit, but afterwards gave himself up to licentious pleasures. The most important incident of his reign was his divorce of his wife Bertha, and marriage with Bertrade, the wife of the count of Anjou, for which he was excommunicated by the council of Autun, in 1094; but ten years afterwards he was absolved by the pope, who also approved of his marriage with Bertrade. B. 1053; D. 1108.

PHILIP II., surnamed the August, succeeded his father, Louis VII., in 1180, at the age of 15. Henry II. of England, taking advantage of his youth, invaded France; but Philip put himself at the head of his forces, and compelled Henry to renew the ancient treaties between the two kingdoms. After this, he turned his attention to the regulation of abuses in the government, and to the improvement of the city of Paris. He expelled the Jews from his dominions, under circumstances of great injustice and cruelty. In 1190 Philip accompanied Richard I. of England to the Holy Land, where they took Acre; but dissensions arising between the two monarchs, Philip returned to France. Though he had sworn on the Gospels not to undertake anything against the interests of Richard in his absence, he invaded Normandy, and took some places; but being repulsed at Rouen, he made a truce for five years, and in the interval married Ingeburge, princess of Demark, whom he afterwards divorced, and espoused the daughter of the duke of Moravia, for which he was excommunicated by the pope, and not absolved till he took back his former wife. Philip gave his assistance to Prince Arthur against his uncle John, king of England; but John having declared himself a vassal of the Holy See, the pope gave countenance to his acts. This giving offence to the English nobility, they made an offer of the throne to Philip, who declined it, but sent to England his son Louis, who was crowned at London in 1216. On the death of John, however, the English barons acknowledged his son, Henry III., and Louis returned to France. B. 1165; D. at Mantes, 1223.

PHILIP III., surnamed the Hardy, was proclaimed king of France in Africa, on the death of St. Louis, his father, in 1270. After concluding a peace with the king of Tunis, whose city the French were besieging, he returned to France, and was crowned at Rheims. Peter of Aragon, having occasioned the horrible massacre of the French in Sicily, called the Sicilian Vespers, Philip marched against him in 1283, and took several towns, but died of a fever on his return, at Perpignan, in 1285. B. 1245.

PHILIP IV., called the Fair, succeeded his father, the preceding monarch, in 1285. He became king of Navarre, in consequence of his marriage with Jane, daughter and heiress of Henry I. In 1285, Philip engaged in a war against Edward I., king of England, who formed several powerful alliances with continental princes against the French monarch. In 1302, Philip, while attempting to suppress a revolt of the Flemings, lost the battle of Courtray, where perished the count of Artois, with 20,000 men. But, in 1304, he gained that of Mons-en-Puelle; in commemoration of which a fine equestrian statue of this monarch was set up in the church of Notre Dame, at Paris. This victory was followed by a peace; but Philip was shortly afterwards embroiled in a contest with Pope Boniface VIII., who pretended to the right of disposing of benefices, which was resisted by the king. On this the pope issued his bull of excommunication, which Philip caused to be burnt. The violent acts of Boniface were condemned by the popes Benedict and Clement V., the latter of whom assisted Philip in persecuting and abolishing the order of Knights Templars in 1311. B. 1268; D. 1314.

PHILIP V., surnamed the Long, was the younger son of the preceding, and succeeded his brother Louis Hutin, by virtue of the salique law, which excluded females from the French throne, in 1316. He made war against Flanders, formed an alliance with Scotland, and expelled the Jews from his kingdom. The leprosy, a disease brought by the crusaders from Palestine, prevailed in a great degree in his reign. B. 1294; D. 1322.

PHILIP VI., or PHILIP OF VALOIS, the first king of France of the collateral branch of Valois, was the son of Charles, count of Valois, brother of Philip the Fair. He ascended the throne in 1328, on the death of his cousin, Charles the Fair. In 1329, Edward III., king of England, did homage for the duchy of Guienne; but in 1337 he assumed the title of king of France, on the pretence of being a grandson of Philip the Fair by his mother. This produced a disastrous war, which lasted, with a few intervals, during many years. In 1346, Edward III. gained the battle of Cressy, in which the French lost near 30,000 men; among whom were John, king of Bohemia, and the flower of the nobility. This was followed by the loss of Calais and other important places, in the following year. Edward sent a challenge to Philip to decide their pretensions by single combat, which the latter refused. The course of the disasters of his reign was completed in the year 1348, by the outbreak of a terrible pestilence, which carried off a third portion of his subjects. B. 1293; D. near Chartres, 1350.

PHILIP, Marcus Julius, called the Arab, from his being a native of Bostra, in Arabia, was born of an obscure family, and became a common soldier in the Roman army; but by his merit he rose to the command of the imperial guard. In 244 he assassinated the emperor Gordianus the younger, and seized upon the throne. He gained great popularity at Rome by his generosity, and by making a canal for supplying the city with water. He celebrated the secular games with great pomp, and permitted great toleration to the Christians; indeed, by some writers, he is stated to have been himself a Christian. In 249 he was defeated by Decius, near Verona, and was assassinated by his soldiery immediately afterwards.

PHILIP, a native of Phrygia, and governor of Jerusalem, where he greatly persecuted the Jews. Antiochus Epiphanes, who had appointed him to that post, left him regent of his kingdom during the minority of his son; but Philip was opposed by Lysias, and slain in battle.

PHILIP, duke of Suabia, son of Frederick Barbarossa, was elected emperor on the death of his brother, Henry VI., in 1198. But another party of the electors chose Otho, duke of Saxony, which occasioned a civil war. The pope excommunicated Philip, but afterwards absolved him, and endeavoured in vain to reconcile the contending princes. D. 1178; assassinated at Bamberg, 1208.

PHILIP, physician to Alexander the Great, who cured his master of an attack of fever contracted while bathing in the river Cydnus. Parmenio wrote a letter to Alexander, informing him that his physician had been bribed by Darius to poison him; but the king of Macedonia, having confidence in his physician, took the draught which had been prescribed for him, at the same time handing to Philip the letter he had received. The speedy recovery of Alexander proved the fidelity of his physician. Flourished in the 4th century B.C.

PHILIP OF DREUX, the son of Robert, count de Dreux, embraced the ecclesiastical state, and became bishop of Beauvais; but the character of his mind more inclined him to warlike affairs than religious exercises. He joined the crusaders, and distinguished himself before Acre, in 1191. Philip II. having declared war against the English, the bishop took up arms in his favour; but was taken prisoner, and kept in close confinement. He made an appeal to the pope, who demanded him, as his son, from Richard II. That monarch, however, sent to the pope the bloody armour in which the bishop was taken, accompanied with these words, "See, holy father, if this be thy son's coat." The pope would not recognize the habiliments as canonical, and the bishop remained a prisoner till 1202. He afterwards fought against the Albigenses; and D. at Beauvais, 1217.

PHILIP, St., one of the twelve apostles of Jesus Christ, was a fisherman of Bethsaida, a city of Galilee, on the Lake of Gennesareth, when he was called by our Saviour. Ecclesiastical historians relate that he was married and had several children, and that he preached the Gospel in Phrygia. He is enrolled among the martyrs by some ancient writers. He is not to be confounded with Philip the Deacon, mentioned in the Acts, who converted the eunuch of Candace, queen of Ethiopia. Suffered martyrdom at Hierapolis, it is supposed, about 80.

PHILIP THE GOOD, duke of Burgundy. Out of revenge for the death of his father, who was slain in 1419, he formed an alliance with Henry V. of England, against Charles II. of France and his successor. He defeated the dauphin at the battle of Mons, in 1421, about which time he made war, with success, against the countess of Hainault, and compelled her to acknowledge him as her heir. It was during this war that Joan of Arc was captured and burnt. (See JOAN OF ARC.) In 1435 he was reconciled to Charles VII. The people of Dinan, in the province of Liége, having committed some outrages, Philip sent against them his son, the count of Charolois, who burnt the city to ashes, and put the inhabitants to the sword. This inhuman action being approved of by the father, proves that he had no right to be called the Good. B. 1396; D. 1467.

PHILIPPEVILLE, fil'-ip-veel, a fortified town of Algeria, on the Gulf of Stora, 35 miles from Bona. Pop. about 10,000.—In 1849 it was nearly consumed by fire.

PHILIPPI, fi-lip'-pi, a ruined town of European Turkey, in Macedonia, 10 miles from Drama, where Brutus and Cassius were defeated by Octavius and Antony, which ended the republican government of Rome, B.C. 42.

PHILIPPINE ISLANDS, fil'-ip-pine, a group in the Asiatic archipelago, consisting of a great number of islands, of various sizes, on many of which the Spaniards have establishments, while others are but little known. There are about 1,200 of them, and the largest are Luzon, or Luconia, Mindanao, Panay, Palawan, Mindora, Marindique, Negros, Zebu, Bohol, Leyte, Samar, and Masbate. Area. Estimated at 120,000 square miles; but the dominion of Spain is held over only 52,150. Desc. Volcanic, and, from their situation, possessing the peculiarities of a tropical climate, although they are not liable to any intense heats. Pro. Their principal is rice, which is the chief food of the natives. The other products are different sorts of pulse, the breadfruit, beans, the cacavata, cotton, coffee, sago, cocoanuts, hemp, cinnamon, betel, and bananas. The fruit-trees are few in number, and of an indifferent quality, except the plantain, to which may be added the orange and mango. Manilla produces indigo of an inferior quality; but the tobacco is excellent. The mountains afford excellent timber; and horses and horned cattle, introduced by the Spaniards, have thriven exceedingly. Among the curious birds are the swallows which form the edible nests so highly esteemed by the Chinese; and the biche de mer, another Chinese delicacy, is also procured on the coast. Manf. Government Manilla cigars, cigar-cases, straw hats, earthenware; and domestic weaving is pursued by the females. Imp. All kinds of India piece-goods, and European cutlery and iron. Exp. Birdsnests, cassia, gold-dust, pepper, rattans, sago, tortoiseshell, wax, wild honey, amber, marble, tar, brimstone, and many other articles of inferior note. Pop. Estimated at 3,700,000; consisting of Papuan negroes, half-castes, Chinese, European, and native whites. Lat. between 5° 32′ and 19° 38′ N. Lon. between 117° and 127° E.—These islands were first discovered by Magellan, in 1521; but it was not till 1565 that they were taken possession of. Manilla was constituted the capital of the Spanish possessions in the Philippines. It was taken by the English in 1762, but restored in 1764. The islands were named after Philip II. of Spain.

PHILIPPOPOLI, fil'-ip-po'-po-le, a town of European Turkey, in Macedon, on a small island formed by the Marizza, 86 miles from Adrianople. Before the earthquake which took place here in 1818, by which the town was in a great measure destroyed, Philippopoli was a thriving place. It still has twenty mosques and several Armenian and Greek churches. Manf. Woollen, silk, and cotton fabrics, leather, soap, and tobacco. Pop. 40,000.

PHILIPS, Ambrose, fil'-ips, an English dramatic writer and poet, was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, where he wrote his Pastorals, which were at one time greatly admired, and praised by some good writers. Pope, however, ridiculed them with great severity, at the same time that he exempted Philips's Winter Piece from his censure. He was also the author of a tragedy of merit, entitled "The Distressed Mother," and an abridged "Life of Archbishop Williams." B. about 1671; D. 1749.

PHILISTUS, fi-lis'-tus, a Greek writer, and the favourite of the tyrant Dionysius of Syracuse, who afterwards banished him. In his exile he wrote the History of Sicily, and that of Dionysius, which Cicero has commended. He was recalled by Dionysius the Younger, but was defeated by Dion in a naval engagement, and put to death, B.C. 367. Some extracts from his writings are included in the "Fragmenta" of Müller.

PHILLIDOR, Andrew, fil'-li-dor, a French musical composer, but better known as a distinguished chess-player. At an early age he became a chorister in the chapel of Louis XV.; but after the changing of his voice he was left without employment. Being an adept at chess-playing, he set out upon a tour through Holland, Germany, and England, and earned, by exhibiting his skill, the means of improving his knowledge of music. In 1753 he set to music Congreve's "Ode to Harmony," which obtained some success. While in London he also devoted much of his time to chess, and produced a work on that art. Retiring to Paris in 1754, he assisted in founding the Opéra Comique. He paid another visit to England in 1774, and there produced a musical work, but soon afterwards began to exhibit himself as a chess-player at Parsloe's Club, in St. James's Street, where, among other feats, he, blindfolded and simultaneously, played and won two games. B. at Dreux, 1726; D. in London, 1795.

PHILLIPS, John, fil'-ips, an eminent modern geologist, professor of geology at the university of Oxford, and assistant general secretary of the British Association for the Advancement of Science. He was an active worker in the paths of geological science for nearly half a century, and assisted in many great works connected with his favourite pursuit, from the date of the "Map of the Strata of England and Wales" to the present great undertaking,—the "Geological Survey of the United Kingdom." He edited or arranged twenty-seven volumes of the Reports of the British Association; and in the "Bibliography of Geology" of Mr. Strickland and Sir W. Jardine, thirty-one treatises of his on geology are enumerated. The most important of his other works are, treatise on geology in the "Cabinet Cyclopædia," "Illustrations of the Geology of Yorkshire," "Rivers, Mountains, and Seacoast of Yorkshire," and "Geological Map of the British Isles." To the "Encyclopædia Britannica," "Encyclopædia Metropolitana," "Penny Cyclopædia," &c., he contributed many valuable articles on subjects of geological science. In 1858-59 he was elected president of the Geological Society. B. 1800.

PHILLIPS, Samuel, a modern English littérateur, was the son of a tradesman in London, who brought him up for the stage. At the age of 14 he appeared at the Haymarket theatre, in the character of Richard III.; but, at the instance of some friends, his father afterwards sent him to the university of Göttingen. He next proceeded to Cambridge; but the death of his father called him to London, in order to carry on the business for the benefit of his mother and family. In 1841 he adopted the profession of literature, and wrote "Caleb Stukely," for "Blackwood's Magazine." Subsequently engaged upon the staff of the Times newspaper, he contributed to that print many of the best reviews of books which have appeared in its columns. He was for a period "literary director" to the Crystal Palace Company; during which time he wrote the "Crystal Palace Portrait-Gallery" and the "Guide to the Palace and Park." Some of his criticisms upon books in the leading English journal were reprinted, with the title "Essays from the Times." Consumptive tendencies had for a long time exhibited themselves previous to his death, which was at length brought about by that malady. B. in London, 1815; D. at Brighton, 1854.

PHILO JUDÆUS, fil'-lo, a learned Jewish writer, who was born of an illustrious family, and formed a member of the deputation sent by the Jews to lay their complaints against the Greeks of Alexandria before the emperor Caligula, A.D. 40. He wrote several works in Greek, the principal of which is entitled "Of the Contemplative Life." He was a zealous Platonist, and, on that account, has been styled the Jewish Plato. The best edition of his works, chiefly treating upon subjects connected with the religion of the Jews, is that of London, by William Bowyer. B. at Alexandria, and flourished in the 1st century A.D.

PHILO OF BYBLOS, a Greek grammarian, who translated into Greek the Phœnician history of Sanconiathon, fragments of which remain. Flourished in the 1st century.

PHILO OF BYZANTIUM, an architect, who wrote a treatise on machines used in war, which is printed in the collection of ancient mathematical works. Flourished about 300 B.C.

PHILOCTETES, fil-ok-te'-tees, son of Pœan and Demonassa, was one of the Argonauts, and the armbearer and friend of Hercules. He erected the pile on which the hero was consumed, and received from him his arrows, dipped in the gall of the hydra. After paying the last offices to Hercules, he returned to Melibœa, where his father reigned. He then visited Sparta, where he became one of the suitors of Helen, and soon after accompanied the Greeks to the Trojan war, with seven ships; but he was prevented from joining his countrymen at Aulis, and, at the instigation of Ulysses, was sent to the island of Lemnos. In this retreat he remained for some time, till the Greeks, in the tenth year of the Trojan war, were informed by the oracle that Troy could not be taken without the arrows of Hercules, then in the possession of Philoctetes. Upon this, Ulysses, accompanied by Diomedes, went to Lemnos, to prevail upon Philoctetes to come and finish the siege. Philoctetes refused to go to Troy, and was about to return to Melibœa, when the manes of Hercules immediately ordered him to repair to the Grecian camp, where he should be cured of his wounds and put an end to the war. Philoctetes obeyed; and, being restored to health by Æsculapius, he destroyed an immense number of Trojans; among whom, according to some mythologists, was Paris. When Troy had been destroyed, he set sail from Asia; but, as he was unwilling to visit his native country, he went to Italy, where he built a town in Calabria, which he called Petilia. The sufferings and adventures of Philoctetes form the subject of one of the best tragedies of Sophocles.

PHILOLAUS, fil-o-lai'-us, a Pythagorean philosopher of Crotona, who maintained that all things were made by harmony and necessity. He also asserted that the earth was round, and had a circular motion. The Golden Verses of Pythagoras have been attributed to him. Lived about 374 B.C.

PHILOPŒMEN, fil-o-pe'-men, general of the Achæans, who displayed great bravery in defending his native city against Cleomenes III., king of Sparta; and, in 208, gained the famous battle of Messene over the Ætolians. For this he was made captain-general; and he shortly afterwards slew Machanidas, tyrant of Lacedæmon, near Mantinea, with his own hand. Nabis, the successor of Machanidas, defeated Philopœmen at sea; but he recovered this loss on land, took Sparta, razed its walls, and abolished the laws of Lycurgus. The Messenians having revolted, Philopœmen marched against them, but was taken prisoner by falling from his horse. Dinocrates, the Messenian general, threw him into prison, and caused him to be poisoned, 182 B.C. B. in Arcadia, about 253 B.C.

PHILOSTORGIUS, fil-os-tor'-ji-us, an ecclesiastical historian, who wrote an Ecclesiastical History of his own time, which was published by Valesius at Paris, with Eusebius, in 1673; but the separate edition of Godefroi, 1642, is the best. B. in Cappadocia, about 364; D. about 425.

PHILOSTRATUS, Flavius, fil-os-trai'-tus, a famous Greek sophist, who resided at Rome, where he was patronized by Julia, wife of Septimus Severus. He wrote the "Life of Apollonius Tyaneus," a pretended philosopher. It is an extravagant romance, full of fables. He also wrote the Lives of the Sophists, and a commentary upon the heroes of Homer. Flourished towards the close of the 2nd century.

PHILOXENUS, fil-lox'-e-nus, a dithyrambic poet of Cythera, lived at the court of Dionysius of Syracuse, who banished him to the stone-quarries for censuring his verses. D. at Ephesus, about 380 B.C.

PHING, fing, a prefix to several cities in China.

PHLEGON, fle'-gon, surnamed Trallian, from the place of his birth, a city of Lydia. He was the freedman of Adrian, and wrote a History of Marvellous Things; also a History of the Olympiads, part of which is extant. He is said to have mentioned the darkness at our Saviour's crucifixion. This passage caused a controversy between Whiston, Chapman, and others, in the 18th century. The best edition of his remains is that of Westerman, 1839. Flourished in the 2nd century.

PHOCAS, fo'-kas, emperor of the East. He usurped the throne by murdering the emperor Maurice and his children, in 602. He put to death a great number of persons, and, by means of fair promises, inveigled Narses, the famous Persian general, to Constantinople, and caused him to be burnt alive. Heraclius, governor of Africa, conspired against and slew Phocas, in 610.

PHOCION, fo'-shi-on, a celebrated Athenian general and statesman, who was the disciple of Plato and Xenocrates. He displayed great eloquence, and opposed Demosthenes, when that great orator endeavoured to raise the Athenians to declare war against Philip. Phocion saw in that measure the ruin of Athens; but, when the war commenced, he manifested the patriotism and talents of a brave general. Philip and Alexander made several attempts to corrupt him, but in vain. Phocion held the generalship at Athens forty-four times; but, notwithstanding his splendid virtues and abilities, he could not escape persecution. He was accused of treachery, and deposed, on which he fled; but was taken and poisoned, B.C. 317. His son Phocus was a man of licentious character; but he avenged the fate of his father upon his accusers, and erected a statue to his memory.

PHOCYLIDES, fo-sil'-i-dees, a Greek poet and philosopher, was a native of Miletus. There is a poem extant, which is, by some critics, attributed to him. Flourished about 530 B.C.

PHORMIO, for'-mi-o, an Athenian general, who succeeded Callias, B.C. 432, and gave great proofs of his courage in the Peloponnesian war, and in defeating the fleets of the Lacedæmonians. He sold his estates to pay his army, and refused the rank of commander-in-chief.

PHOTIUS, fo'-shi-us, patriarch of Constantinople. His learning was great, and advanced him to several high offices in the state; after which, he entered into orders; and, on the deposition of Ignatius, aspired to the patriarchate, which he obtained in an irregular manner in 853, but was nevertheless confirmed in the appointment in 858. This occasioned a schism, and Photius excercised great severities on those who adhered to Ignatius. Basil, the Macedonian, expelled him in 869. Photius, however, continued to gain the favour of Basil, who restored him to the patriarchal see upon the death of Ignatius, in 877. But, in 886, Leo caused him to be again deprived, and confined in a monastery, where he died. His works are, "Bibliotheca," or Commentary on several authors of antiquity; "Nomocanon," or a collection of the canons of the Church; and a collection of theological and controversial works. B. at Constantinople, early in the 9th century; D. in Armenia, about its close.

PHRYNE, fri'-ne, a famous courtesan of Greece, and mistress of Praxiteles, who employed her as a model for his statues of Venus. She acquired immense wealth, and offered to rebuild Thebes, provided this inscription should be placed upon the walls; "Alexander destroyed this city, and the courtesan Phryne restored it;" but her offer was rejected.

PHRYNICUS, frin'-i-kus, a Greek writer, who wrote a treatise on the Attic verbs and nouns, and "The Sophistical Apparatus," a collection of Greek phrases. Flourished about 175.—There were two others of this name, the one a tragic and the other a comic poet.

PHRYXUS, frix'-us, a son of Athamas, king of Thebes, by Nephele, who was persecuted by his stepmother Ino, because he was to obtain the throne in preference to her own children. Being apprised of Ino's intentions upon his life, he secured part of his father's treasure, and privately left Bœotia with his sister Helle, to go to their friend Æetes, king of Colchis. They embarked on board a ship, or, according to the mythologists, they mounted on the back of a ram whose fleece was of gold, and proceeded through the air. The height to which they were carried made Helle giddy, and she fell into the sea, which has been called Hellespont from her name. When Phryxus arrived safe in Colchis, he offered the ram on the altars of Mars. The king received him with great cordiality, and gave him his daughter Chalciope in marriage. Some time after he was murdered by his father-in-law, who envied him the possession of the golden fleece. The fable of Phryxus has been explained by some, who observe that the ship on which he embarked was either called the Ram, or carried on her prow the figure of that animal. The fleece of gold is explained by recollecting that Phryxus carried away immense treasures from Thebes. Phryxus was placed among the constellations of heaven after death. The murder of Phryxus gave rise to the celebrated Argonautic expedition, which had for its object the recovery of the golden fleece. (See JASON.)

PIACENZA, or PIACENTIA, pe-a-chen'-za, a town of Italy, in Parma, near the junction of the Po with the Trebia, 34 miles from Parma. It is defended by a castle, and is inclosed by ramparts entered by five gates. Of its streets, a few are broad and straight, but most of them are narrow and gloomy. Of the public squares, one contains two fine equestrian statues in bronze, representing individuals of the Farnese family. The town has two other squares of inferior interest, one of them containing the ducal palace, the other the cathedral, a heavy building; it contains, however, a number of fine paintings. The theatre is neat and commodious, but small; and there are a university, a public library, and several extensive private collections. Manf. Silk stuffs, woollens, fustians, stockings, and hats. There is also a great yearly fair, held in April. Pop. 31,000.—This is the birthplace of several celebrated men; among whom are Pope Gregory X., Cardinal Alberoni, and Pallavicini. In 219 B.C. Hannibal here defeated the Romans.

PIANOSA, pe-a-no'-sa, an island in the Mediterranean, 10 miles W. of Cape Elba. Ext. 3¼ miles long, by 2½ broad. After the first abdication of Napoleon I., this island was left in his power as an annexation to Elba.

PIAUHI, or PIAUHY, pe'-au-he, a small province of Brazil. Area, 60,500 square miles. Desc. Level, with rich extensive pasturages, on which large herds of cattle are reared. Pro. Millet, manioc, rice, cotton, jalap, ipecachuanha, and cinchora. Minerals. Silver, iron, and lead. Pop. 60,000. Lat. between 2° 42′ and 11° 20′ S. Lon. between 40° 30′ and 47° W.

PIAVE, pe-a'-vai, a river of Italy, rising in the Alps, near Lienz, flowing through the territory of Venice, and falling into the Adriatic 22 miles from Venice.

PIAZZA, pe-at'-sa, a town of Sicily, in the Val di Noto, 80 miles from Palermo. It is noted for the number of its churches and convents. Manf. Woollen cloth and caps. Pop. 16,200.

PICARD, John, pik'-ar, a French astronomer, who became a member of the Academy of Sciences in 1666, and five years afterwards was sent by the king to Uranienburg, which was built by Tycho Brahe to make celestial observations. Picard brought with him from Denmark many manuscripts of Tycho's. He was engaged in measuring a degree of the meridian, and in determining the meridian of France. He wrote a treatise on Levelling, on Dioptrics, on Measures, on the Measurement of the Earth; and "Journey to Uranienburg; or, Astronomical Observations made in Denmark." D. in France, 1620; D. 1683.

PICARDY, pik'-ar-de, an old province in the N. of France, bounded W. by the English Channel and E. by the Netherlands. It now forms the department of the Somme, and part of those of the Oise, Aisne, Pas de Calais, and Yonne.

PICCINI, Nicholas, pe-che'-ne, a celebrated Italian musical composer, whose first masters were Leo and Durante. From Italy he went to Paris in 1776, where the connoisseurs were divided in opinion between him and Gluck. At the Revolution, Piccini returned to Naples, where he was proscribed as being a Jacobin; on which he went again to France, where he remained until his death. His principal operas are, "Roland," "Atys," "Iphigenia in Tauris," and "Dido." B. at Bari, in the kingdom of Naples, 1728; D. at Passy, 1800.

PICCOLOMINI, pik-ko-lo'-me-ne, the name of a noble family of Sienna, who, in 1538, succeeded the Petrucci as chief of the republic. Their power was but short-lived, however; for in 1541 they were deposed at the instance of Spain. This family has given two popes, Pius II. and III., and a celebrated imperialist general, Octavius Piccolomini.

PICCOLOMINI, Alexander, archbishop of Patras and coadjutor of Sienna, where he wrote several dramatic pieces of reputation. His other works are, a treatise on the Sphere, "Theory of the Planets," "Moral Institutes," &c. He was the first who wrote on philosophical subjects in Italian, Latin having been heretofore used by the learned. B. at Sienna, 1508; D. 1578.

PICCOLOMINI, James, a cardinal, whose real name was Ammanati, but which he changed out of respect to Pope Pius II., his patron, who was of that noble family. He became successively bishop of Massa and Frascati, and, in 1461, cardinal. Sixtus IV. seized his property after his death, and applied it to the building of an hospital. He wrote a History of his Own Times, and Letters, which have been printed. B. at Lucca, 1422; D. 1479.

PICHEGRU, Charles, peezh'-groo, a celebrated general of the French republic, who came of humble parentage, but received a good education under the monks in his native town; after which he entered the army, and rose to be sergeant. The Revolution elevated him to the rank of general, and, in 1794, he succeeded General Hoche in the command of the army of the north. Shortly after, he relieved Landau, and compelled the English to evacuate the Netherlands. He next marched into Holland, of which he made a complete conquest. In 1797 he was elected a member of the legislative body; but his opposition to the Directory, and his speeches in favour of the royalist emigrants, occasioned an accusation against him as designing to restore royalty. He was ordered, without trial, to be transported to Cayenne, whence he escaped to England, where he remained till the spring of 1801, when he went to Paris, where he was apprehended and sent to the Temple. Three weeks afterwards he was found strangled in his bed, by means of a black silk handkerchief twisted round his neck, and tightened with a short stick. The body was examined and exposed, and a laboured account published, to make it appear that he had laid violent hands on himself; but all the circumstances warrant a different conclusion, and prove that he was assassinated. B. at Arbois, France, 1761; D. 1804.

PICHINCHA, pe-chin'-cha, a very lofty mountain and volcano of Quito, 11 miles from Quito. Height, 15,920 feet. Lat. 11′ 32″ S.

PICHLER, Caroline, peezh'-ler, an eminent German novelist, who commenced a literary career at an early age, by contributing short poetical pieces to the almanacs. She subsequently produced a number of historical novels, some of which appeared before Sir Walter Scott commenced his career. The best of these novels were "Frederick the Fighter," "Henrietta of England," "The Siege of Vienna," and "The Swedes in Prague." As a dramatist she was less successful; but her "Pictures of the Times," and "Memorable Events of my Life," became highly popular in Germany. About a year after her death, a collected edition of her works was given to the world, and consisted of sixty volumes. As a novelist, she displayed considerable constructive skill, and often wrote with great pictorial effect; but her style was generally marred by too great diffuseness. B. at Vienna, 1769; D. at the same city, 1843.

PICKAWAY, pik'-a-wai, a county in the central part of the state of Ohio, U.S. Area, 542 square miles. Pop. 22,000.

PICKENS, pik'-enz, a district of the United States, South Carolina. Area, 997 square miles. Pop. 17,000.—Also a county in Alabama. Area, 985 square miles. Pop. 22,000.

PICKERING, pik'-e-ring, a market-town of the North Riding of Yorkshire, 18 miles from Whitby. It has a large church, with a lofty spire, an endowed school, and a union workhouse. Pop. 4,300. It has a station on the York and North Midland Railway.

PICKERSGILL, Henry William, pik'-ers-gil, a modern English painter and Royal Academician, who, after completing his career as a student, embraced the historical style of art. He subsequently devoted himself to portraits, and became one of the most fashionably patronized artists in that walk in England. Elected R.A. in 1825, he, ten years later, succeeded to the office of librarian to the Royal Academy. In the British collection at the South Kensington Museum, there is a portrait by him of Robert Vernon, the generous donor of the Vernon collection to the nation. There is also another work of his, entitled "A Syrian Maid," in the same gallery. B. about 1782.

PICKERSGILL, Frederick Richard, a modern English painter, and relative of the preceding. He was a student of the Royal Academy, and, in 1840, exhibited his first picture, "The Combat between Hercules and Achelous." In 1843 he gained one of the £100 prizes, for his cartoon entitled "The Death of King Lear," and, in 1847, won one of the first-class prizes of £100 for his oil-painting of "The Burial of Harold," for which he was afterwards paid an additional £500 on its purchase for the House of Lords. About the same time he became A.R.A., and, in 1857, R.A. One of his best pictures,—"Florimel in the Cottage of the Witch," is in the national collection at the South Kensington Museum. Among his most important works may be mentioned "The Adoration of the Magi," "The Christian Church during the Persecution by the Pagan Emperors at Rome," "Samson Betrayed," and "Love's Labour's Lost." B. in London, 1820.

PICO, pe'-ko, a mountainous island near the coast of Africa, one of the Azores. It has a height of upwards of 7,000 feet, and is crowned with a magnificent dome, while its sides are covered with vineyards and varied cultivation. Area, 254 square miles. Pop. 38,000. Lat. 38° 23′ N. Lon. 28° 25′ W.

PICTOU, pik'-too, a small isle, river, bay, and settlement in Nova Scotia, at the southern extremity of the Gulf of St. Lawrence. The settlement consists of about 30,000 inhabitants, mostly of Scotch descent.

PIDAURO. (See EPIDAURUS.)

PIEDIMONTE, pe'-ai-de-mon'-tai, a town of Naples, in Terra di Lavoro, 20 miles from Caserta. It has a royal palace. Manf. Cloth and paper. Pop. 5,700.

PIEDMONT, peed'-mont (Ital. PIEMONTE, pe-ai-mon'-tai), PRINCIPALITY OF, the principal province of the continental states of the kingdom of Sardinia, forming the north-west portion of Italy, having France on the W. and Lombardy on the E. Area, 11,867 square miles. Desc. Its surface presents a succession of mountains and hills, which are devoted to pasturage, in which large herds of cattle are reared. Rivers. The Po, which receives the two Doras, the Stura, the Orco, the Sesia, the Tanaro, the Borbio, the Balbo, the Bormida, and the Varo. Climate. Cold in the mountains, but hot in the plains. Pro. Wheat, rye, barley, and maize; and, in the lower grounds, rice. The hills are in general covered with vineyards. Olives, almonds, chestnuts, and, in a smaller quantity, figs, oranges, and lemons, are raised. Silk is produced in immense quantities, and, on account of its fineness and strength, is preferred to all the silks of Italy. Minerals. Iron, lead, copper, sulphur, marble, manganese, cobalt, and small quantities of the precious metals. Manf. Principally silk fabrics, hosiery, woollen and linen goods, brandy, liqueurs, glass and iron wares. Pop. 2,500,000. The great routes of the Simplon, Mont Cenis, St. Bernard, and the Col de Tende, cross the Alps in Piedmont. (See SARDINIA.)

PIELIS-YERVI, pe'-lis-yer'-ve, a lake in the E. of Finland, in Carelia. Ext. 57 miles in length, and from 6 to 14 in breadth. It communicates with the lake Orovesi. Lat. between 62° 55′ and 63° 35′ N. Lon. between 29° and 30° 20′ E.

PIERRE, Bernardin de St., pe'-air, an eminent French writer, who was educated for the profession of a civil engineer, and obtained employment under the French government. Quitting his native country, he went to Russia, where he was engaged to execute several important surveys; but having presented to Count Orloff a plan for establishing a colony of foreigners upon the eastern shores of the Caspian Sea, under a republican government, he met with such a reception as decided him to leave that country. He repaired to Poland, with the intention of taking arms against Russia, but fell deeply in love at Warsaw, and forgot military glory in the beauty of a Polish maiden. After spending some time in Germany, he returned to France, and soon afterwards joined an expedition, the ostensible object of which was to form a republican colony in the island of Madagascar; but, discovering that his fellow-voyagers were, in reality, going thither to obtain a supply of slaves, he abandoned them, and landed in the Isle of France (Mauritius), where he spent two years. Returning to Paris, he devoted himself to literature, and produced his beautiful little story of "Paul and Virginia," which has become a classic in every European language. His other works were, "Studies of Nature," "Harmonies of Nature," "The Indian Cottage," "Narrative of a Journey to Russia;" and several plays. When the Revolution burst forth, he was reduced to great distress, which was afterwards alleviated by the generous patronage of Joseph Bonaparte. The emperor subsequently bestowed a pension upon him, and added to it the cross of the Legion of Honour. A complete edition of his works, with his biography attached, was published at Paris in 1836. B. 1737; D. 1814.

PIERRE, ST., Guernsey. (See PETER-LE-PORT, ST.)

PIERRE, ST., pe'-air, the name of numerous parishes, towns, and villages in France, none of them with a population above 12,000, which is the largest, and a suburb of Calais, with a station on the railway du Nord.

PIERRE, ST., an island of N. America, off the S. coast of Newfoundland, and forming with Miquelon Island a colony belonging to France. Pop. united, 2,300.

PIERRE, ST., a seaport of Martinique, in the West Indies, on the W. coast of the island, 21 miles from Fort Royal. It is the chief place of business in the island, and its roadstead is defended by several forts. Pop. 30,000.—Josephine, the first queen of Napoleon I., was born here in 1763.

PIETRA, pe'-ai-tra, a prefix to the names of several small towns in Italy.

PIETRAPERZIA, pe-ai'-tra-pairt'-ze-a, a town of the island of Sicily, 5 miles from Caltanisetta. Pop. 8,500.—In the neighbourhood are some sulphur-mines.

PIEVE DI SACCO, pe-ai'-vai de sak'-ko, a town of Austrian Italy, 10 miles from Padua. Pop. 3,500.

PIGNOTTI, Lorenzo, peen-yot'-te, an eminent Italian writer, who was a physician and professor of medicine at Florence and Pisa, councillor of the latter university, and further distinguished himself as a naturalist, poet, historian, and antiquary. His poems form six volumes, and he also produced some highly popular fables. A History of Tuscany by him was a learned work, but was considered too liberal in its tendencies by the court of Rome, who condemned it to be burnt. B. in Tuscany, 1739; D. 1812.

PIKE, pike, the name of several counties of the United States, with populations varying between 6,000 and 16,000. They are in Pennsylvania, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, Kentucky, Ohio, Illinois, Missouri, and Arkansas.—Also the name of several townships.

PILATE, Pontius, pi'-late, a Roman, who became governor of Judæa A.D. 26. He commanded in that country ten years. The Jews brought Jesus Christ before Pilate, who, perceiving that envy and malice occasioned their charges, would have scourged the prisoner and dismissed him. But being threatened with the wrath of Cæsar, Pilate delivered Jesus, whom he had pronounced innocent, to be crucified. He is said to have subsequently treated the Samaritans with great cruelty, for which he was recalled by Tiberius, and banished to Gaul, where he slew himself, A.D. 37.

PILCOMAYO, pil-ko-mi'-o, a river of S. America, rising near Chicquisaca, and joining the Paraguay nearly opposite Ascension. Its course is estimated at 1,000 miles.

PILES, Roger de, peel, was a celebrated French painter and writer on painting, who, in 1662, became tutor to the son of the president Amelot, with whom he made a tour to Rome, where De Piles had ample opportunities for gratifying the taste which he possessed for the fine arts. The younger Amelot being appointed ambassador to Venice, De Piles accompanied him as secretary; and afterwards attended him in the same capacity to Lisbon and Switzerland. In 1692 he was sent by Louis XIV. to the Hague, ostensibly as a picture-dealer, but in fact to negotiate with those who were friends to France. The object of his mission being discovered, he was sent to prison, where he wrote his "Lives of the Painters." On his return to France he obtained a pension. He was a member of the Academy of Painting, and a great admirer of Rubens, whom he imitated with success.

Besides the above work, he wrote an Abridgment of Anatomy, adapted to painting and sculpture, and a Course of Painting. B. at Clamecy, France, 1635; D. at Paris, 1709.

PILLAU, pil'-lou, a well-built seaport of East Prussia, at the extremity of a narrow peninsula between the Baltic and the long maritime inlet called the Frische Haff, with a commodious harbour, 22 miles from Konigsberg. Pop. 4,000. Lat. 54° 38′ 4″ N. Lon. 19° 54′ E.

PILLEBHET, pil-le-bet', a town of India, in the British district Bareilly. Pop. 26,000.—Its neighbourhood is celebrated for the quality of its rice.

PILNITZ, pil'-nitz, a village of Saxony, on the Elbe, 4 miles from Dresden. Here, in 1791, the convention which was to maintain the rights of the Bourbons to the throne of France was concluded.

PILPAY, pil'-pai, an Indian brahmin, gymnosophist, and philosopher, was, it is believed, a governor of part of Hindostan, and counsellor to an Indian king, whom he instructed by fables, which have been translated into almost as many languages as the Bible. "The Shipwreck, or Floating Islands," is another work attributed to Pilpay, who lived before the Christian era. These celebrated fables have been translated into English by Sir William Jones.

PILSEN, pil'-sen, the chief town of a circle of the same name in Bohemia, on the Beraun, 52 miles from Prague. It is an important commercial town, and has a Gothic church, town-hall, gymnasium, and theatre. Manf. Woollens, cottons, and leather. Pop. 10,200.

PILTON, pil'-ton, the name of several parishes in England, none of them with a population above 2,000.

PIMLICO, pim'-li-ko, a suburb of London, in the county of Middlesex, 2¼ miles from St. Paul's.

PINCHBECK, Thomas, pinch'-bek, an English mechanician, who invented several machines, and first used an alloy of copper and zinc, which was an imitation of gold, and was called after his name. D. in London, 1783.

PINDAR, pin'-dar, the prince of lyric poets. In his youth he bore away the poetical prize from Myrtis, but was less successful in his contest with Corinna, who defeated him five times. It is said, however, by some authors, that she owed her victory less to her poetry than to her charms. At the Olympic games, where women were excluded, Pindar conquered all his rivals, and received the greatest honours. Part of the presents allotted to Apollo were ordered to be given to him, and a statue was erected to his honour at Thebes. When the Spartans took Thebes, they spared the house of Pindar, as did Alexander the Great. The best edition of this poet is that of Heyne. There is an English translation by Carey. Flourished in the 5th century B.C.

PINDAR, Peter. (See WOLCOTT.)

PINEDA, John, pe-nai'-da, a learned Spanish Jesuit, who taught philosophy and theology in several colleges, and wrote commentaries on Job and Ecclesiastes, also a universal History of the World, and a History of Ferdinand III. B. at Seville, 1557; D. 1637.

PINELLI, John Vincent, pe-nail'-le, a learned Italian, who fixed his residence at Padua, where he formed a magnificent library, stored with rare books and valuable manuscripts. The most learned men in Europe were among his correspondents, and his literary treasures were always open for their use. B. at Naples, about 1630; D. 1601.—A descendant of his, Maphæus Pinelli, was a printer at Venice, where he formed a very valuable library, which was brought to London, and there sold by auction. D. at Venice, 1785.

PINEROLO, pe'-nai-ro'-lo, a town of Piedmont, on the Clusone, 22 miles from Turin. It contains a spacious place-of-arms, has a cathedral, and is inclosed by walls. Manf. Woollens, silk, paper, and leather. Pop. 15,000.

PING, ping, a prefix to the names of numerous Chinese cities.

PINGRE, Alexander William, pängr, an eminent French astronomer, who became librarian of St. Geneviève, at Paris. In 1760 he was sent to the South Sea, to observe the famous transit of Venus over the sun's disc. He was afterwards employed to prove the time-pieces of Le Roy, and was admitted a member of the French Academy and of the Institute. His works are, "State of the Heavens from 1754 to 1757," "Memoirs of Discoveries made in the South Seas," "An Historical and Theoretical Treatise on Comets," "Translation of Manilius's Astronomics," and a portion of a projected "History of Astronomy in the 17th Century." B. at Paris, 1711; D. at the same city, 1796.

PINKERTON, John, pin'-ker-ton, a Scottish writer, who was bred to the bar, but devoted himself to literary pursuits. For half a century he continued to produce works in various departments of knowledge, many of which were of a valuable and important character. Among the rest, he gave to the world "A General Collection of Voyages and Travels," "The History of Scotland," "Portraits of Illustrious Persons of Scotland," several collections of ancient Scottish poems, and "Walpoliana." B. at Edinburgh, 1758; D. at Paris, 1826.

PINNER, pin'-ner, a parish of Middlesex, 2½ miles from Harrow-on-the-Hill. Pop. 1,300.—It has a station on the North-Western Railway, about 1 mile from the village.

PINSK, pinsk, a trading town of Russian Lithuania, 100 miles from Grodno. Pop. 5,500.

PINSON, Richard, pin'-son, a native of Normandy, who became servant to William Caxton, and afterwards printer to Henry VII. and Henry VIII. He printed Magna Charta, and several books, which are now scarce and valuable. D. about 1530.

PINTELLI, Baccio, pin-tail'-le, a celebrated Italian architect, who designed the famous Sistine chapel at Rome. He also built the Ponte Sisto over the Tiber, several churches, and the old library of the Vatican. After the death of his patron, Sixtus IV., he was invited to Urbino by Frederick, the second duke; and for him he designed the ducal palace and some churches. His designs were made upon such excellent principles that several of his buildings remain to this time, in a state of perfect preservation. His bridge over the Tiber, although nearly 400 years old, is still as substantial as a new fabric. B. at Florence, early in the 15th century; D. at Urbino, about 1494.

PINTO, Fernam Mendez, pin'-to, a Portuguese traveller, who was at first in the service of a Portuguese gentleman; but being of an adventurous turn of mind, he resolved to make a voyage to India, where he arrived in 1537. During the subsequent twenty-one years he led a life of constant vicissitude; at one time the owner of large treasures, at another pining in captivity. He travelled in the East Indies, China, Japan, and Siam; sometimes on land, sometimes in command of a vessel manned by daring adventurers. In 1558 he returned to Portugal, and composed a narrative of his voyages and adventures for the amusement of his children. This work is a curious one, but wholly unreliable, in consequence of a large admixture of fiction. B. at Montemor-o-Velho, near Coimbra, about 1510; D. it is supposed, about 1578.

PINTURICCHIO, Bernardino, or BERNARDINO, Betti, pin-too-rik'-ki-o, a celebrated Italian painter, who belonged to the school of Perugino, and excelled in historical subjects and portraits. In the latter walk he was extensively employed; and had, among other highly-born sitters, Cæsar Borgia, Queen Isabella of Spain, and Giulia Farnese. B. at Perugia, 1454; D. at Sienna, 1513.

PIOLENE, pe-o-lain', a parish and market-town of France, in the department Vaucluse, 4 miles from Orange. Pop. 2,000.

PIOMBINO, pe-om-be'-no, a town of Italy, the capital of a principality, on a rocky promontory opposite the island of Elba, 40 miles from Leghorn. It has a palace and a harbour, and near it are some salt-works. Pop. 4,000.—Its principality belonged to Baccioccchi, the brother-in-law of Napoleon III.

PIOMBO, Sebastiano del, pe-om'-bo, a celebrated Italian painter. He was a disciple of Giorgone, and painted historical and portrait pieces. One of his finest works,—"The Raising of Lazarus," is in the National Gallery in London. Later in life, he quitted his profession to assume the functions of keeper of the signet to Pope Clement VII.; whence arose his name Del Piombo, 'of the lead,' in allusion to the lead of the seal. Many of the designs of his pictures were furnished by Michael Angelo; Sebastiano supplying the five colouring which characterized his style. B. at Venice, 1485; D. at Rome, 1547.

PIOZZI, Mrs., pe-ot'-se, an English authoress, and the friend of Dr. Johnson. She was the daughter of John Salusbury, a gentleman of Carnarvonshire, and having appeared in the London world of fashion with much success, became the wife of Mr. Thrale, a rich brewer of Southwark. It was as Mrs. Thrale that she made the acquaintance of the great lexicographer; but, after she became a widow, in the eighteenth year of her marriage, she retired to Bath with her four daughters. At Bath, she met Gabriel Piozzi, an Italian music-master, whom she married in 1784. This union, which took place shortly before Dr. Johnson's death, led to the breaking up of their long friendship. After the doctor's death, she produced her "Anecdotes of Dr. Samuel Johnson during the last twenty years of his life," which work Boswell declared to have been written in a spiteful and revengeful spirit. Peter Pindar (Dr. Wolcott) took the opposite view, and wrote his satirical poem called "Bozzy and Piozzi" thereupon. Besides the work just named, Mrs. Piozzi wrote "The Three Warnings," a poem; "Observations and Reflections made in the course of a journey through France, Italy, and Germany;" "British Synonomy," &c. Her "Autobiography, Letters, and Literary Remains," which contain many interesting facts relative to Dr. Johnson, have been recently published. B. about 1739; D. at Clifton, near Bristol, 1821.

PIPER, Charles Count, pi'-per, an eminent Swedish statesman, who, from an obscure rank, rose to be the prime minister of Charles XII., whom he accompanied in his campaign. Taken prisoner after the battle of Pultawa, he was shut up in the fortress of Schlusselberg. B. about 1660; D. 1716.

PIPERNO, pe-puir'-no, a town of S. Italy, in the States of the Church, 15 miles from Frosinone Pop. 3,800.

PIPPI, Giulio. (See ROMANO, Giulio.)

PIRÆUS, pi-re'-us, a town of Greece, Attica, the port of Athens, and 5 miles from that city. Pop. 6,000. In the neighbourhood are the remains of the tomb of Themistocles.

PIRANESI, John Baptist, pe-ra-nai'-se, a celebrated Italian architectural engraver, who was remarkable for a bold and free style of drawing, which he generally executed upon the plate at once by etching in aqua-fortis. He kept an establishment at Rome for the production of architectural engravings, which became famous throughout Europe. His works, consisting of triumphal arches, bridges, buildings, and other remains of antiquity, occupy 20 folio volumes. B. at Venice, 1720; D. at Rome, 1778.

PIRANESI, Francis, was son of the preceding, and, like him, a celebrated engraver and draughtsman. He took part in the revolution at Rome, and, upon the arrival of the French in that city, repaired to Paris, where he produced a splendid collection of Roman antiquities. His works consist of 29 folio volumes. B. 1748; D. 1810.

PIRANGA, pe-ran'-ga, a town of Brazil, in the province of Rio Grande, 20 miles from Mariana. Near it are gold-washings. Pop. 15,000.

PIRITHOUS, pi-rith'-o-us, was king of the Lapithæ, and wished to become acquainted with Theseus, king of Athens, of whose exploits he had heard so much. He therefore resolved to invade his territories, and Theseus immediately met him on the borders of Attica; but their meeting, instead of proving hostile, was like that of the most cordial friends. From that time the two monarchs became so attached, that their friendship, like that of Orestes and Pylades, is proverbial. Pirithous some time after married Hippodamia, and invited not only heroes, but also the gods themselves, and his neighbours the Centaurs, to celebrate his nuptials. Mars was the only god not invited. He therefore determined to raise a quarrel, and to disturb the festivity of the entertainment. Eurythion, intoxicated with wine, attempted to offer violence to the bride; but he was prevented by Theseus, and immediately killed. This irritated the rest of the Centaurs, and the contest became general. Many of the Centaurs were slain, and the rest saved their lives by flight. After the death of Hippodamia, Pirithous and Theseus carried off Helen, who fell to the lot of Theseus. Pirithous, upon this, undertook with his friend to carry away Proserpine, and to marry her. They descended into the infernal regions, but Pluto stopped the two friends, and confined them there; but when Hercules visited the kingdom of Pluto, he obtained the pardon of Pirithous, and brought him back unhurt. Some suppose that he was torn to pieces by the dog Cerberus.

PIRMASENS, peer'-ma-sents, a town of Bavaria, in the province of the Rhine, 35 miles from Spires. Manf. Tobacco, straw hats, glass, and musical instruments. Pop. 6,000.

PIRNA, peer'-na, a fortified town of Saxony, on the Elbe, 9 miles from Dresden. Manf. Cotton, linen, and woollen stuffs. Pop. 6,200.—Here, in 1756, Frederick the Great, of Prussia, defeated the Saxons in a great battle.

PIRON, Alexis, pe'-rawng, a French dramatic poet, who was the son of an apothecary, and was educated for the law; but was prevented from establishing himself in practice, in consequence of the reverse of fortune experienced by his parents. After living in obscurity until his 30th year, he repaired to Paris, where he became employed as a writer for the stage, producing, among other plays, the "Métromanie," one of the best French comedies in existence. He subsequently wrote satirical poems and epigrams, and sought to become a member of the Academy; but, being unsuccessful, he retaliated by keenly satirizing the members of that body. Piron was a man of infinite wit and humour, but his works are too often defaced by licentiousness. He wrote his own epitaph, which was as follows:—

"Here lies Piron, who was nothing, not even an Academician."

His works were collected and published in 7 volumes, in 1776. B. at Dijon, 1719; D. at Paris, 1773.

PIRTON, pir'-ton, the name of several parishes in England, none of them with a population above 1,000.

PISCATAQUA, pis-kat'-a-qua, a river of the United States, forming the boundary between New Hampshire and Maine. After a course of 40 miles, it joins the Atlantic below Portsmouth.

PISCO, pis'-ko, a seaport town of Peru, in the province of Ica, with a good port, 130 miles from Lima. It was destroyed in 1687 by an earthquake, but is now celebrated for its wines, dates, olives, and pale brandy. Pop. Unascertained.

PISISTRATUS, pi-sis'-tra-tus, tyrant of Athens, was a descendant of Codrus and a relative of Solon, and distinguished himself early in life by his courage, particularly at the taking of Salamis; but, after serving his country with glory, he endeavoured to enslave it. To effect his object he had recourse to an extraordinary device. Having inflicted several wounds on himself, he appeared before the people, and pretended that an attempt had been made to assassinate him. The Athenians believed the tale, and assigned him a guard, which he increased, and by that means made himself master of the citadel. The citizens out of fear acknowledged him their ruler; but Megacles and Lycurgus united their forces and expelled Pisistratus from Athens. Shortly after, Megacles offered to assist Pisistratus, on condition of his marrying his daughter; to which the tyrant consented, but afterwards used her so ill, that her father gathered a force and compelled him to quit the city. After an exile of thirteen years, he made himself master of Marathon, and, having taken Athens by surprise, put to death all the friends of Megacles. He built an academy, which he furnished with a valuable library; made the first collection of the poems of Homer, and died in possession of the sovereign power, 527 B.C.

PISA, pe'-sa, a city of Italy, in the grand-duchy of Tuscany, on the Arno, which divides it into two nearly equal parts, 12 miles from Leghorn. The quays, which run along each of the banks, are spacious, and are bordered by rows of good houses. The bridges are four in number, and the middle one is of marble. There are a number of public edifices. The cathedral, with its attendant buildings, the baptistry, the cemetery, and the belfry, is, perhaps, the finest specimen that exists of the style of building called by the Italians the Gotico-Moresco. It contains statues and paintings.

The Campo Santo is a large oblong building, containing funeral monuments, sarcophagi, and other Greek and Roman antiquities. But of all the buildings of Pisa, the most curious is the belfry, or campanile, a cylindrical tower of 178 feet in height, graceful in its proportions, and constructed of successive rows of pillars, chiefly marble, but above all remarkable for its inclination, about 13 feet out of the perpendicular; whence it is commonly called the leaning tower. Besides the cathedral, the city contains several other elegant churches. The square of the university likewise contains several marble buildings; and among the public establishments, the hospital is conspicuous. The university of Pisa is one of the oldest in Italy; it has four colleges, with 40 professors; also a library, a botanical garden, a cabinet of natural history, and an observatory. Pop. 25,000. Lat. 43° 43′ 11″ N. Lon. 10° 23′ 58″ E.—Pisa is a place of great antiquity, having been one of the twelve towns of Etruria, and afterwards augmented by a colony from Rome. The mildness of the climate during winter attracts hither a number of invalids; and the celebrated baths in the neighbourhood are resorted to from a great distance. It is the birthplace of Galileo, and, in 1799, was taken by the French.

Piso, pi'-so, an eminent Roman family, which produced some great men; as,—Piso, Lucius Calpurnius, surnamed Frugi, on account of his frugality. He was consul 149 B.C., and terminated the war in Sicily. He composed annals and orations, which are lost.—Piso, Caius, consul 67 B.C., was the author of a law to restrain the factions which usually attended the election of the chief magistrates.—Piso, Cneius, was consul under Augustus, and governor of Syria under Tiberius, in which situation he behaved with great cruelty. He was charged with poisoning Germanicus; on which account he destroyed himself, A.D. 20.—Piso, Lucius, a senator, who attended the emperor Valerian into Persia in 258. On the death of that emperor he assumed the imperial title; but was defeated by Valens, who put him to death in 261.

Pisticcio, pis-tich'-o, a town of Naples, in the province of Basilicata, 20 miles from Matera. Manf. Woollen cloth. Pop. 6,300.

Pistoja, pis-to'-ya, a town of Italy, in Tuscany, near the Ombrone, 20 miles from Florence. The streets are spacious and the houses well built. It contains few public buildings of note. The cathedral, notwithstanding all the profusion of Carrara marble with which it is embellished, has the appearance of a village church. Manf. Hardware, woollens, leather, and silk. Pop. 12,500.—This place claims the invention of pistols.

Pistorius, John, pis-to'-ri-us, an eminent Roman Catholic divine, who at first applied to the study of medicine, afterwards to the law, and lastly to divinity. From being a zealous Protestant he turned Catholic, and became counsellor to the emperor, and provost of the cathedral of Breslau. He was the author of several valuable theological works, and also wrote energetically in defence of the faith he had embraced. B. in Germany, 1546; D. 1608.

Pisuerga, pis'-oo-air-ga, a river of the N. of Spain, rising in the Cantabrian mountains, and, after a course of 140 miles, falling into the Douro near Valladolid.

Pitcairn's Island, pit'-kairns, an island in the South Pacific Ocean, without a river or harbour, noted as the place of asylum in 1770 for the mutineers of the Bounty, after they left Otaheite. It has a circumference of 7 miles, and is surrounded by rocky shores. It produces the cocoa-nut, plantain, banana-tree, the banyan, the orange, and others; also the sweet potato, pumpkin, water-melon, sugar-cane, ginger, and maize. It has no indigenous animals; but goats, swine, and poultry have been imported. Pop. about 100. Lat. 25° 3′ 0″ S. Lon. 130° 8′ W. (See Adams, John.)

Pitcairne, Archibald, an eminent Scotch physician, who studied divinity and afterwards law at the university of Edinburgh; but quitted both those professions for mathematics and medicine. After publishing a thesis, in which he endeavoured to prove that the doctrine of the circulation of the blood was known to Hippocrates, he, in 1692, accepted an invitation from the curators of the university of Leyden to assume the professorship of medicine, but returned to Edinburgh about a year afterwards. He published "Dissertationes Medicæ;" also wrote some Latin poems of the satirical kind, chiefly against the principal authors of the Revolution. The celebrated Boerhaave was one of his pupils at Leyden. B. at Edinburgh, 1652; D. at the same city, 1713.

Pitea, pit'-e-o, one of the divisions of Swedish Lapland, extending along the river Pitea, from Norway to West Bothnia. Area, 32,950 square miles. Desc. Many lakes, and watered by the rivers Tornea and Lainio. Pop. about 60,000. Lat. between 65° and 67° 8′ N. Lon. between 15° 15′ and 20° 10′ E.—Its capital town is of the same name, and has a population of 1,500.

Pitea, a river of N. Sweden, which, after a course of 180 miles, enters the Gulf of Bothnia, near Pitea.

Pithou, Peter, pe'-too, a learned French lawyer, who was educated a Huguenot, and narrowly escaped in the massacre of St. Bartholomew. Afterwards embracing the Roman Catholic faith, he became attorney-general in the chamber of justice of Guienne. He defended the rights of the kings and church of France against the court of Rome with great ability. His most important works are,—"Treatise on the Liberties of the Gallican Church," "Commentaries on the Customs of Troyes," "Notes on various Authors." To Pithou we are indebted for the first publication of Phædrus, the "Novellæ" of Justinian, and other ancient remains. B. at Troyes, 1539; D. 1596.

Pithou, Francis, brother of the preceding, became attorney-general in the chamber of justice established under Henry IV. He discovered the manuscript of the fables of Phædrus, which he published in conjunction with his brother. His own works were, "Body of the Canon Law," and "The Laws of the Romans compared with those of Moses." B. at Troyes, 1544; D. 1621.

Pitiscus, Samuel, pi-tis'-kus, a learned Dutch antiquary, who became rector of the college at his native place, and afterwards of that of St. Jerome at Utrecht. His works are, "Lexicon Antiquitatum Romanarum," folio, and editions of ancient authors, with notes. B. at Zutphen, 1637; D. at Utrecht, 1727.—He is not to be mistaken for Bartholomew Pitiscus, author of a book entitled "Thesaurus Mathematicus," and a treatise on Trigonometry. B. in Silesia, 1561; D. 1613.

Pitot, Henry, pe'-to, an eminent French mathematician, who acquired the mathematics without a master, and in 1724 was admitted a member of the Academy of Sciences. His work on the theory of manœuvring ships was translated into English, for which he was elected a member of the Royal Society. He was appointed chief engineer of Languedoc and inspector-general of the canal. The city of Montpellier being in want of water, Pitot constructed an aqueduct, which supplied that place from a distance of three leagues. B. at Aramont, Languedoc, 1695; D. 1771.

PITS, or PITSEUS, John, pits, an English biographer, who was educated at Wykeham's School, near Winchester; after which he went to Rheims, where he taught rhetoric and Greek. The civil wars breaking out in France, he retired to Lorraine, and obtained a canonry in the church of Verdun. The duchess of Cleves appointed him her confessor, and, on her death, he became dean of Liverdun. His work, "Lives of the Kings, Bishops, Apostolical Men, and Writers of England," is his principal production. B. at Alton, Hampshire, 1560; D. at Liverdun, 1616.

PITT, pit, a county in the E. of N. Carolina, U.S. Area, 583 square miles. Pop. 14,000.—Also an ARCHIPELAGO in the Pacific Ocean, off the coast of British North America. Lat. between 53° and 54° N. Lon. 130° W.

PITT, Christopher, an English poet and divine, who is known by excellent translations of the "Æneid," Vida's "Art of Poetry," and some pleasing poems. B. at Blandford, Dorsetshire, 1699; D. 1748.

PITT, William, earl of Chatham, a celebrated English statesman, was the son of Robert Pitt, Esq., of Boconnock, in Cornwall, and was educated at Eton, whence he removed to Trinity College, Oxford. He was, for some time, a cornet of dragoons; but, in 1736, he quitted the army, on being chosen member of parliament for the borough of Old Sarum. He exerted himself strenuously in opposition to the measures of Sir Robert Walpole; and produced such an effect, by his eloquence and power, in lowering the tone of that minister, that the duchess of Marlborough, who hated Walpole, bequeathed him a legacy of £10,000. On the change of administration, he was made joint vice-treasurer of Ireland and paymaster-general of the army, which places he resigned in 1755. The year following he was appointed secretary of state, but in a few months afterwards was again out of office. An efficient administration being desired in 1757, he again became secretary of state. The stupendous statesmanlike qualities of his mind now began to reveal themselves. He soon acquired an immense ascendancy over both the parliament and the ministry; and the war in which the country was then engaged with France began to assume a new aspect. A new impetus was given to every department of the government, and the enemy was beaten both on land and at sea. In all directions the most brilliant actions were performed on the continent; whilst, in other parts of the globe, the flag of Great Britain was completely triumphant. Several valuable places, both in America and the East Indies, were added to her possessions. Such was the state of affairs on the death of George II.; soon after which, a change taking place by the coming of Lord Bute into power, Mr. Pitt resigned. The peace of 1763 followed; but it was not popular, and, in 1766, a new administration was formed, of which Mr. Pitt had a share as lord privy seal; and, at this time, he was created earl of Chatham. This ministry, however, being ill arranged, was dissolved in 1768. The differences which had already arisen between Great Britain and her American colonies roused his eloquence against those coercive measures which ultimately led to the war of Independence and the separation of the United States from the mother country. For some time previous, the popularity of Pitt had been on the wane; but it was now revived with all its former splendour. The end of his days, however, was at hand. As he was speaking with his accustomed energy on the subject of the American independence, in the House of Lords, April 8, 1778, he was overpowered, and fell down in a fit of convulsions: from this he never sufficiently rallied as to give hopes of a permanent recovery. Accordingly, on the 11th of the following month he passed into the "undiscovered country," and was solemnly interred in Westminster Abbey, where a monument was erected to his memory at the national expense. B. at Boconnock, Cornwall, 1708; D. 1778.—A writer in the "London Quarterly Review" says, "Lord Chatham was the most powerful orator that ever illustrated and ruled the senate of this empire. For nearly half a century he was not merely the arbiter of the destinies of his own country, but the foremost man in all the world."—His lordship left a widow, who was created a baroness in her own right, with a pension of £3,000 a year. She died in 1803, at Burton Pynsent, in Somersetshire, an estate which had been left to Lord Chatham by Sir Thomas Pynsent, from a veneration of his character.

PITT, William, an illustrious English statesman, was the second son of the great Earl Chatham. His elementary education was received under the eye of his father at Burton Pynsent, in Somersetshire. His private tutor was the Rev. Dr. Wilson, afterwards canon of Windsor; but his education was principally conducted by the earl himself, whose favourite son he was, and who saw in him the seeds of that greatness which would confer additional glory on the name of Pitt. In 1773 he was sent to Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, where, "although he was little more than 14 years of age," says one of his tutors, "and had laboured under the disadvantage of frequent ill-health, his proficiency in the learned languages was probably greater than ever was acquired by any other person in such early youth." At Cambridge he proceeded to the degree of M.A.; and on leaving the university he was entered at Lincoln's Inn, and in three years was called to the bar. He went the western circuit once or twice, but never had much practice. In 1780 he stood for the university of Cambridge, but was unsuccessful. By means, however, of Sir James Lowther (afterwards earl of Lonsdale), he was returned to that parliament for the borough of Appleby. As a senator he soon displayed his great oratorical talents in opposition to Lord North and the American war. His manner was thus described:—"His voice is rich and striking, full of melody and force; his manner easy and elegant; his language beautiful and luxuriant. He gave in this first essay a specimen of eloquence not unworthy the son of his immortal parent." In 1782 he brought forward a motion for an inquiry into the state of the representation in parliament, which was rejected by a small majority. On the death of the marquis of Rockingham, Lord Shelburne obtained the office of first lord of the Treasury, and Pitt was appointed chancellor of the Exchequer, he being at the time in his 24th year. Peace with the Americans and with Spain and France was concluded by this administration, which soon gave way to what was called the Coalition ministry, formed by Lord North and Mr. Fox, and their respective friends. But Mr. Fox's India Bill, which was carried in the Commons, occasioned another change; and, the ministers being deprived of their places in 1783, the important offices of first lord of the Treasury and chancellor of the Exchequer were conferred on Mr. Pitt. In the following month he brought forward a new bill for the better government of India, which was rejected. On this the parliament was dissolved, and the premier, who was returned for the university of Cambridge, again brought forward his bill for the regulation of India, and carried it triumphantly in both houses. Soon after this a commercial treaty with France was entered into, the terms of which were highly advantageous to England. About this time also he adopted other beneficial measures relative to the finances, for extinguishing the national debt by a sinking fund; established a new constitution for the East-India Company, and passed acts for the relief of the Roman Catholics. It is impossible to embrace all the great points of his administration, combining, as it does, so much of the history of England and of the world. During the king's illness, Pitt gained great popularity by taking constitutional ground, in strenuously maintaining, against Fox, the right of parliament, and not of the prince of Wales, to settle the regency. The French revolution, which shook the basis of political affairs throughout Europe, next burst forth. The execution of Louis XVI. occasioned the ministry to dismiss the French ambassador; and this was followed by a war, which lasted eight years. In 1800 Pitt effected the union of Ireland to Britain, and soon afterwards retired from office. The peace of Amiens, signed under the Addington administration, was of short duration, and a new war ensued. In 1804 Mr. Pitt returned to his former office; but he was surrounded with difficulties, as many of his former colleagues had joined the standard of opposition, and he might almost be said to have been left to wield the energies of the state alone. He effected another coalition, with Russia and Austria, against France, which failed. In the mean time, a gouty habit and unremitted mental exertions, together with a too free indulgence in wine, had completely undermined the constitution of this wonderful man, who succumbed to the vexation and pressure of troubles induced by the non-success of the European coalition against France, upon which he had set his heart. His character, if it lacked the fire and vigour of his father, was nevertheless noble and imposing. All that his greatest enemies, even in his own time, could pretend to charge him with, was ambition; while they were compelled to allow him the merit of vigorous application to business, uncommon eloquence, profound financial wisdom, and, above all, perfect disinterestedness. Though he had remained in power during so many years, he died in debt, which the parliament resolved to discharge. His remains were also interred at the public expense, in the same vault with his father. Besides his official situations, he was warden of the Cinque Ports, governor of the Charter-house, master of the Trinity-house, and high steward of the university of Cambridge. B. at Hayes, Kent, 1759; D. at Putney, 1806.

PITTACUS, pit'-ta-kus, one of the so-named seven sages of Greece, who was elected sovereign of Mitylene for having defeated the Athenians. Pittacus governed as a philosopher, and formed a code of laws in verse, that they might be the more easily remembered. After this he resigned his dignity, and when a grant of land was offered him, he refused it, saying, "It is more pleasing to convince my country of my disinterestedness than to possess great riches." B. at Mitylene, island of Lesbos, about 652 B.C.; D. 570 B.C.

PITTHEM, pit'-em, a town of Belgium, in W. Flanders, 15 miles from Bruges. Pop. of parish, 5,500.

PITTSBURGH, pits'-berg, a commercial town of the United States, and capital of Alleghany county, Pennsylvania, 50 miles from Wheeling, on the Ohio. It is situate on a beautiful plain, on a broad point of land, where the confluence of the Alleghany and Monongahela forms the Ohio. It contains a court-house, a gaol, a national armory and magazine, an academy, a library, banks, including a branch of the United-States Bank, and various places of public worship. It is a place of great domestic and foreign commerce. The surrounding country is one bed of fossil coal, and also abounds in iron-ore and various mineral and vegetable productions. These natural advantages have given rise to various manufactures, which are every day growing more extensive. Manf. Steam-engines, machinery, cutlery, nails, stores, and arms; glass, leather, paints, drugs; and it contains iron-foundries, air-furnaces, breweries, flour-mills; besides various other mills and manufactories. Shipbuilding is carried on on a large scale, and most of the machinery of the Mississippi steamboats is made at Pittsburgh. Pop. 120,000.—Here, in 1755, the British under General Braddock sustained a defeat.

PITTSFIELD, pits'-feeld, the name of several townships in the United States, none of them with a population above 6,000.

PITTSFORD, pits'-ford, the name of several townships in the United States, none of them with a population above 2,300.

PITTSYLVANIA, pit'-sil-vai'-ni-a, a county on the S. side of Virginia, U.S. Area, 866 square miles. Pop. 29,000.

PIURA, pe-oo'-ra, a former province of Peru, bounded N.E. by the province of Loxa, E. by that of Jaen de Bracamoros, S.E. by the district of Huambos, W. by the Pacific Ocean, and N.W. by the Bay of Guayaquil. It abounds in maize, cotton, sugar, French beans, melons, quinces, and other European fruits.

PIURA, the capital of the above province, stands on the river Piura, 120 miles from Lambayque. It has an hospital, several churches, a temple of liberty, and a college. Pop. 10,000.

PIUS I., pi'-us, pope, succeeded Hyginus in 142, and condemned the heresy of Valentinian. D. 157.

PIUS II. (Æneas Sylvius Piccolomini). In 1431 he became secretary to Cardinal Capranica, at the council of Basil, and acted in the same capacity to Cardinal Albergotti, who sent him to Scotland to negotiate a peace between England and that country. He afterwards displayed great talents at the council of Basil, which he defended against the pope. The emperor Frederick III., who awarded him the poetic crown, employed him in several embassies. In 1456 he obtained a cardinalship, and, two years later, was elected pope. He began his pontificate by annulling all that he had maintained at the council of Basil; issuing a bull, in which he declared void all appeals from the papal decree to a general council. Pius was about to dispatch a fleet against the Turks when his death took place. His principal works are,—"Memoir of the Council of Basil;" "History of the Bohemians;" "On Cosmography;" Treatise on Education;" "Poem on the Crucifixion;" "Letters;" a romance, entitled "Euryalus and Lucretia;" Memoir of his own life. B. at Corsignano, Sienna, 1405; D. at Ancona, 1464.

PIUS III. (Francesco Piccolomini) was nephew and successor to the preceding. He was elected pope in 1503, but died in less than a month afterwards.

PIUS IV. (cardinal de' Medici). He rose by merit to several high employments, and, in 1549, obtained the cardinalship, and, on the death of Paul IV., in 1559, was elected pope. He confirmed the decrees of the council of Trent, after the closing of that assembly in 1564. In the following year a conspiracy was formed against his life by Benedict Accolti and others, who were executed. This pope was not of the celebrated Medici family of Florence. B. at Milan, 1499; D. 1565.

PIUS V. succeeded the preceding in 1566. He was a Dominican, and had been created by Paul IV. bishop of Sutri, and cardinal and inquisitor-general in the Milanese, where he displayed great bigotry and cruelty. After his election to the papal chair he issued a bull, in which the jurisdiction of the Roman church was sought to be carried to an extravagant pitch. Pius made war against the Turks, which produced the famous battle of Lepanto, wherein the latter were defeated. He was a cruel persecutor, and enforced the mandates of the Inquisition throughout Italy. B. in Piedmont, 1504; D. 1572.

PIUS VI. (John Angelo Braschi). Benedict XIV. created him treasurer of the apostolic chamber, and Clement XIV. conferred on him the cardinalship. He succeeded that pontiff in 1774. Shortly after his election he wrought some important reforms in the public treasury, and completed the magnificent museum in the Vatican, which he filled with monuments, vases, medals, and other ancient remains found in the Ecclesiastical States. But the greatest act of his pontificate was the draining of the Pontine Marshes, a project which had baffled several of the Roman emperors and many of the popes. These marshes occupied the whole of the valley extending from the Apennines to the sea, commencing at the port of Astura, covering the coast of Terracina, and reaching to the kingdom of Naples. This great tract contained nearly 200 square miles, and through the perseverance of Pius VI., a large proportion of it was rendered fit for cultivation. He also constructed on the side of the canals formed to carry off the water of the marshes, a beautiful road nearly 40 miles long, ornamented with rows of poplars. Besides this great enterprise, this pontiff built several handsome edifices at Rome, and founded some hospitals. The emperor Joseph II. having suppressed several monasteries, and decreed all the religious orders in his dominions free from papal jurisdiction, Pius, apprehensive of the consequences of this revolution to the Holy See, went in person to Vienna in 1782; but, though he was honourably received, his efforts could not divert the emperor from his designs. On his return to Rome, the pope became embroiled with the courts of Naples, Modena, and Venice, chiefly with regard to the right of presenting to ecclesiastical benefices. The French revolution was, however, fraught with more serious consequence to the papal see. Upon a mere pretext, the French Convention ordered General Bonaparte to enter the Ecclesiastical territory, when, having taken several places, he compelled the pope to purchase a peace by a contribution of thirty millions of livres (£1,200,000), and the delivering up of the finest works of painting and sculpture. In 1797 a band of French revolutionists excited a tumult at Rome, and, being driven to the house of the French ambassador, were there headed by General Duphot, who, together with several of the French, was slain. Upon this, General Berthier entered Italy, and made the pope prisoner in his capital, which was plundered. The venerable pontiff was carried away by the victors, and hurried over the Alps to Valence, where he died. His body was interred in a private manner; but, in 1802, it was taken up and conveyed to Rome, where it was interred with great pomp. B. at Cesena, in the Papal States, 1717; D. 1799.

Pius VII. (Gregorio Barnaba Chiaramonti) was at first a Benedictine monk, but became, at the age of 40 years, bishop of Tivoli. In 1785 he was created a cardinal, and, after the death of Pius VI., was elected to the papal chair, in 1800, by a conclave of thirty-five cardinals, after several months' deliberation, at Venice. In the following year he entered Rome, which city was shortly afterwards evacuated by the French. The relations between Pius VII. and Bonaparte, then first consul, were at the outset of a sufficiently cordial nature. A concordat was signed between the republic and Rome, and, in 1804, Pius repaired to Paris, where, in the cathedral of Notre Dame, he crowned Napoleon emperor. The misfortunes of the pope commenced, however, in the following year. The emperor suddenly sent his troops to Ancona in 1805, and, shortly afterwards, Civita Vecchia was seized. Napoleon also wished Pius to annul the marriage between his brother Jerome and Miss Paterson, an American Protestant lady, which the pope refused. (See BONAPARTE, Jerome.) Other grounds of quarrel were found by the emperor, who wrote to the pope from Dresden, "that he must not take him for a Louis le Débonnaire; that his anathemas would never make his soldiers drop their muskets; that, if provoked too far, he (Napoleon) could separate the Romish church from the greater part of Europe, and establish a more rational form of worship than that of which the pope was the head, and that such a thing was easy in the actual state of people's minds." In the following year a French force took possession of Rome, and, shortly afterwards, the finest provinces of the papal territory were united to the kingdom of Italy. It was in vain that Pius remonstrated: Napoleon declared that, unless he forthwith entered into an offensive and defensive alliance with the kingdom of Naples and Italy, "he would lose his temporal sovereignty, and remain bishop of Rome, as his predecessors were during the first eight centuries, and under the reign of Charlemagne." After remaining some time as a prisoner in his palace on the Quirinal, Pius was suddenly taken off, under French escort, to Grenoble; whence he was conveyed to Sarona, in the Riviera of Genoa. In 1812 he was taken to Fontainebleau, but still remained obdurate, and refused to sanction Napoleon's separation from Josephine. The defeat of the French in Germany, as well as the previous disaster in Russia, caused Napoleon to give way before his passive but inflexible opponent. In 1804 he sent him back to Italy; but Pius, instead of proceeding to Rome, stopped at Cesena, his native town. Upon the abdication of Napoleon, Pius proceeded to Rome, where he spent the remainder of his life, engaged in reforming the civil institutions of his dominions. He created a new police, abolished torture and the punishment of death for offences against religion, extirpated the banditti of the Campagna, and put an end to several vexatious feudal imposts. B. at Cesena, 1742; D. at Rome, 1823.

Pius VIII. (Cardinal Castiglione) became pope in succession to Leo XII., in 1829. After a short pontificate of one year, he died, 1830.

Pius IX. (Giovanni Maria Mastai Ferretti) became pope in succession to Gregory XVI., in 1846. Born of a noble Italian family, his youth was characterized by mildness and a charitable disposition. In his 18th year he went to Rome, with the intention of entering the body-guard of the pope; but having been seized by an epileptic attack, he, upon recovering, resolved to devote himself to the service of the Church. After completing his studies at the college of Volterra, he was ordained a priest, and dispatched upon a mission to Chili, in 1823. Upon his return, two years later, he became president of the hospital of St. Michael. In 1829 his zeal was rewarded by an appointment to the archbishopric of Spoleto, from which he was, in 1832, translated to Imola: finally he became cardinal, under Gregory XVI., in 1840. Upon the death of Gregory, in 1846, the conciliatory and pious character of Cardinal Ferretti gained him the tiara. The first measures of the new pontiff were of a popular and liberal character: he disbanded his Swiss guard; granted to political offenders, amounting to 2,000, a general and unconditional amnesty; reformed civil abuses, and lightened the burthens of his people to a very considerable extent. But the spirit of republicanism, which awoke at Paris in 1848, spread throughout Europe; and at Rome, as elsewhere, the people rose against their ruler. A republic was proclaimed; and Pius IX., after remaining some time a prisoner in his palace, fled in disguise to Gaeta. These events produced a complete reaction in the weak and vacillating mind of the pontiff. All the liberal tendencies of his mind disappeared under the influence of his minister, Cardinal Antonelli, and under his fear of republican institutions. He called upon the great Catholic powers of France, Austria, Spain, and Naples, to re-establish his authority. Meanwhile, Mazzini had arrived at Rome, where he was proclaimed triumvir. In 1849 a French army marched upon Rome, and, after an attack upon the city, which was gallantly defended by Garibaldi, succeeded in taking it. The restoration of Pius IX. was thus effected; not, however, without the permanent support of a French garrison. With this support, the pope and Cardinal Antonelli have been enabled to pursue a course of reactionary and despotic government. The finances, industry, and commerce of the Papal States have been reduced to the most deplorable condition; public thought stifled, public education neglected, the whole kingdom in a state of insecurity; such have been the results of an administration guided by a cardinal who rules in contempt of the welfare of his sovereign's subjects. Three events in the life of Pope Pius will be remarked in history:—the promulgation of an edict by which a Roman Catholic hierarchy was re-established in England, and in consequence of which a bill was passed in the English houses of parliament forbidding papal bishops to hold ecclesiastical titles in England; the foundation of a college at Rome for the reception of clergymen of the church of England seeking to take orders in the Roman Catholic church; and the doctrinal decision as to immaculate conception. This puerile pontiff has been thus characterised by an eminent critic:—"The distinctive feature of Pius IX. is a constitutional weakness that visibly makes his effective powers fall far short of the intentions which have attractions for his acute surface sensitiveness. A life-long lameness disables him from vigorously acting up to the impressions by which his nerves become easily affected; and the prominent expression in his demeanour and appearance is that of blank impotence. This is especially pronounced in the blank benevolence of his countenance. A stroke of palsy seems to be always lurking under the hazy gleam of his sillily benign smile." B. at Sinigaglia, near Ancona, 1792.

PIZARRO, Francis, pe-zar'-ro, a famous Spanish adventurer, who discovered and conquered Peru. He was the natural son of an officer, and was in his youth employed by his parent to tend pigs. He grew to manhood without being able either to read or write; but he had a bold and enterprising spirit, and the discovery of the New World opened to him sources of wealth and renown. After fourteen years of distinguished services, he joined Diego de Almagro in an expedition, the object of which was to explore the gold regions to the south of Panama. In 1524 he sailed from Panama with one ship, eighty men, and four horses, and, after a lapse of three years, during which he and his followers experienced every form of hardship, the country in which gold and silver abounded was found. He then went to Spain, and obtained from Charles V. the title of governor and captain-general of the newly-discovered country. With the assistance of Cortes, he equipped an expedition, with which he proceeded to Peru, where he surprised and captured several towns, and gained great booty. After founding a Spanish colony at the mouth of the river Piura, he proceeded inland to Caxamarca. A civil war was at that time raging in Peru, and the inca Atahualpa requested his aid against his brother Huascar. At Caxamarca the precious metals were used not only for ornaments, but for ordinary utensils; and the sight of so much wealth inflamed his cupidity to such a degree that he resolved to make himself master of Atahualpa's person. When the inca came to Pizarro's quarters, he was treacherously seized, and confined in a room 22 feet long by 16 feet broad. Shortly afterwards, Atahualpa offered to fill this apartment with gold as high as the Spanish adventurer could reach, if he would set him free. The offer was instantly accepted, and, although the impatience of the Spaniards was too great to allow of all the promised treasure being collected, the hoard was so great that after a fifth part had been reserved for the crown, and another portion for Almagro's party, Pizarro and his companions had 1,528,600 ounces to divide among them. After wringing all that he could from the unfortunate Atahualpa, Pizarro inhumanly put him to death in 1533, and then proceeded to capture the city of Cuzco, where great treasure was taken. In 1534, Ferdinand, one of Pizarro's brothers, laid the royal share at the feet of Charles V.; whereupon the Spanish leader was confirmed in his power, while to Almagro, his rival, was granted all the country that might be conquered southward of Pizarro's vice-royalty. Whilst Pizarro was engaged in settling the government of Peru, Almagro proceeded to conquer Chili. In 1536, the Peruvians having risen against the Spaniards, Almagro marched to their relief; but after defeating the insurgent natives, he took prisoners Pizarro's brothers. Almagro himself subsequently fell into the hands of his more enterprising rival, by whom he was brought to trial and executed, in 1538. Thus left alone in power, Pizarro began to rule in a despotic and partial manner; whereat many of the Spanish adventurers became alienated, and attached themselves to Almagro's son. In 1541 a conspiracy was formed against him, he was surprised during the hour of mid-day, set upon, and, after a most determined resistance, himself and a few devoted followers were slain. B. at Truxillo, 1475.—Gonsalvo, one of his brothers, was acting as governor of Quito at the date of Pizarro's murder, and subsequently succeeded in gaining supreme power throughout Peru. After retaining this position during three years, he was, in 1548, defeated and taken prisoner by Guasca, whom Charles V. had created viceroy. He was brought to trial, condemned as a rebel, and executed almost immediately afterwards.

PIZZI, Joachim, pit'-se, an Italian poet, who early in life, while a student of the Jesuits' college at Rome, evinced the possession of a poetical genius by the production of several fine poems. His principal works were, "Discourse on Tragic and Comic Poetry," "Dissertation on an Antique Cameo," "The Vision of Eden," a poem, and the "Triumph of Poetry." B. at Rome, 1716; D. at the same city, 1790.

PIZZIGHITONE, pit'-se-ge-to'-nai, a fortified town of Italy, on the Adda, 30 miles from Milan. Pop. 4,000.

PIZZO, pit'-so, a city of Naples, on the Gulf of Santa Eufemia, 5 miles from Monteleone. Pop. 6,000.—Here Murat, the ex-king of Naples, was shot in 1815. In 1860 it was taken by Garibaldi, the champion of Italian liberty.

PLACCIUS, Vincent, plak'-ki-us, a learned German writer, who studied at Leipsic, after which he travelled, and on his return became professor of elcquence at Hamburg. He edited several collections of classic authors. B. at Hamburg, 1642; D. 1699.

PLACENCIA, plai-sen'-shi-a (Sp. pla-sen'-the-a), a town of Spain, in Estremadura, 44 miles from Almaraz. It has a Gothic cathedral, rich in works of art. Manf. Hats, leather, and woollen goods. Pop. 7,000.

PLACENTIA. (See PIACENZA.)

PLACENTIA BAY, plai-sen'-shi-a, a spacious bay on the south coast of Newfoundland. Ext. 75 miles long and nearly 60 broad. Lat. 47° to 47° 50′ N. Lon. 54° to 55° 10′ W.

PLACENTIUS, John Leo, plai-sen'-shi-us, a learned Dominican monk, who wrote a History of the Bishops of Tongres and Liége, and a poem, entitled "Pugna Porcorum," in which every word begins with P. B. near Liége, about 1480; D. about 1548.

PLAINFIELD, plain'-feeld, the name of numerous townships in the United States, none of them with a population above 3,000.

PLANCHÉ, James Robinson, pla'-shai, a modern English writer and dramatist, who was descended from a French family which came to England on the revocation of the edict of Nantes in 1685. Early in life he wrote a burlesque, entitled "Amoroso, King of Little Britain," for a private performance, which was afterwards accepted by the committee of management of Drury-lane theatre, where it was produced with complete success in 1818. This unexpected piece of good fortune determined the young author to apply himself to dramatic writing; and, during the subsequent forty years, he wrote about two hundred plays, some of the most successful of which were the charming extravaganzas produced under the management of Madame Vestris. He also adapted several of the plays of the old dramatists, and was at one period engaged to design the costumes for the Shaksperean dramas placed upon the stage of Covent-garden theatre. For the series called the "Library of Entertaining Knowledge," he wrote a "History of British Costume;" the articles on costume in Knight's "Pictorial Shakspere," as well as the "Costume and Furniture" in the "Pictorial History of England" were also from his pen. He became a member of the Society of Antiquaries in 1830, but retired from it in 1852. A course of travel in the north of Europe led to his producing "Lays and Legends of the Rhine," and "Descent of the Danube." Not the least valuable of his many excellent efforts was his translation of the Fairy Tales of the Countess Daulnois, Perrault, and others. In 1854 he received the appointment of Rouge Croix Pursuivant of Arms, for the duties of which office he had previously shown himself fitted, by his works entitled "Regal Records," and "The Pursuivant of Arms or Heraldry founded upon Truth." B. in London, 1796.

PLANTADE, Christopher Henry, plan'-tad, a French musical composer, who wrote, among other operas, "Zoe" and "Palma." B. at Pontoise, 1768; D. 1839.

PLANTAGENETS, plan-taj'-e-nets, the surname of a line of English kings, who were of French origin on the paternal side, Henry II. of England, the first of the line, having been the son of Geoffrey V., duke of Anjou, and of Matilda, daughter of Henry I. The duke of Anjou was so named because he usually wore a sprig of broom,—in Latin planta genista, in French plante genêt,—in his cap. Henry II. ascended the English throne in 1154, and his descendants reigned during 331 years, the last monarch of the line being Richard III., who fell at the battle of Bosworth, in 1485. In the 14th century the line became divided into two great rival factions, that of York and of Lancaster, or the parties of the Red and White Roses. (See HENRY II., III., IV., V., and VI.; RICHARD I., II., and III.; EDWARD I., II., III., IV., and V.; and JOHN.)

PLANTIN, Christopher, plan'-tin, a celebrated French printer, who settled at Antwerp in 1555, and became distinguished for the beauty and correctness of his productions. His editions are extremely valuable. His chief work was a polyglot Bible, executed by order of Philip II. of Spain. B. in Touraine, 1514; D. at Antwerp, 1589.

PLANUDES, Maximus, pla-nu'-dees, a monk of Constantinople, who was sent by the emperor Andronicus as ambassador to Venice, where he became so partial to the Latin church, that on his return he was imprisoned. To recover his liberty, he wrote against that church. He was the author of a Life of Æsop, full of romantic tales and gross anachronisms. He also published a collection of Greek epigrams, under the title of "Anthologia." Flourished in the 14th century.

PLASENCIA, a town of Spain. (See PLACENCIA.)

PLASSEY, or PLASSY, plas'-se, a town of Bengal, district of Nuddeah, on the Baggarutty or Hooghly river, 83 miles from Calcutta. It is memorable for the victory obtained here in 1757 by Clive, over the army of the Bengal viceroy, and which established British supremacy in India.

PLATA, RIO DE LA, re'-o dai la pla'-ta, a river of South America, one of the largest in the world. It is, properly speaking, a continuation of the Paraguay, which has its sources about the 13th degree of S. lat., and, flowing through a flat country, is joined by the Parana, which robs it of its name, and by a variety of smaller streams, the Parana being joined by the Uruguay. They together expand into the sea-like Plata; and it is to this vast estuary that the appellation of the Rio de la Plata properly applies. It flows into the ocean, and is without parallel in the rest of the world, for width and magnificence, being 150 miles broad at its mouth, from Cape St. Maria on one side, to Cape St. Anthony on the other, and between Monte Video and the Punta de Piedras, or Stony Point, which some have considered as its proper limits, 80 miles broad. At Buenos Ayres, 200 miles from the mouth, it is about 30 miles broad, and the shores being little elevated, the eye can seldom reach from one side to the other. This noble expanse is, notwithstanding its extent, deformed by rocks and sand-banks, and rendered of dangerous navigation, not only by its shoals, but likewise by the impetuous winds which sweep at intervals over the vast plains of the Pampas, to the south-west of Buenos Ayres; whence they are called Pamperos, and rush down this wide opening with unequalled fury. The only safe port is that of Monte Video, though those of Maldonado, Barragon, Buenos Ayres, and Colonia, afford different degrees of anchorage and security.

PLATA, LA, or SEBASTIAN DEL ORO, a city of South America, in New Granada, 46 miles from Popayan. It stands in a fertile valley. Pop. Unascertained.

PLATA, LA, or ARGENTINE CONFEDERATION, a republic of S. America, having the Andes on the W.; Bolivia on the N.; Paraguay, Brazil, and Uruguay on the E.; the Atlantic on the S.E.; and Patagonia on the S. Area, about 900,000 square miles. Desc. Mostly consisting of two immense plains; treeless, but during a portion of the year, covered with verdure, and, in the summer, completely dried up. Along its W. frontier there are some elevated mountain-ranges, and in the S., the Pampas are covered with huge thistles, interspersed with numerous salt lakes, some of large size. Rivers. With the exception of the Pampas, which is watered by the Rio Negro, the Colorado, and the Desaguadero rivers, nearly the whole of the country belongs to the basin of the Plata. Zoology. The native animals comprise the jaguar, puma, the armadillo, and the small quadrupeds which supply the chinchilla skins. Millions of oxen roam at large across the plains, or are reared on breeding estates of vast extent. Horses and mules are also plentiful, with herds of sheep and swine. These last, however, are of inferior quality. Pro. Cotton, rice, sugar-cane, indigo, and tobacco; and maize, wheat, and other cereals, are the principal objects of culture in the south. The other products are cocoa, cochineal, madder, chinchona bark, Paraguay tea, and various fruits. Agriculture generally, however, is in an extremely backward state. Minerals. Salt, coal, alum, sulphur, and mineral pitch. Manf. These are mostly imported, but the Indians make ropes, fishing-nets, yarn, and other articles from the fibre of the aloe; also saddle-cloths, blankets, and other fabrics, which they dye with great skill. In Cordova, morocco leather and turned articles are manufactured. Exp. Hides, horse-hair, wool, horns, tallow, beef, chinchilla and other furs, and bullion. Gov. Nominally republican, with the legislative power theoretically vested in a junta of 44 deputies, the half of whom are annually renewed by popular election, and in a senate of two deputies from each department. Pop. Estimated at 800,000. Lat. between 22° and 41° S. Lon. between 57° and 70° W. This country was discovered in 1517, and settled by the Spaniards in 1553. In 1816 it became independent of Spain, and in 1835, De Rosas, a successful soldier against the Indians, was elected dictator of Buenos Ayres, which he held till he was defeated by Urquiza, when he fled to England. Each of its states may be regarded as an independent republic.

PLATÆA, pla-te'-a, anciently a town of Greece, in Bœotia, on the slope of Mount Cithæron, 7 miles from Thebes. Its neighbourhood was the scene of the famous battle with the Persians, in which the Greeks were the victors, B.C. 479.

PLATINA, pla-te'-na (Bartholomew Sacchi), a learned Italian historian, who, on going to Rome, was patronized by Cardinal Bessarion, by whose means he was appointed apostolical abbreviator; of which post he was deprived by Paul II. Platina wrote a letter to that pontiff, who sent him to prison and caused him to be tortured. Subsequently, Sixtus IV. made him librarian of the Vatican. He was the author of a "History of the Popes;" a "History of Mantua;" the "Life of Nerio Capponi;" and other works. B. at Piadena, near Mantua, 1421; D. at Rome, 1481.

PLATO, plai'-to, an illustrious Greek philosopher. His father was Ariston, the son of Aristocles; on his mother's side he was descended from Solon. His first master was Dionysius the grammarian; and afterwards he received instructions in gymnastic exercises from Ariston, an Argive wrestler, who, according to some accounts, gave him the name of Plato, because of the broadness of his shoulders and the robustness of his person. His former name was Aristocles, which was that of his grandfather. He next applied to the study of music and poetry, and composed some pieces intended for the Olympic exercises; but on hearing Socrates deliver a long discourse, he burnt them, and became his disciple. Some of his epigrams, however, are still preserved. He was a disciple of Socrates for about ten years; and upon his death, in 399, Plato left Athens, and travelled into different countries in search of knowledge. At Cyrene he studied geometry and other branches of mathematics; thence he went into Egypt, where, during thirteen years, he sought to learn all that the priests could teach him. He next visited Italy, and settled at Tarentum, where he formed an intimacy with Eurytus and Archytas. He afterwards made a voyage to Sicily, to observe the wonders of that island, particularly Mount Etna. In Sicily he became acquainted with Dionysius, tyrant of Syracuse, whom he was unfortunate enough to offend, and who induced the Spartan ambassador, in whose vessel Plato was returning home, to sell him for a slave at Ægina; but his purchaser having given him his freedom, he repaired to Athens, where he commenced teaching in the garden of the Academy; whence his philosophy was called the Academic. At the request of Dion, uncle of Dionysius the Younger, he made a second voyage to Sicily, where he was received with great honour; but finding that his advice was not heeded by the youthful tyrant, who chose rather to imitate his father, he returned to Athens, where he gained a number of followers. After making a third journey to Syracuse, he settled in his native city, and there spent the remaining years of his life in literary and philosophical pursuits. The philosophy of Plato is so sublime, his morality so pure, and his views of the Divine Being and a future state so clear, that he has been thought to have had a knowledge of the Mosaic writings; a supposition which, considering his long residence in Egypt, is not improbable. The best editions of Plato are,—the Greek text, edited by Bekker, and published at Berlin, 1823; a complete French translation, by Victor Cousin; a partial translation into German, by Schleiermacher; and an English version by Taylor. Some of his principal writings have been translated and published in Bohn's Classical Library. B. at Athens, B.C. 429; D. 347 B.C.

PLATOV, Count, plat'-tov, hetman of the Cossacks, served in the campaign of 1806-7 against the French, and subsequently defeated the Turks in several engagements in Moldavia. He was opposed to Napoleon during the advance of the grand army into Russia, in 1812. He experienced several defeats, particularly at Grodnov; but in the subsequent retreat of the French, his Cossacks proved as destructive as a plague to the fugitives. In the campaigns of 1814-15 he signalized himself chiefly by allowing his Cossacks to plunder without restraint. B. 1765; D. 1818.

PLATTE, plat, a county of the United States, in Missouri. Area, 393 square miles. Pop. 17,000.

PLATTE, LITTLE, RIVER, a small river of Louisiana, which, after a course of 50 miles, falls into the Missouri.

PLATTE, LA, or SHOAL RIVER, a large river of Louisiana, rising in the Rocky Mountains, and, after a course of 600 miles, joining the Missouri near lon. 95° 40′ W.

PLATTEN SEE. (See BALATON.)

PLATTSBURG, plats'-boorg, a township in Clinton county, New York, U.S., on Lake Champlain, at the mouth of the Saranac, 145 miles from Albany. It is handsomely laid out, and contains a court-house, a gaol, academy, lyceum, and several churches. Pop. 7,000.

PLAU, plou, a walled town of Germany, in Mecklenburg-Schwerin, on Lake Plau, 36 miles from Schwerin. Pop. 3,000.

PLAUEN, plow'-en, a town of Saxony, 60 miles from Leipsic. Manf. Cotton goods, paper, leather; and there are muslin and cotton-printing works. Pop. 12,000.—Also a village, 1 mile from Dresden.

PLAUTUS, Marcus Accius, plaw'-tus, a Latin comic dramatist. He was a man of low birth, and settled at Rome, where his plays were performed with great applause. There is more intrigue and plot in his pieces than in those of Terence; the humour, also, is extremely natural and entertaining. Only twenty are extant. A good English translation is that entitled "Bonnel Thornton's Comedies of Plautus, translated into Familiar Blank Verse." B. at Sarsina, in Umbria, about 227 B.C.; D. 184 B.C.

PLAYFAIR, John, plai'-fair, an eminent Scotch mathematician, who, in his 18th year, became a candidate for the professorship of mathematics at the Marischal College, Aberdeen, and was only excelled by two older men. In 1785 he was appointed joint professor of mathematics in the university of Edinburgh, and, in 1805, succeeded to the chair of natural philosophy at the same seat of learning. He was a supporter of Dr. Hutton's geological theories, and, in 1802, published "Illustrations of the Huttonian Theory of the Earth," an improved edition of which he contemplated, and, with that view, made a geological tour in Italy, France, and Switzerland. He published "Outlines of Natural Philosophy" and "Elements of Geometry." To the "Edinburgh Review" he contributed many articles on astronomical and mathematical subjects, as well as several to the "Encyclopædia Britannica." B. at Benvie, Forfarshire, 1748: D. at Edinburgh, 1819.

PLAYFAIR, Lyon, an eminent modern chemist, who was sent from Bengal, in the East Indies, to receive his education at the university of St. Andrew's, and having shown a taste for chemical science, was, in 1834, placed under Professor Graham at Glasgow. In the following year he went to India, but shortly afterwards returned to Europe, and having resumed his chemical studies, under his former teacher, at University College, London, passed to the celebrated laboratory at Giessen, in 1838. Under Liebig he made great progress in organic chemistry, and, after taking the degree of doctor of philosophy at the university of Giessen, he returned to London, where he produced some translations of the great German chemist's Reports on the Progress of Organic Chemistry. In 1843 he became professor of chemistry in the Royal Institution of Manchester, and in that position became very popular. Nominated a member of the Health of Towns Commission, he drew up several of the reports of that body. His next appointment was as chemist to the Museum of Economic Geology, then in Parliament Street; but, when the new building in Jermyn Street was commenced, the arrangements of the laboratory were placed under his charge. He was one of the most active commissioners of the Great Exhibition of 1851, for his services was created a companion of the Bath, and was further rewarded by Prince Albert with the appointment of gentleman usher in his household. He subsequently became joint-secretary, and, at a later period, sole secretary of the department of science and art. Dr. Playfair published some valuable analyses of coal gas in the Memoirs of the Museum of Economic Geology, several lectures upon the products exhibited at the Crystal Palace of 1851. Throughout his career he displayed great scientific knowledge, was the discoverer of some new chemical compounds, and was one of the best chemical analysts of his time. B. in Bengal, East India, 1819.

PLEASANT, plez'-ant, the name of numerous townships in the United States, principally on the banks of the Ohio. None of them has a population above 2,300.

PLEIADES, ple'-i-dees, a name given to seven of the daughters of Atlas and Pleione, one of the Oceanides. They were placed in the heavens after death, where they formed a constellation called Pleiades. Their names were Alcyone, Merope, Maia, Electra, Tayeta, Sterope, and Celeno. They all, except Merope, who married a mortal, had some of the gods for their suitors. On that account, Merope's star is dim among the rest of her sisters. They are sometimes called Atlantides, from their father, or Hesperides, from the gardens of that name, which belonged to Atlas.

PLESCHEN, plesch'-en, a town of Prussia, 54 miles from Posen. Manf. Woollens and tobacco. Pop. 5,300.

PLESS, pless, a town of Prussian Silesia, 63 miles from Opeln. Manf. Woollen cloth and leather. Pop. 3,200.

PLESTCHIFIVO, plest'-che-i-vo, a small lake of Russia, 70 miles from Vladimir. This is the place where Peter the Great first made his attempt to form a Russian navy.

PLEYEL, Ignace, pli'-el, a German musical composer, who studied his art under Vanhall, Haydn, and during an extensive tour in Italy. In 1783 he received the appointment of chapel-master at Strasburg cathedral, and while holding that office composed a number of masses and other pieces of sacred music, which were consumed by a great fire which occurred in the city. Become famous for his compositions, he was, in 1791, invited to London, where he was so liberally rewarded for his efforts that he was enabled to purchase an estate near Strasburg. During the French revolution he narrowly escaped the guillotine. About that period he also began to lose his hold upon the popular musical taste, a change which induced him to abandon the science of music for the trade of music-publisher and pianoforte-manufacturer. After acquiring a fortune in that career, he retired to an estate near Paris. B. at Rupperstahl, near Vienna, 1757; D. near Paris, 1831.

PLINLIMMON, plin-lim'-mon, one of the highest mountains of Wales, 12 miles from Cardigan Bay. The rivers Severn and Wye have their sources in it. Height, 2,463 feet.

PLINY, Caius Plinius Secundus, plin'-e, plin'-e-us, called the Elder, was of an illustrious family, and in his youth bore arms with reputation; after which he was admitted to the college of augurs. Vespasian appointed him procurator of Spain, in which office he conducted himself with strict integrity, devoting the day to public affairs and the night to study. His mind was stored with various knowledge, and he was an indefatigable observer of the works of nature. To this spirit of observation he sacrificed his life; for, lying at Misenium, in the Gulf of Naples, with a fleet which he commanded, he was surprised at an extraordinary cloud issuing from Vesuvius. He immediately put to sea, and landed at the foot of the mountain to ascertain the cause of the phenomenon: but the sulphureous exhalation from the burning lava overcame him, and he was suffocated. Of all the works of Pliny none remains but his Natural History, which, says Cuvier, "is one of the most precious monuments left us by antiquity." It is a perfect encyclopædia of ancient history, and is divided into 37 books, treating of astronomy, meteorology, the theory of the earth, geography, botany, zoology, agriculture, medicine, mineralogy, sculpture, painting, &c. B. it is supposed, 23; D. 79.

PLINY THE YOUNGER, Caius Plinius Cæcilius Secundus, was the nephew of the preceding, who adopted him as his son and heir. He had Quintilian for his master, and advanced so rapidly, that at the age of 19 he pleaded in the forum with an eloquence equal to that of the greatest orators of his time. When Trajan was elevated to the throne, he conferred the consular dignity on Pliny, who, at the desire of the senate, pronounced that fine oration which is extant, entitled the "Panegyric on Trajan." He was some time after appointed governor of Pontus and Bithynia, where he abolished the arbitrary imposts and stopped the persecution of the Christians, of whom he gave a liberal account to the emperor. After his return to Rome, he settled at Comum, his native place, where he established an academy and library for young men who had not the means of education. Pliny was a liberal patron of men of virtue and learning. For Quintilian he always retained the greatest regard, and gave his daughter a handsome dowry on her marriage. Of the many works of this writer, only his Epistles and "Panegyric on Trajan" remain. He also wrote the History of his own Times, of which Tacitus speaks in high terms. The best edition is that of Amsterdam, 1734. Hearne, Lord Orrery, and Masson, have furnished English translations of them. B. at Comum, about 62; D. about 116.

PLOCK, or PLOTZK, plotzk, a city of Poland, 55 miles from Warsaw. It is inclosed by walls, and has a cathedral, bishop's palace, government offices, and a theatre. Manf. Principally leather. Pop. 6,300.

PLOEN, or PLON, plone, a town of Holstein, 22 miles from Lubeck. Pop. 2,700.—The LAKE of the same name is the largest in Holstein, and has a length of 7 miles and a breadth of 4.

PLOËRMEL, plo'-er-mel, a parish and town of France, 25 miles from Vannes. It has a communal college and linen-weaving factory. Pop. 6,000.

PLOMBIÈRES, plom'-be-air, a parish, town, and watering-place of France, in the department Vosges, 14 miles from Epinal. Manf. Cutlery. Pop. 2,000.—This place is much frequented, on account of its warm saline baths.

PLON, plawng, the prefix of numerous places in Brittany, France, none of them with a population above 7,000.

PLONSK, or PLASK, plonsk, a town of Poland, on the Plonna, 30 miles from Plock. Pop. 4,000, chiefly Jews.

PLOOS VAN AMSTEL, Cornelis, plose, an eminent Dutch amateur draughtsman and engraver, who employed his time and wealth in collecting the best drawings of the Italian, German, French, and other masters. His own works consist of imitations of the drawings of great artists; but his fame is chiefly due to his labours as a collector. At his death his collection was sold for an enormous sum. B. at Amsterdam, 1726; D. 1798.

PLOT, Robert, plot, a learned English antiquary and naturalist, who became a secretary to the Royal Society in 1682, and published their "Transactions" from No. 143 to 166. He was appointed first keeper of the Ashmolean Museum, and professor of chemistry at Oxford. He was also nominated historiographer to the king, and Mowbray herald extraordinary. His works are, the Natural Histories of Oxfordshire and Staffordshire, papers in the "Philosophical Transactions," and an essay on the Origin of Springs, in Latin. B. in Kent, 1641; D. 1696.

PLOTINUS, plo-ti'-nus, the most celebrated of the neo-Platonic philosophers. After studying for eleven years under Ammonius, he travelled into Persia and India, where he acquired a great store of knowledge. He served in the army under Gordian; but, when that emperor was slain, Plotinus effected his escape, and went to Rome, where he opened a school of philosophy, and had many disciples. His works were published at the Oxford University Press, in 3 volumes, 1835. B. at Lycopolis, Egypt, 204; D. in Campania, 274.

PLOWDEN, Edmund, plow'-den, an eminent English lawyer, who was educated at Cambridge; whence he removed to Oxford, where he took his degrees in physic, which profession he quitted for the law. His "Commentaries and Reports" are greatly esteemed. They consist of a collection of cases from Edward VI. to the middle of the reign of Elizabeth. B. in Shropshire, about 1517; D. 1584.

PLUCHE, Noel Antony, ploosh, a French writer, who became professor of rhetoric in the college of Rheims, entered into orders, and subsequently went to Paris, where he taught geography and history. His principal works are: "Spectacle de la Nature," of which there are several English translations; "The History of the Heavens," an inquiry into the origin of mythology and idolatry (this has also been translated into English); and "On the Mechanism of Languages." B. at Rheims, 1688; D. 1761.

PLUKENET, Leonard, pluke'-net, an eminent English botanist, who was doctor of physic; but, notwithstanding his great merit, was neglected till the close of life, when he was appointed superintendent of the garden at Hampton Court and royal professor of botany. He published several "Collections of Botany," and his Herbal, containing 8,000 plants, is in the British Museum. B. 1642; D. 1706.

PLUMIER, Charles, ploo'-me-ai, an eminent French botanist, who at first studied mathematics, but afterwards applied himself to natural history. Louis XIV. sent him to America, to collect plants useful in medicine, and he made three voyages for that purpose. The king rewarded him with a pension, and appointed him royal botanist. He was on the eve of undertaking a fourth voyage, but died as he was about to embark. His works are, "Description of the Plants of America," "Treatise on American Ferns," "The Art of Turning," two dissertations on Cochineal, in the "Journal des Savans," &c. B. at Marseilles, 1646; D. near Cadiz, 1706.

PLUMPTON, plump'-ton, the name of several parishes in England, none of them with a population above 2,000.

PLUMSTEAD, plum'-sted, the name of several parishes in England, none of them with a population above 8,500, which is the largest, and which is in the county of Kent, 10 miles from St. Paul's Cathedral, London.

PLUMSTEAD, a township of the United States, Pennsylvania, 30 miles from Philadelphia. Pop. 2,500.

PLUNERET, ploo'-ne-rai, a parish and market-town of France, in the department Morbihan, 20 miles from Lorient. Pop. 3,000.

PLUNKET, William Conyngham, first Lord, plun'-ket, an Irish lawyer and statesman, who, having distinguished himself by his oratorical talents while a student at Trinity College, Dublin, was returned to the Irish parliament through the influence of the earl of Charlemont. In 1787 he was called to the bar, and obtained such a large practice that, by the year 1807, he had acquired a fortune. In the same year he was returned to the British House of Commons, when he attached himself to the Whigs, and became a powerful orator of that party. In 1827 he was created lord chief justice of the Common Pleas in Ireland, and a peer of the United Kingdom. During the passage of the Roman Catholic Emancipation Bill he was the constant adviser of the duke of Wellington in the English House of Lords. In 1830 he became lord chancellor of Ireland, which post he retained until the year 1841. Lord Plunkett's later years were spent apart from political life, in retirement at his estate in Ireland. He was a great and impassioned orator; but though he has been compared with Pitt and Burke, he was too deficient in the profounder principles of legislation to have been equal to those statesmen. As a lawyer, he was more brilliant than sound, more dexterous than learned. B. at Newtown, Cork, 1764; D. near Bray, Ireland, 1854.

PLUNKET, Oliver, archbishop of Armagh and Roman Catholic primate of Ireland, who was accused with having attempted to excite an insurrection of the Roman Catholics of Ireland against Charles II. On that charge he was condemned to death, and after execution his body was quartered, in 1681. B. 1616.

PLUQUET, Francis Andrew Adrian, plu'-kai, an eminent French writer, who entered into orders and obtained a canonry, which he quitted to assume the professorship of history at the College of France, in 1776. He belonged to the party of Fontenelle, Montesquieu, and Helvetius; and, among other important works, wrote "An Examination of Fatalism," "Dictionary of Heresies," "On Sociability" (in this work he combated the opinion of Hobbes, and proved that man is beneficent and religious); "The Classical Books of the Empire of China," and "On Luxury." B. at Bayeux, 1716; D. at Paris, 1790.

PLUTARCH, plu'-tark, a celebrated Greek biographer and moralist, who studied philosophy in the school of Ammonius, at Delphi; and so greatly was he esteemed by his countrymen, that, when but a young man, he was associated in a deputation to the proconsul of the province, on an important mission, which he discharged with honour. He is stated to have afterwards travelled through Greece and into Egypt, and his observations in the latter country are believed to have led to his producing a treatise on Isis and Osiris. One account, but not a perfectly reliable one, declares him to have visited Rome, and to have been there received with flattering marks of distinction by Trajan, who raised him to the consular dignity, and appointed him governor of Illyria. It is certainly ascertained that he resided at Rome, where he delivered lectures in Greek upon philosophy, and enjoyed the friendship of Lucan, the younger Pliny, Martial, and others. At an advanced age he retired to his native town. He left two sons, Plutarch and Lamprias. The last wrote a list of his father's writings, which were numerous. The most celebrated of his works are his "Lives of Illustrious Men," in delineating which he has shown great impartiality, an abhorrence of tyranny and vice, and an accurate acquaintance with the human mind. His "Morals" also contain many valuable observations and curious narratives. The best edition of his works is that of Henry Stephens, Greek and Latin, 1572. His "Lives" have been translated into English by Dryden, by Langhorne, and by Professor Long. His "Morals" have also been translated into English. B. at Chæronea, Bœotia, about 48; D. at the same place, at a very advanced age.

PLUTO, ploo'-to, son of Saturn and Ops, inherited his father's kingdom with his brothers, Jupiter and Neptune. He received as his share the infernal regions. All the goddesses refused to marry him; but, upon seeing Proserpine, the daughter of Ceres, gathering flowers in the plains of Enna, in Sicily, he became enamoured of her, and immediately carried her away. Black victims, and particularly a bull, were the only sacrifices offered to him. The dog Cerberus watched at his feet, the harpies hovered around him, Proserpine sat on his left and the Parcæ occupied his right hand. Pluto is called by some the father of the Eumenides.

PLUTUS, ploo'-tus, was the god of riches in the Grecian mythology. He was represented as blind, because he distributed riches indiscriminately; he was lame, because he came slow and gradually; and he had wings, to intimate that he flew away with more velocity than he approached mankind.

PLUVINEL, Antony, ploo'-ve-nel, a French diplomatist. Henry IV. appointed him his grand equery and chamberlain, and sent him ambassador to Holland. He wrote a treatise on the Art of Riding, and was the first who established riding-schools in France. B. in Dauphiny, about 1550; D. at Paris, 1620.

PLYMOUTH, plim'-outh, a town and naval station of England, Devonshire, 37 miles from Exeter. It is, on account of its harbour and docks, one of the most important maritime places in the kingdom, and is situate at the head of Plymouth Sound, formed by the rivers Plym and Tamar, at their confluence with the sea. The town stands on the eastern side of a peninsula inclosed between these two rivers, at the mouth of the Plym; and about a mile and a half to the west, on the Tamar, is Plymouth Dock, a separate town, dependent on the docks, and nearly equal to Plymouth proper in size and population. Between Plymouth and Dock intervenes the town of Stonehouse, which connects the two, and forms almost a continuous line of buildings from the one to the other. Of the public buildings, the most ancient is the parish church, which consists of a nave, side aisles, and chancels, with a tower at the west end ornamented with pinnacles. There are also various places of public worship for different denominations, and many charitable institutions; consisting of almshouses, hospitals, schools, &c. The other public buildings and establishments are, the guildhall, the public prisons, the theatre and hotel, the public library, an exchange, and a market-place. Government has several military establishments here, such as barracks, hospitals, and prisons; whilst various fortifications have been, at different times, erected for its security. The citadel was built in the time of Charles II., in the year 1670, and stands on a cliff, and contains the governor's residence and extensive barracks. Under its eastern walls is the victualling-office, an extensive range of buildings, comprising the granaries and ovens for supplying the navy with bread. The port and harbour of Plymouth is distinguished for its great extent and capacity, and the security which it affords in its different parts. It is capable of containing about 2,000 sail of shipping, and is, altogether, one of the finest harbours in the world, consisting of several divisions or harbours. Sutton Pool is that which immediately adjoins the town, being almost encircled by the buildings; Catwater Harbour is an extensive sheet of water, formed by the estuary of the Plym. The harbour or bay of Hamoaze is a magnificent basin at the mouth of the Tamar. At the mouth of these various harbours, the great bay of Plymouth Sound forms an excellent roadstead, which is rendered secure by the construction of a breakwater across its entrance. The harbour is defended by several works, raised on different points. The dockyard is at Devonport, and is one of the finest in the world. It extends in a circular sweep along the shores of the Hamoaze, and comprises an area of 96 acres. It is fitted up with everything necessary for the repair and equipment of ships of war. The basin, which was made in the reign of William III., is not large; but this inconvenience is compensated by the excellent harbour of Hamoaze, along the bank of which the wharf wall extends, and which, from the depth of water, allows the largest ships to range along the jetties, and take in their stores immediately from the wharf. Altogether, there are nine docks, and the one last formed is the largest in Europe. The victualling establishments of the dockyard are on a large scale, and the naval hospital is at Stonehouse. Manf. Sailcloth, ropes, glass, soap, starch, and sugar-refining. Pop. with Devonport, 105,000. Lat. 50° 22′ N. Lon. 4° 10′ 2″ W.—This is the birthplace of John Kitto, the distinguished biblical scholar, and also of Sir Francis Drake. It communicates with Exeter by railway.

PLYMOUTH, a county in the E. part of Massachusetts, U.S. Area, 640 square miles. Pop. 60,000.

PLYMOUTH, a seaport-town and capital of the above county, 36 miles from Boston. It contains a courthouse, a gaol, a bank, and many churches. Manf. Iron-works, and cotton and woollen goods. Pop. 6,100. This was the landing-place of the Pilgrim Fathers, and is the oldest town in New England.—Also the name of several townships none of them with a population above 3,000.

PLYMOUTH SOUND, an inlet of the English Channel, between the counties of Devon and Cornwall. It forms an admirable naval harbour by the construction of the Plymouth breakwater, a granite and marble structure thrown across its entrance. Ext. 3 miles long, with a breadth of 4.

PLYMPTON, PLYMPTON EARLS, or PLYMPTON MAURICE, plim'-ton, a market-town of Devonshire, near the Plym, 5 miles from Plymouth. Pop. about 1,000. Sir Joshua Reynolds was born here in 1723, and his picture is in the guildhall.

PLYMPTON ST. MARY, a parish of Devonshire, half a mile from Plympton Earls. It has a station on the South Devon Railway. Pop. 3,000.

PLYMSTOCK, plim'-stok, a parish of Devonshire, 3 miles from Plymouth. Pop. 3,500.

PO, po, the largest river of Italy, which it traverses from west to east, irrigating, with its affluents, the entire plain of Piedmont and Lombardy. It rises in the Cottian Alps, flows north-east to Turin, and holding an easterly course throughout the whole length of Lombardy, discharges itself by a number of mouths into the Adriatic, about 30 miles from Venice. Its estimated length is about 340 miles, nearly 300 of which are navigable. It abounds with salmon, sturgeon, and other fish.

Po DI PRIMARO, pre-ma'-ro, a river of N. Italy, being a continuation of the Reno, which rises near Pistoja, and after a course of about 90 miles, assumes the name of Traghetto, and enters the Adriatic at Parto-di-Primaro, 13 miles from Ravenna.

POCKLINGTON, pok'-ling-ton, a market-town of Yorkshire, on a small stream 14 miles from York. Pop. 2,800. It has a station on the York and North Midland Railway.

POCOCK, Edward, po'-kok, a learned English divine and orientalist, who, at the age of 14, was entered of Magdalen Hall, Oxford; whence he removed to Corpus Christi College, where he obtained a fellowship. In 1629 he entered into orders, and was appointed chaplain to the English factory at Aleppo. While there, he improved himself in the Hebrew, Syriac, Arabic, and Ethiopic languages, which he had before studied at the university. He was also employed by Archbishop Laud in purchasing ancient manuscripts and coins; and that prelate having founded an Arabic lecture at Oxford, appointed Mr. Pocock the first professor. He returned home in 1636; but afterwards made another voyage to the East, and remained there four years. On his arrival in England, he found his patron in the Tower and the kingdom in commotion. In 1648 he was nominated to the Hebrew professorship, with the prebend of Christchurch annexed; he published in the same year his "Specimen Historiæ Arabum." In 1652 he was one of those concerned in preparing the intended edition of the Polyglot Bible. His principal works were,—"Porta Mosis; or, the six Prefatory Discourses of Moses Maimonides;" "The Annals of Eutychius;" "Abul Ferajii Historia Dynastarum;" "Commentaries on Micah, Malachi, Hosea, and Joel;" a Syriac version of the second epistle of St. Peter, the second and third of John, and that of Jude. B. at Oxford, 1604; D. 1691.

POCOCKE, Richard, an eminent English prelate, who, after taking his doctor's degree in laws, at Oxford, in 1733, went to the East, where he travelled during five years. On his return to England, he became chaplain to Lord Chesterfield, and was afterwards promoted to the bishopric of Ossory, whence he was translated to Meath in 1765. His "Eastern Travels" are valuable. B. at Southampton, 1704; D. 1765.

PODGORITZA, pod-go-ritz'-a, a town of European Turkey, in Albania, 38 miles from Scutari. Pop. 6,000, chiefly Mohammedans.

PODOLIA, or PODOLSK, po-do'-li-a, a government of the south-west of European Russia, inclosed on its E., N., and S. sides by Volhynia, Kiev, Kherson, and Bessarabia, and on its W. by Galicia. Area, 16,443 square miles. Desc. Generally level. Rivers. The Dniester and the Bug. Pro. Corn, hops, hemp, flax, tobacco, and different kinds of fruit. The vine and the mulberry are cultivated, and cattle-rearing is extensively carried on. Minerals. Lime, nitre, and alabaster. Manf. Woollen cloth, leather, and potash. Trade is mostly in the hands of Jews. Pop. 1,705,000, chiefly Poles. Lat. between 47° 30′ and 49° 45′ N. Lon. between 26° 25′ and 30° 48′ E.

POE, Edgar Allan, po, an eminent American writer, who was the son of a strolling player, and was in childhood left an orphan, but was adopted by Mr. Allan, a wealthy merchant. He accompanied that gentleman to England in 1816, and was placed at a school at Stoke Newington. Returning to his native country in 1822, he was sent to an academy at Richmond, and at a later period to Charlottsville University, Virginia. His career at school and college was brilliant, so far as the acquirement of learning was concerned, but was marked by so much extravagance and irregularity, that it terminated in his expulsion from the last-named establishment. He soon afterwards quarrelled with his generous protector, in consequence of the latter's refusal to pay some of his gambling debts. Intending to proceed to Greece, at that period struggling to throw off the tyranny of the Turks, he went to Europe; but, although he never reached his destination, he wandered about the continent until he was seized by the police of St. Petersburg, for being engaged in a drunken riot. The American ambassador procured his release, and sent him home, where he was kindly received by Mr. Allan. In a short time, however, he had a serious quarrel with Mr. Allan, who declared he would never see or assist him again. A small volume of poems which he had published, had been so successful as to lead Poe to believe that he might rely upon literature as a means of subsistence; but deeming himself slighted, he soon afterwards enlisted as a private soldier. Some military friends rescued him from this position; upon which he again adopted a literary career. He readily obtained employment upon the magazines and periodicals; but his unfortunate predilection for strong drinks always lost him what his great talent had secured. Towards the close of 1848, he joined a temperance society, but unhappily was weak enough to accept the invitation of some friends to drink, while staying at Baltimore, and became so utterly inebriated that he fell down in the streets. On being picked up, he was conveyed to an hospital, where he expired on the following day. Although he was unfortunately so unjust and so unfaithful to his undoubted genius, he produced a few poems and novels, which inspire the reader with an emotion of pity for the ill-regulated moral faculties which brought so much magnificence of imagination and such remarkable analytical power to an untimely close. His works consist of "Eureka, a Prose Poem," one volume of poetry, and two of tales. B. at Baltimore, United States, 1811; D. in the same city, 1849.

POELEMBERG, Cornelius. (See POLEMBERG.)

POERIO, Carlo, po-ecr'-e-o, a modern Neapolitan statesman, who was the son of Baron Joseph Poerio, counsellor of state and attorney-general of the high court of justice at Naples. Carlo was educated at Florence under the most able professors, but returned to Naples in 1828, where he commenced practice as an advocate, and distinguished himself by eloquently defending the principles of representative government, for which he was three times prosecuted by the ruling powers. When a constitutional government was proclaimed at Naples, in 1848, Poerio was appointed under-secretary for home affairs, and afterwards became minister of public instruction. When Bomba suddenly and infamously destroyed the constitution, Poerio was, with other enlightened members of the state, imprisoned. During ten years he suffered all the horrors of a Neapolitan dungeon, but obtained his release from the late king of Naples in 1859. With Settembrini and many other patriots, he was placed on board a ship, which was ordered to proceed to the United States. But the patriots, who greatly outnumbered the crew of the vessel, sent a deputation to the captain, informing him that, without wishing to employ force, they had resolved to steer the ship into the nearest British port. The exiles were in consequence landed at Cork, and soon afterwards Poerio and his companions proceeded to London. B. at Naples, 1803.

POGGENDORFF, John Christian, pog'-gen-dorf, an eminent German physician, who, in 1834, was appointed professor of physics at the university of Berlin, and in 1838 became member of the Academy of Sciences. In his work entitled "The Magnetism of the Voltaic Pile," he was the first to demonstrate and apply the principles of the multiplier. In 1824 he assumed the direction of the "Annals of Physics and Chemistry," which, under his editorship, became one of the first of the scientific journals of Germany. With Liebig and Wœhler, he afterwards undertook a Dictionary of Chemistry, and subsequently produced "Biographical Dictionary of Mathematicians and Naturalists," and "Studies for a History of the Exact Sciences." His scientific researches have been principally directed towards electricity and magnetism. He invented a galvanometer, another instrument for producing a constant current of electricity, and made some important discoveries relative to galvanic polerization, &c. B. at Hamburg, 1796.

POGGIO BRACCIOLINI, John Francis, pod'-jo brach'-che-o-le'-ne, a learned Italian historian, whose merit procured him the office of secretary to Pope Boniface IX. and several of his successors. While he was at the council of Constance, he was employed in searching for ancient manuscripts in that city, of which he discovered several. From Constance he went to England, where he continued some time, and then returned to Rome; but, in 1425, he settled at Florence, married, and became secretary to that republic. His principal works are,—"Funeral Orations," "History of Florence," "De Varietate Fortunæ," "Epistles," a collection of witticisms, a Latin translation of Diodorus Siculus, and editions of several ancient writers discovered by him, particularly Quintilian and Ammianus Marcellinus. B. at Terranova, Florence, 1380; D. at Florence, 1459.—His son James translated his father's "History of Florence" from the Latin into Italian; also the "Life of Cyrus" from the Greek, and other works. He was put to death for being concerned in the conspiracy of the Pazzi in 1478.

Poggy, or Nassau Isles, pog'-gy, on the west coast of Sumatra, from which they are distant about 60 miles. They are inhabited by savages, and are densely wooded. Lat. between 2° 13′ and 3° 16′ S.

Poilly, Francis, pwoi'-ye, an eminent French engraver, who studied under Peter Daret, and, after improving himself at Rome, was made engraver to the king. His plates, amounting to about four hundred, are neat and accurate. B. at Abbeville, 1622; D. at Paris, 1693.—His brother Nicholas and nephew John Baptist were also good engravers.

Poinsinet, Anthony Alexander Henry, pwoin'-se-nai, a French dramatic author, who wrote some comic operas which possess little merit. B. at Fontainebleau, 1735; drowned in Spain, 1769.

Poinsinet de Sivry, Louis, se'-vre, cousin of the preceding, wrote some poems, and made translations of Pliny the Elder, Aristophanes, Anacreon, and other ancient writers. B. at Versailles, 1733; D. 1804.

Point-a-Pitre, pwănt-a-pee'tr, a town of the French West-India islands, in Guadaloupe, 18 miles from Basseterre. Pop. 13,000.—It was, in 1843, nearly destroyed by an earthquake.

Point Coupee, point koo-pe', a parish of the United States, Louisiana. Area, 430 square miles. Pop. 20,000.

Point de Galle, point' de gal, a seaport on the south-west point of Ceylon, 70 miles from Colombo. The harbour is good. It is in general the station of one or two ships of war, and is well supplied with provisions. The fortress stands very high, and the town is inclosed by a wall, but is a place of no strength. It is, however, healthy, and is much frequented. Lat. 6° N. Lon. 80° 15′ E.

Poiré, pwoi'-rai, a parish and market-town of France, in the department Vendée, 7 miles from Napoléon Vendée. Pop. 4,000.

Poiret, Peter, a French Protestant divine, who, by reading the works of Madame Bourignon and other mystics, became one of their disciples, and devoted his life to mystical theology. His principal works are "The Divine Economy," which has been translated into English; "Solid Principles of the Christian Religion," "Theology of the Heart," and a Life of Madame Bourignon, prefixed to her works. B. at Metz, 1646; D. in Holland, 1719.

Poirier, Germain, pwoi'-ri-ai, an eminent French chronologist and antiquary, who was of the order of Benedictines of St. Maur, which he quitted in 1769. He was one of the writers of "The Art of Verifying Dates," and undertook, in conjunction with Precieux, the 18th volume of the "Collection of the Histories of Gaul and France," begun by Bouquet. B. at Paris, 1724; D. 1803.

Poirino, po'-e-re'-no, a market-town of Sardinia, Piedmont, 14 miles from Turin. Pop. with parish, 6000.

Poirson, John B., pwoir'-sawng, an eminent French geographer, who produced a "Physical and Political Atlas of the whole World," the atlas for the "Universal Geography" of Malte-Brun, and several of the maps accompanying the works of Humboldt. He also constructed several fine globes, one of which is preserved in the Louvre museum. B. in France, 1761; D. at Valence, 1831.

Poisson, Raymond, pwoi'-sawng, a celebrated French actor and dramatic writer. He was gentleman of the chamber to the duke de Croqui, but quitted that service for the stage. His pieces are, "The Baron de la Crasse," "The Good Soldier," "The Fool of Quality," and some others. B. at Paris, about 1620; D. 1690.

Poisson, Simeon-Denis, an eminent French mathematician, who, in 1811, was appointed professor of mechanics in the Normal School at Paris, and subsequently became examiner of the Polytechnic School, member of the Academy of Sciences, and of the Council of Public Instruction, baron and officer of the Legion of Honour. He was one of the most profound mathematicians of his time, and largely contributed to the scientific journals. His dissertations chiefly relate to the mathematics of magnetism, heat, the gases, capillary attraction, gravitation, &c. He excelled in applying the methods of mathematical analysis to the questions of physics. A monument to his memory was erected in his native town. B. at Pithiviers, 1781; D. at Paris, 1840.

Poissy, pwoi'-se, a town of France, on the Seine, 9 miles from Versailles. It is the principal cattle-market for the supply of Paris. Pop. 3,000.

Poitiers, poi'-teers (Fr. pwoi-te'-ai), a town of France, in the department of La Vienne, near the river Clain, 53 miles from Tours. It is divided into four quarters, all built in a mean and antiquated style. The streets are generally steep, winding, and ill-paved. It has several squares, the finest of which is the Place Royale, a cathedral, several other churches, and Roman antiquities. Manf. Woollen caps and stockings, leather, and gloves. Pop. 30,000.—It is famous for being the scene of the celebrated victory of the son of Edward III., surnamed the Black Prince, in 1356, when John, king of France, was taken prisoner and brought to England. It was for three centuries attached to the crown of England. A station on the railway to Bordeaux.

Poitou, poi'-too, the name, before the Revolution, of an old province of France, now subdivided among the departments of La Vienne, the Deux-Sèvres, La Vendée, Charente, and Creuse.

Poivre, Peter, poivr, an eminent French naturalist, who entered the Congregation of Missionaries, and was sent to China, where he was imprisoned during two years. In his passage to Europe the vessel was attacked by the English, and Poivre had his arm carried off. He subsequently quitted the ecclesiastical state, and was sent by the French India Company, in 1749, to open a commercial establishment in Cochin-China, and was also appointed intendant of the isles of France and Bourbon, where he introduced the bread-fruit tree and other valuable plants. He wrote, "The Voyage of a Philosopher," a treatise on the Dyeing of Silks, and "The History and Manners of China," &c. B. at Lyons, 1719; D. at the same city, 1786.

POL-DE-LEON, ST., pole-dai-lai-awng, a town of France, in the department Finisterre, 10 miles from Morlaix. It has a cathedral, town-hall, and an episcopal palace. Pop. 7,300.

POL, ST., pole, a town of France, in the department of the Pas-de-Calais, 20 miles from Arras. It has two ruined castles, a college, and mineral baths. Pop. 7,100.

POLAND, po'-land, a large country of continental Europe, now distributed amongst Austria, Russia, and Prussia, and formerly bounded W. by Germany, E. by Russia, and S. by Hungary, Walachia, and Moldavia. Its partition took place at three distinct epochs, 1772, 1791, and 1795. Of its territories, the Prussian part is in the north-west, the Austrian in the south, the former kingdom of Poland in the middle, while the Russian acquisitions, larger than all the rest collectively, occupy all the country to the east, extending in a vast oblong, from Lithuania in the north, to the Ukraine in the south. Desc. The face of the country is almost everywhere level, and, in many places, marshy. Mountains. The only great mountains are the Carpathians, which formed the boundary between Poland and Hungary. A range, far inferior in height and length, advances from Silesia into a part of the south-west of Poland. Rivers. All the great rivers, except the Niemen, run in shallow channels, overflow their banks, and either flow into the Baltic or into the Euxine. Of the former, the chief are the Vistula, the Bug, the Niemen, and the Dwina; of the latter, the Dnieper and the Dniester. There is also the Warta, which joins the Oder. Climate. Severe in the winter, and generally unhealthy. The most pleasant, and at the same time the most fertile part, is in the south-east, particularly the Ukraine. Pro. Agricultural produce, but the state of cultivation is extremely backward throughout almost the whole of Poland. Corn and cattle are largely exported. Minerals. Iron, lead, gold, and silver. There are salt-mines on a very extensive scale in Galicia. Inhabitants. In Poland, the peasantry live in a most degraded state, in cabins built of logs, the chinks and crevices of which are stopped up with the rudest materials. The best buildings are occupied by Jews, whose filth would be intolerable in any other country. Men, women, children, hogs, cows, and poultry, all live under the same roof, and the traveller is frequently obliged to share the only apartment in the house with these crowded inmates. The German settlers present a striking contrast to the natives. The Jews occupy a conspicuous place in the population, and are the men of business for almost the whole country: the current money of the kingdom is chiefly in their hands. History. The Poles were for a long time governed by elective chiefs, bearing the title of duke; no dynasty having been established before the reign of Piast, or Piastus (in 840), whose family swayed the sceptre for more than five centuries. Afterwards, however, the crown became strictly elective, and party divisions prepared the decline of the state. The confusion occasioned by these contests, furnished a pretence for the neighbouring powers to interfere, and the country was finally partitioned between the great powers of Russia, Prussia, and Austria. In 1772, Russia seized a large part of the eastern provinces, while Austria appropriated a fertile tract in the south-west, and Prussia a commercial district in the north-west, including the lower part of the Vistula. In 1791, Poland was anew invaded by the partitioning powers, particularly by Russia. In 1795 a final division was made of the remaining provinces among the three powers, Russia obtaining on each occasion by far the largest share. By the victories of Bonaparte, the share of Poland possessed by Prussia was wrested from her, and various other changes were made. But, after the destruction of the French power, a partial restitution was made to Prussia and Austria, of their late possessions, and the remainder given to Russia. In 1830 a revolution took place, but ended in the surrender of Warsaw and the dispersion of the Poles. In 1832, what remained of Poland was declared a part of the Russian empire. In 1846 an attempt was made at Cracow to recover independence, but it ended in the subjugation of the last remnant of the country, which was annexed to Austria.

POLAND, KINGDOM OF, the only portion of the preceding country that still retains officially its ancient name, comprises the chief part of that which, from 1807 to 1813, formed the duchy of Warsaw. It consists of the central provinces of Poland, bounded all along its frontier by the respective acquisitions of Russia, Austria, and Prussia. Political Divisions. These comprise six governments,—Warsaw, Radom, Lublin, Plock, Augustowa, and the city of Warsaw. Area, 49,290 square miles. Desc. A vast plain, covered with extensive forests, and well watered. Pro. Mostly rye; but buckwheat, oats, and barley are cultivated; hemp, flax, and tobacco. Minerals. Bog-iron, zinc, copper, coal, and salt. The commerce of the country is mostly in the hands of Jews. Pop. about 4,800,000. Lat. between 50° 4′ and 55° 6′ N. Lon. between 17° 40′ and 24° 18′ E. (See GALICIA.)

POLANGEN, po'-lang-en, a frontier town of Russia, on the Baltic, 42 miles from Telsh. Pop. 1,600.—Here, in 1831, the Poles were defeated by the Russians.

POLAR REGIONS, po'-lar, the zones which encompass the north and south poles within the Arctic and Antarctic circles.

POLE, Reginald, pole, cardinal and archbishop of Canterbury, was the son of Richard Pole, Lord Montague, and of Margaret, daughter of George, duke of Clarence, younger brother of Edward IV., and cousin-german to the mother of Henry VIII. At the age of 12 he was elected of Magdalen College, Oxford, where he made considerable progress in learning. In 1517 he obtained a prebend in the cathedral of Salisbury, and two years after, the deaneries of Exeter and Wimborne. About this time he went to Italy for improvement, upon a liberal establishment from his relation Henry VIII. He returned to England in 1525, and was held in great favour by the king, on account of his engaging manners and accomplishments; but, when that monarch avowed his design of divorcing his queen, Pole opposed it, and went to Italy. Henry having assumed the supremacy over the Church, and caused Dr. Sampson to write a defence of that title, sent the book to Pole, who returned an answer to it under the title "Pro Unitate Ecclesiasticâ." This gave such offence that his preferments and pensions were taken from him; but he was abundantly compensated by the pope and emperor. The former made him cardinal in 1536, and appointed him nuncio to France and Flanders. At home, however, he was declared a traitor, and a price was set upon his head. He was one of the legates at the council of Trent, where he attended as long as his health permitted. On the death of Paul III. he narrowly missed election to the popedom. Queen Mary was no sooner settled on the English throne, than Pole was appointed legate to reduce England to the papal see; but, before he set out, the act of attainder which had been passed against him was repealed. He arrived in 1554, and was magnificently received and lodged in the palace at Lambeth. Shortly after he met the parliament, and pronounced the papal absolution of the kingdom. The day after the death of Cranmer, he took upon himself the title of archbishop of Canterbury, having been promoted to that dignity some time before. He was also elected chancellor of both universities, which he visited by commission. He behaved with moderation to the Protestants, and was displeased with the conduct of Gardiner and the other persecuting prelates. He survived Queen Mary only sixteen hours. Besides his book against Henry VIII. and his defence of it, he wrote several pieces in favour of the papal authority and the doctrines of the Church of Rome. It is difficult to absolve Cardinal Pole from all acquiescence in the dreadful persecutions which took place in Queen Mary's reign; but his mild and honourable disposition seems totally at variance with the fearful acts which disgraced that period. B. at Stourton, Staffordshire, 1500; D. at Lambeth, 1558.

POLEMBERG, Cornelius, po'-lem-bairg, an eminent Dutch painter, who, at the invitation of Charles I., visited England, where he painted several cabinet pictures of great beauty. His landscapes are particularly fine. On the disturbances breaking out between the king and parliament, he returned to his native country. B. at Utrecht, 1586; D. at the same city, 1660.

POLEMON, pol'-e-mon, a Greek philosopher, who is his youth led a dissolute life; but, passing the school of Xenocrates one day, inflamed with wine, he entered in order to ridicule the philosopher. The discourse of Xenocrates on the misery of intemperance had such an effect that Polemon became his disciple and successor. After this change, he drank nothing but water during the rest of his life. B. at Athens, about 340 B.C.; D. 270 B.C.

POLEVOY, Nicolas Alexiewitsch, pol'-e-voi, an eminent Russian writer, who was the son of a Russian merchant settled in Siberia. He never went to school, but was taught reading in his sixth year by his sister. He was a prodigious reader, and, while still a mere child, wrote a drama, a manuscript newspaper, and a History of Peter the Great. "At last," he says, in his Autobiography, "I became my father's walking dictionary in geography and history, for my memory at that time was such as I have never met with in anybody else. To learn by heart a whole tragedy cost me nothing. In a word, if I must describe my mental progress up to the year 1811, it was this,—I had read about a thousand volumes, of all kinds and sorts, and remembered all that I read." In 1812 his father had settled at Moscow, when the city was destroyed by fire at the advance of Napoleon I.; after which event he returned to Irkutsk, where young Polevoy spent several years as clerk to his father, who wished him to become a man of business, while the inclinations of the son were wholly towards literature. In secret he learnt the French and German languages, and in 1817 sent an account of the emperor Alexander's visit to Kursk to the Russian Courier, which was his first essay in print. He continued his contributions, and repaired to St. Petersburg, where he made the acquaintance of the most distinguished literary men; and proceeding to Moscow, established there the Moscow Telegraph, in 1825. The succeeding twenty-one years were occupied in incessant literary labour. He was a journalist, an historian, a romance-writer; he produced essays, tales, translations of Shakspere, and a multitude of dramas, tragedies, and comedies, at a rate faster than criticism could follow. His most important works are, a "History of the Russian Nation," which was left incomplete at his death; "Sketches of Russian Literature;" Dramatic Works and Translations; and Lives of Napoleon, Peter the Great, and Suvarow. His translation of "Hamlet" was played with great success at Moscow in 1837. B. at Irkutsk, 1796; D. at St. Petersburg, 1846.

POLICASTRO, pol-e-kas'-tro, a maritime town of Naples, 42 miles from Diano. It is a bishop's see, and has a Gothic cathedral. Pop. 7,000.

POLIDORO DA CARAVAGGIO, pol-e-dor'-o, an eminent Italian painter, who acquired his art while working at the Vatican, as a preparer of the stucco upon which the great Italian artists wrought, and made such rapid improvement as to be employed in ornamenting the public buildings at Rome. B. in the duchy of Milan, 1495; D. 1543.

POLIER, Antony de, po'-le-ai, a Swiss colonel, who served in the army of the East-India Company, acquired a large fortune, and retiring to Europe, settled at Avignon, where he was murdered by brigands. He made a profound study of the religion of the Hindoos, and is stated to have executed a complete copy of the Vedas. He wrote a work on the Mythology of the Hindoos. B. at Lausanne, 1741; killed at Avignon, 1795.

POLIGNAC, Melchior de, po'-leen-yak, a celebrated French cardinal, who was descended from one of the oldest families in France, and received his education at Paris, where he, at the same time, defended the philosophy of Aristotle and that of Descartes with great ingenuity. In the disputes between the pope and the court of France, Polignac rendered great service by bringing about a reconciliation. Louis XIV. sent him as ambassador to Poland to procure the election of the prince of Conti, after the death of John Sobieski. In this he failed, and on his return to France was for some time in disgrace. He afterwards recovered the royal favour, and in 1712 he assisted in negotiating the treaty of Utrecht. He had shortly before received from Pope Clement XI. the dignity of cardinal. After the death of Louis XIV. he was exiled to his abbey of Anchin, and was not recalled till 1721. In 1726 he was made archbishop of Auch, and in 1732 commander of the order of the Holy Ghost. Cardinal Polignac wrote an excellent Latin poem, entitled "Anti-Lucretius." B. at Puy, Languedoc, 1661; D. at Paris, 1741.

POLIGNAC, Prince Jules de, minister and favourite of Charles X. He was the son of the duke Polignac and the duchess of Polignac, the favourite and confidante of Marie Antoinette. At an early age he joined the count of Artois, then in exile, and was appointed his aide-de-camp. In 1804 he went to France, where he and his elder brother engaged in a plot against the first consul; on the discovery of which he was condemned to an imprisonment of two years. Even after the expiration of this term he was detained in custody, but contrived to effect his escape in 1813. After fulfilling various missions in the interests of the Bourbons, he was, upon their restoration to the throne of France, sent as ambassador to the court of England. From that post he was recalled in 1829, by Charles X., who created him minister of foreign affairs and president of the council. But his acts excited general dissatisfaction, and his reactionary policy led to the fall of Charles X. and the expulsion of the elder branch of the Bourbons from the French throne. During the revolution of 1830 he obstinately refused all compromise, and, after the triumph of the people, attempted to escape under a disguise; but was taken at Granville, conducted to Paris, and brought to trial before the Court of Peers, which condemned him to imprisonment for life, with the loss of all his titles and orders. After being detained for several years in the fortress of Ham, he was pardoned, in 1836; upon which he repaired to England; but subsequently returned to France, where he spent the remainder of his days in strict privacy. This blundering statesman was, apart from politics, an honourable and worthy man; but his public acts may be assumed to have sprung from the prejudices of his birth and education, and his blind faith in the principles of the old régime. B. at Paris, 1780; D. 1847.

POLIGNANO, pol'-een-ya'-no, a town of Naples, 19 miles from Bari. Pop. 4,500.

POLIGNY, po-leen'-ye, a town of France, in the department of the Jura, 26 miles from Besançon. Manf. Hosiery, glue, earthenware, saltpetre, and leather. Pop. 6,000.

POLISTINA, po-lis-te'-na, a town of Naples, 13 miles from Palmi. Pop. 6,000.

POLIZIANO, or POLITIANUS, Angelo, po-lish'-i-at'-nus, a learned Italian writer, whose poetical talents recommended him to the patronage of Lorenzo and Julian de' Medici, the former of whom made him tutor to his children. He discharged this trust so well as to be appointed professor of Greek and Latin at Florence. His principal works were, "History of the Confederacy of Pazzi," a Latin translation of Herodian, "Greek Epigrams," "Latin Epistles," "Bucolic Poems," a "Treatise on Anger," and "Orfeo," the earliest form of the libretto of an opera extant. B. at Montepulciano, Tuscany, 1454; D. 1494.

POLIZZY, po-lit'-se, a town of Sicily, 18 miles from Palermo. Pop. 5,800.

POLLA, pol'-la, a town of Naples, Principato Citra, 10 miles from Sala. Pop. 5,000.—This place suffered severely by an earthquake in 1857.

POLLENZA, pol-lain'-tha, a town of the island of Majorca, 28 miles from Palma. Manf. Black woollen cloth. Pop. 6,000.

POLLIO, Caius Asinius, pol'-li-o, a Roman consul and orator, who gained a great reputation in the reign of Augustus, by his military exploits and his writings. Virgil and Horace were his intimate friends, and have immortalized his name in their works. He wrote tragedies, orations, and a history, which are lost. He is said to have formed the first public library at Rome. B. 76 B.C.; D. 4 A.D.

POLLOCKSHAWS, pol'-lok-shaws, a town of Scotland, in Renfrewshire, on the Cart, 2½ miles from Glasgow. It has extensive bleachfields and printfields, and cotton-mills. Pop. 6,500.

POLLOK, Robert, pol'-lok, a Scotch poet, who was educated for the church, but produced, before he had attained his 26th year, a very remarkable poem, entitled "The Course of Time." Upon the recommendation of Professor Wilson, Messrs. Blackwood, of Edinburgh, published the work, which attracted the most unqualified admiration in the religious world. It speedily ran through several editions; in the year 1857 it had attained its twenty-first. The young poet's constitution was frail, and was undermined by his intense application. He was preparing to start for Italy, but D. at Southampton, 1827; B. in Renfrewshire, 1799.

POLLUX, pol'-lux, a celebrated hero of the Grecian mythology, was the twin brother of Castor, after whose death he implored Jupiter to render him immortal. His prayer could not be entirely granted, but Jupiter divided immortality between the twins, who lived and died alternately. (See CASTOR.)

POLLUX, Julius, a celebrated grammarian and teacher of rhetoric, who was the favourite and teacher of Commodus. He wrote several works, only one of which is extant. This is entitled, "Onomasticon," and is a dictionary of Greek, arranged not alphabetically, but according to subjects. The best edition is that of Amsterdam, 1706. Flourished at the close of the 2nd century of the Christian era.

POLO, Marco, po'-lo, a celebrated old Venetian traveller, whose father and uncle left Venice in 1250 for Constantinople, travelled up the Euxine, and afterwards proceeded to Bokhara. At Bokhara they acquired the Mongol language; they next joined the suite of the Persian ambassador, with which the brothers proceeded to the court of Kublai Khan, in Chinese Tartary. The Venetians were well received by Kublai, who commissioned them to carry a letter to the pope, in which he asked that a hundred learned men might be sent into his dominions. They arrived safely at Venice in 1269, after an absence of nineteen years. In 1272, the two brothers, and Marco Polo, the son of Nicolo, together with two Dominican friars, again set forth into the interior, from the coast of Syria; but the friars, becoming too frightened to proceed, left the three Venetians to prosecute by themselves their journey into central Asia. In 1275 they arrived at the camp of Kublai Khan, who soon afterwards dispatched Marco Polo on several missions to China and India. The Venetian was the first European who visited China. In 1291 the three Venetians were permitted to accompany an embassy to Persia, and, after travelling through China, they embarked at Fo-Kien, and sailed thence for Persia. From Persia they set sail for Venice, which they reached in 1295. Venice was at that period at war with Genoa, and Marco Polo was placed in command of one of the war-galleys of the state; but, being taken prisoner, was conveyed to Genoa. While in captivity he dictated to a fellow-prisoner the narrative of his adventures. This MS. he afterwards corrected, on regaining his liberty, and caused a French translation to be made of it. The work was published at Venice in 1559. It is one of the most interesting and valuable of the ancient works on geography. Marco Polo was B. about 1250; D. about 1323.

POLOTZK, po-lotzk', a town of Russian Poland, 60 miles from Vitebsk. It has a citadel, numerous churches, monasteries, a Jesuits' college, and a school for nobles. Pop. 11,000.—This place was taken twice by the Russians from the Poles, in 1579 and 1655.

POLTAVA, or PULTAWA, pol-ta'-va, pool-to'-a, the capital of a government in Russia, of the same name, on the river Vorskla, 70 miles from Kharkov. The houses are indifferently built, but the streets are wide and straight, and in the centre of the town is a very good square, with a fine monument of granite, in honour of Peter the Great. Pop. 16,000.—The Swedes were completely defeated here in 1709, by Peter the Great.—The GOVERNMENT has an area of 19,000 square miles, and a population of 1,785,000. Corn, hemp, flax, tobacco, fruits, red pepper, honey, and silk are cultivated, and large numbers of live stock are reared.

POLTEN, ST., pol'-ten, a fortified town of Lower Austria, on the Trasen, 35 miles from Vienna. It has a cathedral, an episcopal palace, theatre, and hospitals. Manf. Cotton goods, paper, and glass. Pop. 6,000.

POLYÆNUS, pol'-i-e'-nus, a Macedonian, who wrote a work entitled "The Stratagems of War," dedicated to the emperors Antoninus and Verus. There are several editions of this book in Greek and Latin. It was translated into English by R. Sheppard, 1793. Flourished about the middle of the 2nd century A.D.

POLYBIUS, po-lib'-i-us, a Greek historian. His father, Lycortas, was a distinguished general of Achæa, and taught his son the principles of philosophy and policy. Philopœmen was his instructor in the art of war. Polybius displayed great skill and courage in several expeditions during the war between the Romans and Perseus, king of Macedon. When that monarch was defeated, Polybius was taken prisoner and sent to Rome, where he gained the friendship of Scipio, whom he accompanied to the siege of Carthagena and to that of Numantium. Polybius, on the death of Scipio, was greatly afflicted, and retired into private life. Part only of his Universal History of his own time, in Greek, remains, which was translated into English by Sir Henry Sheares, in 1698. B. at Megalopolis, in Arcadia, about 204 B.C.; D. about 122 B.C.

POLYCANDRO, pol-e-kan'-dro, an island of the Grecian archipelago, 16 miles from Milo. Area, 20 square miles. Desc. Rugged, but yielding corn. Pop. 2,000.

POLYCARP, pol'-i-karp, bishop of Smyrna, and a martyr of the Christian church, was the disciple of St. John the Evangelist. He made a journey to Rome in 160, to settle the controversy respecting the proper time for the celebration of Easter. On his return to Smyrna, in 166, he was condemned to the flames by the proconsul. His martyrdom is affectingly related in a letter from the church of Smyrna to the churches of Pontus; and there is also extant an epistle of his to the Philippians, published by Usher, with those of Ignatius, in 1647. B. 71.

POLYCLETUS, pol-i-kle'-tus, a sculptor of Sicyone, in the Peloponnesus, who was the rival of Phidias. It is reported, that Polycletus, by way of convicting the critics, exhibited a statue for public animadversion, offering to correct the faults that should be noticed. On producing it a second time, amended exactly according to the errors which had been pointed out, he placed by it another, formed according to his own judgment. The observers unanimously approved this last, and censured the former; on which Polycletus said, "That which you condemn is your own work; that which you admire is mine." Flourished about 440 B.C.

POLYCRATES, po-lik'-ra-tees, king of Samos, who was so universally respected, that Amasis, king of Egypt, made a treaty of alliance with him. The Egyptian monarch, however, advised him to chequer his enjoyments by relinquishing some of his most favourite objects. Polycrates complied, and threw into the sea a seal, the most valuable of his jewels; but a few days after, he received as a present a large fish, in whose belly the jewel was found.

POLYDORE VERGIL. (See VERGIL.)

POLYNESIA, pol'-i-nee'-she-a, a term applied to the numerous islands in the Pacific Ocean, east of Australasia and the Philippine islands. It includes New Zealand, and extends 30° on each side of the equator. Lon. from 35° E. to 135° W. (For information regarding the various groups and islands of Polynesia, see their individual names.)

POLYPHEMUS, pol'-i-fe'-mus, king of all the Cyclops, in Sicily, and son of Neptune and Thoosa. He is represented as a monster of immense strength, and with one eye in the middle of the forehead. He fed upon human flesh, and kept his flocks on the coasts of Sicily, when Ulysses, at his return from the Trojan war, was driven there. The Grecian prince, and twelve of his companions, visited the coast, and were seized by the Cyclops, who daily devoured two of them in his cave, in which they were confined. Ulysses would have shared the same fate had he not intoxicated the Cyclops, and put out his eye with a firebrand while asleep. Polyphemus, awaked by the sudden pain, stopped the entrance of his cave; but Ulysses made his escape by creeping between the legs of the rams of the Cyclops, which had been put up in the cave. Polyphemus became enamoured of Galatæa, but his addresses were disregarded, and the nymph shunned his presence. The Cyclops then crushed the head of Acis, his rival, with a piece of broken rock.

POLZIN, pol'-zhin, a town of Prussian Pomerania, on the Wipperbach, 30 miles from Koshin. Manf. Woollen cloth, leather, and tobacco. Pop. 3,500.

POMARICO, po'-ma-re'-ko, a town of Naples, 10 miles from Matera. Pop. 5,000.

POMBAL, pom'-bal, a town of Portugal, in Estremadura, 21 miles from Coimbra. Manf. Principally hats. Pop. 5,000.

POMBAL, Don Sebastian Joseph Carvalho, Marquis de, a Portuguese statesman, who served during some time in the army; but abandoning a military life, retired to his estate until 1739. In 1745 he was sent ambassador to Vienna, where he married the Countess Daun, a relation of the famous marshal of that name. In 1750 he was appointed secretary for foreign affairs, and had the principal share in the administration. He displayed great talent, encouraged agriculture and commerce, placed the marine on a respectable footing, and instituted several excellent regulations; but he disgraced his public life by his avarice. He, however, distinguished himself by his honourable conduct after the earthquake which destroyed Lisbon in 1755. By his means the city was speedily restored, and the public calamity relieved. But his influence at court created him many enemies; and at length a conspiracy was formed against him and the king, which was discovered, and the authors and agents severely punished. Being suspicious that the Jesuits were concerned in this plot, he caused them to be expelled the kingdom. On the death of Joseph II., in 1777, the power of Pombal was destroyed, and he was exiled from court. B. at Soura, Coimbra, 1699; D. at Pombal, 1780.

POMERANA, po-mai-ra'-na, a town of Tuscany, near the famous borax lagoons, 7 miles from Volterra. Pop. 2,500.

POMERANIA, pom'-e-rai'-ne-a (Germ. PROMERA, prom'-era), a maritime province of Prussia, lying along the south coast of the Baltic, and having on its landward sides the provinces of W. Prussia, Brandenburg, and Mecklenburg. Area, 12,204 square miles. Desc. Almost entirely flat, and in many parts extremely marshy. Rivers. The largest is the Oder; the others are the Leba, the Stolpe, the Rega, the Persante, the Ucker, and the Ihna. The Haff is a large inland bay, or rather lake, of an oblong form, which communicates with the Baltic by the mouths of the Oder. Pro. The soil is not very fertile: the principal crops are wheat, barley, rye, oats, potatoes, flax, hemp, and tobacco. The inhabitants have numerous herds of cattle. Fishing is carried on along the seacoast and in the rivers. The forests are extensive, and abound in game, and the common fuel is wood and turf. Minerals. Comparatively rare, and almost confined to marsh-iron, alum, and salt. Amber is occasionally found on the coast. Manf. Principally woollen stuffs, iron-wares, and glass. The other fabrics, far inferior in quantity, are linen and leather. Smoked geese are an important article of trade, and the salmon and sturgeon fisheries are very productive. Pop. 1,255,000, chiefly Protestants. Lat. beginning at about 53° N., and stretching along the Baltic. Lon. between 12° 30′ and 18° E.

POMERELIA, or LITTLE POMERANIA, pom'-e-re'-le-a, a district of the Prussian states, bounded N. by the part of the Baltic called the Gulf of Dantzic, S. by Poland, and W. by Pomerania. Ext. 90 miles long, and 50 in breadth.

POMEY, Francis, po'-me, a French Jesuit, who published, among other learned works, "Treatise on the Funerals of the Ancients," "Pantheum Mysticum," and "An Account of the Heathen Mythology," of which Andrew Tooke gave an English translation, without acknowledgment. B. 1618; D. 1673.

POMFRET. (See PONTEFRACT.)

POMFRET, pom'-fret, the name of several townships in the United States, none of them with a population above 4,500.

POMFRET, John, an English poet and divine, who entered into orders, and obtained the living of Malden, in Bedfordshire. On account of a passage in his poem entitled "The Choice," Bishop Compton was for some time very much prejudiced against him. His poems possess little merit, but were once very popular. B. at Luton, Bedfordshire, 1667; D. 1703.

POMONA, or MAINLAND, po-mo'-na, the largest of the Orkney islands, and nearly in their centre. Area, 150 square miles. Desc. Much intersected by arms of the sea, and in general bleak and barren, covered with heath, destitute of trees, and encumbered with hills, marshy swamps, and fresh-water lakes. Many swine and sheep are reared. Pop. 17,000. (See ORKNEY ISLANDS.)

POMPADOUR, Jane-Antoinette Poisson, Marchioness of, pom'-pa-door, mistress of Louis XV., was the daughter of a butcher, and at an early age became the wife of Etoile, nephew of the farmer-general Normand Tournehem. While hunting in the forest of Senar, on the borders of which Tournehem held an estate, the king had an opportunity purposely afforded him of seeing Madame Poisson, with whose charms he was immediately enamoured. She was created marchioness of Pompadour in 1745, and retained a complete ascendancy over the heart of Louis till her death. The marchioness is stated in her Memoirs to have had a considerable concern in the political affairs of her time, particularly the war of 1756. B. 1722; D. at the palace of Versailles, 1764.

POMPEII, or POMPEIA, pom'-pe-i (Ital. pom-pai'-ye), an ancient city of Italy, at the foot of Mount Vesuvius, buried by an eruption of that mountain in the year 79. Its ruins were discovered in 1755. About two-fifths of them have been cleared; so that, in the contemplation of these ancient remains, there is ample scope for the gratification of antiquarian curiosity.

POMPEY, POMPEIUS, Cneius, pom'-pe, pom-pe'-yus, commonly called, was the son of Pompey, an able general, under whom he acquired the art of war, and with such success, that at the age of 23 he was fitted to command three legions, which he raised at his own expense, and with which he joined Sylla. Three years afterwards he recovered Sicily and Africa, and became so great a favourite with the army that Sylla recalled him. He obeyed the mandate, though his soldiers wished him to resist the orders of the dictator. Sylla received him with expressions of friendship, and saluted him with the appellation of Imperator: he also obtained the honours of a triumph. After the death of Sylla, Pompey compelled Lepidus to quit Rome; and he brought the war against Sertorius in Spain to a victorious conclusion, for which he obtained a second triumph, B.C. 73, and, at the same time, was elected consul. In his consulate he restored the tribunes, exterminated the pirates, gained great advantages over Tigranes and Mithridates, and made numerous conquests in the East. After these exploits he entered Rome, and was honoured with a third triumph. But his glory and vain character procured him many enemies; to counteract whom he joined with Crassus and Cæsar in forming the first triumvirate, B.C. 60. To strengthen this alliance, he married Julia, daughter of Cæsar; but these two great men became rivals, in consequence of Pompey's being created sole consul, B.C. 52. On the death of Julia, he married Cornelia, daughter of Metellus Scipio, whom he associated with him in the consulate. Cæsar held the government of Gaul, when the senate, at the solicitation of Pompey, passed a decree commanding him to quit the army, on pain of being declared an enemy to his country. War now broke out between the two generals, who encountered each other on the plains of Pharsalia, where Pompey was defeated, and fled, but was assassinated on landing in Egypt. B. 106 B.C.; killed, 48 B.C.

POMPEY, Cneius Magnus, elder son of the preceding, endeavoured to avenge his father's murder upon Cæsar; but was defeated at Munda, in Spain, and was shortly afterwards slain, B.C. 45.

POMPEY, Sextus Magnus, younger son of Pompey, waged a successful war against Octavian; but being defeated by the latter in a great sea-fight, B.C. 36, he fled to Asia, and was put to death at the order of Titius, at Miletus, B.C. 35.

POMPIGNAN, John James le Franc, Marquis of, pom'-peen-yawng, a French writer, who was admitted a member of the French Academy in 1760; on which occasion he had the courage to deliver an inaugural discourse in defence of Christianity, which drew upon him a number of satires and lampoons from Voltaire and the other infidels of that society. His works consist of dramatic pieces, sacred odes, moral discourses, a translation of the Georgics, &c. B. at Montauban, 1709; D. 1784.

POMPIGNAN, John George le Franc de, brother of the preceding, was a prelate of the French church. He wrote—"Critical Essay on the Present State of the Republic of Letters;" on the Secular Authority in matters of Religion; "Scepticism convicted by the Prophecies;" "Religion avenged on Incredulity by Incredulity itself." B. at Montauban, 1715; D. 1790.

POMPONATIUS, Peter, pom'-po-nai'-shi-us, a learned Italian, who taught philosophy at Padua and other cities in Italy, with extraordinary reputation. In his book "De Immortalitate Animæ," printed at Bologna, in 1516, he maintained that a future state was no part of the Aristotelian philosophy, but a matter of religious faith. This position occasioned a violent controversy, and Pomponatius, though supported by Cardinal Bembo, was regarded as an atheist. B. at Mantua, 1462; D. 1525.

POMPONIUS LÆTUS, Julius, pom-po'-ni-us, a name given to Peter of Calabria, who went to Rome, where he was distinguished for his talents, till he was falsely accused of conspiring against Pope Paul II. He then retired to Venice; but, after the death of that pontiff, he returned to Rome, where he became suspected of atheism, on account of his enthusiasm for the ancient philosophy. His principal works are, "The Lives of the Cæsars:" editions of Sallust, Pliny the Younger, and some of the works of Cicero; Commentaries on Quintilian, Columella, Virgil, &c. B. in Calabria, 1425; D. 1495.

PONDICHERRY, pon'-de-sher'-re (Fr. PONDICHÉRY, pon'-de-shai'-re), a city on the seacoast of the south of India, and the capital of the French settlement, 83 miles from Madras. It was formerly a village; but being purchased by the French from the king of Bejapore, in the year 1672, it became a handsome and regular town, the houses in general two stories high, with flat roofs, and colonnades in front. Pop. 80,000.—In 1761 it was taken by the army under Colonel Coote, but was restored at the peace of 1763. In 1778 it surrendered to the British force under Sir H. Munro, and was again restored at the peace of 1783. It was again taken in the revolutionary war, and restored at the general peace.—The DISTRICT in which it stands has an area of about 80,000 square miles, and contains 92 villages.

PONIATOWSKI, Joseph, Prince, pon'-e-a-tow'-ske, a distinguished Polish general, who at first served in the Austrian service, and when his countrymen rose against Russia, he fought under Kosciusko; but, upon the defeat of that general, Poniatowski sought a refuge at Vienna. When the French entered Warsaw, in 1806, he was appointed to the command of the Polish army, which was to co-operate with the French against Russia. In 1812 Napoleon gave him the command of the 5th corps of the "grand army," which was composed of Poles. In the subsequent battles he distinguished himself by his skill and bravery, and covered himself with glory in the retreat from Moscow. Shortly before the battle of Leipsic he was created a marshal of France. B. at Warsaw, 1763; drowned in the Elster, 1813.

PONIATOWSKI, Stanislaus, Count, a Polish nobleman, who distinguished himself as general of the Swedish army of Charles XII. It was through his bravery that Charles was enabled to effect his escape after the battle of Pultawa, and afterwards succeeded in winning over the Porte to support the unfortunate monarch against the Russians. He subsequently returned to his native country, where King Augustus created him general of the royal guard and treasurer of Lithuania. He also enjoyed the favour of the elector of Saxony, who had succeeded to the kingdom of Poland. By that monarch he was appointed castellan of Cracow, one of the highest posts in the country. One of his sons became king of Poland, under the name of Stanislaus Augustus. B. 1678; D. 1762.

PONS, pawns, a parish and town of France, in the department Lower Charente, 12 miles from Saintes. It consists of an old and new town, and has a castle and several churches. Pop. 7,000.

PONT, pawng, the prefix to numerous places in France, with populations generally ranging between 1,000 and 7,000.

PONT-A-MOUSSON, moos'-son, a town of France, on the Moselle, 18 miles from Metz. It has a commercial college. Manf. Earthenware. Pop. 8,000.

PONTARLIER, pon-tar'-le-ai, a town of France, on the Doubs, 40 miles from Besançon. Manf. Paper and leather. Pop. 5,000.

PONTE, pont'-tai, two market-towns of Italy, neither with a population above 1,000.

PONTE-CORVO, kor'-vo, a town of the States of the Church, 50 miles from Naples. It has a castle, a cathedral, and other churches. It gave the title of prince to Bernadotte. Pop. 5,200.

PONTEDERA, pon-tai-dai'-ra, a town of Tuscany, 13 miles from Pisa. Manf. Cotton goods. Pop. 3,500.

PONTEFRACT, or POMFRET, pom'-fret, a market-town in the West Riding of Yorkshire, near the river Aire, not far from its junction with the Calder, 21 miles from York. The streets are open, spacious, and clean, and the houses are handsome. It has but one parish church, which is of great antiquity, being mentioned so early as the reign of Henry I. The church of All Saints, or All Hallows, which was formerly the parish church, is now a ruin. There are, besides, places of worship for various religious denominations, a charity school, hospitals, and the king's free grammar-school. It has, besides, a town-hall, theatre, and a new market-hall, opened in 1860, by Lord Palmerston. But a small part of the ruins of Pontefract Castle are now in existence. It was finished in 1080; but was, after three successive and desperate sieges, taken and demolished by the parliamentary army. In it Richard II. died; and, by order of Richard III., Rivers, Grey, and Vaughan were put to death in it. It has a trade in corn, malt, filtering-stones, and garden produce. Pop. 12,000. It has a station on the Yorkshire and Lancashire Railway.

PONTE LAGOSCURO, la'-gos-koo'-ro, a town of Italy, in the States of the Church, 4 miles from Ferrara. Pop. 6,000.

PONTE STURA, stoo'-ra, a town of Italy, at the junction of the Stura and the Po, 7 miles from Casale. Pop. 2,000.

PONTIAC, a township of the United States, in Michigan, 25 miles from Detroit. Pop. 3,000.—It is connected by railway with Detroit.

PONTIANAK, pon'-te-a-nak', the principal of the Dutch settlements on the W. coast of Borneo, on the left bank of the river Campuas. It has a fort, and exports pepper, gold-dust, and edible birdsnests. Pop. 20,000, of whom half are Malays.

PONTIFICAL STATES. (See STATES OF THE CHURCH.)

PONTINE MARSHES, THE, pon'-teen, an extensive marshy tract of Italy, in the southern part of the Campagna di Roma, extending from Cisterna in the north, to Terracina in the south, a distance of 25 miles. The region is very fertile, but singularly pestilential. From the time of the Romans, efforts have been made to drain it, with the view of rendering the atmosphere less dangerous. It is traversed by the road from Rome to Naples.

PONTIUS PILATE. (See PILATE, Pontius.)

PONTIVY, or BOURBON-LA-VILLE, pon'-te-ve, a town of France, in the department of Morbihan, on the Blavet, 30 miles from Vannes. Manf. Chiefly leather and iron tools. Pop. 8,000.

PONTOISE, pon-twawse', a parish and town of France, in the department of the Seine-et-Oise, 20 miles from Paris. Manf. Chemicals. Pop. 7,000. This place was twice taken by the English, in 1419 and 1437.

PONTOPPIDAN, Eric, pont-op'-pi-dan, an eminent Danish divine, who was professor of theology in the university of Copenhagen, and, in 1747, became bishop of Bergen. He wrote extensively upon the history and antiquities of his country. The most important of his works were,—"A History of the Reformation in Denmark," and another upon the History, Antiquities, and Migrations of the old Danish races. B. in Jutland, about 1700; D. at Bergen, 1764.

PONTREMOLI, pon-trai-mo'-le, a fortified town of Italy, in Tuscany, 40 miles from Parma. Manf. Silks and linens. Pop. 5,000.

PONTYPOOL, pon'-ti-pool, a market-town of Monmouthshire, 8 miles from Newport. It consists of two principal streets, and owes its origin entirely to the mineral riches with which the neighbourhood abounds. Pop. 4,000, chiefly occupied in large coal- and iron-works. It is connected by railway with Newport.

POOLE, Matthew, pool, a learned English nonconformist minister, who was educated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge, where he took his degrees in arts, and having entered into orders, according to the Presbyterian mode, became rector of St. Michael-le-Querne, London, of which he was deprived at the Restoration, for nonconformity. Besides sermons, he wrote "Annotations on the Bible," in English; but his greatest work was the "Synopsis Criticorum," or a collection of elucidations on the Scripture, by different authors. B. at York, about 1624; D. at Amsterdam, 1679.

POOLE, a market-town and seaport of Dorsetshire, on a peninsula connected with the mainland by a narrow isthmus, 18 miles from Dorchester. It consists of four principal streets, and a fifth crossing these, together with several minor streets or lanes. It has a church, town-hall, market-house, several grammar and charity schools, an exchange, custom-house, workhouse, and public library. Poole harbour is one of the best in the English Channel for merchant-ships. The principal branch of business consists in the Newfoundland fishery. A trade is also carried on to the Baltic, Norway, America, and Portugal. Near the mouth of the harbour is a bank, on which are vast quantities of oysters. Pop. about 7,000.—It has a station on the London and South-Western Railway.

POONAH, poo'-na, a city of British India, capital of a district of the same name, 75 miles from Bombay. It is a modern town, and not fortified; but covers about two miles square of ground. The streets are long and narrow, but the houses are very irregularly built. The better kind are raised, with large blocks of granite, to the height of about 14 feet; after which the superstructure is composed of timber frames, with slight brick walls. The houses of the common people are only one story high, with tiled roofs. The palace is surrounded by high and thick brick walls, with round towers at the angles, and has only one entrance, which is through a pointed arch. Pop. 76,000.—The DISTRICT has an area of 5,298 square miles. Pop. 670,000.

POORUNDER, poo'-run-der, a town and fortress of Hindostan, province of Guzerat. It is large and populous. Lat. 21° 39′ N. Lon. 69° 48′ E.

POPAYAN, po-pa-yan', a city of S. America, New Grenada, situate on an extensive plain, 5,905 feet above the level of the sea, about 3 miles from the Cauca river. The streets are all in straight lines, regular, broad, and level; and the buildings have mostly only one story, and are very handsome. There are some pretty small squares in the town, and a beautiful grand square. It has a cathedral, and several convents and churches, with two nunneries. It is also the seat of the royal mint. Pop. 20,000. Lat. 2° 28′ 38″ N. Lon. 76° 36′ W.

POPE, Alexander, pope, a celebrated English poet, whose father was a linendraper in the Strand. His parents being of the Roman Catholic persuasion, he was placed, at eight years of age, under a priest named Taverner, who taught him the rudiments of the Latin and Greek languages. Meeting with Ogilby's Homer about this time, he was so much pleased with the work that it became his favourite book; and when he was at school, at the age of 10, he turned some of the events of Homer into a play, which was performed by the upper boys, the master's gardener representing Ajax. At the age of 12 he retired with his parents to Binfield, in Windsor Forest, where his father had purchased an estate. Here he formed his intention of becoming a poet, and wrote his "Ode on Solitude," which appears as the first-fruits of his poetic genius. It was here also that he first met with the works of Waller, Spencer, and Dryden; but, on perusing Dryden, he abandoned the rest, and studied him as a model. In his 16th year he wrote his Pastorals; the "Essay on Criticism," "Rape of the Lock," and "Windsor Forest," quickly following. The "Essay on Criticism," notwithstanding the youth of the author, is one of the finest poems in the language, and contains the soundest rules; but his genius shone to a greater advantage in his "Rape of the Lock," founded on the circumstance of Lord Petre's cutting off a lock of Mrs. Fermor's hair. About 1713, the poet being then in his 25th year, he published proposals for a translation of the "Iliad," in which he met with such great encouragement, that he was enabled to purchase a house at Twickenham, whither he removed with his parents in 1715. After completing the "Iliad," he undertook the "Odyssey," for which also he obtained a liberal subscription. He was, however, materially assisted in this work by the learning and abilities of Broome and Fenton. In 1721 Pope published an edition of Shakspere. The reputation which he had acquired by the success as well as the merit of his works, procured him numerous enemies among writers of the minor classes, from whom he experienced frequent splenetic attacks. His temper was too irritable and too little under control to permit his taking no notice of them; and in 1728 he vented his resentment in a mock heroic, entitled "The Dunciad," in which he took more than warrantable revenge, and, what was worse, exposed to ridicule many worthy and gifted individuals who had given him no offence. In 1733, by the advice of Lord Bolingbroke, he employed his pen upon a moral and philosophical subject, the result of which was his "Essay on Man," an ethical poem addressed to that statesman. Of this work it is needless to speak; for, whatever may be thought of its leading principle, it possesses refined thoughts and substantial beauties. He next wrote satires, in which he attacked several persons of rank. Pope was engaged in preparing a complete edition of his works when he was carried off by asthma. In person Pope was small and crooked; yet there was much animation and elegance in his countenance, except when he was labouring under his hereditary complaint, the headache. His friendships appear to have been capricious, and he had no small portion of vanity in his disposition; to which, and self-interest, almost all considerations were readily sacrificed The best editions of Pope are Warburton's, in 9 volumes, and those of Bowles and Roscoe. The latest and best memoir of the poet was recently brought out under the auspices of J. W. Croker and Mr. Peter Cunningham. B. in London, 1688; D. 1744.

POPE, Sir Thomas, a patron of learning. He received his education at Eton school, and afterwards studied the law. At the age of 28 he became treasurer of the Court of Augmentations, and was shortly afterwards appointed visitor of religious houses, in which situation he conducted himself with moderation. In 1540 he was knighted and made master of the jewel-house in the Tower. He was the intimate friend of Sir Thomas More, to whom, by order of the king, he communicated the sad tidings of his intended execution. In 1554 he founded Trinity College, Oxford. B. at Dedington, Oxfordshire, 1508; D. in London, 1558.

POPEDOM. (See PONTIFICAL STATES.)

POPERINGEN, po-per-ing'-en (Fr. POPERINGUE, po-pe-rĭng'), a town of Belgium, in West Flanders, 6 miles from Ypres. It contains several well-built churches. Manf. Coarse woollens and serges. Pop. 11,200.

POPLAR, pop'-lar, a hamlet of Middlesex, 4¼ miles from St. Paul's Cathedral, London. It comprises the East and West-India Docks, and the almshouses of the widows of the servants of the East-India Company. Pop. about 30,000.

POPO, po'-po, a cluster of islands in the Asiatic archipelago, the chief of which is 50 miles in circuit. Pro. Sago, cocoa-nuts, and salt. Pop. Unascertained. Lat. 1° 15′ S. Lon. 129° 45′ E.

POPOLI, po'-po-le, a town of Naples, on the Pescara, 8 miles from Salmona. Pop. 4,000.

POPPÆA SABINA, pop-pe'-a sa-bi'-na. The most celebrated of the name was a Roman matron, who married a Roman knight, by whom she had a son. Her personal charms captivated Otho, who was then one of Nero's favourites. He carried her away, and married her; but Nero, who had seen her accomplishments, soon deprived him of her, and sent him out of Italy. After he had taken this step, Nero repudiated his wife Octavia, and married Poppæa. The cruelty of the emperor did not, however, long permit her to share the imperial dignity. She died of a kick which she received from him when advanced in pregnancy, about the 65th year of the Christian era.

POPPI, pop'-pe, a town of Italy, on the Arno, 25 miles from Florence. It has a palace, a convent, churches, public library, hospital, and theatre. Pop. 6,000.

PORCHESTER. (See PORTCHESTER.)

PORDENONE, John Anthony Licinio Regillo, por-dai-no'-nai, an eminent Italian painter, so called from the place of his birth. He was the disciple of Giorgione, and the rival of Titian. The emperor Charles V. conferred on him the honour of knighthood. B. at Pordenone, Friuli, 1483; D. 1539.

POROS, po'-ros, a small island of Greece, 7 miles from that of Ægina. Pop. Unascertained.—It has a small town of the same name, where were held the conferences which settled the new Greek monarchy of 1828.

PORPHYRY, por'-fi-re (PORPHERIUS, por-fir'-i-us), a Platonic philosopher, who studied eloquence at Athens, under Longinus; and philosophy at Rome, under Plotinus, whose life he wrote. His learning was great, and he composed many works, one of which, against the Scriptures, was burnt by order of Theodosius the Great. B. at Tyre, 233; D. at Rome, 304.

PORPHYROGENITUS, por-fi-ro-jen'-i-tus. (See CONSTANTINE IX., or VII.)

PORPHYROGENITUS, the name borne by the children of the emperors of the East (see CONSTANTINE), either because they were swathed in a robe of purple at their birth, or because they were born in a chamber hung with purple, to which the empresses of the East retired at the period of their accouchement.

PORSENNA, or PORSENA, por-sen'-na or por'-se-na, a lar, or great lord, of Etruria, who declared war against the Romans because they refused to restore Tarquin to his throne. At first successful, he would have entered the gates of Rome, had not Horatius Cocles stood at the head of a bridge, and resisted the fury of the whole Etrurian army, while his companions behind were cutting off the communication with the opposite shore. (See COCLES, Horatius.) This act of bravery astonished Porsenna; but when he had seen Mutius Scævola, who had entered his camp with the intention of murdering him, burn his hand without emotion, to convince him of his fortitude, he no longer dared to make head against so brave a people. He made a peace with the Romans, and never after supported the claims of Tarquin. The story of Porsenna's attack upon Rome forms the subject of one of Lord Macaulay's stirring "Lays of Ancient Rome."

PORSON, Richard, por'-son, a celebrated Greek scholar, who was the son of a parish clerk in Norfolk. Through the liberality of Mr. Wilton, a gentleman of that county, he was enabled to pursue his studies at Eton. A similar act of liberality on the part of Sir George Baker was the means of his proceeding to Cambridge, where he pursued his career in a most distinguished manner till, in 1790, he was unanimously elected regius professor of Greek. Until the establishment of the London Institution, Porson struggled with poverty, having only the £40 a year afforded by his professorship to subsist upon; but on being appointed chief librarian to the last-named institution, with a salary of £200 per annum, his circumstances became comparatively easy. Although one of the greatest scholars England has produced, Porson published very little, his Tracts and Miscellaneous Criticisms upon the Greek Writers, and his edition of the "Lexicon of Photius," being his most important efforts. B. at East Ruston, Norfolk, 1759; D. 1808.

PORT, port, a prefix to the names of numerous towns and places in all parts of the globe.

PORTAGE, por'-taij, a county of the United States, in Ohio. Area, 648 square miles. Pop. 25,000.—Also the name of several townships, none of them with a population above 5,000.

PORT ANTONIO, ăn-to'-ni-o, a harbour on the N.E. coast of Jamaica.

PORT AU PRINCE, or PORT REPUBLICAN, o-prăns or o-prince, a seaport town of the island of Hispaniola, situate on the W. coast, at the head of the Bay of Gonaives. It is the seat of the superior courts in Hayti, and of most of the foreign trade. Pop. 28,000. Lat. 18° 35′ N. Lon. 72° 18′ W. In 1770 great part of it was destroyed by an earthquake; in 1791 it was set on fire; and in 1794 it was taken by the English.

PORT ESSINGTON, es'-sing-ton, a bay of N. Australia, on the E. side of Coburg Peninsula. Lat. 11° 22′ 3″ S. Lon. 132° 10′ 7″ E. A settlement was, in 1839, founded here; but, on account of the insalubrity of the climate, was abandoned in 1845.

PORT JACKSON, jăk'-son, a bay and English settlement on the E. coast of N. S. Wales, Australia. The entrance is between two heads, which are distant from each other 1¾ mile. Lat. 33° 51′ 45″ S. Lon. of Cattle Point, 151° 11′ 49″ E. Sydney is on the E. side of this port.

PORT LOUIS, loo'-e, a seaport of France, in the department of the Morbihan, at the mouth of the Blavet, 3 miles from Lorient. Pop. 2,700.

PORT LOUIS, loo'-is or loo'-e, a seaport town, capital of the island of Mauritius, or the Isle of France, in the Indian Sea. After having been long the chief settlement of the French in this part of the world, it fell into the possession of the British. It is situate on the west side of the island, in a low and flat valley. The houses of the town are built chiefly of wood. The quays are commodious, both for the loading and unloading of vessels. Pop. 35,000. In 1817, Port Louis was almost entirely burnt to the ground, but has been since rebuilt. Lat. 20° 10′ S. Lon. 57° 32′ E.

PORT MACQUARRIE, măk-quar'-re, an inlet on the E. coast of Australia, into which enters the Hastings. Lat. 31° 25′ S. Lon. 152° 53′ E.

PORT MAHON, ma-hon', a seaport of the island of Minorca, and the chief place of a district. It is surrounded by the sea on the east, south, and west sides, and is built chiefly on lofty rocks. The houses are in general good, all being provided with cisterns, and many with terraces. The place d'armes is square, large, and handsome: on one side are barracks capable of containing 1,200 men. The Alameyda is the only public walk, and is merely an alley of trees. It has a good harbour, on one side of which is a dockyard, and on the other a natural mole. Pop. 13,000. Lat. 36° 17′ N. Lon. 4° 5′ E. The English have several times captured this place, but, in 1802, it was finally ceded to Spain.

PORT NATAL, na-tăl', an inlet of Natal, in E. Africa. Lat. 29° 53′ S. Lon. 31° 2′ E.

PORT OF SPAIN, the principal town of the island of Trinidad, on its W. coast, near the mouth of the Carony river. It is mostly built of stone and brick. Pop. 12,000. Lat. 38° 6′ N. Lon. 61° 32′ W.

PORT PATRICK, păt'-rik, a town and parish of Scotland, on the coast of the Irish Sea, being the nearest point of Great Britain to Ireland, 6½ miles from Stranraer. The town is delightfully situate, and is much frequented during the summer months. The harbour has one of the finest quays in Britain, with a reflecting lighthouse. It has no manufactures. Pop. 2,000. This place was long famous as the "Gretna Green" of Ireland.

PORT PHILLIP, fil'-ip, a bay on the S. coast of Australia. It receives the Yarra-Yarra, on the banks of which is Melbourne, the capital of Victoria. At the W. side is an inlet, near the head of which is the town of Geelong. Lat. 38° 18′ S. Lon. 144° 47′ 7″ E.

PORT ROYAL, roi'-al, a seaport of the island of Jamaica, situate on the south side of the island, on a narrow neck of land, in which a thousand sail of ships could anchor with the greatest convenience and safety. It contains the royal navy yard, for heaving down and refitting the queen's ships; the navy hospital, and barracks for a regiment of soldiers. The fortifications are kept in excellent order, and are remarkably strong. Pop. 15,000. Lat. 17° 50′ N. Lon. 77° W.

PORT STEPHENS, ste'-fens, an island of New South Wales, 18 miles from Port Hunter. It runs 15 miles inland, and has a breadth of 5. On its banks is Carrington, the capital of the county of Gloucester.

PORTA, John Baptist, por'-ta, a learned Neapolitan writer, who invented the camera obscura, and acquired a great reputation by his works on science, particularly mathematics, medicine, and natural history. He held assemblies of learned men in his house, which were condemned by the court of Rome, on the absurd charge that the object of their meetings was the discussion of magic. Some writers have claimed for Porta the discovery of the telescope; but the most competent critics admit that Galileo is the only person to whom that honour is due. His principal works are,—treatises on Natural Magic, in Latin; another on Physiognomy, mixed with astrology, and other delusions of his age. B. at Naples, about 1550; D. at the same city, 1615.

PORTA, James della, a celebrated Italian architect, who built the Gregorian chapel, several fine churches, and other structures, and finished the cupola of St. Peter's at Rome, in 1590. The Villa Aldobrandini, now called Belvedere, is one of his best works. B. at Milan, about 1530; D. at Rome, about 1595.—His nephew, William della Porta, was an eminent sculptor, and restored the legs of the Farnese Hercules.

PORTAL, Antony, por'-tal, an eminent Italian physician, who went to reside at Paris, and there became the friend of Buffon, a member of the Academy of Sciences, professor at the College of France, and president of the Academy of Medicine. At the restoration he was appointed consulting physician to the king. He was an industrious writer, his most important publication being a "History of Anatomy and Surgery," first produced in 1773. B. 1742; D. at Paris, 1832.

PORTARLINGTON, por-tar'-ling-ton, a well-built town of Ireland, on the Barrow, partly in King's County and partly in Queen's County, 40 miles from Dublin. Manf. Leather, tobacco, soap, and candles. Pop. 3,000. It has a station on the great S. and W. Railway.

PORTCHESTER, port'-ches-ter, a village and parish of England, noted for its ancient castle, 4 miles from Portsmouth. Pop. 800. It was one of the principal cities previous to the Roman conquest.

PORTER, Anna Maria, por'-ter, an English novelist, who, while a child, residing with her mother at Edinburgh, made the acquaintance of Sir Walter Scott, then in his youth. Her first attempts in fiction are said to have sprung from the suggestions of the future novelist, who used to relate stories to her. Her chief works are, "The Hungarian Brothers," "The Recluse of Norway," "The Village of Mariendorpt," and "The Knight of St. John." She was also the authoress of a collection of ballad-romances, and other poems. B. at Durham, about 1781; D. near Bristol, 1832.

PORTER, Jane, an English novelist, was the sister of the preceding, and the authoress of "The Scottish Chiefs," "Thaddeus of Warsaw," "The Pastor's Fireside," "The Field of Forty Footsteps," &c. These novels display certain powers of description and skill in construction; but enjoy, at the present time, but little of the great popularity they once had. B. 1776; D. at Bristol, 1850.

PORTER, Sir Robert Ker, an English painter, and the brother of the two preceding novelists. He produced some battle-pieces of an extraordinary size. His "Storming of Seringapatam," exhibited in the Strand in 1800, was 120 feet in length; "The Siege of Acre" and "The Battle of Agincourt" (hung in the Guildhall), were also of large dimensions. In 1804 he was appointed historical painter to the emperor of Russia, and painted upon the walls of the Admiralty, at St. Petersburg, "Peter the Great planning the Port of Cronstadt and St. Petersburg." He went to Spain in 1808, and accompanied the army of Sir John Moore until the battle of Corunna: he was also a spectator of the great Russian campaign of Napoleon while in Russia, an account of which he published on his return to England. In 1813 he was created a knight by the prince-regent. During the interval 1817-20 he travelled with his wife, the Princess Mary de Sherbatoff, in Georgia, Persia, and Armenia, and published a work on that tour in 1822. Several years later he obtained the appointment of British consul at Venezuela, which post he filled until the year 1841. During the concluding years of his life he painted few pictures, and those chiefly upon sacred subjects. B. at Durham, 1775; D. at St. Petersburg, 1842.

PORTER, George Richardson, an eminent statistical writer, who was educated for a commercial career; but meeting with ill-success in trade, he resolved to devote himself to statistical literature. In 1832 he received an appointment at the Board of Trade, and, in his various employments therein, displayed so much energy and intelligence, that he rose to a secretaryship of the board, at a salary of £1,500 per annum, in 1841. He was one of the founders of the Statistical Society, and a constant contributor to its Journal. To the same body he was also elected treasurer, upon the retirement of Mr. Hallam in 1841. His most important work, entitled "The Progress of the Nation," was commenced in 1836, and completed about 1840; but several new and enlarged editions were subsequently put forth. His other works were a translation of Bastiat's "Popular Fallacies regarding General Interests," a section of "The Admiralty Manual of Scientific Engineering," edited by Sir J. F. Herschel, and a portion of the "Geography of Great Britain," published by the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge; and the "Tropical Agriculturist." B. in London, 1792; D. at Tonbridge Wells, 1855.

PORTICI, por-te'-che, a town of Naples, in the Terra di Lavoro, at the foot of Mount Vesuvius, 4 miles from Naples. It has a royal palace, adorned with pictures and frescoes from the walls of Pompeii; a museum of antique statues, bronze arms, and furniture, also taken from the buried cities. Manf. Ribbons. Pop. 6,500.

PORTLAND, port'-land, a township of Victoria, Australia, 170 miles from Melbourne. It is increasing very fast.

PORTLAND, a town and port of entry of the United States, in Maine, 50 miles from Augusta. It is finely situate on a peninsula in Casco Bay, and contains an elegant court-house, almshouse, a market-house, churches, a theatre, and Athenæum. It has a good harbour, near the entrance of which is a stone lighthouse. It is also defended by two forts on opposite sides of the ship channel. Pop. 24,000.

PORTLAND ISLANDS, in the Eastern Ocean. The north-east point of the most eastern isle is in lat. 2° 36′ S., lon. 147° 18′ 45″ E.—2. An island near the east coast of New Zealand.—3. One of Queen Charlotte's Islands, in the South Pacific Ocean.

PORTLAND ISLE, a small island, or rather peninsula, of Dorsetshire, in the English Channel, opposite Weymouth. It is connected with the mainland by a very singular ridge of pebbles, called the Chesil Bank, which extends 11 miles westwards from the island, along the coast, and at no great distance from it, being separated by a long narrow channel called the Fleet. The island consists nearly of one continued mass of freestone, and this forms the famous Portland stone, of which such quantities are exported to the metropolis and other places. Two lighthouses are erected on the island. Pop. 5,200. Lat. 50° 31′ N. Lon. 2° 26′ W.

PORTLOCK, Lieut.-General Joseph Ellison, port'-lok, an eminent modern geologist, and president of the Geological Society. As lieutenant of the Royal Engineers, he formed one of the members of the Trigonometrical Survey in Ireland, which was commenced in 1825. During several years he exhibited in that capacity the highest qualities of a scientific officer, and not only discharged his duties as a military surveyor to the complete satisfaction of his superiors, but also collected a mass of information on geology, antiquities, &c., which were of the utmost value. Having been sent to Corfu, he made himself acquainted with the geology of that island, and transmitted his knowledge to the Geological Society. He wrote treatises on Geology, Geognosy, and Palæontology, and contributed papers on the duties of his profession to several scientific publications. B. about 1800.

PORTO. (See OPORTO.)

PORTO, a prefix to the names of several places in Brazil, the largest with a population of 12,000, 160 miles from Rio Grande.

PORTOBELLO, port-to-bel'-lo, a seaport-town and summer resort of Scotland, 3 miles from Edinburgh. Pop. 4,000.—It has a station on the North British Railway.

PORTO (or PUERTO) BELLO, port-to bel'-lo, or pwair'-to bel'-yo, a seaport of South America, on the north coast of the Isthmus of Darien, with an excellent harbour, 40 miles from Panama. It stands near the sea, on the side of a mountain which embraces the harbour, the entrance of which is defended by a castle called Todo Hierro, or All Iron. The place has greatly declined. Pop. 1,500.—Porto Bello was taken in 1596 by Sir Francis Drake, who died in a subsequent voyage in its narbour. It was taken and plundered by John Morgan, and, in 1739, by Admiral Vernon.

PORTO DE NAOS, dai-nai'-os, a harbour on the S. coast of Lancerota, one of the Canaries.

PORTO ERCOLE, air'-ko-lai, a small town of Italy, in Tuscany, 30 miles from Civita Vecchia. Pop. Unascertained.

PORTO FERRAJO, fer-ra'-yo, the capital town of the Island of Elba, on a lofty point of land projecting into a bay. Pop. 4,500.—It was the residence of Bonaparte, after his first abdication of the throne of France, in 1814.

PORTO MAURICIA, ma-ou-re'-cha, a town of Sardinia, 2 miles from Oneglia. Pop. 10,000.

PORTO RICO, re'-ko, one of the Spanish West-India islands, situate 60 miles to the eastward of Hispaniola. Area, 3,750 square miles. Desc. Extremely fertile, and enjoying all the benefits of the most temperate climate, being beautifully diversified with woods, hills, and valleys, and well watered with a variety of streams. Its meadows are very rich. It produces all the different fruits which are common in the West Indies. Its principal trade consists in sugar, ginger, hides, and cotton, both raw and manufactured, cassia, mastic, salt, indigo, coffee, dye-wood, tobacco, oranges, lemons, and sweetmeats. Pop. 300,000. Lat. between 17° 56′ and 18° 32′ N. Lon. between 65° 40′ and 67° 20′ W.

PORTO RICO, ST. JUAN DE, the capital of the island of Porto Rico, on a peninsula on the north coast of the island, with a good harbour, defended by a citadel and castle. It has a bishop's palace, a cathedral, custom-house, town-house, arsenal, theatre, and gaol. Pop. 30,000. Lat. 18° 29′ N. Lon. 66° 7′ 2″ W.

PORTO SANTO, san'-to, a small island in the Atlantic, a sort of appendage to the island of Madeira, from which it is distant 26 miles. Desc. Mountainous and volcanic. Pro. Maize, barley, fruits, and wine. Pop. 6,000.

PORTO VECCHIO, port-to vek'-kyo, a fortified town in the island of Corsica, on a gulf of the same name, with an excellent harbour, 15 miles from Bonifacio. Pop. 2,100. On account of the neighbouring marshes to this place, it is almost abandoned by its inhabitants during the summer months.

PORTREE, port-ree', a town and parish of Scotland, in Inverness-shire, in the island of Sky. The town is small, but thriving, and admirably adapted for trade and the fisheries. The parish comprises the E. part of the island and the islands of Rasay, Rona, and Fladda. Pop. 4,000. Lat. 57° 24′ N. Lon. 6° 7′ W.

PORTSEA. (See PORTSMOUTH.)

PORTSEA ISLAND, port'-see, lies between Portsmouth and Langston harbours. Ext. 4 miles long, and the same breadth. It is level and fertile, and contains the towns of Portsea and Portsmouth.

PORTSMOUTH, ports'-mouth, a fortified maritime town of Hants, and the principal naval station of England, 95 miles from London. It is situate on the western side of the island of Portsea, at the mouth of the bay termed Portsmouth Harbour, and is the most perfect fortress in Britain. It consists of the old town of Portsmouth, included within its walls, and the new town of Portsea, which has outgrown in size, population, and importance, the parent town itself. In the Portsmouth division, the principal public buildings connected with naval affairs, are the victualling-office, the government-house, the houses of the lieutenant-governor and port-admiral, and the marine and military barracks. The church is a spacious structure, with a tower; and there are other churches and places of religious worship for different denominations. Besides these, there are the town-hall, a prison, the custom-house, a large and convenient building, with an extensive establishment, including fast-sailing cutters for the prevention of smuggling; various charitable institutions, a theatre, barracks, green-room, ball-rooms, workhouse, philosophical society, mechanics' institute, female penitentiary, St. Paul's Academy, general hospital, and grammar-school. Portsmouth is the seat of the civil and military establishments, the residence of the port-admiral; and its civil jurisdiction extends over Portsea, though the latter contains the vast establishments of the dockyards and gun-wharf, which form, together with the harbour and the fortifications, the most striking features in the town. Portsmouth harbour excels decidedly every other in Great Britain for its capaciousness, depth, and security. At its entrance at Portsmouth it is very narrow, but it soon expands to a great width, and extends, in several branches, up to Fareham, Porchester, and Port-bridge. Everywhere the anchorage is good, the depth sufficient for ships of any size, the shelter complete, and the extent sufficient to contain almost the whole navy of England. Another capital advantage is the neighbourhood of the roadstead of Spithead, between Portsmouth and the Isle of Wight, which is so spacious, that it can contain 1,000 sail of vessels in the greatest security. The harbour is completely defended by the number and strength of its batteries, which have been improved, extended, and strengthened up to the present time. The works are so elevated as to command the whole of the adjacent country. The dockyard being the grand naval arsenal of England, and the general rendezvous of the British fleet, is by far the largest in the kingdom. The sea wharf wall of the dockyard extends along the western shore of the harbour, and includes an area of 100 acres. In the centre of the wharf wall, facing the harbour, is the entrance into the great basin, including an area of 2½ acres. Into this basin open four excellent dry docks; and, on each of its sides, is a dry dock opening into the harbour, all of them capable of receiving ships of the largest class. Besides these, there is a double dock for frigates. Here is also a camber or canal, with a wharf wall on each side, and of sufficient width to admit transports and merchant ships bringing stores to the dockyard. In the same face of the yard are three building-slips, capable of receiving the largest ships, and a small one for sloops; besides two building-slips for frigates on the northern face of the yard, and a smaller one for sloops. The dockyard is entered from the town through a lofty gateway, beyond which the porter's house, the mast-houses, and a large guard-house, are the first objects that present themselves. A little farther on stands the pay-office; beyond it is the royal naval college, and fronting this, is the school of naval architecture. Next to these buildings, the commissioner's house appears, and to it succeeds an immense range of storehouses, the anchor wharf, where hundreds of anchors are piled up ready for immediate service, the ropery, the smithery, the rigging-house and sail-loft, the hemp-houses and the sea-store houses, the tarring-house, and other appendages of the ropery. In short, everything necessary to the constructing, rigging, and outfitting of the navy is here to be found. There is, also, an armory capable of containing 20,000 stand of arms. Pop. including borough and parish of Portsea, 73,000. Lat. 50° 48′ N. Lon. 1° 6′ W. Portsmouth received its first charter from Richard Cœur de Lion, and is a place of considerable antiquity. The earliest mention of it occurs in the Saxon Chronicle, A.D. 501. Edward IV. surrounded it with fortifications, which were greatly extended afterwards by succeeding monarchs. It has a station on the Brighton and South-Coast Railway, also on a branch of the London and South-Western Railway. It communicates with Gosport by a floating bridge across the harbour, and by steam-packets with Ryde, Cowes, Southampton, Plymouth, Havre, and Dublin.

PORTSMOUTH, a town and port of entry of the United States, New Hampshire, on the Piscataqua river, 52 miles from Boston. It contains a court-house, a gaol, an almshouse, an academy, an Athenæum, various churches; and the harbour is one of the best in the United States. The entrance is defended by several forts, and there is a lighthouse. It has suffered severely by fire. Pop. 10,000.—In the Piscataqua, opposite to the town, is Navy Island, on which there is a United States navy-yard.

PORTSMOUTH, a pleasant and regularly-built town of the United States, in Norfolk county, Virginia, on Elizabeth river, 85 miles from Richmond. It has a court-house, military academy, Masonic hall, and a theatre. Pop. 7,000.—This town has a suburb called Gosport, in which is a U.S. naval yard.—Also the name of several other small towns in the United States.

PORTSMOUTH HARBOUR. (See PORTSMOUTH.)

PORTSOY, port'-soi, a considerable seaport of Scotland, in Banffshire, on a point of land projecting into the Moray Firth, which forms a safe harbour, 7 miles from Banff. Manf. Thread and fine linens, and it sends out a number of vessels to the fishery. Pop. 2,300. Lat. 57° 38′ N. Lon. 2° 36′ W.

PORTUGAL, por'-tu-gal (Port. por-too-gal'), the most western kingdom of Europe, forming the W. portion of the Iberian peninsula, is bounded by Spain and the Atlantic. Area, 35,268 square miles. Political Divisions. These consist of six provinces:—Douro, Minto, Tras-os-Montes, Beira, Estremadura, Alentejo, and Algarve. Desc. The country generally inclines from N.E. to S.W. Several of the great mountain-chains of Spain intersect it from east to west, and terminate in large promontories in the Atlantic. The most remarkable of these chains is the Serra de Estrella, nearly in the centre of Portugal. This chain is a continuation of the Serra do Gata, and culminates in an elevation of 7,524 feet above the level of the sea. Another chain is the Serra de Monchique, the extremity of which, Cape St. Vincent, is the south-west point, not only of Portugal, but of Europe. Rivers. The principal are the Tagus, the Douro, the Minho, and the Guadiana. These all enter the country from Spain, and with the Mondego and the Saddo, which have their sources in Portugal, flow W. to the Atlantic Ocean. Lakes. None. Climate. Healthy, except in the vicinity of salt-marshes and on parts of the banks of the Tagus and Mondego. Pro. Wheat, barley, oats, flax, hemp, vines, and maize in the elevated tracts; rice in the low grounds, with olives, oranges, lemons, citrons, figs, and almonds. Silk is made of very good quality. There are extensive forests of oak in the N., chestnut in the centre, and the sea-pine and cork in the S. Oxen are employed as beasts of draught, and mules and asses as those of burden. Cattle, sheep, goats, and swine are numerous, and fish abound in the rivers and on the coasts. Minerals. Iron-mines are worked, and the mountains abound in fine marble, and contain traces of gold and silver. Of salt, large quantities are formed in bays along the coast, by natural evaporation. There are numerous salt-marshes, and upwards of 200 mineral springs. Manf. Limited; principally consisting of woollens, silk, and earthenware. Cotton-spinning is followed, and paper, glass, and gunpowder, are made in a few places. For a long time past the import and export trade has been managed chiefly by foreign merchants, particularly British, settled at Lisbon and Oporto. Exp. These consist almost entirely of wine, salt, and wool. Imp. Various; such as corn, flour, fish, woollens, linen, cotton, lace, hardware, hats, shoes, stockings, &c. The higher classes are divided into the Titulados, or high nobility, and the Fidalgos, or gentry. The women in the capital are loose and dissolute; in the country the people are indolent and listless. They are temperate in eating and drinking; and among the national amusements, the predilection for bull-fights is strong. A want of cleanliness is equally complained of in the capital and in the provincial towns. Rel. Roman Catholic; but all others are tolerated. Gov. A limited monarchy. The national assembly is called the Cortes, and consists of a house of Deputies and a house of Peers. Pop. 3,500,000. Lat. between 36° 57′ and 42° 8′ N. Lon. between 6° 15′ and 9° 32′ W.—Portugal forms the greater part of the ancient Lusitania, and was known, at least along its coast, to the Phœnicians and Carthaginians. It constituted a Roman province under Augustus, and was overrun by tribes of Alani, Suevi, and Visigoths. In the 8th century it was subjected by the Moors, who in the 13th century were expelled from the kingdom. Portugal afterwards became a great naval power, her navigators making many discoveries in Africa, and finding the maritime route to India. In 1807 a French army occupied Lisbon, and the royal family removed the seat of government to Brazil, which was in their possession till 1826. The government of Portugal was formerly despotic, everything being in the power of the king. But a revolution took place in 1816, which originated with the army, the soldiers declaring their attachment to a free constitution, and their resolution to submit no longer to the despotism. A free government was accordingly organized, and was proceeding very peaceably with various important reforms, both civil and ecclesiastical, when, after the entrance of the French troops into Spain, in 1823, a counter-revolution took place, and from 1827 to 1833 the throne was occupied by the usurper Don Miguel. In 1836 several changes took place, and the present constitution was established. The foreign possessions of Portugal are now limited to the Azores, Madeira, Cape Verd Islands; Goa, in Hindostan; and Macao, in China.

PORTUS, Francis, por'-tus, an eminent Greek professor, who filled the chair of classical literature at Padua, Modena, and Ferrara. Having embraced the reformed faith, he quitted Italy and went to Geneva, where he obtained a professorship in 1562. His works are, additions to the Greek Dictionary of Constantine; commentaries upon Pindar, Thucydides, Longinus, Xenophon, and other ancient authors. B. in the island of Crete, 1511; D. at Geneva, 1581.

PORUS, por'-us, king of part of India, near the river Hydaspes, on the banks of which he was defeated by Alexander, who asking him how he would wish to be treated,—"As a king," said Porus. This answer so pleased the victor, that he not only restored to him his dominions, but added thereto several provinces. He was treacherously put to death by Eudamus, B.C. 317.

POSEN, GRAND-DUCHY OF, po'-zen, a province of Prussia, bounded E. by Russian Poland, S. and W. by Silesia and Brandenburg, and N. by Prussia. Area, 11,500 square miles. Desc. Mostly level, and in some parts marshy. Rivers. This province is watered by the Netz, the Warta, the Vistula, and Prosna. Pro. Hemp, flax, tobacco, hops, wool, bog-iron, and nitre. Manf. Woollens, brandy, and leather. Pop. 1,400,000, chiefly Poles. Lat. between 51° 30′ and 53° 30′ N. Lon. between 15° 30′ and 19° E.

POSEN, the capital of the grand-duchy of Posen, at the confluence of the Prosna and the Warta, 144 miles from Berlin. It is surrounded with a mound and ditch, and is built with tolerable regularity. Of its public edifices, the cathedral and council-house are old; the principal guard-house, and the building that was the Jesuits' college, are comparatively recent. Here, also, are a theatre, a theological seminary, a college, and school. Manf. Linen, leather, and watches; also firearms. Here, as in the rest of Poland, the sale and purchase of goods are chiefly managed by Jews, who occupy a particular quarter of the town. Pop. 50,000, 5,000 military inclusive.

POSIDONIUS, pos-i-do'-ni-us, an astronomer of Alexandria, who flourished before Ptolemy, and undertook to ascertain the circumference of the earth, which he made to be 30,000 furlongs. There was a Stoic philosopher of the same name, who was a native of Apamea, in Syria, and taught with reputation at Rhodes. Josephus charges him with having invented the calumny against the Jews, that they worshipped the head of an ass. Cicero makes several allusions to his writings. Flourished about 100 B.C.

POSING, po'-sing, a town of Hungary, 11 miles from Presburg. It has celebrated mineral baths. Pop. 5,000.

POSSAGNO, pos-sa'-nyo, a village of Italy, 22 miles from Treviso. Pop. 2,600.—Here Canova was born.

POSSNECK, poss-nek', a town of Germany, 53 miles from Leipsic. Manf. Cloth, leather, and porcelain. Pop. 4,000.

POSTEL, William, pos'-tel, a French mystic. He was sent by Francis I. into the East, to collect manuscripts, and, on his return, was appointed royal professor of mathematics and languages. He lost this post, however, in consequence of his extraordinary opinions, and went to Rome, where he turned Jesuit; but was expelled from the order and imprisoned, for maintaining that the authority of councils was superior to that of popes. On gaining his liberty he went to Venice, and formed an intimacy with an old woman who had given herself up to mystic reveries. Postel started the strange notion that women had been left without redemption, which was now accomplished by Mother Joan, the name of this visionary. For his wild fancies he was again imprisoned; but recovered his liberty, and returned to Paris. He afterwards wrote a retractation, and was restored to his professorship; but again relapsed, and was confined in a monastery. He wrote a great number of works on theology and the oriental languages. B. at Dalerie, Normandy, 1510; D. at Paris, 1581.

POSTHUMUS, Marcus Cassius Latienus, pos'-thu-mus, a Roman general, who was elected emperor in Gaul on the death of Valerian, in 261. He defeated the Germans in several actions, and displayed talents and virtues worthy of his dignity; but, having refused to allow his soldiers to plunder Mayence, they rose against and slew him and his son, in 267.

POSTIGLIONE, pos-teel'-ye-o-nai, a town of Naples, in the Principato Citra, 26 miles from Salerno. Manf. Coarse woollen cloths. Pop. 4,000.

POTEMKIN, Gregory Alexander, po-tem'-kin, a Russian general, and favourite of Catherine II. He entered the cavalry of the Russian guard at an early age, and, having attracted the notice of Catherine, by his tall and handsome person, she made him minister of war; in which capacity he suggested the idea of taking the Crimea from the Turks. In 1787 he renewed the war against Turkey, and put himself at the head of the army. The year following he took Oczakow, and put its inhabitants to the sword. He acquired prodigious riches, was appointed field-marshal of Russia, grand hetman of the Cossacks, and possessed almost uncontrollable power. He was a man of debauched principles, and an inordinate epicure, which produced a disorder that carried him off. His remains were interred under a magnificent mausoleum at Cherson. He is said to have aspired to the duchy of Courland and to the kingdom of Poland. B. near Smolensk, 1736; D. 1792.

POTENZA, po-ten'-dza, a fortified town of Naples, in the Basilicata, 58 miles from Salerno. Manf. Woollens, serges, cottons, leather, and earthenware. Pop. 9,000.—In 1857 this place suffered severely by an earthquake.

POTOMAC, po-to'-mak, a river of the United States, rising in two branches, originating in and near the Alleghany Mountains, and forming, through its whole course, part of the boundary between Virginia and Maryland. After a course of 400 miles, it flows into Chesapeake Bay, between Point Lookout and Smith's Point.

POTOSI, po-to-se', a department of Bolivia, S. America. Area. Estimated at about 32,000 square miles. Desc. Mountainous; so lofty as frequently to rise above the line of vegetation. It has the richest silver-mines in S. America. Pop. 200,000.

POTOSI, a city of South America, in the above province, situate in a narrow glen on the river of the same name, on the mountain which contains the mines, 70 miles from Chuquisaca, in a cold climate, owing to the height of the ground, and in a barren country, the sides of the hills being covered only with moss, and their summits capped with eternal snows. Pop. 16,000. —In 1547 this town was founded, and is entirely supported by the mines. A royal mint was established in 1562; and so rapidly did its population increase, that, in 1611, the town is said to have contained 160,000 inhabitants. Since then, however, the population has continually decreased. It has a mint, convents, nunneries, a college, and an hospital.

POTSDAM, pots-dam', a city, and the second royal residence of Prussia, standing on the Havel, 17 miles from Berlin. Potsdam is to Berlin what Versailles is to Paris. It is indebted for its chief improvements to Frederick II. The old town consisted of only four streets; the new town was either built or repaired entirely by Frederick II. The streets are regular and spacious, and, on the whole, may vie in beauty with any town in Germany. It is surrounded by a wall and ditch, and has five gates towards the land and four towards the river. The form of the town, exclusive of the suburbs, of which it has five, is compact, and approaches to a square. The palace, situate on the bank of the Havel, is a magnificent structure: connected with it, also, are a theatre, a menagerie, and spacious stables. The town-house was built in 1754, on the plan of that of Amsterdam; and there are extensive barracks, a great hall for exercising the troops in bad weather, and, in the garrison church, there are statues of Mars and Bellona: also, in this church, is the tomb of Frederick II. The market-place is ornamented by an obelisk, and by statues of the kings of Prussia. There are a gymnasium, various schools, charitable institutions, and an orphan-house on a large scale, for the children of soldiers. Pop. 40,000.—The palace of Sans-Souci, the favourite retreat of Frederick II., is in the neighbourhood of Potsdam.

POTT, Percival, pot, an eminent English surgeon, who was elected surgeon to St. Bartholomew's Hospital, and, in 1764, became fellow of the Royal Society. He invented some surgical instruments, and wrote a treatise on the "Hernia," another on "Wounds of the Head," and "Observations on the Fistula Lachrymalis." B. in London, 1713; D. 1788.

POTTER, pot'-ter, a county of the United States, on the north side of Pennsylvania. Area, 1,064 square miles. Pop. 7,000.—Also the name of several townships, none of them with a population above 2,500.

POTTER, Paul, an eminent Dutch painter. He excelled in painting landscapes with cattle, and in representing the effect of the meridian sun upon objects. His "Bull" is universally admitted as an extraordinary piece of animal-painting: it is in the museum at the Hague. B. at Enckhuysen, 1625; D. at Amsterdam, 1654.

POTTER, Robert, a learned English divine, who made several excellent translations of classical authors, the most important of which were his Sophocles, Euripides, and Æschylus. He was also the author of a vindication of Gray, the poet, against Dr. Johnson. B. 1721; D. 1804.

POTTER, John, a learned English prelate, who was educated at the university of Oxford, and became an eminent tutor. On being appointed chaplain to Archbishop Tenison, he removed to Lambeth, and, in 1708, became regius professor of divinity. In 1715 he was preferred to the see of Oxford, whence, in 1737, he was translated to Canterbury. He wrote "Antiquities of Greece," "Discourse on Church Government," an edition of Lycophron, an edition of Clemens Alexandrinus, and some theological works. B. at Wakefield, Yorkshire, 1674; D. 1747.

POTTERIES, THE, pot'-ter-ees, a name applied to several towns in Staffordshire, where china and stoneware are manufactured.

POTTINGER, Sir Henry, pot'-tin-jer, an English diplomatist, who went to India as cadet in 1804, and, by his energy and ability, rose in succession to the posts of judge and collector at Ahmednugger, in the Deccan, political resident at Cutch, and president of the regency of Scinde. In 1839 he was further honoured by being created a baronet, and, upon the outbreak of war between England and China, he was sent to the latter country as ambassador extraordinary. After acting with much decision in concert with Admiral Sir William Parker, he succeeded in obtaining from the Chinese authorities a treaty of commerce. At the conclusion of the war he was nominated governor and commander-in-chief of Hong-Kong, and knight grand-cross of the Bath. Upon his return to England, in 1844, the House of Commons voted him a pension of £1,500 per annum. In 1846 he was appointed governor of the Cape of Good Hope, a post he vacated to assume the governorship and command-in-chief of the presidency of Madras. In all these employments he evinced himself the possessor of the best qualities of a public administrator. He returned to his native country in 1854. B. 1789; D. at Malta, 1856.

POUGET, Francis Aimé, poo'-zhai, a learned French divine, who became doctor of the Sorbonne and vicar of St. Roch, at Paris, in which office he is said to have converted La Fontaine. He wrote several volumes of theological works. B. 1666; D. 1723.

POUGHKEEPSIE, po-kep'-se, a township and village of the United States, New York, on the Hudson, 70 miles from Albany. It has a college with a fine edifice, Duchess Academy, and some other buildings. Pop.

14,000.—Here, in 1788, the convention met which adopted the constitution of the United States.

Pouilly, poo'-e-ye, the name of several parishes and towns of France, none of them with a population above 3,500.

Poulton, pole-ton, a market-town and parish of Lancashire, at the mouth of the river Wyre, 17 miles from Lancaster. Pop. 8,000.—It has a station on the Wyre and Preston Railway.

Poussin, Gaspar, poos'-sĕ, an Italian painter, of French extraction, and whose real name was Dughet; but he took that of Poussin, his sister having married Nicholas Poussin. His landscapes, particularly those which represent land-storms, are very fine. Six of his paintings are contained in the National Gallery. B. at Rome, 1613; D. at the same city, 1675.

Poussin, Nicholas, an eminent French painter, who studied in Italy, where he applied principally to landscape. On his return to France, in 1639, he was named first painter to Louis XIII., and provided with apartments in the Tuileries. He was also appointed to ornament the gallery of the Louvre; but, being thwarted in his plans while executing that great work, he went to Rome, and continued to reside there until his death. Eight fine pictures by him are in the National Gallery. A set of his pictures, entitled the "Seven Sacraments of the Church of Rome," are included in the collection of the earl of Ellesmere. B. at Andely, Normandy, 1594; D. at Rome, 1665.

Pouza, pow'-dza, the principal of a group of small islands in the Mediterranean Sea, 30 miles from Terracina. Ext. 4 miles long, by 2 broad. Pop. 1,500. Lat. 40° 53′ N. Lon. 12° 57′ E.

Powell, Rev. Baden, pow'-el, an eminent English mathematical professor, who received his education at Oriel College, Oxford, and, in 1827 became Savilian professor of geometry in the same university. During his long connection with Oxford, he was one of the most energetic supporters of reform, and a constant advocate for the introduction of a more extensive system of teaching with respect to the natural sciences than was there pursued. The nature of his researches will be seen by an enumeration of his principal works or contributions to scientific journals. These are: "Elementary Treatise on Experimental and Mathematical Optics;" "Revelation and Science;" the "Connection of Natural and Divine Truth; or, the Study of the Inductive Philosophy considered as subservient to Theology;" "Tradition Unveiled;" Essays on the Spirit of the Inductive Philosophy, the Unity of Worlds, the Philosophy of Creation, the Plurality of Worlds; a revised edition of Dr. Periera's work upon "Light;" an Historical View of the Mathematical Sciences, contributed to Dr. Lardner's "Cabinet Cyclopædia;" and a large number of papers on Natural Philosophy and Mathematics, furnished to the "Philosophical Transactions," the "Annals of Philosophy," the "Reports of the British Association," and "Taylor's Scientific Memoirs." He was the author of one of the "Essays and Reviews," a work which at the present time so deeply affects the religious world. B. in London, about 1798; D. 1859.

Powell, Edward, an English Roman Catholic priest, who was ordered by Henry VIII., in 1523, to write a work against Luther and in favour of the Pope; but having, at a later period, maintained the same views in opposition to his former royal patron, he was condemned to be hanged and quartered in 1540.

Powers, Hiram, pow'-ers, an eminent modern American sculptor, who was the son of a small farmer in Windsor county, Vermont, U.S. On the death of his father, being left in poor circumstances, he was compelled to maintain himself by his own resources. After finding employment in an hotel, a provision-store, and a clockmaker's shop, he made the acquaintance of a foreign artist, and, having from his youth been an adept at drawing, he quickly learnt the art of modelling in plaster from his tutor. He then obtained employment in the Cincinnati Museum as a modeller in wax. While thus engaged, he assiduously cultivated his artistic powers, and with so much success that, in 1835, he was enabled to set himself up at Washington as a modeller of busts. Two years later he proceeded to Italy, which for a long period had been a cherished idea. In that land of art his progress was very rapid. The first work by which he acquired fame as a sculptor was an "Eve," in marble. In 1851, his "Greek Slave" was placed in the Great Exhibition of London, where it became an object of popularity to a most remarkable degree. From that period his fame became European, and he was everywhere admitted to be a highly-gifted representative of American art. His other works were, a "Fisher-boy," the "United States," for the Crystal Palace at Sydenham; "Washington," "California," "La Penserosa," and a number of portrait busts of the most distinguished statesmen and public men of his native country. B. at Woodstock, Windsor county, U.S., 1805.

Powhatan, pow-hat-tan', a county of the United States, in Virginia. Area, 220 square miles. Pop. 8,200.

Pownall, Thomas, pow'-nal, an English writer and politician, who, in 1753, went to America, and was appointed governor of New Jersey and afterwards of South Carolina. He returned to England in 1771, and, several years later, entered the House of Commons, where he opposed the war with America. He wrote a treatise on the "Antiquities of Roman Gaul," "Intellectual Physics," an essay on the "Nature of Being," a treatise on "Old Age," "Memorial to the Sovereigns of Europe," and other works. B. at Lincoln, 1722; D. at Bath, 1805.

Poyais, po'-yai, a district of North America, in Honduras, about 110 miles from Secklong. Lat. 15° 10′ N. Lon. 85° 10′ W.—Hither Sir Gregor Macgregor enticed a number of settlers, by exaggerated representations of the country. After suffering the greatest misery from famine and disease, they were taken from the country by the British governor at Balize.

Po-Yang, po-yang', a large lake of China, in the province of Kiang-si. Ext. 80 miles long, with a breadth of 40. Lat. between 28° 50′ and 30° N. Lon. 116° E.

Pozzo di Borgo, Charles Andrew, Count, pot'-so de bor'-go, a Corsican nobleman, who was sent, in 1792, as deputy to the National Assembly, to thank that body for having annexed Corsica to France; but afterwards returned to his native island, and acted, in concert with General Paoli, for the establishment of a free government, under English protection. In 1797, the English having abandoned Corsica, he repaired to London, where he became the leader of the French refugees. In 1803 he went to Russia, and entered the diplomatic service of that country. The emperor Alexander appointed him his ambassador to Louis XVIII., in 1814, and, as the envoy of Russia, he took part in all the acts of the Holy Alliance. He was present, as Russian commissioner, at the battle of Waterloo, where he received a wound; and afterwards was one of those who suggested that Napoleon should be exiled from Europe. He represented the emperors Alexander and Nicholas at the court of France until the year 1834, when he returned to St. Petersburg. Shortly afterwards he resumed his former post at Paris, and in 1835 repaired to London as ambassador extraordinary of the czar. In 1839 he retired from public affairs and took up his residence at Paris. B. at Ajaccio, Corsica, 1764; D. at Paris, 1842.

Pozzolengo, pot'-so-lain'-go, a town of Austrian Italy, 8 miles from Verona. Pop. 2,000.—This place was occupied by the Austrians on the 24th June, 1859, when they were defeated by the French at the battle of Cavraano.

Pozzuoli. (See Puzzuoli.)

Prachatitz, pra'-ka-titzh, a town of Bohemia, 76 miles from Prague. Pop. 2,500.

Prado, pra'-do, a market-town of Portugal, 3 miles from Braga. Pop. 6,500.

Prado, El, a market-town of Spain, 28 miles from Toledo. Pop. 3,000.

Pradon, Nicholas, pra'-dawng, a French poet, who wrote some tragedies, one of which, "Phædra and Hippolytus," acted in 1677, was very successful, and set up in opposition to Racine, by those who were envious of that writer's great reputation. He wrote a satire upon Boileau. The works of Pradon were printed in 1744. B. at Rouen, 1632; D. at Paris, 1698.

Praga, pra'-ga, a town of Poland, on the Vistula, opposite to Warsaw, with which it communicates by a bridge of boats. Pop. 4,000. In 1787 it contained 7,000 inhabitants; but, in 1794, the Polish insurgents took refuge here, and it was stormed by Suwarrow, and given up to pillage and massacre, when about 20,000 were slain. In 1830, the Grand-duke Constantine of Russia was forced, with his troops, to retreat hence at the beginning of the unsuccessful resistance of the Poles to the Russians.

PRAGUE, praig (Germ. PRAG, prag), a city of Austria, the capital of Bohemia, situate on the Moldau, over which is a bridge of 16 arches, 160 miles from Vienna. The streets are in general well paved, with raised foot-paths for passengers; and the town may be divided into three parts. The whole is surrounded by a moat and earthen mound; and though, from the irregularity of its form, the circuit is not less than 12 miles, the elevation of the ground, in different parts, renders it capable of a temporary defence. Of the three divisions, the old town is the largest, and contains in one part the quarter of the Jews. The new town, on the other hand, has the best streets, while the Hradschin, a detached quarter, has the finest view, being built on a high precipitous hill, at some distance from the river. It contains a number of houses belonging to the nobility and country gentry; also the cathedral and the archbishop's palace. In a low-lying tract to the north and east of the Hradschin, is the quarter called Klein-seite, or Little Prague, said to be the oldest part of the town; and at the river-side is the only suburb, called Smichow. Prague, long the capital of Bohemia, contains the ruins of what was once the residence of the sovereign. It has also another building, called a palace, but less ancient, used for public offices. It is so large as to contain 150 rooms, with a hall inferior only to that of Westminster. The cathedral is a fine old Gothic structure, containing the tomb of St. John of Nepomuk, with a silver shrine weighing 37 cwt., and other shrines of many Bohemian monarchs. The Themkircho contains the tomb of Tycho Brahe; and the church of St. Gallus is where Huss preached. The theatre is large; and of public buildings generally, such as churches, convents, schools, and family mansions, the number is greater than in most other towns of the size; but few of them are good edifices. The houses in Prague are built in general of stone, some in the modern taste (having been rebuilt after the bombardment of 1757); but many more are of old architecture. The university is the oldest in Germany, having been founded by Charles IV., in 1348. It has various other seminaries. Of the charitable institutions, the principal are, three hospitals, two orphan-houses, and a lying-in hospital. Manf. Linen, cotton, and silk goods, hats, paper, brass-ware, jewellery, plated goods, glass, tobacco, mathematical and musical instruments. Prague, though a capital, is far more backward than an English, or even a French city of corresponding size; the shops being, in general, ill-furnished, and the lower orders living in penury. Pop. 120,000. Lat. 50° 5′ 19″ N. Lon. 14° 25′ 22″ E. Prague has often been exposed to the calamities of war, and was taken by storm in November, 1741, for the elector of Bavaria, then emperor; but Marshal Belleisle was obliged to leave it in December, 1742. The king of Prussia bombarded and took it in 1744, making the garrison, consisting of 16,000 men, prisoners of war; but he was obliged to abandon it the same year. In 1757, the king of Prussia again besieged it; but his efforts proved ineffectual. In 1848 it was bombarded, when more cruelties were perpetrated. It is the birthplace of Jerome of Prague.

PRAHAN, prai'-hăn, a town of Australia, near Melbourne. Pop. 10,000.

PRAIRIE, prair'-e, the name of several townships in the United States, none of them with a population above 2,500.

PRATO, pra'-to, a walled town of Tuscany, in the district of Florence, 9 miles from the city of that name. Its chief ornament is the cathedral, a fine edifice of white marble. It has numerous other churches, hospitals, and asylums, the Cicognini college, poor-houses, and an hospital for foundlings. Manf. Silks, woollens, hats, and soap. Pop. 12,500.

PRATT, Charles. (See CAMDEN, Earl of.)

PRAVADE, pra-vad'-de, a town of European Turkey, Bulgaria, 23 miles from Trimla. Pop. Unascertained. Here, in 1829, the Turks were defeated by the Russians.

PRAXAGORAS, prăx-ag'-o-răs, a Greek historian, who was a native of Athens, and wrote a history of the sovereigns of that country, and another of Constantine; also one of Alexander the Great. Flourished about 345.

PRAXEAS, prăx'-e-ăs, an heresiarch, who, after opposing the Montanists with zeal, fell into the error that there was only one person of the Trinity, and the same who was crucified. He was followed by the Sabellians and others. Tertullian wrote against him. Flourished in the 2nd century.

PRAXITELES, prăx-it'-e-lees, a celebrated Grecian sculptor, who executed several fine statues in bronze and marble, of Bacchus, a satyr, Venus and Apollo. An ancient copy of one of his works, the "Apollo Sauroctonos," is the only example of his genius extant. He excelled by the grace, tenderness, and finish of his works, and was esteemed as second to Phidias only. Phryne, the celebrated Thespian courtesan, was his mistress, and served as the model for his statues of Venus. He also executed a series called "The Labour of Hercules," for the temple erected to that hero at Thebes. Two of his sons acquired fame as sculptors. Praxiteles is supposed to have been B. about 360 B.C.; D. about B.C. 280.

PREANGER, prai-ăng'-er, a Dutch residency of Java, in the S.W. part of the island. Pop. 700,000.

PREBLE, preb'-el, a county of the United States, in Ohio. Area, 432 square miles. Pop. 22,000.

PREEZ, preez, a market-town of Denmark, in the duchy of Holstein, 8 miles from Kiel. It has a seminary for noble ladies. Pop. 5,000.

PREGEL, prai'-gel, a river of East Prussia, formed by the junction of the Angerap and Pissa, which, after a course of 120 miles, joins the Frische Haff, below Konigsberg.

PREMITI, prai-me-tee', a town of European Turkey, in the Voyussa, 55 miles from Valona. Pop. 3,000.

PRENZLOW, prents'-loo, a well-built town of Prussia, the chief place of the district of Brandenburg, called the Ucker Mark, on the lake and river Ucker, 70 miles from Potsdam. Here are several Lutheran and other churches, schools, and hospitals. Manf. Linens, woollens, and tobacco: there are, besides, several breweries and tanneries, and it has a trade in corn. Pop. 13,000. Here, in 1806, 20,000 Prussians surrendered to the French.

PRESBURG, press'-berg, a town of Hungary, on the Danube, which is here crossed by a bridge of boats, 34 miles from Vienna. This town was once the capital of Hungary, and the kings are still crowned here. The fortifications of Presburg have been demolished; and no distinction is now made between the town and suburbs. The principal church is an old Gothic edifice. The other public buildings are the hall of the Diet, a German theatre, an archbishop's palace, a barracks, a Catholic academy, and a Calvinist college, with many charitable institutions. Manf. Silk, woollens, tobacco, rosoglio, leather, and nitre. The trade of the place is, in a great measure, transit, particularly in corn and linen. Pop. 44,000. Presburg is noted for the treaty here concluded between France and Austria in 1805, when the Tyrol was given to Bavaria, and Venice to the French.

PRESCOT, pres'-kot, a market-town and parish of Lancashire, 8 miles from Liverpool. Manf. Cotton, sail-cloth, and earthenware; but the chief trade consists in the making of watch-tools, for which the town has been long celebrated, and of watch movements. Pop. 47,000.

PRESCOTT, William Hickling, pres'-kot, a celebrated American historian, who came of a New England family of high honour. His grandfather, Colonel William Prescott, commanded the American forces at Bunker's Hill; his father was an eminent judge at Boston. In 1811 he was sent to Harvard university, where he graduated in 1814. While at college, he was deprived by an accident of the use of one eye; and the sight of the other became so impaired as to compel him to abstain from any lengthened course of study. Happily, his father's circumstances were such as to preclude the necessity of his toiling for bread. He early determined to devote himself to a life of literature. Soon after quitting college, being advised to travel, he went to Europe, and spent two years in an extended journey through England, France, and Italy. At the end of that time he returned to his native country with restored health, but with no great improvement in the state of his eyes. His marriage took place soon after, and from this period his days flowed on in diligent and uneventful devotion to literary pursuits. But he laboured at his task under circumstances which would have crushed many men. "While at the university," he says, "I received an injury in one of my eyes which deprived me of the sight of it. The other, soon after, was attacked by inflammation so severely that for some time I lost the sight of that also; and though it was subsequently restored, the organ was so much disordered as to remain permanently debilitated; while twice in my life since I have been deprived of the use of it for all purposes of reading or writing for several years together. It was during one of these periods that I received from Madrid the materials for my History of Ferdinand and Isabella; and in my disabled condition, with my transatlantic treasures lying around me, I was like one pining from hunger in the midst of abundance. In this state I resolved to make the ear, if possible, do the work of the eye. I procured the services of a secretary, who read to me the various authorities; and, in time, I became so far familiar with the sounds of the different foreign languages (to some of which, indeed, I had been previously accustomed by a residence abroad), that I could comprehend his reading without much difficulty. As the reader proceeded, I dictated copious notes; and when these had swelled to a considerable amount, they were read to me repeatedly, till I had mastered their contents sufficiently for the purpose of composition." But the difficulties of composition had yet to be overcome. Dictation was at first tried; but finding that he could not attain the force and freedom he required, he was compelled to relinquish that mode. A writing-case for the blind was obtained from London, and "with this instrument," continues Prescott, "I have written every word of my historicals. This modus operandi exposes me to some embarrassments; for as one cannot see what he is doing on the other side of the paper, any more than a performer on the treadmill sees what he is grinding on the other side of the wall, it becomes very difficult to make corrections. This requires the subject to be pretty thoroughly canvassed in the mind, and all blots and erasures to be made then, before taking up the stylus. This compels me to go over my composition to the extent of a whole chapter, however long it may be, several times in my mind before sitting down to my desk. When there, the work becomes one of memory rather than of creation, and the writing is apt to run off glibly enough." In 1838 the first of the historical works composed under so many difficulties was produced, under the title of "The History of Ferdinand and Isabella the Catholic of Spain." The work became universally successful, and was translated into French, Spanish, and German. Its author was immediately elected a member of the Royal Academy of Madrid. Prescott's literary industry was not checked by the success of his first work. He immediately devoted himself to the history of another brilliant period in the history of Spain, the fruits of which appeared in 1843, in a work in three volumes, called "The History of the Conquest of Mexico," which was received with even greater favour than that which had greeted the "History of Ferdinand and Isabella." The literary world recognized in it the same careful research, the same accuracy of statement, the same persuasive sweetness and beauty of style. In 1847 he published the "History of the Conquest of Peru," a work of kindred and commensurate excellence to that of the "History of the Conquest of Mexico." The historian next devoted himself with unabated ardour to the preparation of a work of wider range and broader scope,—the "History of the Reign of Philip II." He had become one of the great literary names of the age, and everywhere both public and private collections were thrown open to him. It was while preparing himself for this task that he paid a brief visit to England, where he was cordially received by individuals of the highest literary and social distinction, and where the favourable impression created by his works was confirmed by his prepossessing manners and appearance. He took ample time for the task which he destined to be the crowning act of his life. The first two volumes of the work appeared in 1855; and the highest expectations formed by the public were justified. In the following year he produced an edition of Robertson's "Charles V.," to which notes and a supplement, containing an account of the emperor's life after his abdication, were added. In the last year of his life he published the third volume of his "History of Philip," which, unfortunately, did not complete the work. His other works consist of essays upon Italian, Spanish, English, and American literature, and a memoir of Brockden Brown, the American novelist. He obtained the highest acknowledgments of literary distinction. The university of Oxford, in 1850, conferred upon him the degree of doctor of laws. In 1845 he received the highest of all distinctions of its kind, in being elected a corresponding member of the class of moral and political philosophy in the French Institute, succeeding Navarete, the Spanish historian. Of most of the learned societies of Europe he was a member. His friend Mr. Ticknor, in his "History of Spanish Literature," said of him, that his "honours will always be dearest to those who have best known the discouragements under which they have been won, and the modesty and gentleness with which they have been worn. His manners were most frank, simple, and engaging; his social nature was strong and active. His countenance retained to the last a youthful glow and animation, which were the faithful expressions of a sunny temper and an ever-young heart. No man was ever more warmly beloved; no man could show a better title to the affections of his friends. His honours and distinctions never impaired the simplicity and sweetness of his nature, or changed his countenance towards any one whom he had ever known and loved." B. at Salem, Massachusetts, 1796; D. 1859.

PRESQUE ISLE, presk, an island in Lake Huron. Lat. 45° 4′ N. Lon. 83° 40′ W.

PRESTBURY, prest'-ber-e, two parishes of England.—1. In Cheshire, 34 miles from Chester. Pop. 60,000, chiefly employed in silk- and cotton-mills.—2. In Gloucester, 2 miles from Cheltenham. Pop. 2,000.

"PRESTER JOHN," pres'-ter, the name given in the middle ages to a supposed Christian sovereign dwelling in the interior of Asia. The report appears to have been created by the Nestorian Christians, who declared that they had come into possession of some letters addressed by him, a khan, residing somewhere near the banks of the Amoor, to the pope, the king of France, and the emperor of Constantinople, in which he signed himself John, the High Priest. In the 13th century two friars were dispatched by the pope to this imaginary personage; but although they penetrated as far as the wall of China, they met with no Prester John. The tradition continued to be believed till the 15th century, but disappeared soon after the Portuguese had reached India by the way of the Cape of Good Hope.

PRESTON, pres'-ton, a borough town of Lancashire, on a gentle elevation above the Ribble, about 15 miles from its confluence with the Irish Sea, and 21 miles from Lancaster. The town was incorporated by Henry II. in 1160. By a subsequent charter, granted in the reign of Henry III., the officers of the burgh were authorized to hold a guild merchant for the renewal of freedom to the burgesses, and for other purposes. This privilege is made the occasion of great festivity. Its public edifices are the court-house, exchange, assembly-rooms, town-hall, theatre, gaol, custom-house, almshouses, infirmary, and many places of worship. It is the seat of an institution for diffusing useful knowledge, with an extensive library, good museum, and an agricultural society. There are other public libraries, various schools, and a provident society. Manf. Linen and cotton weaving and spinning. Pop. about 75,000.—It has communication by means of the Lancaster Canal and by railways with Wyre, on Morecombe Bay, and with Bolton and Manchester.

PRESTON, the name of numerous parishes in England, none of them with a population above 6,000.

PRESTON, a county in the N. of Virginia, U.S. Area, 545 square miles. Pop. 12,000.—The name also of two townships, neither of them with a population above 2,000.

PRESTONPANS, pres'-ton-pănz', a parish and town of Scotland, in Haddingtonshire, 10 miles from Edinburgh. The town consists of a street about half a mile in length. Pop. 2,000.—A little above this village, the king's troops, under Sir John Cope, were defeated in 1745.

PRESTWICK, prest'-wik, a parish of Lancashire, comprising the town of Oldham. Pop. 96,000.

PRUSSEN, a kingdom of Europe. (See PRUSSIA.)

PREVESA, prai-vai'-sa, a fortified seaport of European Turkey, in Albania, 18 miles from Arta. It is built out of the ruins of the ancient Nicopolis, which are situate at a small distance to the north. Pop. 8,000.

PRIAM, pri'-am, the last king of Troy, was son of Laomedon. When Hercules took the city of Troy, Priam was in the number of his prisoners; but his sister Hesione redeemed him from captivity, and he exchanged his original name, which was Podarces, for that of Priam, which signifies bought or ransomed. Being placed on his father's throne by Hercules, he employed himself in fortifying and embellishing the city of Troy. After he had reigned for some time, Priam expressed a desire to recover his sister Hesione, whom Hercules had carried into Greece and married to Telamon, his friend. He manned a fleet, of which he gave the command to his son Paris, with orders to bring back Hesione. Paris neglected his father's injunctions, and carried away Helen, the wife of Menelaus, king of Sparta, during the absence of her husband. Priam countenanced his son's act by receiving in his palace the wife of the king of Sparta. This abduction kindled the flames of the Trojan war. Troy, after a ten years' siege, having been betrayed into the hands of the Greeks, and Hector, the chief support of the Trojans, having been slain by Achilles, Priam resolved to die in defence of his country. He put on his armour and advanced to meet the Greeks, but was seized by Neoptolemus, who plunged his dagger into his breast. His head was cut off, and the mutilated body was left among the heaps of slain.

PRICE, Rev. Thomas, price, a distinguished Welsh scholar, whose life was passed as pastor to different congregations of his countrymen. The object of his life was to rescue Welsh literature from the neglect into which it had fallen. In 1829 he made a tour in Brittany, and published an interesting account of that country. His principal works are,—"An Essay on the Influence which the Welsh Traditions have had on the Literature of Europe;" a "Critical Essay on the Language and Literature of Wales;" "History of Wales and the Welsh Nation, from the early ages to the death of Llewelyn ap Gruffyd;" and an Essay upon the "Comparative Merits of the Remains of Ancient Literature in the Welsh, Irish, and Gaelic Languages." B. in Brecknockshire, 1787; D. 1848.

PRICE, Richard, an English dissenting minister and political writer, who, at the commencement of the American war, distinguished himself by his zeal in behalf of republicanism, and published his "Observations on Liberty and Civil Government," for which he received the thanks of the city of London. He also wrote "Observations on the National Debt," in which he endeavoured to prove that the kingdom was on the eve of bankruptcy. Soon after the breaking out of the French revolution, he preached a discourse at the Old Jewry, in which he exulted over the misfortunes of the royal family of France, in such a manner as to call forth the keen animadversions of Burke. His principal works were, "On the Importance of Christianity," "A Review of the Principal Questions and Difficulties in Morals," "Discussion of the Doctrines of Materialism and Necessity, in a Correspondence with Dr. Priestley." B. at Tynton, Glamorganshire, 1723; D. 1791.

PRICHARD, James Cowles, pritch'-ard, an eminent English ethnologist, who received his education for the medical profession at Edinburgh. His inaugural thesis, when taking his M.D. degree, was the physical history of mankind, and to that subject his attention continued to be devoted till, in 1813, his "Physical History of Mankind" was produced. In that work, not only anatomy and physiology, but also philology, was introduced, to found a systematic history of the races of mankind. This work has been several times reprinted, has been translated into French and German, and is generally admitted to be one of the best works of its class. Dr. Prichard also devoted much attention to the study of nervous and mental diseases, and was appointed visiting physician to the Gloucestershire Lunatic Asylum, and, in 1845, became one of the commissioners of lunacy. He was fellow of the Royal, and president of the Ethnological Society, and, upon the installation of the late duke of Wellington as chancellor of the university of Oxford, Dr. Prichard was nominated M.D. of that seat of learning. His principal works were, "On the Crania of the Laplanders and Finlanders," "On the Eastern Origin of the Celtic Language," "An Analysis of Egyptian Mythology," "On the Different Forms of Insanity in relation to Jurisprudence," and a "Review of the Doctrines of the Vital Principle." B. at Ross, Herefordshire, 1785; D. in London, 1848.

PRICHARD, Rees, a Welsh divine and poet, who was educated at the university of Oxford, and spent his life as a rural pastor in his native country. His poems in Welsh, on religious subjects, have been often printed, and are very popular in Wales. B. in Wales, about 1574; D. 1644.

PRIDEAUX, John, pre'-do, a learned English prelate, who was admitted of Exeter College, Oxford, of which he became fellow, and, on the death of Dr. Holland, was chosen rector. He was afterwards appointed regius professor of divinity, in which he displayed considerable talents. He also served the office of vice-chancellor, and, in 1641, was advanced to the bishopric of Worcester; but was deprived of the revenues by the rebellion. He wrote extensively upon grammar, logic, and theology, and was described as "a plentiful fountain of all sort of learning." B. at Stowfort, Devonshire, 1578; D. at Bredon, Worcester, 1650.

PRIDEAUX, Humphrey, a learned English divine, who, in 1676, published, under the title of "Marmora Oxoniensia," an account of the Arundel marbles, with a comment on them, which gained him great reputation; it also procured him the patronage of the chancellor Finch, who gave him a living at Oxford. In 1681 he was promoted to a prebend of Norwich, of which cathedral he became dean in 1702. Being disabled from public duty, through an ill-performed surgical operation, he devoted himself to composition, and produced his "Connection of the Old and New Testament," an admirable work, which was translated into several languages, and passed through numerous editions. Besides the above works, he was the author of "Directions to Churchwardens," "The Life of Mahomet," "The Original Right of Tithes." B. at Padstow, Cornwall, 1648; D. at Norwich, 1724.

PRIEGO, pre-ai'-go, a town of Spain, in the province of Cordova, 35 miles from the town of that name. Manf. Woollens and silks. Pop. 13,500.

PRIESSNITZ, Vincent, preess'-nitz, the founder of the hydropathic system, or system of curing diseases by water. He was the son of a farmer in Austrian Silesia, and, after receiving some education at the town school, was put to the work of the farm. After remaining at this employment for several years, his mind was turned to the subject of the "water-cure" by a singular accident. One day, while taking a cart loaded with barley to the fields, the horse became restive, bit him with his teeth, and, throwing him down, dragged the cart over his body. Two of his ribs were broken, and a medical man declared that, even if he recovered, he would remain a cripple for life. The future water-doctor, however, contrived, by placing himself in a certain position, so to expand his lungs, that his ribs were replaced; while, with a copious use of cold water, he kept down the inflammatory symptoms. In a short time he was quite recovered, and then commenced applying, in other cases, the treatment which had proved so beneficial in his own. He studied medicine, and, in time, formed an establishment at Gräfenberg, which was soon resorted to from all parts of Germany. Between the years 1829—1843 he had treated 1,050 patients successfully, using neither medicine, bleeding, nor blistering. Water, open air, exercise, plain diet, and cheerful society, were his only remedies. His fame increased rapidly until his death. B. 1799; D. 1851.

PRIESTLEY, Joseph, preest'-le, an English natural philosopher and theologian, who, at the age of 22, became assistant minister to an Independent congregation at Needham Market, in Suffolk; after which he was chosen pastor of a congregation at Nantwich, in Cheshire, where also he kept a school. In 1761 he removed to Warrington, as tutor in the belles-lettres in the academy there. His connection with that institution ended in 1767, when he accepted an invitation from the dissenters at Leeds, where he published several theological works, which attracted considerable notice and led to a sharp controversy. In 1773 he went to reside with the earl of Shelburne as librarian and companion. Several years afterwards he appeared as a champion of the doctrine of philosophical necessity, in which he had his friend Dr. Price for an opponent. While thus engaged in metaphysical and theological disputations, he pursued his philosophical inquiries with ardour; the result of which appeared in the "Philosophical Transactions," and in separate publications, particularly his "Experiments and Observations on Different Kinds of Air." The term of his engagement with Lord Shelburne having expired, Dr. Priestley, with a pension of £150 a year, retired to Birmingham, where he became pastor of a congregation of Unitarian dissenters in 1780. He there published several of his works; as, "Letters to Bishop Newcome on the Duration of Christ's Ministry," and the "History of the Corruptions of Christianity." This last brought him into a controversy with Dr. Horsley. Dr. Priestley, however, still persevered, and published his "History of Early Opinions concerning the Person of Christ." In 1791 a riot happened at Birmingham, owing to an imprudent meeting of some of his friends to celebrate the destruction of the Bastille. Several houses were pulled down and burnt, and Dr. Priestley's among the rest; by which he lost his library, manuscripts, and philosophical apparatus. In consequence of this disgraceful transaction, he retired to London, and for some time officiated as pastor to the Unitarian congregation at Hackney, of which Dr. Price had been minister. But his mind being greatly depressed by late events, he went to America in 1794, and settled at Northumberland, in the state of Pennsylvania. He was a fellow of the Royal Society, and of other learned bodies in different parts of the world. He lived to see his phlogistic system of chemistry universally exploded; yet he persisted in defending it to the last. He was also equally tenacious of his Socinianism. His writings are too various to be enumerated. The principal and best are his "Charts of History and Biography," his "History of Electricity," the "History and Present State of Discoveries relating to Vision, Light, and Colours;" lectures on the "Theory and History of Language," and on the "Principles of Oratory and Criticism." Cuvier pronounced an éloge before the National Institute of France, after his death. Dr. Thomson declares that Priestley "was perfectly sincere and unaffected, and the discovery of truth seems to have been in every case his real and undisguised object." B. near Leeds, 1733; D. in America, 1804.

PRIMATTICIO, Francis, pre'-mat-te'-cho, an eminent Italian painter and architect, who was commissioned by Francis I. of France to decorate the palace of Fontainebleau with frescoes, and was afterwards appointed commissary-general of the royal buildings. B. at Bologna, 1490; D. in France, 1570.

PRINCE, THE BLACK. (See EDWARD.)

PRINCE GEORGE, two counties of the United States. —1. In Maryland. Area, 492 square miles. Pop. 22,000. —2. In Virginia. Area, 275 square miles. Pop. 8,000.

PRINCE'S ISLAND, an island in the Bight of Biafra, 140 miles from Fernando Po.—Also several small islands in the Sea of Marmora, near the Straits of Constantinople. They produce fruit and wine, and cattle are reared. The climate being agreeable and the scenery beautiful, numerous visitors are attracted to them.

PRINCE EDWARD, a county of the United States, in Virginia. Area, 255 square miles. Pop. 12,000.

PRINCE EDWARD'S ISLAND, one of the British colonies of N. America, in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, separated from Nova Scotia and New Brunswick on its S. and W. sides by Northumberland Strait. Area, 2,134 square miles. Desc. Generally level or undulating, and well watered. Its shores are indented with numerous inlets, and the soil is fertile. Pro. The cerealia and vegetables common to England. Timber is abundant, and the pastures are excellent. Minerals. Coal and sandstone. The trade is mostly with England, and shipbuilding is carried on to a large extent. The fisheries are important. Pop. Perhaps 70,000. Lat. between 46° and 47° N. Lon. between 62° and 64° 30′ W.—Also an ISLAND of Upper Canada, on the W. side of Lake Ontario. Ext. 36 miles long, with a varying breadth up to 20 miles.

PRINCE OF WALES' ARCHIPELAGO, in the North Pacific Ocean. Lat. between 54° 25′ and 56° 30′ N. Lon. between 132° and 134° W.

PRINCE OF WALES, CAPE, the north-western extremity of the American continent, forming with East Cape, on the opposite shore of Asia, Behring's Straits, which separate the two continents of America and Asia. Lat. 66° N. Lon. 167° 59′ W.

PRINCE OF WALES' ISLANDS, a group in Torres Strait, at the N.E. extremity of the Gulf of Carpentaria.

PRINCE OF WALLS' ISLAND. (See PENANG.)

PRINCE WILLIAM'S SOUND, a great inlet of the North Pacific Ocean, on the North-American coast, containing numerous islands, but having no good harbour. Lat. 60° to 61° 20′ N. Lon. 145° to 148° W.

PRINCE WILLIAM-HENRY'S ISLAND, in the Pacific Ocean, 70 miles in circumference. Lat. 1° 32′ S. Lon. 149° 30′ E.

PRINCESS ANNE, a county in the S.E. of Virginia, U.S. Area, 351 square miles. Pop. 8,000.

PRINCESS ROYAL'S ISLANDS, lie on the western coast of North America, to the eastward of Queen Charlotte's Islands.

PRINCETON, prince'-ton, the name of several townships in the United States, none of them with a population above 3,500.

PRINCIPATO CITRA, or CITERIORE, prin-che-pa'-to che'-tra, a province in the central part of the late kingdom of Naples, having the Mediterranean to the west. Area, about 2,400 square miles. Desc. Its surface is, for the most part, mountainous, though it is traversed by a great plain, and watered by the rivers Silaro, Sarno, Calore, and Negro. The vegetation is luxuriant, and rearing live-stock forms an important branch of industry. Pop. about 4,000,000.

PRINCIPATO ULTRA, or ULTERIORE, ool'-tra, another province of the same country, to the south of the former. Area, 1,800 square miles. Desc. It is traversed by the Apennines, and is watered by the rivers Sabato, Tammaro, Calore, and Ofanto. Pop. about 600,000.

PRINGLE, prin'-gel, Sir John, an eminent Scotch physician, who studied his profession at Edinburgh, and afterwards completed his education under Boerhaave, at Leyden, where he took his doctor's degree. In 1742 he was appointed physician to the army in Flanders. He afterwards attended the duke of Cumberland in the same capacity during the Scotch rebellion. He next settled in London, where he obtained great practice, and in 1761 was appointed physician to the queen's household. In 1766 he was created a baronet, and on the death of Mr. West was elected president of the Royal Society. He was subsequently appointed physician to the king. He was the author of "Observations on Diseases of the Army," "Memoirs upon Septic and Anti-septic Substances," for which he received the gold medal of the Royal Society; "Observations on the Treatment of Fevers in Hospitals and Prisons," "Anniversary Discourses before the Royal Society," &c. B. in Roxburghshire, 1707; D. 1782.

PRINGLE, Thomas, a Scotch poet and writer of works of travel. He was the son of a farmer, and was educated at the grammar-school of Kelso and the university of Edinburgh. After publishing several minor effusions, he started the "Edinburgh Monthly Magazine," having among his coadjutors Lockhart, Dr. Brewster, Hogg, and Wilson. In the first number appeared an article on the "Gipsies," gratuitously supplied by Scott. This magazine afterwards became the property of the Messrs. Blackwood, and in time its title was changed to that of "Blackwood's Magazine." Pringle had, however, separated from the periodical, and after experiencing some pecuniary embarrassments, he, in 1820, went out with his brothers, who were farmers, to the Cape of Good Hope. The families of the Pringles had accompanied them, and soon a tolerably prosperous community was formed. Through the influence of Scott and others, he subsequently obtained the post of librarian to the government at Cape Town. He also set up an academy, and started a newspaper, and was apparently on the high road to fortune, when his print, "The South-African Journal," having been declared by the governor to contain a libel upon him, Pringle fell under the ban of the government authorities, and in time became ruined in his prospects. In 1826 he repaired to London, and sought to obtain the sum of £1,000 as compensation for his losses, but without success. The remaining years of his life were spent as a working literary man. His chief works were, "A Narrative of a Residence in South Africa," "An Account of English Settlers in Albany, South Africa," and several small collections of poems. His two works on Africa are exceedingly interesting, and give a picturesque, but at the same time truthful narrative, of what the author had seen. His poetry is fluent and pleasing. B. at Blaiklaw, Teviotdale, 1789; D. 1834.

PRINSEP, James, prin'-sep, an eminent Oriental scholar, who went out to India at an early age, as a subordinate in the Mint department at Benares. In that city he collected a valuable body of observations, which he published in an important work, entitled "Sketches of Benares." In 1832 he was appointed editor of the "Journal of the Asiatic Society," which was produced at Calcutta, to which place he had some time previously removed. In 1832 he succeeded Wilson as secretary of the Asiatic Society. One of the most important of his later researches was the deciphering of some inscriptions which had baffled all previous Oriental scholars. He likewise devoted himself to a profound study of Bactrian coins, and by his enlightened and indefatigable efforts succeeded in obtaining an almost unbroken series, from the days of the successors of Alexander the Great to modern times. He likewise furnished articles on chemistry, Indian antiquities, and numismatics, to the journal of which he was the editor. B. in England, 1800; D. 1840.

PRIOR, Matthew, pri'-or, an eminent English poet. Losing his father when young, his care devolved upon his uncle, a vintner, near Charing Cross, who sent him to Westminster school, but afterwards took him home, with the intention of bringing him up to his own business. Prior, nevertheless, still pursued his classical studies as occasion permitted, which proved the means of his advancement; for happening to explain a disputed passage in Horace, to some company at his uncle's house, the earl of Dorset, one of the party, became his patron, and sent him to St. John's College, Cambridge, of which he was chosen fellow. In 1687 he wrote, in conjunction with the Hon. Charles Montague, afterwards earl of Halifax, a burlesque upon Dryden's "Hind and Panther," in a poem entitled the "Story of the Country Mouse and City Mouse." The earl of Dorset introduced him to court after he left the university; and, in 1690, he was appointed English secretary to the congress at the Hague, and gave so much satisfaction that King William made him gentleman of his bedchamber. In 1697 he was secretary at the treaty of Ryswick; in 1700 he was for a short time secretary of state. In 1713 he was appointed secretary to the embassy in France; and he had not been long there, when, going to see the curiosities at Versailles, the officer in attendance showed him the fine paintings by Le Brun of the victories of Louis XIV., asking at the same time whether King William's actions were also to be seen in his palace: "No, sir," answered Prior, "the monuments of my master's actions are to be seen everywhere but in his own house." In 1715 he was arrested by order of the House of Commons, and committed to prison. He was even excepted from the act of grace; but, in 1717, he recovered his liberty without being brought to trial. Besides his poems, which are easy, lively, and elegant, he wrote the History of his Own Times. B. either in Dorsetshire or London, 1664; D. at Wimpole, Cambridgeshire, 1721.

PRISCIANUS, pris'-i-an'-nus, an eminent Roman grammarian, whose work, "De Arte Grammaticâ," is the most complete ancient treatise on the subject extant. His works were printed by Aldus Manutius, at Venice, in 1476. From several inferences in his works, he is said to have become a Christian. He was so exact in his judgment and criticisms, that to "break Priscian's head" became a proverb for false grammar. Flourished in the 6th century.

PRISREND. (See PERSERIN.)

PRISTINA, pris-te'-na, a town of European Turkey, in Servia, 42 miles from Uskup. Near it is the tomb of Sultan Amurath I. Pop. 12,000.

PRIVAS, pre'-va, a town of France, in the department of the Ardèche, on three rivulets near the Rhone, 26 miles from Valence. Pop. 5,300.

PROBUS, Marcus Aurelius, pro'-bus, a Roman emperor, who, from being a common soldier, rose to the highest military rank. After the death of the emperor Tacitus, in 276, the Eastern army proclaimed Probus, as the reward of his valour and integrity. He was also acknowledged by the senate; after which, he turned his arms against the Gauls and Goths, whom he completely subdued. He next defeated the Sarmatians, and made an advantageous peace with Persia. The interval of peace he employed in rebuilding cities and occupying his soldiers in useful works. The Persians again taking up arms, Probus prepared to attack them, but was murdered by his troops at Sirmium, in 282.

PROCIDA, pro-che'-da, an island of the Mediterranean, on the coast of Naples, separated from the mainland by a channel about 1¼ mile across. Ext. 3 miles long, with a breadth of 1½. Pop. 15,000. Lat. 40° 45′ 50″ N. Lon. 95° 5′ E. It has a town of the same name, with a population of 4,000.

PROCIDA, JOHN OF, an Italian gentleman, lord of the island of Procida, who distinguished himself as physician to the emperors Frederic II. and Conrad IV., both of whom loaded him with honours and possessions. Having been despoiled of a great portion of his wealth by Charles of Anjou, he formed the resolution of depriving him of his crown, and placing it upon the head of Peter III., king of Aragon. With infinite subtlety, he organized a conspiracy against Charles in 1282, and was one of the prime movers of the great massacre of all the French in Sicily, known in history under the name of the "Sicilian Vespers." He became, at a subsequent period, the confidential adviser of the Aragonese princes of Sicily, and D. at a very advanced age. B. about 1225.

PROCLUS OF CONSTANTINOPLE, pro'-klus, a Platonic philosopher, who wrote against the Christian religion, and in one of his works sought to prove that the world is eternal. He also composed Commentaries upon Plato, and other works. D. at Athens, 485.

PROCLUS, St., patriarch of Constantinople, was the disciple of Chrysostom, whose works in Greek were published at Rome in 1630. D. 447.

PROCOPIUS, pro-ko'-pi-us, a Greek historian, whom Justinian took into his confidence, honoured him with the title of Illustrious, and appointed secretary to Belisarius. He wrote a "History of the Wars of the Persians, the Gauls, and the Goths," also a "Secret History." The best edition of his works is that of Bonn (in the series of Byzantine Historians), 1838. Flourished about the 6th century.

PROCOPIUS OF GAZA, a Greek rhetorician and theologian, who wrote commentaries on the books of the Kings and Chronicles, and on Isaiah, printed in Greek and Latin. Flourished about 520.

PROCOPIUS, Michael Coltelli, an eminent French farce writer, who was of Italian extraction. He was educated for the church, but quitted his studies to practise surgery, which he also abandoned for the drama. His light and lively pieces were very popular in their day. B. at Paris, 1684; D. at the same city, 1753.—His father, Francis Procopius, opened the Café Procopius, the first establishment of the kind at Paris. It was for a long time the resort of men of science and literature.

PROCRUSTES, pro-krus'-tees, a famous robber of Attica, called also Polypemon, who tied travellers on an iron bed, and, if their length exceeded that of the bed, he used to cut off a portion of their limbs; but, if they were shorter, he had them stretched to make their length equal to it. He was slain by Theseus.

PROCTOR, Bryan Waller, prok'-tor, a modern English poet, generally known under the pseudonym of Barry Cornwall. He was educated for the legal profession, and, during many years, held an important appointment as one of the commissioners of lunacy. His first volume of poems was produced in 1819, under the title of "Dramatic Scenes and other Poems." His "English Songs," Memoir and Essay, prefixed to an edition of Shakspere, "Marcian Colonna," and others, evinced, in their author, the possession of a graceful and refined order of mind. Some of his songs became popular; and one of his tragedies (that entitled "Mirandola"), which was produced at Covent-Garden theatre, was highly successful. A collection of some charming essays and tales in prose by him was published in America. B. about 1790.—His daughter has distinguished herself as a graceful versifier.

PRODICUS, prod'-i-kus, a sophist and rhetorician, who taught at Athens, and had for disciples Euripides, Socrates, Isocrates, and Xenophon. The Athenians put him to death, on pretence that he corrupted the morals of their youth. Flourished 435 B.C.

PROME, or PRONE, prome, a city of Burmah, India, on the Irrawadi, 240 miles from Rangoon. Pop. 30,000. Lat. 18° 50′ N. Lon. 95° 5′ E.

PROMETHEUS, pro-me'-the-us, was brother to Atlas and Epimethus, and surpassed all mankind in cunning. He ridiculed the gods, and deceived Jupiter himself. To punish Prometheus and the rest of mankind, Jupiter took fire away from the earth; but Prometheus climbed to the heavens, by the assistance of Minerva, and stole fire from the chariot of the sun. This provoked Jupiter, who ordered Vulcan to make a woman of clay, and, after he had given her life, he sent her to Prometheus, with a box of the most valuable presents. (See PANDORA.) Prometheus, suspecting the snare, took no notice of Pandora, but induced his brother to marry her, and the god, now more irritated, caused this wily mortal to be tied to a rock on Mount Caucasus, where, for 30,000 years, a vulture was to feed upon his liver, which was never to be diminished. He was delivered from this punishment 30 years afterwards, by Hercules.

PRONSK, pronsk, a town of Russia, on the Prona, 30 miles from Riasan. Pop. 7,000, principally engaged in agricultural pursuits.

PROPERTIUS, Sextus Aurelius, pro-per'-shi-us, an eminent Latin poet, who was the esteemed friend of Mæcenas, Ovid, and Tibullus. His elegies are usually printed with those of Catullus. A translation of them by "Oxford Hands" appeared in 1685. B. about 56 B.C.; D. about 16 B.C.

PROPONTIS, SEA OF. (See MARMORA.)

PROSERPINA, or PROSERPINE, pro-ser'-pi-na, pros'-er-pine, a daughter of Ceres, called by the Greeks Persephone, who was so beautiful that Jupiter himself became enamoured of her. She resided in Sicily, and delighted in the flowery meadows and limpid streams which beautified the plains of Enna. From this solitary retreat Pluto carried her away into the infernal regions, of which she became the queen. (See PLUTO.) Ceres, disconsolate at the loss of her daughter, travelled all over the world, and, at length, learned from the nymph Arethusa that her daughter had been carried away by Pluto; whereupon she repaired to Jupiter, and demanded him to punish Pluto. Jupiter, to soothe the grief of Ceres, permitted Proserpine to remain six months with Pluto, and the rest of the year on earth. As queen of Hades and wife of Pluto, she presided over the death of mankind; and no one could die if herself or Atropos (see PARCÆ) did not cut off one of the hairs from the head. Proserpine was universally worshipped by the ancients, and was known by the different names of Libitina, Hecate, and Juno infernal.

PROSPER, St., pros'-pair, a French theologian, whose youthful life was licentious; but, when his country was ravaged by the barbarians, he altered his conduct, and became a penitent. He was a disciple of St. Augustine, whose memory he defended. He also opposed the Pelagians with considerable zeal. The best edition of his works is that of Paris, 1752. B. in Aquitaine, 403; D. about 463.

PROSSNITZ, pross'-nitz, a town of Austria, in Moravia, 9 miles from Olmutz. Manf. Woollen goods, linens, cottons, spirits, and beer. Pop. 11,000, of whom about 2,000 are Jews.

PROTAGORAS, pro-tag'-o-ras, a Greek philosopher of Abdera, who was at first a porter. He became the disciple of Democritus, to whose system he added remarks, doubting whether the gods existed or not, for which his books were burnt at Athens, and the author banished. Flourished in the 5th century B.C.

PROTEUS, pro'-te-us, a sea deity, who received the gift of prophecy from Neptune. He generally resided in the Carpathian Sea, and reposed himself on the shore. He was difficult of access, and, when consulted, he refused to give answers, by immediately assuming different shapes and eluding the grasp. Aristæus was in the number of those who consulted him, as also Hercules.

PROTOGENES, pro-toj'-e-nees, a celebrated Greek painter, who was the rival of Apelles; but there remained a close friendship between them. Flourished about 332 B.C.

PROUDHON, Peter Joseph, proud'-awng, a modern French writer on political economy, who acquired considerable notoriety in 1850, by publishing a work entitled "What is Property?" a question which he himself answered in the first line of his work as follows: "All property is robbery." His other works, which are principally remarkable for their Utopian and impracticable character, are, "The Solution of the Social Problem," and a "System of Contradictions in Political Economy." In 1849 he attempted to form a "People's Bank" at Paris; but the scheme was broken up by the condemnation of M. Proudhon to three years' imprisonment, for alleged libel; upon which he took to flight. B. at Besançon, 1809.

PROUT, Samuel, prout, an eminent English water-colour painter, who was the companion of Haydon in their student days; but, unlike that ambitious artist, Prout drew from nature "the ivy-mantled bridges, mossy water-mills, and rock-built cottages which characterize the valley scenery of Devon." He was fortunate enough to attract the notice of John Britton, the antiquary, and he accompanied him as draughtsman in a tour through Cornwall. In 1805 he went to London, where he maintained himself by executing drawings for the printsellers of the metropolis, and by teaching. In time he won a high position, and began to produce his remarkable lithographic fac-similes of drawings made upon the continent of Europe. The most important of these were, "Sketches made in Flanders, Germany, France, Switzerland, Italy, &c." He also wrote "Hints on Light and Shade, Composition, &c." B. at Plymouth, 1783; D. 1852.

PROUT, William, a distinguished English physician, who wrote many valuable and learned treatises upon medicine, one of the most important of which is "On the Nature and Treatment of Stomach and Renal Diseases." He also wrote one of the Bridgewater treatises. B. 1786; D. in London, 1850.

PROVENÇAL ISLAND, pro-van'-sal, lies off the S. coast of Asia Minor, in the Mediterranean Sea. Lat. 36° 10′ N. Lon. 33° 47′ E.

PROVENCE, pro'-vance, an old province in the south-east of France, now forming the departments of the Lower Alps, Mouths of the Rhone, Var, and the E. part of Vaucluse. In the 9th century it gave name to the kingdom of Burgundy or Provence, afterwards called Arles.

PROVIDENCE, prov'-i-dence, one of the Bahama islands, and the second in point of size. Ext. About 25 miles long and 9 broad, narrowing towards the east and west extremities of the island. It has a good harbour. Lat. 25° 3′ N. Lon. between 77° 10′ and 77° 38′ W. (See BAHAMAS.)

PROVIDENCE, an island in the W. part of the Caribbean Sea, near the coast of Honduras. Ext. 10 miles long, with a breadth of 4. Pop. 400.

PROVIDENCE, a county in Rhode Island, U.S. Area, 380 square miles. Pop. 90,000.—Also the name of several townships, none of them with a population above 3,000.

PROVIDENCE, the chief town of the above county, built on both sides of Providence river, 40 miles from Boston. It contains a court-house, a gaol, a university, a public library, public schools, and places of worship for various religious denominations. Manf. Cottons, woollens, and paper, besides bleaching, dyeing, and calendering. The Brown University is a respectable and flourishing seminary. Pop. 50,000.—This place was founded in 1636, and was the first instance of a community established on principles of perfect toleration.—It is also the name of several townships, and of various small islands in the Pacific and Indian oceans.

PROVINCE WELLESLEY, a British settlement on the

W. coast of the Malay peninsula, immediately opposite Penang. Area, 100 square miles. Desc. Undulating, with a healthy climate. Pro. Rice, sugar, pepper, and cocoa-nuts, with cattle and poultry. Pop. about 95,000, mostly Malays. It is under the government of the Bengal presidency.

PROVINCETOWN, a township of the United States, Massachusetts, 50 miles from Boston. It has a good harbour and extensive salt-works. Pop. 3,300, employed in the fisheries.

PROVINS, pro'-vănce, a town of France, in the department of the Seine-and-Marne, 29 miles from Melun. It has some manufactures of woollens, and an important commerce in corn. In its neighbourhood roses are cultivated for medicine and perfumery. Pop. 7,500.

PRUDENTIUS, Aurelius Clementius, pru-den'-shi-us, a Latin poet, who was successively an advocate, a magistrate, and a soldier, and distinguished himself in all these professions. His Latin poems were printed by Elzevir in 1667, with the notes of Heinsius. Flourished in the 4th century.

PRUSSIA, or the PRUSSIAN STATES, prus'-shi-a, an extensive kingdom of Central Europe. It comprises a large portion of Germany, besides the provinces of Prussia and Posen, and the Swiss possessions, which are without its limits. Its form is extremely irregular, from its eastern being entirely separated from its western parts. The E. is the larger portion, and is bounded on the N. by the Baltic Sea, E. by Russia, W. by Brunswick, Hanover, and Mecklenburg, and S. by Austria, Saxony, and electoral Hesse. The W., or Rhenish Prussia, is bounded on the E. by Hesse-Darmstadt, Nassau, Brunswick, Waldeck, Lippe, and part of Hanover; W. by the Netherlands, Belgium, and Luxemburg; N. by Hanover, and S. by France and Rhenish Bavaria. Prussia possesses the canton of Neufchâtel, in Switzerland, and the principality of Hohenzollern. Political Divisions. The whole kingdom is divided into the following provinces:—East Prussia, West Prussia, Brandenburg, Pomerania, Westphalia, Silesia, Posen, Saxony, and Lower Rhine. Area, about 108,000 square miles. Desc. Of provinces so widely scattered, the surface must necessarily be far from uniform; and it is difficult to make any comprehensive remark, except that a general level predominates. The chief part of the country is, however, far from fertile, the soil being often sandy and covered with heath, excepting along the banks of the rivers. Mountains. None very high: the Hartz, or Harz, in Saxony, with the Brocken, attain an elevation of 3,650 feet; the Gebirge, between Silesia and Bohemia, culminate in the Schnee Kuppe, at 5,000 feet. Rivers. No country in Europe is more favoured in regard to water communication in its interior than Prussia. The Baltic forms a number of bays, or rather lakes, along its coast; such as the Frische, the Curische, the Putzig, and Stettin Haffs; and a succession of large navigable rivers are found at no great distance from each other; such as the Niemen, the Pregel, the Vistula, the Oder, the Elbe, the Weser, and the Rhine, with their numerous tributaries, the Netz, Warta, Elbe, Spree, and Moselle. Lakes. Numerous, but generally small. Climate. Humid in the vicinity of the Baltic, cold in Silesia, and the winters severe in Prussia proper. Zoology. The wild boar and the wolf in the forest districts. Forests. Extensive; chiefly consisting of fir. Pro. Wheat, oats, barley, potatoes, flax, hemp, chicory, and beet-root; but the capital applied to agriculture is inconsiderable. Cattle and sheep are raised; also horses. Flax is an object of general culture in Westphalia, as it is in Silesia. The wool of Saxony is of a superior quality. In Westphalia, hogs are numerously reared, and, in Pomerania, geese. Minerals. Iron, copper, lead, vitriol, alum, saltpetre, and, in a smaller degree, silver, in the high grounds of the Westphalian and Rhenish provinces, particularly in the mountainous district of the Hartz. Salt from brine springs is in some parts of Prussian Saxony abundant; also coal. Manf. Silesia and Westphalia have long been noted for their linens. Woollens also are made, more or less, in almost every town or large village. Cotton-works have been established near the Rhine, at Berlin, at Erfurt, at Elberfeld, and in particular quarters of Silesia. The next in importance are leather, earthenware, glass, paper, tobacco, and working in metals; also starch, potash, and vitriol. Brewing is a branch of great importance. The manufactories have largely increased since the formation of the Zollverein. Exp. Linens, woollens, and hardware, with corn, wool, timber, pitch, tar, potash, linseed, tobacco, and wax. To these are to be added horses, horned cattle, hams, salt meat, and, from a few maritime towns, the produce of the fisheries. Distilled spirits are, like corn, an article of export from the eastern and most thinly peopled part of the kingdom. Imp. These comprise coffee, cotton, sugar, tea, and other produce of the colonies; wines, silk, fruit, and bay-salt of the south of Europe; manufactured goods, such as printed cottons, and the finer hardware; also miscellaneous articles, such as tin, furs, and dye-stuffs. Education. The universities are six in number, viz. Berlin, Halle, Breslau, Konigsberg, Bonn, and Griefswald; and there are in these, and at Dantzic, Magdeburg, and a number of other towns, academies, in which are taught partly the classics and mathematics, but more particularly the modern languages, drawing, and such accomplishments as are useful in genteel professions. In short, the most complete system of national education is established, and attendance at school is compulsory. Religion. The royal family of Prussia, and the majority of the population, are Calvinists; but about three-fifths of the people are Protestant, and the remainder Catholic. Army. About 400,000. Navy. None. Gov. A monarchy nearly absolute; for although the central government consists of two chambers, it can hardly be called a limited monarchy. Pop. 16,000,000. Lat. between 49° 7′ and 55° 52′ N. Lon. between 6° and 22° 50′ E.—In the middle of the 13th century, E. Prussia was subjugated by the Teutonic knights, who introduced Christianity, and, in the 16th century, Albert of Brandenburg, grand master of the order, appropriated the country. In 1700 his descendant succeeded in obtaining, from the emperor, the royal dignity. The king died in 1713; his successor availed himself of the distress of the Swedes to seize the chief part of Pomerania, and Frederick II., after suffering a great deal of hard treatment from his father, ascended the throne in 1740, which he was successful in keeping. In 1756 a new war burst forth, which, notwithstanding the great military talents of the king and his fine army, brought the Prussian monarchy to the brink of ruin. The king died in 1786. He was succeeded by Frederick William II., a weak voluptuous character. His son, Frederick William III., came to the crown in 1797, and having taken up arms against France, lost the battle of Jena. The peace of Tilsit, however, restored little more than half the Prussian states. The peace of Paris, in 1814, after the fall of Napoleon I., confirmed by that of 1815, gave them not the same extent of territory in Poland, but an ample equivalent in Saxony and the Lower Rhine, and restored Prussia to all her former importance.—Prince Frederick William, the present heir-apparent to the throne of Prussia, is connected by marriage with the royal house of England, he having espoused the Princess Royal, eldest daughter of Queen Victoria and Prince Albert.

PRUSSIA, EAST, or DUCAL PRUSSIA, a province of Prussia, comprising Konigsberg and Grumbinnen. It originally belonged to the knights of the Teutonic order, and gave its name to the kingdom of Prussia.

PRUSSIA PROPER, a province of Prussia, composed of East and West Prussia, and formerly divided by the Vistula, but, now, by a line a few miles to the east of that river. It forms the governments of Dantzic and Marienwerder.

PRUSSIA, RHENISH, a province of Prussia, formed by the two districts of Lower Rhine and Cleveberg.

PRUSSIA, WEST, a province of Prussia, which formerly belonged to Poland.

PRUSSIAN HOLLAND, a circle of Prussia, in the district of Königsberg. Area, 340 square miles. Desc. Level and fertile. Pop. 38,000.

PRUTH, prooth, a river of Europe, rising in the palatinate of Marmarosch, in Hungary, and, after a course of 360 miles, falling into the Danube, below Galatz. It forms a portion of the boundary-line of the Russian frontier; and by crossing it, in 1853, the Russians gave rise to the war with Turkey.

PRYNNE, William, prin, an eminent English lawyer, who, in 1632, was tried in the Star Chamber for writing a libel against the queen, under the title of "Histriomastix; or, a Discourse on Stage Plays." For this he was sentenced to stand in the pillory, to lose both his ears, and to pay a fine of £3,000. In another pamphlet he attacked Laud and the bishops, for which he was condemned to lose the remainder of his ears, to pay a fine of £5,000, to be branded on both cheeks, and to be imprisoned for life. These atrocious sentences were rigidly carried into effect. The House of Commons released him in 1641. He sat in the Long Parliament; but, though he had been active in promoting the rebellion, he was an enemy to Cromwell, who caused him to be imprisoned. At the Restoration he was made keeper of the records in the Tower. He wrote a very large number of books, chiefly on politics and religion; also the "History of Archbishop Laud," and the Lives of Kings John, Henry III., and Edward I. B. at Swainswick, near Bath, 1600; D. in London, 1669.

PRZEMYSL, pzhem'-isl, the chief town of the circle of the same name, in Austrian Galicia, on the San, 122 miles from Cracow. Manf. Linen and leather. Pop. 9,000.

PRZIBRAM, pzib'-ram, a town of Bohemia, 33 miles from Prague. Manf. Cloth and paper.—In its neighbourhood are lead- and silver-mines. Pop. 5,300.

PSALMANAZAR, George, săl-ma-na'-zar, a notorious impostor, who is supposed to have been a native of France. After obtaining a good education in a monastery, he went to Germany, where he pretended to be a Japanese converted to Christianity. Being reduced to distress, he entered a Scotch regiment in Flanders, the chaplain of which brought him to England, where he passed for a native of Formosa, and, to support the character, lived upon raw flesh. He wrote a pretended Formosan grammar, and a history of that island, which imposed upon many learned persons. At length the deceit was discovered, and Psalmanazar was abandoned by his patrons. He next engaged with the booksellers in compiling the "Ancient Universal History," his share of which shows considerable erudition. His latter years made ample amends for his former irregularities. B. about 1679; D. in London, 1753.

PSAMMENITUS, psăm'-me-ni'-tus, king of Egypt, succeeded his brother Amasis, 526 B.C. Cambyses declared war against him, and, having taken him prisoner, put him to death after reigning six months.

PSAMMETICUS, psăm-met'-i-kus, king of Egypt, who reigned, in conjunction with eleven others, between 671—656 B.C. He was subsequently driven by his colleagues to the seacoast; but, with the assistance of the Ionians and Carians, he defeated his enemies at Memphis; on which he became master of Egypt. He greatly encouraged the Greeks, and enriched his country by commerce; he was also a patron of the arts and sciences. Supposed to have D. 616 B.C.

PSAPHON, psaï'-fon, a Libyan, who is said to have taught birds to repeat these words, "Psaphon is a god," and then to have set them free. His countrymen, hearing these sounds uttered by the birds of the air, believed it to be a miracle, and accordingly paid divine honours to the ingenious impostor.

PSIOL, pse-ol', a river of Russia, which, after a course of 300 miles, joins the Dnieper, 10 miles from Krementchug.

PSKOV, pskof, a government or province of the north-west of European Russia, lying between those of Livonia and Smolensko. Area, about 18,000 square miles. Desc. Flat and well watered, but generally infertile. The forests are extensive, and cattle are largely reared. Pop. 776,000. Lat. between 56° and 58° N. Lon. between 27° 15′ and 32° E.

PSKOV, a town of European Russia, capital of the above government, 160 miles from St. Petersburg. It has a number of churches, several convents, and schools. Pop. 10,200.

PSYCHE, si'-ke, a nymph whom Cupid married and carried into a place of bliss. Venus put her to death, because she had robbed the world of her son; but Jupiter, at the request of Cupid, granted immortality to Psyche. The word signifies 'the soul;' and Psyche personified is generally represented with the wings of a butterfly, to intimate the lightness of the soul, of which the butterfly is the symbol.

PSYCHRISTUS, Jacobus, si-kris'-tus, a celebrated Alexandrian physician, who, says Friend, in his "History of Physic," "was very eminent for his great insight into philosophy and physic." He held high office under Leo the Great, and was so revered by the people, that a statue of him was set up in the baths. Such eagerness had he for improving his own art, that the people imagined the soul of Æsculapius had been transfused into him. He never bled, and seldom resorted to fire or the knife. Flourished in the 5th century.

PTOLEMÆUS, or PTOLEMY, tol'-e-me'-us, tol'-e-me, the name of a number of Greek kings of Egypt, the most celebrated of whom were:—

PTOLEMY LAGUS, or SOTER, first Greek king of Egypt, was the natural son of Philip of Macedon. He was the favourite and one of the best generals of Alexander the Great, on whose death he obtained Egypt, Libya, and part of Arabia, to which, on the death of Perdiccas, he added Cœlosyria, Phœnicia, Judæa, and the isle of Cyprus. He made Alexandria his capital, where he built a lighthouse called the Pharos, as a guide to pilots for that harbour. He encouraged literature and formed an academy, with a museum, at Alexandria. Ptolemy is said to have written the Life of Alexander the Great, and other works, which are lost. D. 283 B.C.

PTOLEMY PHILADALPHUS, son and successor of the above. He obtained his surname (which signifies brother-loving) in ridicule, for having put to death his two brothers. Ptolemy formed an alliance with the Romans. He was a great encourager of commerce, for which purpose he built a city on the Red Sea. He also constructed considerable fleets, both there and in the Mediterranean. He was a liberal patron of learned men, and caused the Scriptures to be rendered into Greek, in that version called the Septuagint. D. 247 B.C.

PTOLEMY EUERGETES, the son and successor of the preceding. He declared war against Seleucus Callinicus, to avenge the death of his sister Berenice. Ptolemy made himself master of Syria and Cilicia, and was extending his conquests when the news of a revolt recalled him to Egypt. He soon quelled the insurgents, and by the prudence of his reign acquired the name of 'Euergetes,' or benefactor. He was poisoned by his own son, 222 B.C.

PTOLEMY PHILOPATER ('father-loving'), ironically so called, from his cruelty in poisoning his father. He put to death his mother, brother, uncle, and sister, and is said to have exposed a number of Jews, on a plain, to the fury of his elephants; but those animals, instead of destroying the intended victims, fell upon the Egyptians; on which the tyrant, out of fear, conferred great favours on the Jewish nation. D. 205 B.C.

PTOLEMY EPIPHANES, or 'Illustrious,' succeeded his father Philopater, and, at the age of 14, assumed the reins of government. During his minority, Antiochus the Great conquered large portions of his kingdom; but afterwards restored them to Ptolemy, when he gave him his daughter in marriage. Ptolemy was poisoned B.C. 181.

PTOLEMY PHILOMETOR, son and successor of the preceding. Having declared war against Antiochus Epiphanes, he was taken prisoner by him. The Egyptians then placed Physcon, his brother, on the throne, whom Antiochus deposed, and restored Philometor, who died of a wound received in battle against Alexander Balas, king of Syria, B.C. 146.

PTOLEMY PHYSCON, so called from the prominence of his belly, succeeded his brother Philometor, and was a cruel and sensual tyrant. On account of the persecutions which they endured, the people of Alexandria emigrated into Asia; and his subjects having revolted against him, he murdered his son Memphitis, from suspicion. D. 117 B.C.

PTOLEMY LATHYRUS ('gray pea'), so called from an excrescence on his nose, resembling a pea. He succeeded his father Physcon; but was soon after driven to Cyprus by his mother Cleopatra, who gave the crown to her son Ptolemy Alexander. Lathyrus, having mustered an army, invaded Judæa, and committed great cruelties on the Jews; after which he marched to Egypt, but was unsuccessful. On the death of Alexander he ascended the throne. D. 81 B.C.

PTOLEMY AULETES, which surname he obtained from his skill on the flute, was the illegitimate son of the preceding, and ascended the throne after the death of his father. He ceded Cyprus to the Romans, with a large tribute, which so displeased his subjects, that they revolted, and placed his daughter Berenice on the throne. By the help of his allies, he recovered his dominions, and put his daughter to death. D. 51 B.C.

PTOLEMY DIONYSIUS, or BACCHUS, king of Egypt, the son of the preceding, ascended the throne with his sister Cleopatra, whom he married, according to the will of his father. Pompey the Great, who had been his guardian, fled into Egypt after his defeat at Pharsalia, and was murdered by him. Ptolemy, who was no more faithful to Cæsar than he had been to his rival, was drowned in the Nile, after being defeated by the Romans, B.C. 48.

PTOLEMY, Claudius, an eminent Egyptian geographer and mathematician. He is celebrated for his System of the World, in which he placed the earth as the centre of the system, round which sun, planets, and stars revolved. His Geography describes the whole world as it was known in his day, and was the great text-book of the science of which it treats until the 15th century, when the discoveries of the Venetians and Portuguese demonstrated its errors. A small but correct edition of this curious work was published in the "Tauchnitz Classics," in 1813. A very curious map, giving a view of Ptolemy's known world, was furnished by Gosselin, in his "Researches upon the Geography of the Ancients," published at Paris 1813. Flourished at Alexandria early in the 2nd century.

PUBLICOLA. (See VALERIUS, Publius.)

PUBLIUS SYRUS, pub'-li-us, a comic poet of Syria, who was at first slave to a patrician named Domitius, who gave him his liberty. His works are lost, but some quotations from them are preserved in the writings of ancient authors. Flourished at Rome, about 40 B.C.

PURNA, pub-na', a populous town of Bengal, in the district of the same name, on the Ganges, 130 miles from Calcutta.—The DISTRICT has an area of 2,606 square miles, and a population of 600,000.

PUDSEY, pud'-se, a township of England, in Yorkshire, 4 miles from Bradford. Manf. Chiefly woollen goods. Pop. 12,000.

PUEBLA, pwaib'-la, a department of the Mexican Confederation, wholly situate within the tropics. It is bounded N.E. by Vera Cruz, E. by Oaxaca, S. by the Pacific Ocean, and W. by the intendancy of Mexico. Area, 18,140 square miles. Desc. Mountainous, the greater portion being traversed by high cordilleras. Beyond the 18th degree of latitude the whole country is a plain, eminently fertile in wheat, maize, and fruit-trees. This plain is from 5,900 to 6,560 feet above the level of the sea. In this intendancy is also the most elevated mountain of Mexico, the Popocatepetl, a volcano continually burning. Pop. about 600,000. Lat. between 16° 20′ and 20° 15′ N. Lon. between 97° and 99° 15′ W.

PUEBLA, DE LOS ANGELES, the capital of the above department, stands on a table-land, about 7,500 feet above the level of the sea, 75 miles from Mexico. Its temples are sumptuous; its streets are wide, and drawn in straight lines from east to west and from north to south. The principal square in the centre of the city is very magnificent. It is adorned on three sides with uniform porticoes, where are shops filled with all kinds of commodities; and on the fourth side is its grand cathedral, which has a beautiful front and two lofty towers. Besides the cathedral, there are various other churches and convents, well built and finely adorned. There are, also, several colleges and charity schools, both for male and female pupils. Manf. Hard soap, iron and steel wares, particularly swords, bayonets, &c. Pop. 74,000.

PUEBLA, LA, the name of numerous small towns of Spain, none of them with a population above 7,000.

PUENTE, pwain'-tai, a 'bridge,' a name prefixed to numerous towns in Spain, none of them with a population above 6,500.

PUERTO, pwair'-to, a 'port,' a prefix to the names of many places of Spain, of which the following are the principal.

PUERTO DE LA MAR. (See COBIJA.)

PUERTO DE SANTA MARIA, or ST. MARY'S, a seaport of Spain, in the province of Seville, at the mouth of the Guadalete, 7 miles from Cadiz. The town is unfortified, but well built; its streets are broad, well paved, and kept carefully clean. The church and monasteries are remarkable only for a profusion of tasteless ornaments. Manf. Linen and printed cottons. It is the principal place for the import of the wines of Xerez. Pop. 18,000.

PUERTO PRINCIPE, SANTA MARIA DE, an inland town 145 miles from the city of Cuba. Pop. 9,000, of which a third are slaves.

PUERTO REAL, a seaport-town of Spain, in the province of Seville, near the mouth of the Guadalete, 5 miles from Cadiz. Its streets are airy and clean. This is the great depôt of the salt made in the tanks that surround the isle of Leon and the bay of Cadiz. Pop. 4,000.

PUFFENDORF, Samuel de, poof'-fen-dorf, an eminent writer on universal jurisprudence. He studied at Leipsic, where he applied to philosophy, law, and the mathematics. In 1658 he was appointed tutor to the son of Coyer, ambassador of the king of Sweden to the court of Denmark; but war breaking out between the two countries, the family of the ambassador was thrown into prison, and Puffendorf with the rest. There he composed his treatise on "Universal Jurisprudence," which was printed at the Hague in 1660. This work obtained for him the professorship of the law of nature and nations at Heidelberg; whence, in 1670, he removed, by the invitation of the king of Sweden, to Lunden, and was appointed professor in the university of that city. He was afterwards created a baron, and historiographer, by the Swedish monarch. In 1688 he went to Berlin, where he became counsellor of state. His other works are, "History of Sweden from 1628 to 1654;" "History of Charles Gustavus;" "History of Frederic William the Great, elector of Brandenburg;" and treatise on "The Law of Nature and Nations." B. at Chemnitz, Saxony, 1632; D. at Berlin, 1694.

PUGIN, Augustus, pu'-jin, an eminent French architectural draughtsman, who settled in London, and became an assistant to the architect Nash. He also published a number of works on architecture, the most important of which were,—"Specimens of Gothic Architecture from various Edifices in England;" "Specimens of the Architectural Antiquities of Normandy;" and "Gothic Ornaments." D. 1832.

PUGIN, Augustin Welby Northmore, an eminent English architect, and the son of the preceding, under whom he acquired the elementary principles of his art. He was next engaged as the designer of furniture for the apartments at Windsor Castle, and subsequently devoted himself to the production of Gothic designs for furniture, gold and silversmith's work, &c. About 1841 he embraced the doctrines of the Roman Catholic faith, and soon afterwards became extensively employed in designing ecclesiastical structures for the service of that church. From his plans, churches, chapels, convents, and schools were erected throughout Great Britain. His best works are, the cathedral church of St. Marie, at Derby; the cathedral of St. George's, Southwark, London; and the Roman Catholic churches at Liverpool, Manchester, Oxford, Cambridge, and Newcastle-upon-Tyne. For the earl of Shrewsbury, who was his constant patron, he built a monastery and church at Alton Towers; he also designed the gateway to Magdalen College, Oxford. His latest employment was the designing and superintendence of the interior of the new palace at Westminster. His chief literary works were,—"Glossary of Ecclesiastical Ornaments;" "True Principles of Pointed or Christian Architecture;" and "An Apology for the Revival of Christian Architecture." He unfortunately outlived his mental powers. B. 1811; D. at Ramsgate, 1852.

PUGLIA. (See APULIA.)

PULASKI, pu-las'-ke, the name of four counties of the United States.—1. In Arkansas. Area, 1,151 square miles. Pop. 6,500.—2. In Kentucky. Area, 120 square miles. Pop. 15,000.—3. In Virginia. Area, 363 square miles. Pop. 6,000.—4. In Georgia. Area, 758 square miles. Pop. 7,000.

PULCHERIA, St., pul-kee'-ri-a, empress of the East, was the daughter of the emperor Arcadius, and ruled in conjunction with her brother, Theodosius the Younger. On his death, in 450, she espoused Marcianus, and associated him in the government. She convened the council of Chalcedon in 451, and liberally patronized learned and religious men. B. 399; D. 453.

PULCI, Louis, pool'-che, an eminent Italian poet. He wrote an epic poem, entitled "Morgante Maggiore," in which are blended sacred and profane matters, in a very extraordinary manner. He also wrote a poem on a tournament held at Florence in 1468, entitled, "Giostra di Lorenzo de' Medici." B. at Florence, 1431; D. at the same city, 1487.

PULO, poo'-lo, an 'island,' a prefix to the name of many islands in the Asiatic Archipelago, with populations unascertained, but generally small.

PULO PENANG, Prince of Wales Island. (See PENANG.)

PULSZKY, Ference Aurel, pool'-ske, an Hungarian politician and writer, who, after completing his education as an advocate, accompanied his uncle, M. Fejervary, an eminent Hungarian antiquary, on a tour through Germany, Italy, and Great Britain. In 1840 he became a member of the Hungarian diet; but having lost his seat at a subsequent election, he devoted himself to political literature, and, among other employments, acted as Hungarian correspondent of the "Allgemeine Zeitung." Upon the outbreak of the revolution in Hungary, he was sent by Kossuth upon a mission to England, to secure the support of that power for Hungary. In his absence, the Hungarian cause was lost. After Kossuth's arrival in England, he became his intimate companion, and accompanied him on his tour through America. A description of his American journey was published in a volume entitled "Red, White, and Blue;" he also wrote "Diary of a Tour in Great Britain," and, in conjunction with his wife, "Tales and Traditions of Hungary." B. at Eperies, Hungary, 1814.

PULTENEY, William, pult'-ne, earl of Bath, an English statesman. He became a member of the House of Commons early in life, and at the prosecution of Walpole in 1712, defended him with great eloquence. When George I. ascended the throne, he was appointed secretary at war, under Walpole; but he subsequently became a severe and constant antagonist of that minister, until at length he succeeded in depriving Sir Robert of his place; after which he was created earl of Bath, and was admitted of the privy council. He had been a popular idol up to this time; but then, in the words of Chesterfield, sank "into insignificance and an caridom." B. 1682; D. 1764.

PULTOWA. (See POLTAVA.)

PULTUSK, or PULTOWSK, pool-toosk', a town of Russian Poland, on an island formed by the Narew, 60 miles from Plock. Pop. 5,000.—Here, in 1806, the Russians were defeated by the French.

PUNA, poo'-na, a city of Peru, province of Paucarolla, on Lake Chucuito. It is a rich and beautiful place, and near it are rich silver ores; but the mines are filled with water. Lat. 16° 20′ S. Lon. 70° 26′ W.

PUNA, an island of South America, situate at the mouth of the Guayaquil. Ext. 30 miles long, with a breadth of 10. Desc. Well wooded and fertile. Lat. 2° 50′ S. Lon. 70° 58′ W.

PUNDERPOOR, pun-der-poor', a town of India, in the province of Bejapore, on the Beemal, 90 miles from Sattarah. Pop. Perhaps 20,000. Lat. 17° 56′ N. Lon. 75° 12′ E.

PUNITZ, poo'-nitzh, a town of Prussian Poland, 45 miles from Posen. Pop. 2,000.—Here, in 1706, a battle was fought between the Saxons and the Swedes.

PUNJAB, or FIVE RIVERS, pun-jaub', an extensive region of Hindostan, principally situate in the province of Lahore, but including part of Moultan, and comprising the country traversed by the "five great waters," of which the Indus is the most westerly, and the Sutlej the most easterly. Area, 78,000 square miles. Desc. Elevated; inclosing the valleys of the Indus and other rivers, with a vast alluvial plain, intersected by large streams into five doabs. The soil is various, being in some parts barren, and in others marked by considerable fertility. Rivers. The Indus, Chenab, Ravee, Beas, Jhylum, and Sutlej. Pro. Grain of all kinds, with opium, indigo, and tobacco; the orange, the palm, and other fruit-trees. Camels and buffaloes are extensively reared. Minerals. Rocksalt, alum, sulphur, nitre, coal, and gypsum. Manf. Silk and cotton fabrics, carpets, shawls, and warlike arms. Pop. 4,750,000.—The Punjab was the scene of Alexander the Great's Indian conquests. It was annexed to the British possessions in India in 1849.

PUNNAH, pun-na', a rajahship of India, comprising upwards of 1,000 villages. Area, 688 square miles. Pop. 70,000. Lat. between 23° 52′ and 25° 5′ N. Lon. between 79° 50′ and 80° 45′ E.—Also a TOWN, 62 miles from Banda, mostly tenanted by monkeys. There are a palace and numerous temples, and supposed inexhaustible diamond-mines in the vicinity.

PUNO, poo'-no, a department of S. Peru, inclosed by Bolivia on the E., and on the other sides by the departments Arequipa and Cuzco. Area, 21,510 square miles. Desc. Nearly inclosed by the Cordilleras of the Andes, and formerly famous for its silver-mines. Pro. Barley, potatoes, and cattle are reared. Pop. 260,000. Lat. between 14° and 18° S. Lon. between 69° and 72° W.

PURBACH, George, poor'-bak, a German mathematician, so called from his native place, a village of that name in Germany. He studied philosophy and divinity at Vienna; but devoted himself principally to astronomical pursuits, translated Ptolemy's "Almagest," invented some astronomical instruments, constructed tables, and made numerous observations. B. at Purbach, near Linz, 1423; D. at Vienna, 1461.

PURBECK, ISLE OF, pur'-bek, a peninsular district of Dorsetshire. It is situate on the English Channel, is nearly surrounded by the sea and the river Frome, and comprehends the whole of the south-eastern corner of the county, from Luckford Lake eastwards. Ext. 10 miles long and 7 broad. Purbeck has been long famous for its stone, which is in great demand both for building and paving.

PURCELL, Henry, pur'-sel, an eminent English musical composer, was brought up in the king's chapel; at the age of 18 was made organist of Westminster Abbey, and, in 1682, one of the organists of the chapel-royal. His church music is in the grandest style, and his operas are very fine. Dryden, whose songs he set, has paid a fine compliment to his talents. His beautiful songs were published in a collection entitled "Orpheus Britannicus." B. in London, 1658; D. 1695, and was buried in Westminster Abbey.

PURCHAS, Samuel, pur'-kas, a learned English divine and writer, who was educated at Cambridge, and, after entering into orders, obtained the vicarage of Eastwood, in Essex, in 1604; but, having conceived the idea of compiling a collection of voyages, he removed to London, in order to prosecute his studies, and left his living to his brother. After settling in London, he was presented to the living of St. Martin, Ludgate, and was also appointed chaplain to Archbishop Abbot. His works are as valuable as they are curious: "Purchas his Pilgrimage; or, Relations of the World, and the Religions observed in all Ages and Places discovered from the Creation unto this Present," the materials for which he derived from upwards of thirteen hundred authors. He also produced "Purchas his Pilgrims;" the difference between which and the preceding is thus stated by himself:—"These brethren, holding much resemblance in name, nature, and feature, yet differ in both the object and the subject; that being mine own in matter, though borrowed, and in the form of words and method; whereas the Pilgrims are the authors themselves, acting their own parts in their own words." He also wrote "Microcosmus; or, the History of Man," and some volumes of sermons. B. at Thaxted, Essex, 1577; D. 1628.

PURGATURO, poor'-ga-too'-ro, a small island near the city of Naples. It serves for performing quarantine. Pop. 14,000.

PURNEAH, pur-ne-a', a district of Bengal, forming the north-west division of that province. Area, 5,878 square miles. Desc. Level, and subject to inundations by the streams which flow from the Himalaya. This year the fields may be covered with sand, and the next, by a rich deposit of mud. Pro. Rice, barley, wheat, Indian corn, opium, indigo, oil-seeds, and vegetables. Its domestic animals are the buffalo, the sheep, and the goat. Manf. Cottons, woollens, and silks. Pop. 1,600,000. Lat. between 25° 9′ and 26° 37′ N. Lon. between 86° 48′ and 88° 23′ E.

PURNEAH, the capital of the above district, stands on the Seraw river. It has a good trade, and is the residence of the judge, collector, &c., of the district. Pop. 50,000. Lat. 25° 45′ N. Lon. 88° 23′ E.

PUSEY, Rev. Edward Bouverie, pu'-se, an English divine, and the chief instrument of that movement in the established church of England which has been called the Anglo-Catholic and the Puseyite movement. He was educated at Oxford, where, about 1822, he was elected fellow of Oriel College. In 1833 he commenced the publication of the Oxford "Tracts for the Times." These tracts, together with his sermons and letters, evinced a desire for the re-establishment of ceremonies and forms which had not been in use in the English church since the Reformation. He incurred the displeasure of most of his ecclesiastical superiors; but, on the other hand, succeeded in finding a band of strong partisans among the clergy of England. Dr. Pusey wrote several volumes of sermons, adapted some Roman Catholic devotional works for the use of the established church, and edited the "Anglo-Catholic Library." B. 1800.

PUSHKIN, Alexander Sergievitch, poosh'-kin, the Byron of Russia. Whilst a student, he neglected his studies for poetry, and immediately after quitting the academy he began to exercise his talents in writing verses to liberty; but these political views were unsuited to Russia, and the poet was compelled to accept an appointment at Odessa. Siberia would doubtless have been his destination, had he not brought out, at the same time, a patriotic poem relative to Vladimir, the Charlemagne of his country. In 1822 he produced his "Prisoner of the Caucasus," which was not as successful as his later works; such as "The Gipsies," "Onægin," and "Poltava." The great popularity of these latter poems led to his recall. He secured the favour of the emperor Nicholas, who appointed him historiographer, with a pension of 6,000 roubles. After this his opinions underwent an almost total change. His last efforts were almost entirely confined to prose composition; but his labours were brought to a sudden and unfortunate termination by his being shot in a duel with an officer. The emperor bestowed a pension upon his widow and family, and ordered a fine edition of the poet's works to be produced at his own expense. B. at St. Petersburg, 1799; D. 1837.

PUSTERTHAL, poos'-ter-hal, the E. part, and formerly a circle of the Tyrol, watered by the head-streams of the Adige and the Drave. Area, 2,100 square miles. Pop. 100,000.

PUTBUS, poot'-boos, a lordship of Prussia, in the island of Rugen, 5 miles from Bergen. Area, 128 square miles. Pop. 13,000.

PUTIVL, poo-tivl', a town of the interior of European Russia, in the government of Kursk, on the Sem. It has numerous churches and chapels, and other public buildings. It trades chiefly in the rural produce of the vicinity. Pop. 9,000.

PUTNAM, put'-nam, the name of several counties in the United States.—1. In Georgia. Area, 273 square miles. Pop. 11,000.—2. In New York. Pop. 14,293.—3. In Ohio. Area, 468 square miles. Pop. 7,500.—4. In Indiana. Pop. 15,000.—5. In Virginia. Pop. 6,000.

PUTNAM, Israel, an American republican general. He was destined to the occupation of a farmer, and continued in that avocation till the French and Indian war broke out, when, at the age of 36, he took service in the English army, and from his known courage and energy, received the command of a company of light troops or "rangers," at the head of which he performed prodigies of valour during ten years. When the dispute between his country and England commenced, he was following the quiet life of a farmer and tavern-keeper; but the first blood that was shed roused all his fiery energy. He was created major-general by Congress; and at Bunker's Hill, New York, and during Washington's retreat through New Jersey, he showed himself one of the bravest and most devoted of the patriot leaders. But in 1779 he was stricken with paralysis, and was prevented from participating in the final triumphs of his countrymen. B. at Salem, Massachusetts, 1718; D. at Brooklyn, Connecticut, 1790.

PUTNEY, put'-ne, a parish and pleasant village of England, in the county of Surrey, on the Thames, connected with Fulham, on the opposite side, by a wooden bridge, 6½ miles from St. Paul's Cathedral, London. The church is an old Gothic building. On Putney heath are numerous villas of merchants and other opulent citizens of the metropolis. Pop. 5,300.—Gibbon, the historian, was born here. Steamers ply to it constantly from London.

PUTTEALA, put-te-a'-la, a native state of Sirhind, India, within the jurisdiction of the Cis-Sutlej states. Area, 4,448 square miles. Desc. Fertile, and it raises large quantities of grain. Pop. 665,000.

PUTTUN, poot-toon', a town of India, in the territory of the Guicowar. Manf. Silks, cottons, swords, spears, and pottery. Pop. Estimated at 30,000.

PUTUMAYO, also called ICA, poot-too-mi'-o, a river of South America, which, after a course of 700 miles, joins the Amazon, in lat. 3° 30′ S., lon. 50° 40′ W.

PUY, LE, pwe, an ill-built town of France, capital of the department of the Upper Loire, on the Borne, 70 miles from Lyons. It stands on the S. slope of Mount Arris, crowned by the basaltic rock of Corneille. It has a large cathedral, less remarkable for its architecture than for a miraculous image of the Virgin. Manf. Blankets, linen, lace, silk, and stoneware. Pop. 16,000.

PUY-DE-DÔME, a department in the central part of France, towards the east, comprising the northern part of Auvergne. Area, 2,253 square miles. Desc. Mountainous; containing a large number of puys or peaks, the principal of which are Mont Dor and the Puy-de-Dôme. Its soil, in the high grounds, is dry and stony; but in the beautiful valley of Limagne it is fertile. Rivers. The Allier, the Dore, the Sioule, the Couze, the Dolore, the Veyre, and several inferior streams. Pro. Grain, hemp, wine, and fruit. Chestnuts are the principal food of some of the inhabitants, and cattle and sheep are extensively reared. Minerals. Coal, antimony, silver, lead, alum, and marble. Manf. Linens, woollens, and paper. Pop. about 60,000.

PUYLAURENS, pwe'-law-rang, a parish and town of France, in the department of the Tarn, 13 miles from Lavaur. Pop. 6,200.—The fortifications of this place were dismantled by Louis XIII.

PUZZUOLO, or POZZUOLI, poot'-soo-o-le, anciently Puteoli, once a celebrated town of Italy, delightfully situate on a point projecting into the sea, nearly in the centre of the fine bay of Puzzuolo, 7 miles from Naples. Commerce has long since forsaken this place, and the devastations of war and earthquakes have greatly reduced it. Pop. 14,000.—Near it is the Grotto del Cave.

PYE, Henry James, pi, an English poet-laureate, who was educated at the university of Oxford, and produced several volumes of poems, and a translation of Aristotle's "Poetics," which obtained for him the office of laureate in 1790. He was also a member of parliament, a magistrate, and a commissioner of police. His verses are both poor and tame. B. in Berkshire, about 1740; D. 1813.

PYLADES. (See ORESTES.)

PYM, John, pim, an English statesman, who received his education at the university of Oxford, and afterwards applied himself to the study of the law. The representative of a good Somersetshire family, he early entered the House of Commons, where he distinguished himself as a bold and eloquent debater. As member for Tavistock, in Devonshire, he was one of the most energetic opposers of the measures of Charles I., and in 1626 acted as one of the managers of the impeachment of the duke of Buckingham. In 1640 he delivered a remarkable speech to the House of Commons, in which he declared that the earl of Strafford was the "principal author and promoter of all those counsels which had exposed the kingdom to so much ruin." The impeachment of Strafford was the result of this oration. Against Laud he also delivered an eloquent speech; and his power and influence became so great during the crisis which speedily ensued, that he was called "King Pym." In 1641, Pym delivered a speech to the Lords upon presenting petitions which had been received by the lower house, of such eloquence and boldness, that the Commons voted him their thanks. In the subsequent struggle between Charles and the parliament, Pym was nominated lieutenant of the ordnance; but his death occurred shortly afterwards. B. in Somersetshire, 1584; D. in London, 1643.

PYNE, James B., pine, a modern English painter, who was articled to a solicitor, but, upon the expiration of his apprenticeship, devoted himself to landscape-painting. In 1835 he went to London, and after labouring steadily during several years, at length attracted notice as a vigorous and able landscape-painter. Besides his paintings, he produced several collections of lithographic drawings, the chief of which were "The English Lake District," and "Windsor and its surrounding Scenery." B. at Bristol, 1800.

PYRAMUS, pir'-a-mus, a Babylonian youth, who became enamoured of Thisbe, a beautiful virgin. Their affection was mutual, and the lovers, whom their parents forbade to marry, regularly interchanged sentiments through the chink of a wall which separated their houses. They both agreed to elude the vigilance of their friends, and to meet at the tomb of Ninus, under a white mulberry-tree, outside the walls of Babylon. Thisbe came first to the appointed place; but the sudden arrival of a lioness frightened her away, and, as she fled, she dropped her veil, which the lioness found and covered with blood. Pyramus soon arrived, and, finding Thisbe's veil bloody, concluded that she had been torn to pieces by wild beasts, and stabbed himself. Thisbe, when her fears vanished, returned from the cave, and at the sight of the dying Pyramus, fell upon the sword still reeking with his blood. The tree, as the poets mention, was stained with the blood of the lovers, and ever after bore fruit, but of the colour of blood.

PYRENEES, pir'-e-nees', an extensive mountain-range in the south of Europe, dividing France from Spain, and extending, almost in a straight line, from St. Sebastian, on the Bay of Biscay, to Port Vendres, on the Mediterranean. Ext. 270 miles, with a breadth of from 50 to 100. From them proceed, under various names, a number of inferior ramifications of mountains along the French territory to the north, and the Spanish to the south. The acclivity of the Pyrenees, on the side of Spain, is often extremely steep, presenting a continued succession of rugged chasms, abrupt precipices, and huge masses of naked rock; on that of France, the ascent is generally gradual, and the mountains both more accessible and of more pleasant aspect: they have a mean altitude of nearly 8,000 feet, which is also the limit of the snow-line. The principal summits are Mont Perdu, which has an elevation of 10,994 feet; the Vignemale, 10,820 feet; and Pic-tethou (Maladetta), 11,168 feet. They contain glaciers as in the Alps; but these masses of permanent ice are much less extensive. In an extent of 250 miles, there are necessarily many passes; the total number, including paths for pedestrians, exceeds fifty; but the carriage-roads hardly exceed five; and of these the most frequented are from Jonquera to Perpignan on the east, from St. Sebastian to St. Jean de Luz on the west, and, at some distance inland, from Pampeluna to St. Jean de Pied de Port. The passes in the interior are over very high ground: thus that of Pineda is 8,248 feet above the sea; Gavarnie, 7,654; Lavareze, 7,350; and Tourmalet, 7,143. The principal rivers rising in the Pyrenees are the Adour, Garonne, and Aude, flowing N., and the Slobregat and numerous affluents of the Ebro, flowing S.

PYRENEES, EASTERN, or ORIENTALES, a department in the south of France, comprising what formerly constituted the provinces of Roussillon, Cerdagne, and part of Languedoc. Area, 1,593 square miles. Desc. Mountainous; but with not so great a degree of elevation as in the centre of the Pyrenees; and, on the coast of the Mediterranean, there is an extensive plain. Rivers. The Tet, the Tech, the Gly, and other inferior streams. Pop. 182,000.

PYRENEES, LOWER, a department in the S.W. of France, including the ancient provinces of Bearn and Navarre; i.e., the N.W. part of the Pyrenees, and the country between them and the Bay of Biscay. Its superficial extent amounts to 3,100 square miles; its population to 383,000. The face of the country is mountainous; the scenery extremely diversified and romantic. It is watered by the Adour and a number of mountain streams called gaves, all flowing westward from the Pyrenees to the sea.

PYRENEES, UPPER, a department in the S.W. of France, formed by a portion of the Pyrenees, about 70 miles from the Bay of Biscay, and of the tract of country to the north. Area, 1,800 square miles. Desc. Mountainous, and remarkable for its picturesque views and diversified scenery. The soil in the elevated regions is stony, and little fitted for cultivation; but wine is abundant and of good quality. Cattle are extensively reared, and the horses are excellent. Rivers. The Garonne, the Gimone, the Louzon, the Save, the Gers, and a multitude of inferior streams. Pop. 252,000.

PYRENEES, AUSTRALIAN, a name given to a mountain-range in the colony of Victoria, between the Australian Alps and the Grampians.

PYRITZ, pe'-ritz, a town of Prussia, in Pomerania, 24 miles from Stettin. Manf. Woollen cloth and leather. Pop. 5,500.

PYRMONT, peer-mont', a town in the N.W. of Germany, in great repute for its mineral springs, 33 miles from Hanover. Pop. 1,300.

PYRRHO, pir'-ro, a Greek philosopher, who founded the Pyrrhonian or first sceptic school, which doubted the truth of everything. After studying under Anaxarchus, he followed in the train of Alexander's army into India, where he attended the Gymnosophists, and acquired a knowledge of the doctrines of the Persian magi. After his return to Greece, he lived a retired life, but obtained many disciples.

PYRRHUS, pir'-rus, king of Epirus, was an infant when his father was slain; but was saved from the fury of the insurgents by some faithful servants, and conveyed to Glaucias, king of the Illyrians, who brought him up and restored him to his throne. He was obliged to take Neoptolemus as a partner in the government; but the latter having attempted his life, Pyrrhus defeated him and henceforth reigned alone. His reign dates from 295 B.C. He seized a great part of Macedonia, but was defeated and driven out of the country by Lysimachus, 283 B.C. In 281 B.C. he went to assist the Tarentines against the Romans; and, though he fought under great disadvantages, defeated them upon the banks of the Siris. He afterwards went to Sicily, and contributed to expel the Carthaginians; but, in sailing to Tarentum, his fleet was defeated, and only a few of his ships escaped. He afterwards laid siege to Sparta, but without success. He was slain in an attempt on Argos, by a tile which a woman threw on his head from the top of her house, 273 B.C.—The biography of Pyrrhus is one of the finest in Plutarch.

PYTHAGORAS, pi-thăg'-o-răs, a celebrated Greek philosopher. He studied in Egypt many years, and, after travelling over a great part of Asia, returned to his native place; but, finding that Polycrates had usurped the government at Samos, he went to Crotona, in Italy, where he taught philosophy with great reputation. Students came to him from all parts, on whom he imposed a probationary silence for five years; after which they were required to place their property in the common stock. He greatly reformed the manners of the people of Crotona and its neighbourhood, and several of his disciples became excellent legislators, particularly Zeleucus. He was the first who assumed the title of philosopher, and held that the sun was in the centre of the universe, and that the earth revolved round it with the other planets. His other principles were less rational, for he maintained the doctrine of a transmigration of souls, and the unlawfulness of eating animal food. B. at Samos, about 570 B.C.; D. about 504 B.C.

PYTHEAS, pith'-e-ăs, a Greek traveller, who was the cotemporary of Aristotle, and rendered himself famous by his skill in mathematics. He travelled into various countries and made numerous discoveries, particularly with respect to the length of the days in different climates, and the obliquity of the ecliptic. In his "Description of the Ocean," he states that he sailed through the English Channel and as far as Thule, generally supposed to be Iceland.

PYTHEAS, a rhetorician of Athens, who opposed Demosthenes, and sarcastically said that his orations smelt of the lamp.

PYTHIAS. (See DAMON.)

PYTHON, pi'-thon, a celebrated serpent, sprung from the mud which remained on the earth after the deluge of Deucalion. Some suppose it produced by Juno, and sent by the goddess to persecute Latona. Apollo, as soon as born, attacked the monster, and killed him with his arrows; and, in commemoration of the victory, he instituted the celebrated Pythian games.

PYZDRY, piz'-dre, a town of Russian Poland, on the Warta, 33 miles from Kalisz. Pop. 3,300.

Q.

QUADRA AND VANCOUVER'S ISLAND, quad'-ra, on the N.W. coast of North America, between Queen Charlotte's Sound and De Fuca's Straits. (See VANCOUVER'S ISLAND.)

QUADRIO, Francis Xavier, quad'-re-o, a learned Italian writer, whose principal works are, "On the Italian Poetry," "History of Italian Poetry," "Historical Dissertations upon the Valteline." B. 1695; D. at Milan, 1756.

QUAHERAH. (See CAIRO.)

QUAIN, Jones, quain, a modern Irish anatomist, who was educated for the medical profession at Paris, and became professor of anatomy in the University College, London. His most important works were, "Elements of Anatomy," the best treatise of its kind in the English language; and a translation of Dr. Martinet's "Manual of Pathology." B. at Mallow, Ireland.

QUAIN, Richard, an eminent surgeon, brother of the preceding, under whom he received his professional education, and also succeeded him as professor of anatomy at University College. His principal work is, "Anatomy of the Arteries of the Human Body." He also contributed many valuable papers to the "Transactions of the Medico-Chirurgical Society." B. at Mallow, Ireland.

QUAIN, Richard, cousin of the preceding, and a distinguished physician, who filled the offices of house physician at University College Hospital, and afterwards physician to the Consumptive Hospital at Brompton. He invented the stethometer, and wrote a treatise on "Fatty Diseases of the Heart." B. at Mallow, Ireland.

QUANG, quäng, the prefix of numerous places in E. Asia.

QUANGSI, quang-si', a province of China, situate on the south-western frontier, bordering on Tonquin. It is densely wooded, and mostly uncultivated. Pop. Estimated at about 7,000,000. Lat. between 22° and 26° N. Lon. between 105° and 112° 30′ E.

QUANGTONG, quäng-tong', cän-ton', an extensive province in the south of China, washed on the east and south by the sea. Desc. Fertile, with an excellent water communication. Pro. Rice, sugar, green tea of inferior quality, betel-nut, and iron. Manf. Silks, cottons, grass-cloths, glass, and lacquered wares. Pop. 19,200,000. Lat. between 20° and 25° 30′ N. Lon. between 108° and 117° E.

QUARTO, quawr'-to, a town of Sardinia, 4 miles from Cagliari, standing in a salt-marsh. It is very unhealthy. Pop. 5,400.

QUATRE BRAS, katr bra, a hamlet of Belgium, 7 miles from Ligny, noted for an obstinate conflict between the British and French on the 16th June, 1815, where the duke of Brunswick "foremost fighting fell."

QUATREMÈRE DE QUINCY, Antony Chrysostom, kat'-re-mair, an eminent French archæologist, who became a member of the Legislative Assembly in 1790; but having declared himself in favour of a constitutional monarchy, was thrown into prison during the Reign of Terror, and remained there thirteen months. His royalist principles subsequently led to his being condemned to death by the Directory; but he contrived to effect his escape. Under the empire he was allowed to return to his native country, where he led a retired and studious life. At the restoration of the Bourbons he received the appointments of royal censor, intendant-general of the public arts and monuments, and member of the Council of Instruction. He subsequently became member of the French Institute, perpetual secretary of the Academy of Fine Arts, and member for the department of the Seine. His principal works were "Dictionary of Architecture," "The Arts of Design in France," and lives of Raffaelle, Canova, and Michael Angelo. B. at Paris, 1758; D. 1849.

QUARLES, Francis, quawrles, an English poet, who received the appointment of cupbearer to Elizabeth, daughter of James I. and queen of Bohemia, after which he became secretary to Archbishop Usher, and chronologer to the city of London. He was a zealous royalist, for which his estates were sequestrated and his goods plundered. The loss of his manuscripts is said to have preyed so much upon his spirits as to occasion his death. He wrote several works, the best known of which is his "Emblems, Meditations, and Hieroglyphics." Pope is supposed to have been considerably indebted to his works. B. near Rumford, Essex, 1592; D. 1644.

QUATTROMANI, Sertorio, quat'-tro-ma'-ne, a learned Italian writer, who, through the influence of Paul Manutius, was admitted into the library of the Vatican, where he studied the Greek writers with great avidity. He was afterwards taken into the service of the duke of Nocera, who held him in great esteem. After the death of his patron, he accepted an invitation from the prince de Stigliano, but he did not long remain in his service. He translated the Æneid into Italian verse; and his works were printed together at Naples in 1711. B. at Cosenza, Naples, about 1541; D. about 1606.

QUAY, ST., kwi, a maritime village of France, in the department of the Côtes-du-Nord, 11 miles from St. Brieux. Pop. 2,500.

QUEBEC, que-bek' (Fr. QUÉBEC, kai-bek', Ind. ke-bek', 'narrow'), a city of North America, and capital of Lower Canada, on a promontory of the St. Lawrence, formed by that river and the St. Charles, 400 miles from the Gulf of St. Lawrence. The ridge of land on which it stands is from one to two miles broad. It has Cape Diamond, a bold promontory, on the N.; and across it, at the N.E. or lower end, the town of Quebec is built. The fortifications, extending across the breadth of the peninsula, have a circuit of about 2¾ miles, and are divided into two parts, namely, the Upper and Lower. The upper town may be said to stand on Cape Diamond, at least upon the side of it which slopes towards the St. Charles; the lower is situate immediately under Cape Diamond. The communication from the upper to the lower town is by a winding street, at the top of which is a fortified gate; but the peculiar situation of the city occasions great irregularity and unevenness in the streets. The principal public buildings are the castle of St. Louis, on the summit of the rock, the court-house, the Protestant cathedral, the Catholic cathedral, a lofty, spacious, plain, stone edifice; the Ursuline convent, the gaol, the barrack, which has an ordnance office, armory, storehouses, and workshops; a reading-room, royal institution, French grammar-school, medical school, mechanics' institute, city library, and several benevolent institutions. There are two market-places, a place d'armes, a parade, and an esplanade. Manf. Soap, candles, tobacco; and there are distilleries, breweries, and shipbuilding-yards. Its harbour admits ships of the line, and it is the great entrepôt for the trade of Canada with Britain, the West Indies, &c. Pop. 270,000. Lat. 46° 49′ 1″ N. Lon. 71° 13′ W.—Quebec was founded by the French in 1608. In 1629 it was taken by the English, but afterwards restored. It was again taken in 1759, by the English, under the command of General Wolfe, who fell in the engagement; and by the peace in 1763 it was ceded, with the rest of Canada, to the conquerors. The climate of Quebec is intensely cold during the winter; but it is not always that the St. Lawrence is frozen over. In 1845 a large part of the town, outside of the fortifications, was destroyed by fire.

QUEDA, kaï'-da, a country of Asia, situate on the western coast of the peninsula of Malacca. It is densely wooded, and produces tin and gold. Pop. 70,000. Lat. between 5° 10′ and 7° 30′ N., and stretches inland from 20 to 25 miles.

QUEDLINBURG, kwed'-lin-boorg, a town of Prussian Saxony, on the Bude, 30 miles from Magdeburg. Its abbey church is handsome, but the other buildings are remarkable only for antiquities. Manf. Woollen stuffs. Pop. 14,200.—Here Klopstock, the author of the "Messiah," and Karl Ritter were born.

QUEEN ANNE, a county of Maryland, U.S. Area, 403 square miles. Pop. 14,500.

QUEENBOROUGH, queen'-bo-ro, a market-town and borough of Kent, near the mouth of the Medway, 2 miles from Sheerness. The church is an ancient building, and the guildhall is very neat. Pop. 900; mostly fishermen.

QUEEN CHARLOTTE'S ISLANDS, a group in the North Pacific Ocean, off the coast of North America. The largest is 170 miles long, and in some places 60 broad. Their inhabitants are savages. Lat. 52° to 54° 22′ N. Lon. from 131° to 133° 7′ W.

QUEEN CHARLOTTE'S ISLANDS, a group in the S. Pacific, discovered by Captain Carteret, in the year 1767. Lat. 9° 50′ to 11° 20′ S. Lon. between 163° 30′ and 165° 10′ E.

QUEEN CHARLOTTE'S SOUND, a bay at the N. end of the southern island of New Zealand. Also the name of the N. portion of the strait which separates Vancouver's Island from the mainland. Lat. of entrance, 51° 55′ N. Lon. 131° 2′ W.

QUEEN'S COUNTY, an inland county of Ireland, bounded N. and W. by King's County; E. by Kildare and part of Carlow; S. by Kilkenny; and S.W. by Tipperary. Area, 664 square miles. Desc. Along its western boundary runs a range of high and steep mountains; and in the eastern division the Dysart hills form a prominent and picturesque object. These heights command the view of a fine and beautiful country, adorned with rich plantations and splendid demesnes. Rivers. The principal are the Barrow and the Nore. There are no lakes deserving of notice. Pro. Potatoes, wheat, and oats. Minerals. The principal are coal and limestone. Manf. Woollen, linen, and cotton stuffs; but the trade consists mostly in transporting farm produce and cattle to Dublin and England. Pop. 112,000.

QUEEN'S COUNTY, a county of New York, U.S., in the W. part of Long Island. Area, 396 square miles. Pop. 37,000.

QUEENSFERRY, SOUTH, queenz'-fer-e, a royal borough of Scotland, in Linlithgowshire, on the coast of the Firth of Forth, 9 miles from Edinburgh. It consists of one regular street, and has an old chapel, with a stone roof. The town derives its chief consequence from the ferry over the Firth of Forth. Manf. Soap; and there are several breweries. Pop. 1,200. —NORTH QUEENSFERRY is on the opposite side of the Forth, and has a population of about 500.

QUEENSTOWN, Ireland. (See COVE OF CORK.)

QUEENSTOWN, a neat village of Upper Canada, on the Niagara. It is the depôt of all the merchandise and stores brought from Montreal and Quebec. Queenstown suffered much during the war in 1814 between Great Britain and the United States.

QUELPAERT, quel-part', an island at the entrance of the Yellow Sea, 60 miles from Corea. Ext. 45 miles long, with a breadth of 12. Desc. Volcanic, but well-wooded, and rearing cattle extensively. Lat. of Beaufort Island, 33° 9′ N. Lon. 126° 56′ E.

QUELUZ, kaï'-looz, a town of Brazil, about 20 miles from Ouro Preto. Pop. of district, 6,000.

QUENTIN, ST., quen'-tin (Fr. ken'-tă), a town of France, in the department of the Aisne, on the Somme, 24 miles from Laon. It has a public square, in which is situate the town-hall. This and the ancient cathedral, both in the Gothic style, are the only buildings of interest in the town. Manf. Thread, linen, cambric, lawn, gauze, and cottons; also leather, soap, and sulphuric acid. Pop. 25,000. The terminus of the railway from Creil is here.—The Spaniards defeated the French here in 1557.

QUERASIO. (See CHERASIO.)

QUERETARO, ke-raï'-ta-ro, a city of Mexico, capital of a department of the same name, in the Mexican Confederation, 110 miles from Mexico. It is a fine city, and the largest, after Mexico, in the intendancy to which it belongs. From north to south it is sheltered by a mountain, and thence begins its celebrated glen, where the fields and groves are irrigated by a large river, the waters of which are introduced by means of hidden aqueducts. It has three grand squares, and a celebrated channel, about 10 miles long, for carrying the water to the city. The parish church is magnificent, and there are several convents. Manf. Fine cloths, baizes, and serges. It has a great number of shops and stalls, furnished with all sorts of provisions; and also tanneries, in which leather and belts are dressed and made. Humboldt also visited a great manufactory of cigars. Pop. 30,000. Lat. 20° 38′ N. Lon. 100° 11′ W.—The DEPARTMENT has an area of 7,500 square miles and a population of 190,000.

QUERIMBA, ke-rim'-ba, the name given to a range of islands extending along the E. coast of Africa, to the south of Cape Delgado. They are comprised in the Portuguese territory of Mozambique. The principal island is 4 or 5 miles long, containing about 30 farmhouses and a small fort. Lat. 12° 20′ S. Lon. 40° 58′ E.

QUERINI, Angelo Maria, quaï-re'-ne, a celebrated Italian cardinal, who, at the age of 17, entered among the Benedictines. In 1710 he travelled in Germany, whence he passed to Holland, England, and France, in which countries he contracted an intimacy with the most learned men of the age, particularly Newton, Bentley, Fénélon, and Montfaucon. Benedict XIII. made him archbishop and cardinal, which dignities he filled with great reputation. Cardinal Querini formed a magnificent library, which he gave to the Vatican. His most important works were a Latin treatise upon the Antiquities and History of Corfu; a Literary History of Brescia; Lives of Popes Paul I., II., and III.; and an edition of the Letters of Cardinal Pole. B. at Venice, 1680; D. at Rome, 1755.

QUESADA, kai-sa'-da, a town of Spain, in the province of Jaen, 40 miles from the city of that name. Pop. 4,500.

QUESNAY, Francis, kes'-nai, a learned French physician, who became physician to the king of France, member of the Academy of Sciences at Paris, and of the Royal Society of London. He was the principal of the society called Economists. His works are: "On the Effects of Bleeding;" "Physical Essay on the Animal Economy;" "Treatise on Fevers." B. 1694; D. 1774.

QUESNEL, Pasquier, kes'-nel, a celebrated French controversialist, who studied theology, after which he became distinguished by his learning and piety; but being a zealous Jansenist, he was obliged to retire to Brussels, where he published his "Reflections on the New Testament," which work was attacked by the Jesuits, and occasioned so much controversy that Pope Clement XI. issued his famous bull, called "Unigenitus," against Quesnel's book. Through the intrigues of the Jesuits he was thrown into prison, and put in irons; but he effected his escape, with the assistance of a Spanish gentleman. He wrote a number of pieces of practical and controversial divinity. B. at Paris, 1634; D. at Amsterdam, 1719.

QUESNOY, LE, kes'-noi, a fortified town of France, 20 miles from N. Cambray. Pop. 3,200.—Another on the Deule, 6 miles from Lisle. Pop. 1,900.

QUETELET, Lambert Adolphus James, ket'-e-lai, a modern Belgian philosopher, who, at 18, received the appointment of professor of mathematics at Ghent. In 1826 he became director of the new observatory at Brussels, member and perpetual secretary of the Academy of Sciences in the same city. His most important works were,—"Theory of Probabilities applied to Moral and Political Science;" "Researches upon Reproduction and Mortality;" "The Influence of the Seasons upon Mortality at different Ages;" and a series of memoirs on astronomy, physics, and mathematics. B. at Ghent, 1796.

QUEVEDO DE VILLEGAS, Francis, kai-vai'-do, an eminent Spanish author, who cultivated both poetry and prose, and his works were much esteemed; but some of them gave such offence, that the author was thrown into prison, where he remained. His works were published at Madrid in 1772, under the title of "Parnasso Espagnolo." His "Visions of Hell" have been translated into English. B. at Madrid, 1580; D. 1645.

QUIA COUNTRY, ke'-a, a territory of W. Africa, immediately east of the peninsula Sierra Leone, with an area of about 1,300 square miles, yielding crops of rice, maize, and yams.

QUIBERON, ke'-be-rawng, a town of France, in the department of the Morbihan, on a long and narrow peninsula of the same name, which, with some islands, forms one of the largest bays in Europe, 24 miles from L'Orient. Pop. 3,600, mostly fishermen. In 1795 a body of French emigrants landed here, and were overpowered by the republican troops, and dispersed. Those who were taken were shot.

QUIEVRAIN, keev'-rä, a market-town of Belgium, 9 miles from Valenciennes, at the junction of the Belgian and French railway. Pop. 2,200.

QUILIMANE, ke-le-ma'-nai, a maritime town, with a fort, of Mozambique, in Eastern Africa, at the mouth of the Zambezi. It has a trade in gold and ivory, but its principal traffic is in slaves. Coal is said to be abundant in its neighbourhood. Pop. Unascertained. Lat. 17° 51′ 8″ S. Lon. 37° 1′ E.

QUILLEBŒUF, keel-bee(r)f', a town of France, in the department of the Eure, on the Lower Seine, 7 miles from Pont-Audemer. Pop. 1,500. Here is a pilot station with 110 pilots.

QUILLET, Claude, keel'-lai, a French physician and Latin poet, who, to avoid the resentment of Cardinal Richelieu, retired to Rome, where he wrote his "Callipædia," a Latin poem, on the art of having beautiful children. In this piece he satirized Cardinal Mazarin, who, instead of punishing him, gave him an abbey. In 1656, Quillet published a new edition of his poem, dedicated to the cardinal, substituting an eulogy instead of satire. He also wrote a Latin poem called "The Henriade." His "Callipædia" has been translated into English by Rowe. B. 1602; D. 1661.

QUILLOTA, keel-yo'-ta, a town of Chili, pleasantly situate on the Aconcagua, 20 miles from the Pacific. Pop. about 10,000. Lat. 32° 50′ S. Lon. 71° 18′ W.

QUILOA, ke'-lo-a, a city and seaport of Eastern Africa, once the capital of the Portuguese settlements in that country. It now consists of a few scattered huts. Lat. 8° 41′ S. Lon. 39° 47′ E.

QUILON, ke-lon', a seaport-town of S. India, on the Malabar coast, 37 miles from Trivandrum. It has an active import trade in pepper and cotton. Pop. about 20,000.

QUIMPER, or QUIMPER CORENTIN, kim'-pai, a town of France, in the department of Finistère, at the confluence of two navigable rivers, 32 miles from Brest. The only objects of interest are the cathedral, the exchange, the public library, and the botanical garden; but it has, besides, a theatre, communal college, and baths. Manf. Hats, porcelain, linen, and hempen fabrics. Pop. 11,000.

QUIMPERLE, kim'-pairl, a town of France, in the department of Finistère, 27 miles from Quimper. Manf. Paper. Pop. 6,200.

QUIN, James, quin, an eminent English actor, who was intended for the law; but, having a strong inclination for the stage, he joined a company of players, and, after performing at Dublin and other places with applause, was engaged at Covent Garden, where he played Falstaff with the greatest success. He became the first actor of his time till Garrick appeared. In 1746 the rival actors performed together in the "Fair Penitent," and exhibited an astonishing display of powers. Quin was employed by Frederick, prince of Wales, to instruct the royal children in elocution; and when he was informed of the graceful manner in which George III. delivered his first speech from the throne, he emphatically said, "Ay, it was I who taught the boy to speak." About this time he obtained a pension, having retired from the stage some years before. B. in London, 1693; D. at Bath, 1766.

QUINAULT, Philip, ke'-nolte, a French dramatic poet, who is considered the first author of French operas. He also produced several tragedies and comedies of considerable merit. He was a member of the French Academy, and obtained a pension from Louis XIV. The works of Quinault were printed at Paris, with his Life, in 1778. B. at Paris, 1635; D. 1688.

QUINCY, Thomas de. (See DE QUINCY, Thomas.)

QUINCY, quin'-se, the name of several townships in the United States, none of them with a population above 7,000.

QUINET, Edgar, ke'-nai, a modern French author and statesman, who, after pursuing his educational career in his native country with some distinction, repaired to the university of Heidelberg, where he completed his education in the most brilliant manner. In 1828 he was appointed a member of the scientific commission dispatched to the Morea, and, in 1839, became professor of foreign literature to the Faculty of Letters at Lyons. An eloquent and ardent advocate of republicanism, the principles of which he defended both in his writings and in the councils of the nation, he was, after the coup d'état, expelled from France. He took up his residence at Brussels, and devoted himself entirely to literature. As an author, he was very prolific and diverse. His most important works were "Modern Greece," "Art in Germany," "Liberty of Discussion in Religious Matters," "The Austrian, French, Spanish, and Neapolitan Crusade against Rome," which was an energetic protest against the attacks made upon the republic of Rome in 1848; "The Philosophy of the History of France," and a dramatic poem. He also contributed many interesting and valuable articles to the "Revue des Deux Mondes." In 1852 he married, at Brussels, the daughter of the Moldavian poet Assaki. B. at Bourg, Ain, 1803.

QUINTANA, Manuel Jose, keen-ta'-na, a celebrated Spanish poet, who pursued the profession of advocate until the French invasion of Spain (1808), when he resolved to devote his pen to the denunciation of the foreign intruders. He drew up the manifestoes of the insurrectionary juntas, established a weekly periodical, wherein he persistently attacked the French, and, indeed, in many forms, proved himself the most eloquent and energetic literary antagonist with which they had to contend. But, at the same time, he was an advocate for free government, and his opinions found no favour with Ferdinand VII. Upon his return to Spain, Quintana was seized, and imprisoned during six years, and was subsequently banished to an obscure town in Estremadura. In 1828 he was permitted to return to Madrid, in consequence of his complying with King Ferdinand's request that he should write an ode upon the occasion of his third marriage. Honours and fortune followed: he was appointed director-general of studies and of public instruction; became a senator and a peer, and received in public, a crown of laurel from the queen of Spain. His odes written in favour of liberty are regarded as among the finest specimens of Spanish poetry. Mr. Prescott translated several of his prose biographies. B. at Madrid, 1772; D. at the same city, 1857.

QUINTANAR DE LA ORDEN, keen-ta'-nar, a town of Spain, in Toledo, 17 miles from Belmonte. Manf. Woollen stuffs. Pop. 6,000.

QUINTILIAN, or QUINTILIANUS, Marcus Fabius, quin-til'-i-ăn, quin-til-i-ai'-nus, a celebrated orator and critic. At the commencement of the reign of Galba, he opened a school of rhetoric at Rome, where he taught with great reputation, and was liberally rewarded by the government. He also pleaded in the forum, and was intrusted by Domitian with the education of his two nephews. His "Institutiones Oratoricæ" may be justly pronounced the finest system of rhetoric ever written. This invaluable work was discovered by Poggio Bracciolini in 1417, in the abbey of St. Gall. The best edition is that of Burmann, 1724, Leyden. B. either in Spain or at Rome, about 42; D. about 117.

QUINTIN, kăn'-tă, a town of France, in the department of the Côtes-du-Nord, on the Gouet, 9 miles from St. Brieuc. Manf. Linens and cambries. Pop. 4,000.

QUINTUS CALABER, or QUINTUS SMYRNÆUS, quin'-tus, a Greek poet, who wrote, in imitation of the style of Homer, a continuation of the "Iliad." The work was discovered by Cardinal Bessarion in Calabria, in the 15th century. Select translations of it appeared at Oxford in 1821. Supposed to have lived in the 5th century.

QUINTUS CURTIUS RUFUS, a Roman historian, of whose life nothing is known, but who is supposed to have been the writer spoken of by Suetonius. He wrote the "Acts of Alexander the Great, King of the Macedonians," in ten books, two of which are lost. The clear style of the work has caused it to become a classic, although it is more a romance than a history, and it is full of errors in geography and chronology. There are many editions of it, and an English translation was made by Digby in 1726. Supposed to have flourished at the beginning of the 1st century.

QUIRIN, ST., ke'-răn, a village of France, in the department of Meurthe, in the arrondissement of Sarrebourg, with a large mirror manufactory. Pop. 2,000.

QUIROS, Fernandes de, ke'-rose, a Spanish navigator, who was employed by Philip III. in making discoveries in the Pacific Ocean. In 1605 he discovered the Society Isles and other places. D. at Panama, 1614.

QUISTELLO, kees-tuil'-lo, a town of Austrian Italy, 12 miles from Mantua. Pop. Small.—Here the French were, in 1734, defeated by the Austrians.

QUITA, Dominic, ke'-ta, a Portuguese poet, who at first followed the trade of a barber, during which period he acquired, unaided, the Spanish, Italian, and French languages. He subsequently found a patron in the duke of San-Lorenzo. His poems consist of sonnets, pastorals, and dramatic pieces. B. 1728; D. 1770.

QUITO, ke'-to, an old province of South America, bounded N. by Santa Fe, and comprising some districts of Popayan, which also formed a part of its northern frontier; E. by the Portuguese frontiers; W. by the great Pacific Ocean, from the Gulf of Puna to the government of Atacames; and S. by Peru. In this immense territory the population is chiefly confined to the valley, which is formed on the very ridge of the main chain of the Andes, by the parallel summits making a prolonged series of small narrow plains. The eastern parts are chiefly immense tracts, thinly scattered with missionary villages. The vegetable productions vary with the elevation of the ground. The champaign country produces abundant crops of maize; and the deep ravines, where the temperature is hot, produce sugar-cane. The lands which are in elevated situations in the mountains possess a colder climate, and produce corn, barley, and all other sorts of grain. In its mountain-plains feed very large flocks of sheep, which with their wool furnish materials for the manufactures of this province. It now forms part of Ecuador. (See ECUADOR.)

QUITO, the capital of the republic of Ecuador, stands on the eastern slope of the western branch of the equitorial Andes, 150 miles from Guayaquil. The volcanic mountain of Pichincha is the basis on which it rests; and owing to the inequalities of the ground, the streets are very irregular and uneven. On one side of the principal square stands the cathedral, and on the opposite the episcopal palace; the third side is taken up with the town-house, and the fourth by the palace of the Audience. It is very spacious, and has in the centre an elegant fountain. Besides the principal square, there are two others, and both very spacious, together with several others that are smaller. In these the greatest part of the convents are situate, and make a handsome appearance. Manf. Coarse cotton and woollen goods, hosiery, lace, jewellery, and confectionary. It has a trade in agricultural produce, and exports iron, steel, and indigo. Pop. 78,000. Lat. 13′ 27″ S. Lon. 78° 50′ W.—The great danger of Quito is from earthquakes, and from the vicinity of burning mountains, which often break out into the most tremendous eruptions. On the 4th February, 1797, the country was shaken by a most dreadful concussion, and, in the space of a second, 40,000 persons were hurled into eternity. Since this period violent shocks of earthquakes have been frequently experienced. The height of Quito above the level of the sea is 9,543 feet. Eleven summits of mountains capped with snow are to be seen from it.

QUIVOX, ST., ke'-vox, a parish of Ayrshire, Scotland, 3 miles from Ayr. It stands in a coal-field, where there are some mines worked. Pop. 7,300.

QUORNDON, quorn'-don, a township of England, in Leicestershire, 3 miles from Sileby. Pop. 2,000.—It has a station on the Leeds branch of the Midland Counties Railway.

R.

RAAB, or GYORI VARMEGYE, rab, a county of Hungary, on both sides of the Danube, and of the river Raab. Area, 600 square miles. Pop. 80,000.

RAAB, a navigable river of Hungary, rising in Styria, and, after a course of 180 miles, falling into the Danube near Raab.

RAAB, GYOR, or NAGY-GYOR, the capital of the above county, nearly surrounded by the Danube, the Raab, and the Rabnitz, 65 miles from Buda. It is fortified both by nature and art, is regularly built, and has several handsome houses. Manf. Tobacco principally. Pop. 17,000.

RAALTE, ralt, a town of the Netherlands, in the province of Overryssel, 10 miles from Zwolle. Pop. 5,100.

RAAMAH, ra'-a-ma, a country of Arabia, supposed to have been near the Persian Gulf. From it were sent spices and precious stones to Tyre.

RAASAY, or RAAZA, ra-say', a considerable island of the Hebrides, between the mainland of Scotland and the Isle of Skye, from which it is separated by a narrow sound. Area, 28 square miles. Desc. Rough, rocky, and indifferently fruitful, with bold and dangerous shores. Pop. 700. Lat. 57° 25′ N. Lon. 6° W.

RABAGH, EL, ra'-ba, a town of Arabia Hedjaz, 110 miles from Mecca, on the road to Medina, near the Red Sea, and where pilgrims to Mecca perform their ablutions.

RABAN-MAUR, or MAGNENTIUS, ra'-ban-mor, a learned French prelate, who, after studying under Alcuinus, entered into orders, and was elected abbot of Fulda. In 847 he became archbishop of Mentz, and distinguished himself by writing against Gotescbalcus the monk, whom he delivered up to Hincmar, archbishop of Rheims. His works, consisting of Commentaries upon the Scriptures and devotional treatises, were published at Cologne, 1627. B. at Mayence, 776; D. 856.

RABASTEINS, ra'-ba-stais, an ill-built town of France, in the department of the Tarn, on the Tarn, 18 miles from Toulouse. Pop. 6,000.

RABATT, ra-bat', a fortified maritime town of Morocco, in the kingdom of Fez, 20 miles from Mehediah. It has many mosques, minarets, and mausoleums. Pop. about 40,000.

RABAUD-SAINT-ETIENNE, John Paul, ra'-bo, a French Protestant minister, who became a member of the National Convention of France. He was proscribed, with other members of the Girondist party, and fled; but was taken and sent to Paris, where he was guillotined. He wrote—"A Letter on the Life and Writings of Count de Ghibelin;" "Letters on the Primitive History of Greece;" "Considerations on the Interests of the Third Estate." B. at Nismes, 1753; D. at Paris, 1793.

RABELAIS, Francis, ra'-be-lais, a celebrated French writer, who was the son of an apothecary. He became a monk of the order of St. Francis; but, on account of an intrigue, he was imprisoned in a monastery, whence he made his escape, and obtained permission of Pope Clement VII. to abandon the monastic life. He then studied medicine at Montpellier, where he took his doctor's degree, and became professor in 1531. The chancellor Duprat having abolished the privileges of that university, Rabelais was deputed to wait on him, and he succeeded in obtaining a reversal of that decree. The cardinal du Bellay, ambassador to Rome, appointed him his physician, and took him in his suite. On his return to France he was rewarded with a prebend in an abbey, and the benefice of Meudon, which offices he filled until his death. His principal work is the famous satirical romance entitled the "History of Gargantua and Pantagruel." In this work, wherein acuteness, wit, and humour overflow, even to riotousness, Rabelais, under the guise of allegory, ridiculed all the great personages of his country. The monks, especially, were lashed in the severest manner. The work consisted of five parts, which appeared separately between 1533—1564. Urquhart's English translation of this romance is very fine and spirited. Besides the above piece, he wrote some medical works and numerous letters. B. at Chinon, Touraine, 1483; D. at Paris, 1553.

RACCA, or RAKKA, rak'-ka, a town on Asiatic Turkey, on the eastern bank of the Euphrates, at the mouth of a small river named Beles. Pop. 8,000. Lat. 36° 5′ N. Lon. 38° 50′ E.

RACCONIGI, rak'-ko-ne'-je, a town of Piedmont, on the Maira, 20 miles from Turin. Manf. Silk fabrics, twist, and woollens. Pop. 11,000.

RACE, CAPE, raice, a cape on the south-east coast of Newfoundland.

RACE OF PORTLAND, is on the English coast, off the peninsula of Portland.

RACE OF ALDERNEY, a narrow strait of the English Channel, between the isle of Alderney and Cape La Hogue.

RACHEL, rai'-chel, second daughter of Laban, the dearly beloved of Jacob, who, to obtain her, devoted seven years to the flocks and herds of her father. But, at the end of that period, he found in his veiled bride, not Rachel, but Leah, her elder sister, whom he did not love, and was obliged to labour during seven more years in order to gain her. She was the mother of Joseph and Benjamin.

RACHEL, Eliza Rachel Felix, usually called ra'-shel, a celebrated French actress, who was the daughter of a Jew pedlar. The family gained a livelihood by periodically visiting various towns in Germany and Switzerland, and at length settled at Lyons, and in 1830 went to reside at Paris. Sarah, her elder sister, used to sing at the various cafés, to the accompaniment of an old guitar, while Rachel went from table to table to collect the offerings of the spectators. On one of these occasions the young minstrels attracted the notice of M. Choron, the founder of the Institution for the Study of Sacred Music, and he, more particularly noticing Rachel, took both sisters under his charge. After a short time, however, he found that the sonorous organ of the young Jewess was better suited for declamatory expression than for music, and he transferred her, as a pupil, to a dramatic instructor. Under this tutor she laboured unweariedly during four years, until she obtained a true conception of the highest classical characters, although she had a secret longing for the lighter creations of Molière. She next became a student at the Conservatoire, and, in 1837, she made her début at the Gymnase, but with little success. In the following year, however, she took the Parisian public by surprise, and excited the greatest enthusiasm by her performance of Camille, in "Les Horaces," at the Théâtre Français. The Parisian critics were startled by her powerful acting, by the originality of her conceptions, and, above all, by a certain concentrated power of expression which thrilled to the soul of the hearer. In the same year she performed other classical parts, such as Emile, in "Cinna;" Monime, in "Mithridate;" and the chief character in "Phèdre." Her popularity reached the highest point at once, and her salary, which was 4,000 francs in the first year, became 20,000 in the second. In after-years her income varied from 300,000 to 400,000 francs. In the course of time she extended her repertoire by the representation of parts in modern works, and attracted crowded audiences by her performance in "Adrienne Lecouvreur," "Lady Tartuffe," and "Louise de Lignerolles." Up to her very last season she continued to study regularly, and a strong proof of her progress was to be found in the successive changes and very decided improvements which took place in her enactment of the part of Phèdre, always a fine performance, but in later years a truly grand one. In London she was always welcomed at her periodical visits to the St. James's Theatre; but, although great things had been expected from a trip across the Atlantic, her efforts at New York were far from being a high success. Never of a robust constitution, the arduous labours of her profession at length led to an illness which cut her off prematurely. B. at Munf, Switzerland, 1820; D. at Cannes, 1858.—Her four sisters, and brother Raphael Felix, were also more or less distinguished as performers upon the French stage.

RACINE, John, ra'-seen, a celebrated French poet, who was educated in the society of Port Royal, where he gave his principal attention to the Greek tragic poets. His first publication was an ode on the marriage of Louis XIV. in 1660, which procured him a present of 100 louis-d'or. In 1664 he produced his tragedy of "Thébaide," which was followed, in 1666, by "Alexander." Till this time he wore the ecclesiastical habit, which he now renounced. Nicole, in a letter written against Desmarets, having charged the dramatic poets as poisoners of the soul, Racine replied in a severe manner. In 1668 appeared his "Andromache," which was attacked by several critics, particularly St. Evremond. His next piece was the tragedy of "Britannicus," which far surpassed his former productions. In 1677 appeared his best tragedy, that entitled "Phèdre," which was opposed by one on the same subject written by Pradon, and occasioned violent controversies between the partisans of the respective poets. The intrigues of his rivals so irritated Racine, that he resolved to abandon the drama. Through the influence of Madame de Maintenon, Racine was associated with Boileau in writing the "History of Louis XIV.," a work which was never published. About this time he consented to write his sacred drama of "Esther," at the desire of Madame de Maintenon, and it was acted by the young ladies of her educational establishment of St. Cyr, in 1689. His best piece of this kind was his "Athalia." At the instance of his patroness, Madame de Maintenon, Racine drew up a memorial upon the best mode of alleviating the miseries of the people, which, falling under the king's eye, he was so displeased as to banish the poet from court. His health had for a long time been in a frail condition, and the loss of the court favour so greatly increased his sufferings, that, after lying ill for two years, he died. Besides his dramatic works, he wrote canticles or hymns for the use of St. Cyr; the "History of Port Royal;" "Letters and Epigrams," &c. Racine was not equal to Corneille in vigour and genius, but he surpassed him in variety, tenderness, and elegance. His style is perfect. B. at Ferté-Milon, Aisne, France, 1639; D. 1699.

Racine, Louis, a French poet, son of the preceding. He embraced the ecclesiastical state, but Cardinal Fleury gave him a civil appointment. He wrote several good poems; "Reflections on Poetry;" a prose translation of Milton's "Paradise Lost;" Life of his father; and other works. B. at Paris, 1692; D. 1763.

Racine, a county of the United States, in the S.E. of Wisconsin. Area, 339 square miles. Pop. 15,000.

Racine, a city of the United States, in Wisconsin, 70 miles from Chicago. It has a great many churches, a high school, and an episcopal palace. Pop. 6,000.

Racle, Leonard, rakl, an eminent French architect, who, in 1786, obtained a prize from the academy of Toulouse, for a memoir on the construction of an iron bridge of a single arch of 400 feet span. He also wrote others on the properties of the cycloid, and on regulating the course of the Rhone. He was the intimate friend of Voltaire, whose house at Ferney he built. B. at Dijon, 1708; D. 1792.

Radcliffe, Alexander, rad'-kliff, an English poet, who wrote a burlesque on Ovid's Epistles, a poem called "News from Hell," and other works of a like nature. D. about 1700.

Radcliffe, John, an eminent English physician, took up his bachelor's degree in physic at Lincoln College, Oxford, and afterwards commenced practice, and obtained a considerable reputation. In 1682 he took his doctor's degree, and not long after removed to London, where he rose to the height of his profession. Astonishing things are related of his skill and ready wit. He attended King William, who having shown him his swollen ancles, and asked what he thought of them, "Why, truly," said Radcliffe, "I would not have your majesty's two legs for your three kingdoms," which uncourtly answer gave great offence. In 1713 he was chosen member of parliament for Buckingham. To the university of Oxford he was a munificent benefactor, particularly by founding the famous library which is called by his name. B. at Wakefield, Yorkshire, 1650; D. 1714.

Radcliffe, Mrs. Anne, an eminent English romance-writer, whose works abounded in incidents of the terrible, the mysterious, and the wildly imaginative type. Her talent was undoubted, and her success great, which induced a crowd of inferior imitators to attempt the same order of composition. In 1789 she produced the "Castles of Athlin and Dumbayne," and, in subsequent years, published the "Mysteries of Udolpho;" "The Forest, or the Abbey of Saint Clair;" and other romances. She was also the author of "A Tour in Holland." All her works were translated into French, and were very popular on the continent, as well as in England. For some years before her death she had relinquished her pen. B. in London, 1764; D. 1823.

Radkmaker, Gerard, rad'-ma-ker, a Dutch painter, whose best works consist of architectural and perspective subjects. B. at Amsterdam, 1673; D. at the same city, 1711.

Radetzky, de Radetz, Field-marshal Count Joseph, ra-detz'-ke, a celebrated Austrian general. He commenced his military career as cadet in a cavalry regiment in 1781. Called to participate in the long struggle against Napoleon, and having won his way to the rank of major-general, fought at Agram and Erlingen,—in the battles of 1813, '14, and '15, he gained honourable laurels, inasmuch as he defended the independence of his country; and at Kulm, Leipsic, and Brienne, exhibited great skill and bravery; but afterwards he became nothing else than the able executioner of the decrees of a despotic government. Having been successively governor of Ofen in Hungary, and Lemberg in Poland, he was, in 1822, appointed commander-general of the Lombardo-Venetian kingdom. In 1848 the people of Milan rose against their Austrian oppressors, and after a gallant struggle drove them out of the city. Radetzky retreated upon Verona, to await the arrival of reinforcements. Shortly afterwards, Charles Albert, king of Sardinia, joined the popular cause, and crossing the Adige, placed his army between the Austrian commander and the troops which were marching to his aid. In the end, however, the old marshal proved too skilful a strategist for the Piedmontese king, and after many severely contested battles, Charles Albert was signally defeated at Novara. This battle decided the fate of the Italian cause, and Austrian tyranny was again triumphant in Lombardo-Venetia. After 73 years of service in the Austrian armies, he was permitted to resign at the commencement of the year 1857. B. at the castle of Trebnice, in Bohemia, 1766; D. 1857.

Radnor, New, a market-town and borough of Wales, in Radnorshire, on the Somergill, 12 miles from Brecknock. It was formerly a place of great importance, but it has now dwindled into poverty and insignificance. The public buildings are the town-hall, the prison, and the church. Pop. 2,100.

Radnorshire, rad'-nor, a county of South Wales, bounded N. by Montgomeryshire and Shropshire, E. by Herefordshire, and S. and W. by Brecknockshire and part of Cardiganshire. Area, 426 square miles. Desc. The face of the country is throughout extremely wild, bleak, and mountainous, except towards the eastern and southern borders, and also where it is intersected by several valleys, which are well watered. Rivers. The Wye, the Ython, the Teme, the Lug, and the Edow. Pro. The valleys afford a considerable extent both of meadow and of arable land, especially the vale of Wyeside and the vale of Radnor. Sheep and cattle are the staple product of the county. Pop. 25,000.

Radom, ra-dom', a town of Russian Poland, 56 miles from Warsaw. Pop. 9,000.

Radomsyl, ra-dom-sy'l', the name of several towns in Russia, none of them with a population above 4,000.

Radzivil, rad'-zi-vil, the house of, an ancient Polish family of Lithuania, which commenced to figure in history in the 14th century. Nicholas Radzivil, the first of the name, was created by Jagellon, grand-duke of Lithuania, palatine of Wilna. The most celebrated of his descendants were,—Nicholas, palatine of Wilna and governor of Livonia, under Sigismund Augustus, king of Poland. He signalized himself by his valour against the Teutonic order in 1557, and against the Russians, whom, in 1565, he completely defeated. He abjured the Catholic for the Protestant religion, which he propagated zealously, and at his own expense produced a Polish translation of the Bible, which was condemned at Rome. B. about 1500; D. 1567. His descendants reverted to the Roman Catholic faith. Charles Radzivil, palatine of Wilna, distinguished himself by his opposition to the Russians, and was the great rival of the powerful Czartoryiski family. Nominated, in 1762, governor of Lithuania, by Augustus III., king of Poland, he energetically combated Russian influence; but, not succeeding in preventing the dismemberment of his native country, he went into exile, but returned to Poland shortly before his death, which took place in 1790.—A lady of this house secretly married Sigismund, king of Poland, in 1518.

RAEBURN, Sir Henry, rai'-bern, an eminent Scotch artist, who was brought up to his father's trade, which was that of a goldsmith; but, having shown great taste and skill in miniature-painting, he was sent to London and afterwards to Italy, for the purpose of improving himself as an artist. In 1787 he returned to Edinburgh, where he became a popular portrait-painter, and continued to reside there until his death. He received many marks of honour both at home and abroad; was elected member of the academy of Florence and of New York, and became an R.A. in 1815. His best portraits were those of Sir Walter Scott, Francis Jeffrey, Sir Francis Chantrey, Lord Eldon, and Professor Playfair. When George IV. visited Edinburgh in 1822, he created Raeburn a knight. As a draughtsman he was correct and vigorous, and his colouring was rich and harmonious. B. near Edinburgh, 1756; D. at Edinburgh, 1823.

RAFFAELLE, or RAPHAEL, Sanzio, ra'-fa-aill'-lai, ra'-fa-el, a celebrated Italian painter. His father, an artist of some eminence, after teaching him the rudiments of the art, placed him under Perugino. At Florence he studied the famous cartoons of Da Vinci and Michael Angelo; after which he went to Rome, where he was employed by Pope Julius II. in the embellishment of the Vatican. He also painted several fine pieces for Francis I. of France, who liberally rewarded him. Leo X. employed him in designing the cartoons for the tapestry to be hung in the Sistine chapel. These drawings were sent to Flanders to be copied; and, after remaining there a century, seven were bought by Charles I. They are at present at Hampton Court. The works of this, the most eminent painter of modern times, are numerous, but are chiefly to be found at Rome. In the National Gallery there are a St. Catherine, portrait of Julius II., a portion of a cartoon, and the "Vision of a Knight," with the original pen-and-ink drawing. The university of Oxford possesses a fine collection of his drawings. B. at Urbino, 1483; D. at Rome, 1520.

RAFFLES, Sir Thomas Stamford, răf'-fels, an eminent English statesman and naturalist, who became a clerk in the India House at an early age, and in that capacity displayed so much zeal and talent as to be chosen, in 1805, to fill the post of under-secretary to the government of Pulo-Penang, or Prince of Wales Island. His ability was so great that, in a short time, he rose to the secretaryship, but was compelled to vacate that office in 1808, in consequence of ill-health. He went to Malacca, where he devoted himself to the study of the Malay language, and in 1809 published an essay thereupon. In 1811 he was appointed lieutenant-governor of Java, which had been taken from the Dutch. During the five years that he held this post, he made extensive reforms in the government and abolished slavery. At the same time he collected a vast and valuable body of information relative to the geology, geography, and natural products of the island. These materials he subsequently classified and published, after his return to England, in a work entitled "The History of Java." In 1818 he received the honour of knighthood, and was appointed lieutenant-governor of Fort Marlborough, in the island of Sumatra. As formerly, he was distinguished by his enlightened measures as an administrator, and emancipated the slaves. At Singapore he founded a commercial station, and a college for the study of Anglo-Chinese and Malay literature. He returned to England in 1824; but, unfortunately, the ship in which he had first embarked took fire, and almost the whole of the valuable collection of animals, plants, manuscripts, and drawings which he had formed, was totally destroyed. He was the founder and first president of the Zoological Society, and presented the museum of that body with a fine collection of preserved animals. D. at sea, off Jamaica, 1781; D. 1826.

RAGLAN, James Henry Fitzroy, Lord, răg'-lan, a modern English general, who left the Westminster school in his 16th year to enter the British army as cornet in the 4th Light Dragoons. After accompanying the British ambassador to Constantinople in 1807, he was placed upon the staff of the duke of Wellington, and subsequently became his aide-de-camp. He served throughout the Peninsular campaign, which was marked by the victories of Rolica, of Talavera, of Vimiera, and of Busaco. In the retreat to the lines of Torres Vedras, and in the subsequent operations, he evinced distinguished merit. At Waterloo he lost his right arm, and was subsequently created K.C.B. and a colonel. After the conclusion of the war he fulfilled the diplomatic duties of secretary and minister in the embassy at Paris. In 1819 he became military secretary to the duke of Wellington, both in the Ordnance and, at a later period, at the Horse Guards. Upon the death of the duke of Wellington, Lord Raglan was called to still higher military duties. He was appointed master-general of the ordnance, and, at the outbreak of the war between England and Russia, he was selected to take the command of the British army destined to defend the Turkish empire. Under his directions, and in conjunction with the French troops led by Marshal St. Arnaud, the British army signally defeated the Russians, and in two hours carried the intrenched and fortified position of the height of Alma. It has been ascertained that he was for carrying Sebastopol by a coup-de-main, but gave way to the wishes of the French commander, who desired to take the fortress by investment. The repulse and defeat of the enemy at Balaklava, and the daring intrepidity of the army at Inkermann, took place under his command; but he succumbed to disease before the final success of the operations which he himself had inaugurated. A fuller and more satisfactory knowledge of all the facts of the Crimean campaign has revealed to us that he was most unjustly censured by the English press as the author of a considerable part of the failures and sufferings of the British troops before Sebastopol, and history will readily grant him the honours due to a brave man and a skilful general. After his death his remains were conveyed to England, a pension of £1,000 per annum was settled upon his widow, and one of £2 50 upon his son. Lord Westmoreland, his relation, paid him a just tribute when he said "He died a martyr to the service he had undertaken, but he died full of glory, for the great and brilliant victories he had achieved; for the skill with which he directed his army under the most difficult circumstances; for the anxiety and care with which he watched over his troops; and for the energy with which he inspired them. He died, like his great commander, the duke of Wellington, an example to guide hereafter all military men in the discharge of their duties towards their sovereign and their country, and in the pursuit of fame, combined with justice, with moderation, and with virtue." B. 1788; D. before Sepastopol, 1855.

RAGO, ra'-go, one of the Cape de Verd Islands, lying to the S. of Branco, in the Atlantic. It is uninhabited.

RAGOTZKY, Sigismund, ra-gotz'-ke, an Hungarian magnate, who was elected prince of Transylvania upon the death of Stephen Botkay in 1607. D. about 1610.

RAGOTZKY, George, prince of Transylvania, entered into an alliance with the Swedes, against Poland, in 1659. He was slain in action with the Turks, 1661.

RAGOTZKY, Francis Leopold, prince of Transylvania, an Hungarian patriot, who was, in 1701, appointed chief by the revolted Hungarians, and displayed, in that capacity, signal bravery and address. After holding Hungary separate from Austria during ten years, he, upon the proclamation of peace between the inhabitants of that country and the emperor, went to France, and thence to Constantinople, where he was held in great esteem. B. 1676; D. in Turkey, 1735.

RAGUENET, Francis, rag'-nai, a French historian, who obtained a prize from the French Academy in 1689, for a discourse on the "Merit of Martyrdom." In 1704 he published a "Comparison between the Italians and the French, with regard to Music and the Opera," in which he defended the superiority of the former. This work occasioned a literary warfare. His other works are, "The Monuments of Rome; or, a Description of the Works of Art, &c., in that City;" the "History of Oliver Cromwell;" "History of the Old Testament." B. at Rouen, 1660; D. 1720.

RAGUSA, Augustus Frederick de Marmont, Duke of, ra-goo'-sa, a celebrated French general and marshal of France. He received a complete and regular military education at the college-school of Châlons, and, after entering the army, attracted, at Toulon, the favourable notice of Bonaparte, who made him his aide-de-camp. He accompanied that general to Italy in 1796, and fought in almost every subsequent engagement, winning high honour for his great skill, bravery, and readiness of resource, till, at length, he was selected by Bonaparte to carry to Paris the twenty-two colours captured from the enemy. In the Egyptian campaign he was a general of brigade, and, in 1799, he was one of the officers that accompanied Bonaparte in his perilous flight from Egypt. Between the years 1805—1814 he was one of the most conspicuously skilful and courageous of all Napoleon's subordinates. At Ulm, during the conquest of the province of Styria; at Wagram; as the successor to Massena in Portugal; and at Bautzen, Dresden, and Leipsic, he bore a distinguished part. Against an allied force of Austrians, Russians, and Prussians, numerically four times greater than his own, he obstinately defended Paris, in 1814. But when the enemy's artillery began to sweep the city from the heights of Montmartre, he received instructions from Joseph Bonaparte which permitted him to evacuate the French capital. He then went over to the allies with his entire force, thus deserting the cause of the emperor for ever. He was subsequently employed by Louis XVIII. and Charles X., the latter of whom commanded him to repress the revolt of 1830: he was, however, defeated by the people, and became an object of odium with his countrymen. His name was struck off the rolls of the French army, and he was banished from his native country. He spent the remainder of his life away from France, and devoted his leisure to the composition of some excellent treatises upon military science. His Memoirs appeared at Paris in 1856. B. at Châtillon-sur-Seine, 1774; D. at Venice, 1852.

RAGUSA, a fortified city of Austria, in Dalmatia, on a peninsula on the Adriatic, which forms two large and commodious harbours, protected by works of considerable strength, 38 miles from Cattaro. It has a cathedral, Gothic custom-house, a palace, guard-house, barracks, lyceum, theatre, and several public schools. Its trade was once important, but has greatly declined. Pop. 9,000. Lat. 42° 38′ 9″ N. Lon. 18° 7′ E.—Ragusa was founded about the middle of the 7th century. This petty republic did not lose its independence until the successes of Napoleon I., who conferred on Marshal Marmont the title of Duke of Ragusa.

RAGUSA, a populous town of Sicily, in the Val di Noto, on the Ragusa, 3 miles from Modica. Manf. Woollens and silks. In its vicinity, vines, olives, and other fruit are produced. It is noted, also, for its breed of horses and mules. Pop. 17,000.

RAHDUNPORE, rad-un-por', a town of Hindostan, in the province of Gujerat, on the Puddar river. It possesses a respectable citadel. Lat. 24° N. Lon. 71° 45′ E.

RAHMANIE, ra-ma-ne', a town of Lower Egypt, situate at the junction of the Nile with the canal of Alexandria, 25 miles from Rosetta. Pop. Unascertained.—The French, during their occupation of Egypt, made it a fortified station. It was taken from them by the British in 1801.

RAHO, ra'-ho, a town of Hungary, 18 miles from Szigeth. Pop. 2,500.

RAHOON, ra-hoon', a town of Hindostan, in the province of Lahore, 12 miles from Loodianah. Manf. Cotton goods. Pop. Unascertained.

RAIATEA, rai-a-te'-a, one of the Society Islands, in the Pacific, 130 miles from Tahiti. It has a circuit of 40 miles, with a mountainous surface. Pro. Arrowroot and cocoa-nuts. Pop. Unascertained.

RAIKES, Robert, raiks, an English philanthropist, who was the son of a printer of Gloucester, and was himself bred to the same trade. Having acquired a fortune in trade, he employed it in acts of charity, and in providing instruction to the inmates of the county bridewell and to the children and workmen employed in the factories. He established a number of Sunday schools, requiring only "clean hands, clean faces, and combed hair" in their attendants. In all his noble efforts he was very successful. B. at Gloucester, 1735; D. 1811.

RAIMBACH, Abraham, raim'-bak, an eminent English engraver. He was of Swiss descent on his father's side, and was, at an early age, placed as an apprentice to an engraver. His first work was the key to Copley's "Death of Chatham." An assiduous student of his art, he went on increasing in skill, till, in the year 1812, he became engraver for Sir David Wilkie. During the remainder of his life he was employed by that artist to reproduce his works, the excellence and popularity of which enabled both to acquire large sums by their sale. His best prints after Wilkie were "The Rent-Day," "The Village Politicians," "The Cut Finger," "The Parish Beadle," "Blind-Man's-Buff," and "Distraining for Rent." After his death, his autobiography was published by his son: it was entitled "Memoirs and Recollections of the late Abraham Raimbach, including a Memoir of Sir David Wilkie." The work is full of interest, and contains a pleasing account of the engraver's visit to the museum of the Louvre at Paris, during the short interval of peace in 1802. B. in London, 1776; D. 1843.

RAIMONDI, Marc Antonio, rai-mone'-de, a celebrated Italian engraver, who was employed by Raffaelle to engrave his drawings. Clement VII. ordered him to be imprisoned for having engraved a series of obscene designs after Julio Romano, illustrating the sonnets of Aretino; but the pope having been shown his superb engraving of the "Martyrdom of St. Lawrence," he pardoned him, and became his patron. When Rome was taken by the Spaniards, in 1527, Raimondi lost everything he possessed, and fled to Bologna, where he continued to work until his death. The British Museum possesses a fine collection of his engravings, some of which are valued at £60 per impression. B. at Bologna, about 1488; D. about 1546.

RAIMONDI, John Baptist, an eminent Italian orientalist, who resided for some time in Asia, and there acquired the Hebrew, Syriac, Arabic, and Armenian languages. He was employed at Rome to arrange the oriental works contained in that city, and formed the plan of a polyglot Bible on a more enlarged method than either that of Alcala or of Anvers; but was compelled to relinquish his idea from want of the requisite funds. In 1610 he produced an Arabic grammar. B. at Cremona, about 1540; D. about 1620.

RAIN, or RHAIN, rine, a town of Bavaria, 22 miles from Augsburg, where the Austrian general Tilly received his mortal wound in 1631. Pop. 1,100.

RAINHAM, rain'-ham, the name of several parishes in England, none of them with a population above 1,500.

RAINY LAKE, rai'-ne, a lake of North America, 160 miles to the W. of Lake Superior, divided by an isthmus into two parts. The broadest part is not more than 20 miles.

RAISEN, rai'-sen, the name of several towns of England, none of them with a population above 1,000.

RAISMES, raim, a town of France, in the department of the North, 3 miles from Valenciennes. Pop. 3,700.—It has a station on the Northern Railway.

RAJAHMUNDRY, ra-ja-moon'-dre, a district of British India, in the presidency of Madras. Area, 6,050 square miles. Desc. Hilly in the N., with a fertile and level soil along the coast. Rivers. The principal is the Godavery. Pro. Wheat, rice, maize, millet, sugar-cane, cotton, tobacco, and indigo. Pop. 1,012,036. Lat. between 16° 18′ and 17° 38′ N. Lon. between 81° 7′ and 82° 40′ E.

RAJAHMUNDRY, a town of Hindostan, on the banks of the Godavery, and capital of the above district. It has a fort, a gaol, and a bazar. Pop. about 20,000.

RAJESHAYE, ra'-jes-hai, a district of British India, in the presidency of Bengal. Area, 2,084 square miles. Desc. Hilly, with a great deal of jungle. Pro. Rice, wheat, oats, barley, sugar-cane, ginger, and hemp. Pop. 672,000. Lat. between 24° 6′ and 24° 58′ N. Lon. between 88° 18′ and 89° 20′ E.

RAJMAHAL, raj-ma-hal', 'the royal residence,' an ancient city of Bengal, on the Ganges. It has fallen into decay, the modern town consisting only of one street. Lat. 25° 2′ N. Lon. 87° 43′ E.—The railway from Calcutta to Delhi passes through this town.

RAJPOOTANA, raj-poo-ta'-na, a tract of W. India, with an area of 114,390 square miles and a population of 11,000,000. Lat. between 23° 55′ and 29° 57′ N. Lon. between 70° 5′ and 77° 40′ E.

RALEIGH, Sir Walter ra'-le, a celebrated English navigator, author, and courtier. After receiving the rudiments of his education at home, he was, about 1568, sent to Oriel College, Oxford, where "he was worthily esteemed a proficient in oratory and philosophy;" but did not long remain there; for, having an enterprising spirit, he entered into the troop of gentlemen volunteers who went to the assistance of the Protestants in France, where he continued about five or six years. He subsequently joined the expedition of General Norris in the Netherlands, in aid of the cause of the prince of Orange. Soon after his return he engaged with his brother-in-law, Sir Humphry Gilbert, in a voyage to America, whence they returned in 1579. The next year he was in Ireland, where he distinguished himself against the rebels of Munster. On his return to England he introduced himself to the notice of Queen Elizabeth by a romantic piece of gallantry. Her majesty, while taking a walk, stopped at a muddy place, hesitating whether to proceed or not; on which Raleigh took off his new plush cloak, and spread it on the ground. The queen trod gently over the foot-cloth, and soon rewarded the sacrifice of a cloak with a handsome suit to the owner. Being still intent upon making discoveries, he, in 1584, fitted out a squadron, which endeavoured to establish the colony called, in honour of Elizabeth, Virginia; but almost the only fruits of the expedition were the bringing of the tobacco-plant and the potato to England. After spending £40 000 in an unsuccessful attempt to found a colony, he abandoned the scheme to a mercantile community. Meanwhile he had been created a knight, captain of the queen's guard, a lord warden of the Stanneries, and lieutenant-general of Cornwall. In the defeat of the Spanish armada, in 1588, Sir Walter bore a glorious part, for which he received distinguishing marks of favour from the queen. In 1591 he sailed on an expedition against the Spanish fleet, but without success. About the same time he incurred the queen's displeasure by an intrigue with one of her maids of honour, whom he afterwards married. In 1595 he sailed to Guiana, and destroyed the capital of Trinidad. The year following he took a distinguished part in the taking of Cadiz. Honours were lavished in abundance upon him, and he obtained the lordship of St. Germaine, in Cornwall. Sir Walter was one of those who brought about the fall of Essex, and remained in the favour of the queen till her death; but, in the succeeding reign, his fortunes changed. He was stripped of his preferments, tried, and condemned for high treason, on a charge the most frivolous, and without the least evidence. He remained in the Tower thirteen years, during which he wrote several works on various subjects of great importance, the best of which was the "History of the World," which was published in 1614. The year following he was released, occasioned by the flattering account which he had given of some rich mines in Guiana. On gaining his liberty, he sailed to that country in search of those pretended mines, instead of discovering which, he burnt the Spanish town of St. Thomas, and returned to England, where, in consequence of the complaint of Gondamor, the Spanish ambassador, he was apprehended, and, in a most unprecedented manner, beheaded, on his former sentence. His works are historical, philosophical, poetical, and political. As an author, Hume declares him to be the "best model of our ancient style;" and Hallam speaks of him as "less pedantic than most of his contemporaries, seldom low, and never affected." The appearance and character of this poet, courtier, navigator, statesman, and military and naval commander, are thus sketched by Aubrey:—"He was a tall, handsome, and bold man; but his nævе was that he was damnable proud. He had a most remarkable aspect, an exceeding high forehead, and long-faced." Altogether, he was one of the most remarkable men of a remarkable age. B. at Hayes, Devonshire, 1552; beheaded at Westminster, 1618.

Raleigh, the metropolis of North Carolina, U.S., in Wake county, 26 miles from Smithfield. It contains a state-house, court-house, gaol, a governor's house, market-house, theatre, state bank, churches, and schools. Pop. 4,500.

Ralph, James, rălf, an American writer, was originally a schoolmaster at Philadelphia, and went thence, in 1725, to London, where he published a poem entitled "Night." He also wrote a History of England, and several political pamphlets. Pope has given him a place in his "Dunciad," where he exclaims,—

"Silence, ye wolves, while Ralph to Cynthia howls,
And makes night hideous; answer him, ye owls."

B. about 1700; D. at Chiswick, 1762.

Ramazzini, Bernardin, ra-mat'-se'-ne, an Italian physician, who, after taking his degree at Parma, went to Modena, where he was medical professor many years, and then removed to Padua. His works were numerous, and are still held in high esteem by his countrymen. B. at Carpi, near Modena, 1633; D. 1714.

Rambervillers, ram'-ber-vil'-lai, a town of France, in the department of the Vosges, 16 miles from Epinal. Manf. Linen and cotton thread, woollen, and hosiery. Pop. 5,000.

Rambouillet, ram-bwoo'-e-yai, a town of France, in the department of the Seine-and-Oise, 30 miles from Paris. It has a royal château, in which Charles X. took refuge before his exile, in 1830. Pop. 4,200.—It has a station on the railway from Paris to Chartres.

Ramsbury, rămz'-ber-e, a parish of Wiltshire, 30 miles from Salisbury. Pop. 3,000.

Rameau, John Philip, ra'-mo, a celebrated French musician, who, after practising as organist at his native place, discharged the same office in the cathedral of Clermont. In 1733 he produced his opera of "Hippolytus," which was followed by several others, and greatly admired. But it was as a theorist in music that Rameau excelled; and on account of his two works, the "Demonstration of the Principles of Harmony" and the "Code of Music," he was called the Newton of that science. Louis XV., to whom he was composer, conferred on him the title of nobility and the order of St. Michael. B. at Dijon, 1683; D. 1764.

Rameswaram, rams-wa-ram', an island in the Gulf of Manaar, off the S. extremity of Hindostan. Ext. 11 miles long, with an average breadth of 6. It has a remarkable temple, celebrated in wild fables. Pop. 4,300. Lat. 9° 18′ N. Lon. 79° 22′ E.

Ramghur, ram-goor', the capital of a district of the same name in India, on the Dummodah river, 200 miles from Calcutta. Lat. 23° 28′ N. Lon. 85° 43′ E. —The District has an area of 8,524 square miles, and a population estimated at 375,000.

Ramgurh, ram-goor', a town of India, in the Rajpoot territory of Alwar, 95 miles from Delhi. Pop. 10,000.

Ramillies, răm'-e-lees (Fr. ra-me'-yai), a village of Belgium, in South Brabant, 26 miles from Brussels. It is noted for a victory gained here, in 1706, by the duke of Marlborough over the French.

RAMMAHUN ROY, ram-mu-hoon', a distinguished orientalist, who came of a high order of the Brahminical caste. While still quite a youth, he evinced heretical tendencies; and he states, "when about the age of 16, I wrote a manuscript, calling in question the validity of the idolatrous system of the Hindoos. This, together with my known sentiments on that subject, having produced a coolness between me and my immediate kindred, I proceeded on my travels, and passed through different countries, chiefly within, but some beyond, the bounds of Hindostan. When I had reached the age of 20, my father recalled me, and restored me to his favour; but my continued controversies with the Brahmins on the subject of their idolatry and superstition, and my interference with their custom of burning widows and other pernicious practices, revived and increased their animosity towards me; and, through their influence with my family, my father was again obliged to withdraw his countenance, though his limited pecuniary support was still continued to me." After the death of his father, in 1803, he openly broke with the Brahmins, and wrote several works exposing their errors. He published an English translation of portions of the Vedas in 1817, and subsequently became part proprietor of an English newspaper called the Bengal Herald. A series of selections from the New Testament, entitled, "The Precepts of Jesus the Guide to Peace and Happiness," translated into Sanskrit and Bengalee, was his next publication. In 1830 he was sent to England as ambassador from the king of Delhi, who at the same time conferred upon him the title of rajah. He was on the eve of returning to his own country when he was seized with illness, which terminated in his death. He was a frequent attendant in the Unitarian chapels in England, and held that a belief in the divine mission of Christ was perfectly consistent with the doctrines laid down by the Sanskrit writers on the Brahminical faith. He wrote and spoke English, Bengalee, Persian, Hindostanee, and was further acquainted with French, Hebrew, Latin, Greek, and Arabic. He was as acute as a diplomatist as enlightened and cultivated as a man. His representations to the British court led to the king of Delhi's receiving an addition to his income of £30,000. B. in Bengal, 1774; D. near Bristol, 1833.

RAMNAGUR, ram-na-goor', a fortified town of the Punjab, 62 miles from Lahore. Here the Sikh forces were, in 1848, defeated by the British.

RAMNAGUR, a town of British India, 4 miles from Benares. Pop. 10,000.

RAMPOOR, ram-poor', a city of Hindostan, and capital of an extensive district of the same name, on the Cossila river. It contains the palace of the nabob Fyzoola Khan, and some other good houses; but is chiefly composed of sunburnt-brick houses, with thatched or tiled roofs. Pop. Unascertained. Lat. 28° 50′ N. Lon. 78° 58′ E.—The DISTRICT has an area of 720 square miles and a population of 320,000. Lat. between 28° 30′ and 29° 11′ N. Lon. between 78° 55′ and 79° 30′ E.

RAMREE, ram-ree', an island of British India, in Aracan, lying to the N.E. of Cheduba. Ext. 50 miles long, with a breadth of 15. (See ARACAN.)

RAMSAY, Andrew Michael, răm'-sai, usually called the Chevalier Ramsay, a Scottish author, who was educated at Edinburgh; after which he became tutor to a nobleman's son at the university of St. Andrew's. In 1710 he was at Cambray, where he was converted to the Roman Catholic religion by the celebrated Fénélon, whose life he wrote. He was afterwards employed as tutor to the duke de Château Thierry, and made knight of the order of St. Lazarus. He was also engaged by the son of James II., called the Pretender, in instructing his children. His works are, "Discourse upon Epic Poetry," "Essay upon Civil Government," "Remarks on Shaftesbury's Characteristics," "History of M. de Turenne," "Philosophical Principles of Natural and Revealed Religion." B. at Ayr, Scotland, 1686; D. in France, 1743.

RAMSAY, Allan, a Scotch poet, who, at an early age, went to Edinburgh, where he became apprentice to a barber, but subsequently distinguished himself by several ingenious poems and songs in the Scotch dialect. His principal performance is a pastoral, entitled "The Gentle Shepherd." B. in Scotland, 1685; D. 1758.

RAMSAY, Allan, a Scotch portrait-painter, and son of the preceding. His early studies in drawing were made without the aid of any tutor; but he afterwards improved his skill by a visit to Italy. Lord Bute became his patron; and, through his means, he was introduced to George III., whose principal painter he became in 1767. The English school of portrait-painting was in a very crude condition at that period; but Ramsay was perhaps superior to most of the predecessors of Sir Joshua Reynolds. Two of his portraits of George III., when prince of Wales, were engraved. He was an accomplished man beyond the immediate range of his profession, and was acquainted with the Greek, Latin, Italian, and French languages. B. at Edinburgh, 1713; D. at Dover, 1784.

RAMSDEN, Jesse, răms'-den, an excellent English mechanician, who was at first a cloth-worker, but in his 23rd year apprenticed himself to a mathematical instrument maker in London. He pursued his new employment with so much success that he was engaged by the best mathematical instrument makers in the metropolis, and was enabled in 1768 to open a shop in the Haymarket; but in 1775 he removed to Piccadilly, where he carried on business till his death. He greatly improved Hadley's quadrant or sextant; and he invented a machine for dividing mathematical instruments, for which he received a premium from the Board of Longitude. Mr. Ramsden also improved the construction of the theodolite, and the barometer for measuring the heights of mountains. The pyrometer, for denoting the expansion of bodies by heat, also employed his talents; and he made many important discoveries and improvements in optics. He improved the refracting micrometer, the transit-instrument and quadrant, and procured a patent for an improved equatorial. His mural quadrants were admirable, and much sought after. Mr. Ramsden was chosen a fellow of the Royal Society in 1786. B. near Halifax, Yorkshire, 1735; D. at Brighton, 1800.

RAMSDON, răms'-don, two parishes of England, neither with a population above 500.

RAMSEY, răm'-se, a market-town of Huntingdonshire, formerly noted for a wealthy Benedictine abbey, of which there are now scarcely any remains. It is 10 miles from Huntingdon, and the lake Ramseymere is in its neighbourhood. Pop. 5,000.

RAMSEY, a town of England, in the Isle of Man, in a spacious bay, 14 miles from Douglas. It has a chapel and court-house. Pop. 2,800.

RAMSEY, an island of Wales, off the coast of Pembrokeshire, 4 miles from St. David's. Ext. About 2 miles long.

RAMSGATE, răms'-gait, a market and seaport-town of Kent, noted for its excellent artificial harbour, and also as a fashionable resort for sea-bathing, on the eastern coast of the isle of Thanet, 15 miles from Canterbury. Its public buildings are the parish church of St. Lawrence, other places of worship, market and custom-houses, barracks, assembly-rooms, and bazar. But the harbour is by far the most striking feature in the town. It consists of two immense piers, extending from the coast about 800 feet into the sea, and bending towards each other, so as nearly to approach and inclose a circular area of 46 acres. It is the largest artificial haven in England, and is bordered by wet and dry docks, guarded by batteries, and with a lighthouse at its entrance. The pier forms a very delightful promenade, and is, accordingly, the favourite walk of the company. The sea-views are very fine, and in clear weather the cliffs of Calais may be seen, though at the distance of 30 miles. Boat-building and the repairing of ships are carried on sometimes to a considerable extent. Pop. about 12,000.—Ramsgate is a member of the Cinque port of Sandwich. Vast quantities of provisions are here imported in small boats from the French coast.

RAMSTADT, UPPER AND LOWER, ram'-stat, two contiguous towns of the grand-duchy of Hesse-Darmstadt, on the Modau, 5 miles from Darmstadt. Pop. united, 4,000.

RAMTEAK, ram-teek', a town of India, in the territory of Nagpore, with several temples. It is a place of pilgrimage. Lat. 21° 24′ N. Lon. 79° 22′ E.

RAMUS, Peter, ra'-moos, a French philosopher and mathematician. His birth was mean, and he received his education in the college of Navarre, where he was a servant. He studied with such ardour as to be admitted to the degree of master of arts; his thesis on which occasion was an attack upon the doctrine of Aristotle, which occasioned a violent controversy, and Ramus was prohibited from teaching. But, in 1551, he was nominated to the professorship of philosophy and eloquence in the College of France. He was also obnoxious to the Sorbonne for being a Protestant, and in the massacre of St. Bartholomew, this learned and worthy man fell a victim. His principal works are, treatises on Arithmetic and Geometry; Greek, Latin, and French Grammars; a "Life of Cicero," with remarks on the Latin language; "Animadversions upon Aristotle;" "Commentaries upon Quintilian," &c. B. at Cuth, Picardy, about 1515; killed at Paris, 1572.

RAMUSIO, John Baptist, ra-moo'-se-o, secretary of the Council of Ten at Venice, and ambassador from that republic to France, Switzerland, and Rome. He made the first collection of voyages and travels that is known; the first volume of which appeared at Venice, 1550. B. at Treviso, Venetia, 1185; D. at Padua, 1557.

RANAI, or ORANAI, ra'-nai, one of the Sandwich islands, in the North Pacific Ocean. Ext. 20 miles long, with a breadth of 10. Pop. 20,400. Lat. 20° 51′ N. Lon. 185° 23′ E.

RANCAGUA, ran'-ca-gwa, an old province of Chili, inclosed between the rivers Maypo and Cachapuel, and extending from the Andes to the sea.—The capital is of the same name, standing on the river Cachapuel, 53 miles from Santiago.

RANÇON, ran'-sawng, a parish and town of France, on the Gartempe, 6 miles from Bellac. Pop. 2,200.

RANDAZZO, rand-dat'-so, a town of Sicily, at the foot of Mount Ætna. Pop. 4,500.

RANDERS, ran'-ders, a trading town of Denmark, in North Jutland, on the Guden, 20 miles from Aarhuus. Manf. Gloves; and it has a considerable trade in corn. Pop. 7,100.

RANDOLPH, răn'-dolf, the name of several counties of the United States.—1. In the north-west part of Virginia. Area, 1,484 square miles. Pop. 6,000.—2. In the central part of North Carolina. Area, 724 square miles. Pop. 16,000.—3. In Illinois. Area, 514 square miles. Pop. 11,000.—4. In Georgia. Area, 713 square miles. Pop. 13,000.—The name also of several townships, none of them with a population above 5,000.

RANDOLPH, Thomas, an English statesman, who was banished to France in the reign of Mary, on account of his religion. Queen Elizabeth employed him in several embassies, and rewarded him with knighthood, the offices of chamberlain of the exchequer and mastership of the posts. His letters are in different collections, and his account of Russia is contained in Hakluyt's Voyages. B. in Kent, 1523; D. 1590.

RANDOLPH, Thomas, an English poet, who was a fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, and the intimate friend of Ben Jonson, who used to call him his son. His poems abound with wit and humour. He was the author of several dramatic pieces. B. at Badby, Northamptonshire, 1605; D. 1635.

RANDOLPH, Thomas, a learned English divine, who became fellow, and afterwards president of Corpus Christi College, Oxford. He wrote an answer to the essay on spirit, a valuable discourse on Jephthah's vow, and several sermons. B. in Oxfordshire, about 1710; D. 1788.

RANDON, James Louis, Count, ran'-dawng, a French general and marshal of France. He was an illustration of the famous saying of the time of the empire, that every French soldier carried the baton of a marshal of France in his knapsack. He was but a sergeant in 1812, and he gained the epaulette of a sub-lieutenant by gallant conduct at the battle of Moskowa. His bravery and skill as an officer, during the various campaigns in Africa, between 1838-46, led to his rapid advancement. He was war minister to the prince president of the republic in 1851, after which he became governor-general of Algeria. In 1856 he was created marshal of France, and, soon afterwards, minister of war. B. at Grenoble, 1795.

RANEEGUNGE, ra'-ne-goonj, a town of British India, in the presidency of Bengal. The neighbourhood is rich in iron and coal. Lat. 23° 35′ N. Lon. 87° 10′ E. —United with Calcutta by railway.

RANEEPOOR, ra'-ne-poor, a manufacturing town of Scinde, 45 miles from Hyderabad. Pop. 5,000, mostly weavers.

RANGOON, ran-goon', a fortified city of British India, in the province of Pegu, on the Irrawaddi river, about 30 miles from the sea. The streets are rather narrow, but straight, and paved with brick. The houses are constructed of timber, and raised several feet from the ground. Shipbuilding is carried on to a great extent. Pop. Unascertained. Lat. 16° 48′ N. Lon. 96° 10′ E.—This place has been twice destroyed by fire, and, in 1852, was taken by the British.

RANKE, Leopold, rank, an eminent modern German historian. At the outset of his career he was engaged as teacher in the gymnasium of Frankfort-on-the-Oder; but having had from his earliest years a strong predilection for historical studies, he devoted all his leisure to the composition of a "History of the Roman and German People from 1494 to 1535;" on the publication of which, in 1824, it was found to be so full of accurate and discriminating knowledge, that its author received the appointment of professor of history in the university of Berlin. The government of Prussia next granted him the means of prosecuting his researches among the archives of Vienna, Rome, and Venice. The historian was thus enabled to produce his "Princes and Nations of South Europe in the 16th and 17th Centuries," and "The Conspiracy against Venice in 1688." In 1836 his reputation was established on the most substantial basis by his great work entitled "The Popes of Rome; their Church and State," of which an excellent translation was made by Mrs. Austin, and which likewise formed the foundation of one of Lord Macaulay's best essays. For about four years he edited the "Historical and Political Gazette," a print which, being deemed too liberal in its views, was discontinued in 1836. In 1841 he became historiographer of Prussia. The most important of his subsequent works were, "History of Germany during the Reformation," translated into English by Mrs. Austin; "Memoirs of the House of Brandenburg," and "History of Prussia during the 17th and 18th Century," and a "History of Servia and the Servian Revolution." B. near Naumberg, Prussian Saxony, 1795.

RANKEN, răn'-ken, a county of the United States, in Mississippi. Area, 795 square miles. Pop. 8,000.

RAPHAEL. (See RAFFAELLE.)

RAPHELENGIUS, Francis, ra-fel-lain'-je-oos, a learned French critic, who studied the learned languages at Paris, after which he went to England, and taught Greek at Cambridge. On his return, he published learned editions of several ancient writers, with notes, and was employed on the Polyglot Bible of Antwerp, printed in 1571. He was appointed professor in Hebrew and Arabic at Leyden. His other works are—a Hebrew Grammar, an Arabic Lexicon, and a Chaldaic Dictionary. B. near Lisle, 1539; D. at Leyden, 1597.

RAPHOE, ra'-foe, an episcopal market-town of Ireland, county of Donegal, 6 miles from Lifford. The cathedral was built in the 11th century. Pop. 1,500. This place is the head of a Roman Catholic diocese.

RAPIN, Paul de, rap'-ă, a French historian, who studied the law, and became an advocate. Obliged to leave France on the revocation of the edict of Nantes, he visited England and Holland; and in 1688 he accompanied William of Orange to England, and obtained a military command in Ireland; but, being wounded at the siege of Limerick, he disposed of his commission. He afterwards became tutor to the son of the earl of Portland, whom he accompanied on his travels. His History of England, which is very excellent, was printed at the Hague in 1711, and was afterwards translated into English by Nicholas Tindal. B. at Castres, 1661; D. at Wesel, 1725.

RAPOLLA, ra-pole'-la, a town of Naples, in Basilicata, 2 miles from Melfi. Pop. 3,200.—In 1851 this place was visited by an earthquake.

RAPPAHANNOCK, răp'-pa-hăn'-nok, a navigable river of Virginia, rising in the Blue Mountains, and, after a course of 130 miles, falling into Chesapeake Bay.

RAPTEE, rap-te', a river of British India, in the presidency of Bengal. After a course of 270 miles, it joins the Ganges in the district of Goruckpore.

RARITAN, răr'-i-tăn, a river of New Jersey, U.S., formed by two branches, which unite about 20 miles above New Brunswick. It flows by New Brunswick, and, gradually becoming broader and deeper, passes Amboy, and then widens into Raritan Bay, which is immediately connected with the ocean.—Also a township of New Jersey, 20 miles from Trenton. Pop. 3,200.

RAS, ras (a 'headland'), the prefix to the names of numerous capes in Africa and Asia.

RAS EL KHYMA, ke'-ma, a fortified maritime town of Arabia, on the Persian Gulf. It stands on a sandy peninsula, and is defended by batteries. This place, in consequence of the depredations of pirates, was twice taken by the British. Pop. Unascertained. Lat. 25° 49′ N. Lon. 55° 30′ E.

RASGRAD, ras'-grad, a town of European Turkey, in Bulgaria, 33 miles from Rustchuk. Pop. 6,000.—Here in 1810 the Turks were defeated by the Russians.

RASK, Rasmus Christian, rask, an eminent Danish philologist, who displayed an extraordinary aptitude for the acquisition of languages from his earliest years. He was the son of parents in the humblest circumstances; but his talents procured him patrons, who furnished him with the means of prosecuting his studies, first at the university of Copenhagen, and, subsequently, in Russia, Sweden, and Finland. In 1808 he was employed in a subordinate capacity at the university library at Copenhagen, but was subsequently sent, at the cost of the Danish government, to Persia and India, whence he brought home a most valuable collection, consisting of upwards of a hundred old and rare oriental manuscripts. His later years were passed in the uninterrupted prosecution of his philological labours, and in the fulfillment of his duties as historical professor in the university of Copenhagen. His most important works were—an Armenian Dictionary; Anglo-Saxon Grammar; Investigations concerning the Northern or Icelandic Language; Spanish, Frisian, and Acra Grammars; and a treatise on "The Age and Authenticity of the Zend-Avesta." B. in the island of Funen, 1787; D. at Copenhagen, 1832.

RASPAIL, Francis Vincent, ras'-pail, a modern French chemist and writer on scientific subjects, who, in 1825, was appointed editor of the natural history section of the "Bulletin des Sciences." Before that period he had been a successful writer upon scientific questions for various French journals. Two of his works were as remarkable for their originality as for their general excellence. These were, the "Natural History of Health" and the "Médecine et Pharmacie Domestique," the last of which was most efficiently reproduced in an English form by Dr. G. L. Strauss, in a work entitled "Domestic Medicine; or, Plain Instructions in the Art of Preserving and Restoring Health." M. Raspail was a man of strong political feelings, and, both with sword and pen, fought for the cause of republicanism. Under Louis Philippe he was twice imprisoned for his opposition to the government, and at the coup-d'état he was placed in confinement by Louis Napoleon. B. at Carpentras, in the department of Vaucluse, 1794.

RASTADT, ra'-stat, a strongly-fortified town of Germany, in Baden, on the Murg, 20 miles from Strasburg. It has a magnificent mansion, formerly occupied by the princes of Baden. Manf. Carriages, fire-arms, mathematical and philosophical instruments; also silver and plated wares. Pop. 6,500.—This place has been the scene of repeated diplomatic conferences. During one of these, in 1798-99, two of the representatives of France were assassinated. It has a station on the railway from Basle to Manheim.

RASTALL, or RASTELL, John, ras'-tel, an old English printer, who pursued his calling in London. His wife was the sister of Sir Thomas More, whose "Dialogues on the Worship of Images and Relics" he printed. He was himself an author, translator, and compiler, and is said to have written the "Anglorum Regum Chronicon, or Pastyme of People," which was included in the "Collections of English Chronicles" published in 1811. D. in London, 1536.

RATCLIFFE, rat'-klif, a chapelry of Middlesex, 2¼ miles from St. Paul's Cathedral, London. Pop. 15,500.

RATH, rath, a prefix to numerous unimportant places in Ireland.

RATHANGAN, rath'-an-gan, a town of Ireland, in the county of Kildare, 28 miles from Dublin. Pop. 1,200.

RATHCOOLE, rath'-kool, three parishes of Ireland, in Leinster and Munster, none with a population above 1,500.

RATHCORMICK, rath-kor'-mik, a town of Ireland, in the county of Cork, 14 miles from Cork. Pop. 1,000.

RATHENAU, ra'-te-nou, a town of Prussia, in Brandenburg, on the Havel, 42 miles from Berlin. It consists of a new and old town, the latter being inclosed by walls. Manf. Woollen, linen, leather, and gloves. Pop. 6,000.—Here, in 1675, the Swedes were defeated by the Prussians.

RATHKEALE, rath'-keel, a market-town of Ireland, Munster, 17 miles from Limerick. Castle Mattress, the seat of the Southwell family, is in its neighbourhood. Pop. 8,000.

RATHLIN ISLAND, rath'-lin, an island on the N. coast of Ireland, about 3 miles from Fairhead. Ext. About 6 miles long and 1 broad. Pop. 800.

RATHSPECK, rath'-spek, three parishes of Leinster, Ireland, none of them with a population above 2,500.

RATIBOR, ra'-te-bor, a walled town of Prussian Silesia, 44 miles from Oppelm. Manf. Woollen and linen stuffs, hosiery, leather, and tobacco. Pop. 9,000. It is the capital of a principality of the same name.

RATISBON, or REGENSBURG, rat'-is-bon (Germ. rai'-gens-boorg), a city of Bavaria, on the Danube, opposite the influx of the Regen, 67 miles from Rugen. It is surrounded with an earthen mound, but it is not tenable against an army. Though built of stone, it has all the defects of an old town, the streets being narrow and crooked, and the houses high and old-fashioned. The town-house is gloomy. The best edifices are the cathedral and the church of St. Emeran, the former a venerable Gothic pile, the latter containing a number of good paintings; the town-house, in which the diet of the empire was held from 1662 to 1806; the episcopal residence, the arsenal, and the Haidplatz, where tournaments were given in the days of chivalry. Besides these, there are a public drawing-school, public libraries, an observatory, gymnasium, and several hospitals. Manf. Tobacco, porcelain, leather, and steel wares; also extensive dockyards for the building of boats and lighters. There is also a considerable trade on the Danube. The river is crossed by a bridge of great length, connecting Ratisbon with its northern suburb, called Stadt-am-Hof. Pop. 25,000. This place was long the capital of Bavaria, and, till 1806, was a free imperial city. In 1524 the Roman Catholics here formed a league against the Protestants; and here, in 1809, Napoleon I. was wounded in a battle in which he forced the Austrians to retreat.

RATZEBURG, rats'-boorg, a town of Denmark, in the duchy of Lauenburg, 11 miles from Lubeck. It stands on a small island in the Lake of Ratzeburg, and is the seat of the Danish duchy of Lauenburg. Pop. 3,100. —The LAKE has a length of 6 miles and a breadth of about 1½.—The PRINCIPALITY has an area of 130 square miles and a population of 16,500.

RAUCH, Christian, rouk, a modern German sculptor, who received instruction from Canova and Thorwaldsen. He was extensively employed by the various governments of Germany, and produced a large number of works, some of them of great excellence. The statues of Göthe, Schiller, and the monument to Frederick the Great of Prussia, were his best productions. A reduced model of the last work is contained in the Crystal Palace at Sydenham. B. in the principality of Waldeck, 1777.

RAUPACH, Ernst Benjamin Solomon, row'-pak, a celebrated German dramatist, who, for some time, resided at St. Petersburg, as professor of philosophy in the university of that city. After a course of travels in Germany and Italy, he repaired to Berlin, where he settled. His dramatic works, of both the serious and comic species, consist of eighteen volumes. B. in Silesia, 1784; D. at Berlin, 1852.

RAVAILLAC, Francis, ra-vai'-yak, a French regicide, who at first assumed the religious habit of the Feuillans, but was expelled on account of his fanatical views. He afterwards became deranged in intellect by the discourses of the leaguers, and, conceiving that Henry IV. of France was not a true Catholic, he assassinated him in 1610. He was torn in pieces by wild horses. B. at Angoulême, about 1579.

RAVEE, ra-ve', one of the "five rivers" of the Punjab, rising near Chumba, and after a course of 380 miles, joining the Chenab 35 miles from Mooltan.

RAVENGLASS, rai'-ven-glass, a seaport-town of Cumberland, 42 miles from Carlisle. Pop. Unascertained. It has oyster-fisheries, and a station on the Whitchaven and Furness Railway.

RAVENNA, ri-ven'-na, a town of the United States, in Ohio, on the Cuyahoga, 128 miles from Columbus. Pop. 2,500. It has a woollen manufactory.

RAVENNA, ra-ven'-na, a city of Italy, in the States of the Church, situate near the mouth of the Montone, 16 miles from Forli. The situation is pleasant, but the air is unhealthy, from the marshy nature of the ground. Its most interesting objects are the monuments of antiquity, in particular the ruins of the palace of Theodoric and the Porta Aurea, a splendid gate of marble, built by the Romans. The cathedral is a fine modern edifice, having its nave supported by four ranges of columns of Grecian marble. It has some fine pictures by Guido. The church of St. Vitale is likewise supported by pillars of Grecian marble, brought from Constantinople. Another church, called Santa Maria Rotonda, is very ancient, and contains the tomb of Theodoric. The other objects are, the tomb of Dante, a pillar commemorating the death of Gaston de Foix and the victory of Louis XII. of France over Pope Julius II. in 1512; the mausoleum of Placidia, containing the tombs of Honorius and Valentinian III.; various churches, a public library, and hospitals. Manf. Silks principally. Pop. 17,000.—Ravenna was made a Roman colony by Augustus, was the seat of the emperor Honorius, and was successively occupied by the barbarians who invaded Italy.

RAVENSBURG, ra'-vens-boorg, a town of Germany, 21 miles from Constance. Manf. Cotton and woollen stuffs, paper, and sealing-wax. Pop. 4,600.

RAVENSBURN, rai'-vens-burn, a river of England, in Kent, which runs into the Thames.

RAVENSCROFT, Thomas, rai'-vens-kroft, an eminent English musical composer, who was educated in St. Paul's choir, and in his 15th year became bachelor of music of the university of Cambridge. His fine collection of part-songs, including the famous "Canst thou love and lie alone?" was first published in 1611. In 1621 he produced "The whole Book of Psalms, &c., composed into Four Parts by Sundry Authors," which included contributions from the father of John Milton, Tallis, and Morley. Ravenscroft himself produced the justly-admired Bangor, St. David's, and Canterbury tunes. He is also supposed to have edited the famous collections of melodies known as the "Pamelia" and "Deuteromelia," a selection from which was printed by the Roxburgh Club in 1822. B. 1592; D. about 1640.

RAVENSTONDALE, rai'-ven-ston-dail, a parish of Westmoreland, 4 miles from Kirkby-Stephen. Pop. 1,900.

RAVIERRES, ra-ve-nir', a market-town of France, in the department of Yonne, 12 miles from Formère. Pop. 1,300.

RAVITZ, or RAWITSCH, ra'-vitch, a town of Prussian Poland, near the confines of Silesia, 54 miles from Posen. It is fortified by a wall and ditch, has four gates, is regularly built, and the streets are generally paved. Manf. Woollens, leather, linen, tobacco, and salt. Pop. 10,200.

RAWDEN, raw'-den, a township of Yorkshire, 6 miles from Bradford. Manf. Woollens. Pop. 2,700.

RAWLINSON, Richard, raw'-lin-son, a learned English antiquary, who collected materials for a continuation of Wood's "Athenæ Oxonienses" and "History of Oxford," which, with an account of his travels, he bequeathed to the university of Oxford, as well as a collection of medals and books. He also founded an Anglo-Saxon professorship in the same university; and his heart, agreeably to his own desire, was put in a marble urn and placed in St. John's College chapel. He published a translation of Fresnoy's "Method of Studying History," and other works. B. about 1700; D. 1755.

RAWLINSON, Sir Henry Creswicke, an eminent decipherer of the cuneiform inscriptions. In his 16th year he entered the military service of the East-India Company, from which he retired in 1856, having won his way to the rank of lieutenant-colonel. He was also created a K.C.B., and appointed a director of the East-India Company. His first efforts in the department of knowledge for which he became famous were in 1833, when he copied and read the Behistun inscriptions in Kurdistan. While political resident at Bagdad, in 1843, he studied the inscriptions of Nineveh. He contributed many papers to the journals of the Asiatic and Geographical societies; and in 1852 published, "Outline of the History of Assyria, as collected from the Inscriptions discovered by A. H. Layard in the Ruins of Nineveh." He also put forth a "Memorandum on the Publication of the Cuneiform Inscriptions," and was employed to furnish copies of the inscriptions discovered at Nineveh and Babylonia. B. at Chadlington, Oxfordshire, 1810.

RAY, or WRAY, John, rai, an eminent English botanist, whose father was a blacksmith, but gave his son a good education at Braintree, whence he removed to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he became fellow and Greek and mathematical lecturer. While at the university, he cultivated the study of botany, which was then in a very disorganized state; but, by his example and exertions, it became a favourite pursuit. In 1660 he published, in Latin, his "Catalogue of Plants Growing in the Neighbourhood of Cambridge," which laid the foundation of his "Synopsis Methodica Stirpium Britannicarum." The same year he was ordained by Bishop Sanderson; but, in 1662, he quitted his fellowship. After this he made numerous journeys over the kingdom with his friend Mr. Willughby and others, in search of botanical and zoological facts. He also accompanied the same gentlemen on an extensive tour over the continent of Europe, of which he published an account in 1673. He was chosen a fellow of the Royal Society in 1667, and contributed numerous papers to the Transactions of that learned body, on subjects of natural history. In 1679 he fixed his residence near Black-Notley, Essex, where he continued perfecting his collections and works till his death. His botanical and zoological writings laid the foundations of the classification of the vegetable and animal kingdoms. His other works were, "Three Discourses on the Primitive Chaos, the Creation, Deluge and Conflagration of the World;" several volumes attempting a classification of the whole animal kingdom; a translation of Rauwolf's "Travels in the East." After his death were published his "History of Insects," and a collection of Philosophical Letters between himself and several of his correspondents. Cuvier says that his labours "may be considered as the foundation of modern zoology; for naturalists are obliged to consult them every instant, for the purpose of clearing up the difficulties which they meet with in the works of Linnæus and his imitators." B. at Black-Notley, near Braintree, Essex, 1627; D. at the same place, 1705.

RAY, a county of the United States, in Missouri. Area, 563 square miles. Pop. 10,500.

RAYNAL, William Francis, rai'-nal, a French historian, who entered early into the society of Jesuits, and on taking priests' orders became a celebrated preacher, but quitted his order in 1748; on which he fixed his residence at Paris, where he had recourse to literature as a means of support. In 1770 he published his celebrated work, the "Philosophical and Political History of the European Commerce in both Indies," which obtained him a great reputation. With a view to a more correct edition, he travelled in Holland and England, and when in the latter country, was honoured with a very flattering mark of distinction: on visiting the House of Commons, the speaker ordered business to be suspended till he was accommodated with a convenient seat. In 1781 he published, at Geneva, a new edition of his history, greatly improved and enlarged. It was, however, proscribed by the parliament of Paris, and the author would have been arrested, had he not retired to Germany. In 1788 he returned to Paris, and, in 1791, he addressed a letter to the National Assembly, in which he exposed the dangerous course in which they were engaged, and predicted the evils which would result from revolution. His other works are,—"History of the Stadtholdership;" "History of the Parliament of England;" "History of the Divorce of Henry VIII. of England;" "On the Revolution of the English Colonies in North America." B. at St. Geniez, 1711; D. at Paris, 1796.

RAZ, LE, raz, a headland of France, in the department of Finistère, 25 miles from Brest. Lat. 48° 2′ N. Lon. 4° 44′ W.

RAZZE, raz'-ze, a town of Syria, near the Mediterranean Sea. It has many mosques, and an extensive caravan trade with Egypt. Pop. 5,000.

RÉ, rai, a small island near the west coast of France, opposite to La Rochelle. Ext. 18 miles long, with a breadth of 4. Pop. 18,000. It was attacked by the English in 1627.

READING, red'-ding, a market-town and borough of Berks, on the river Kennet, at its junction with the Thames, 38 miles from London. Its principal streets are spacious and well paved. There are churches, meeting-houses for dissenters of all denominations, a town-hall, county gaol, library, museum, news-rooms, mechanics' institute, several learned societies, a theatre, and baths. Of the once celebrated abbey of Reading, which occupied a circumference of nearly half a mile, nothing now remains but fragments of massive walls, composed of flint and gravel. Manf. Silks, velvets; and there are iron-foundries. The trade is considerable. Pop. 22,000. The Kennet and Avon Canal connects this town with Bristol. It has a station on the Great Western Railway. Archbishop Laud was born here in 1573.

READING, the capital of Berks county, Pennsylvania, U.S., on the Schuylkill, 50 miles from Philadelphia. It contains a court-house, a gaol, banks, a large edifice for the public offices, and several churches. Manf. Hats. So many as 55,000 hats are made here annually. Pop. 16,000.—Also the name of various townships.

REALEJO, rai-a-lai'-ho, a town of Central America, in Nicaragua, on the Pacific Ocean, on a river of the same name, 18 miles from Leon. It is a pretty large town, has churches, and an hospital surrounded by a very fine garden. Pop. about 5,000. Lat. 12° 45′ N. Lon. 87° 50′ W.

RÉAUMUR, René Antony Ferchault, Sieur de, rai-aw'-mur, an eminent French philosopher, who was educated for the legal profession, but abandoned it for the study of mathematics, philosophy, and natural history. In 1708 he was admitted a member of the Academy of Sciences. His principal works are,—"A History of Insects;" "A History of the Rivers of France;" and numerous papers in the Memoirs of the Academy of Sciences. He was the inventor of the valuable instrument known as Réaumur's thermometer. Of his work on insects, Cuvier declares, "that he unceasingly excites our curiosity by new and singular details. His style is diffuse but clear, and the facts which he relates, may always be depended upon." B. at Rochelle, 1683; D. 1757.

REBOUL, John, reb'-ool, a modern French poet, who was the son of a locksmith, and who himself followed the calling of a baker until the year 1839, when he repaired to Paris, where a brilliant reception awaited him, in consequence of the great popularity his poems had attained in the capital. The merit of bringing him before the public was due to M. de Lamartine, who addressed to the baker-poet one of his harmonies, entitled "Genius in Obscurity." He published several collections of poems, some of which ran through as many as six editions. His songs are frequently of the Anacreontic order. One of his tragedies was produced upon the French stage in 1850, and obtained a great and deserved success. In 1848 he was sent to the Constituent Assembly as the representative of his native department. B. at Nismes, Gard, 1796.

RECANATI, rai-ka-na'-te, a town of Central Italy, on the Musone, 4 miles from Loreto. It has a town-hall, rich in works of art. Pop. 16,000.

RECHABITES, rek'-a-bites, a Jewish sect, founded by Jonadab, son of Rechab, in the reign of Jehu. They sought to rigorously observe the laws of Moses, abstained from wine, lived in tents, and did not cultivate the earth or possess property.

RECORDE, Robert, rek'-ord, an English physician and mathematician, who was the first who wrote on algebra in the English language. B. about 1500; D. in London, 1558.

REDDING, Cyrus, red'-ding, an English littérateur, who, after editing the Plymouth Chronicle and other prints, went to Paris to undertake the literary direction of Galignani's Messenger, an English journal founded in the French capital after the second return of the Bourbons. He subsequently became sub-editor of the New Monthly Magazine, while under the editorship of Thomas Campbell, and, after discontinuing his connection with that periodical, became editor of several provincial newspapers. He published, among other works, a "Naval Gazetteer," "Every Man his own Butler," and a "History and Description of Modern Wines." B. in Cornwall, 1785.

REDDITCH, red'-ditch, a hamlet of England, in Worcestershire, 12 miles from Birmingham. It is noted for its needle manufactures, of which 70,000,000 are said to be made weekly.

REDGRAVE, Richard, red'-graiv, a modern English painter, whose early youth was spent in his father's office, where he was employed in making designs and working drawings. In 1826 he became a student of the Royal Academy; eleven years later he obtained his "first success" as an artist, on exhibiting his picture of "Gulliver on the Farmer's Table," at the British Institution. From that period he gradually rose to a foremost position in his profession. In 1840 he became associate, and in 1851 an academician. His best paintings are—"The Sempstress," an illustration of Thomas Hood's "Song of the Shirt;" "A Poet's Study;" "Solitary Pool;" "Little Red Riding-Hood;" "The Midwood Shade." His work entitled "The Country Cousins" is an excellent one, and was painted for Mr. Vernon. It now belongs to the nation, and may be seen in the British collection at the South Kensington Museum. He was appointed head master of the government school of design, and published an "Elementary Manual of Colour." B. in London, 1801.

REDI, Francis, rai'-de, an Italian naturalist, who became professor of philosophy at Pisa, and physician to the grand-duke Ferdinand II. of Tuscany. He assisted in compiling the Dictionary of the Academy Della Crusca, and wrote some poems; but is chiefly known by his works on natural history, which are —"Experiments on the Generation of Animals;" "Observations on Vipers;" "Experiments on Natural Curiosities brought from India." B. at Arazzo, 1626; D. at Pisa, 1698.

RI DON, red'-awng, a town of France, in the department of the Ille-and-Vilaine, on the Vilaine, 40 miles from Rennes. Pop. 6,000.

RED RIVER, or NATCHITOCHES, nätch'-i-totch'-es, a river of North America, in Louisiana, rising about lat. 35° N., lon. 105° W., and, after a course of about 1,500 miles, flowing into the Mississippi, 240 miles above New Orleans, in lat. 31° 15′ N., lon. 91° 48′ W.

RED RIVER SETTLEMENT is in British N. America, between Lake Superior and Winnipeg.—It was in 1813 founded by the earl of Selkirk. Pop. about 6,000.

REDRUTH, red'-rooth, a market-town and parish of Cornwall, 9 miles from Truro. It consists chiefly of one long street, and owes nearly all its importance to the neighbouring mines of tin and copper. Pop. 11,000.—Near this town is the hill called Carnbrae, where are Druidical remains. It is connected with Hayle by the West Cornwall Railway.

RED SEA, or ARABIAN GULF, an extensive inlet of the Indian Ocean, dividing Arabia from the opposite coast of Africa. It extends in a north-north-west direction, from the Straits of Babelmandeb to Suez, where it is only 60 miles distant from the Mediterranean; and the isthmus between these seas forms the only connecting point of the continents of Asia and Africa. Ext. About 1,400 miles long, with a breadth not exceeding 200 miles in any part. It is supposed to take its name from the blood-red colour frequently imparted to it by the animalcules with which it abounds. Formerly it was the principal route for traffic between Europe and the East, which continued till after the discovery of the passage round the Cape of Good Hope. It has now become again a part of the direct route between Europe and India. The Red Sea telegraph is being laid to connect India with Europe.

REES, Abraham, rees, a laborious compiler, who came of a family of dissenting clergymen. He was, during 20 years, professor of mathematics in the Dissenters' College at Hoxton, and afterwards became professor of theology and the natural sciences at the new college at Hackney. He first published an enlarged edition of the Encyclopædia of Chambers, and subsequently produced a work of the same kind himself, under the title of the "New Encyclopædia," in which work he was assisted by several talented men. B. in Wales, 1743; D. in London, 1825.

REES, a town of Rhenish Prussia, 11 miles from Cleves. Manf. Cotton goods. Pop. 3,500.—This town was taken by the Dutch in 1614, and by the French in 1678.

REGALBUTO, rai-gal-boo'-to, a town of the island of Sicily, 25 miles from Catania. Pop. 6,400

REGEN, rai'-gen, a river of Germany, rising in the Bohmer-Wald, and, after a course of 70 miles, falling into the Danube opposite Regensburg.

REGENSBURG. (See RATISBON.)

REGGIO (REGIUM JULII), red'-jo, a town of Naples, and capital of Calabria Ultra, on a strait which separates Sicily from the mainland, 8 miles from Messina. Its public edifices are all religious; consisting of a cathedral, churches, convents, and colleges. Manf. Silks, gloves, hosiery, and articles from the thread of shell-fish. It has, besides, an export trade in wine, citron, olives, and oil. Pop. 7,500.—Reggio was almost totally destroyed by an earthquake in 1783. It is the birthplace of Agathocles, several poets and sculptors, and the philosophers Hipparchus and Hippias.

REGGIO, a town of Italy, capital of a small duchy of the same name, on the river Tessone, 12 miles from Modena. The streets are regular, and bordered with arcades or piazzas. The only public edifices of interest are the cathedral, with its paintings, the church of St. Prospero, that of the Augustine friars; the town-house, the theatre, and the Porta Nuova. Manf. Silks, hempen fabrics, and horn, wooden, and ivory articles. Pop. 18,600.—Ariosto and Correggio were born here.

REGIOMONTANUS, re-ji-o-mon-tai'-nus, a German astronomer, whose real name was Müller. He studied at Vienna under Purbach, whom he succeeded in the chair of astronomy, 1461. He was taught the Greek language by Theodore Gaza, and was thus enabled to read Ptolemy and other mathematicians of antiquity. He visited several countries, and received marks of distinction from sovereign princes, particularly Sixtus IV., who made him archbishop of Ravenna, and employed him in reforming the calendar. He wrote extensively upon astronomy. B. in Germany, 1436; D. at Rome, 1476.

REGLA, rai'-gla, a fortified town of the island of Cuba, a suburb of Havannah, on the opposite side of its bay. It is the seat of a slave trade. Pop. 8,000.

REGNARD, John Francis, rain'-yar, a French comic writer. He was fond of travelling, and in a voyage from Genoa to Marseilles, was taken by an Algerine pirate, and carried to Algiers, where by his skill in cookery he obtained the favour of his master; but being detected in an intrigue, he was condemned to suffer death or turn Mahometan. The French consul being made acquainted with the affair, ransomed him and sent him to France, after which he travelled through Flanders, Holland, Denmark, Sweden, and Poland. His dramatic works, which rank next to Molière's, were published in 1823. B. at Paris, 1656; D. near Paris, 1710.

REGNIER, Mathurin, rain'-yai, a French satirical poet, who secured the patronage of Cardinal Joyeuse, and obtained a pension and a canonry. The best edition of his poems is that of Paris, 1822. B. at Chartres, 1573; D. at Rouen, 1613.

REGNIER, Francis Seraphin, a learned French author, whose talents recommended him to the patronage of the duke de Crequi, whom he accompanied to Rome in 1662. While there, he wrote Italian sonnets in so good a style as to be admitted a member of the Academy della Crusca. In 1684 he succeeded Mezeray as secretary of the French Academy. His most important works were a French grammar; an Italian translation of Anacreon; French, Latin, Spanish, and Italian poems; and a history of the disputes of France with the court of Rome. B. at Paris, 1632; D. 1713.

REGNITZ, raik'-nitz, a river of Bavarian Franconia, which, after a navigable course of 35 miles, falls into the Main below Bamberg.

REGULUS, Marcus Attilius, reg'-u-lus, a Roman consul, who, in his second consulate, defeated Amilcar and Hanno in a naval engagement off the coast of Sicily. This victory was followed by another on land, and the reduction of several places. The Carthaginians sued for peace, which was refused. Xantippus, a Spartan commander, coming with reinforcements to the Carthaginians, defeated Regulus, who was taken prisoner. The Carthaginians subsequently sent him as envoy to Rome to propose terms of peace, but on the condition of his return. Regulus advised the senate not to comply with the terms, for which the Carthaginians put him to a cruel death, 251 B.C. The senate gave his widow leave to avenge her husband's death on some illustrious Carthaginians, which she did with such barbarity as obliged them to stop her progress.

REHNA, rā'-na, a town of Mecklenburg-Schwerin, 17 miles from Lubeck. Pop. 2,700.

REHOBOAM, re-ho-bo'-am, succeeded his father Solomon 980 B.C., in his 41st year. In consequence of his oppressive exactions, ten tribes revolted against him, and took for their king Jeroboam, who had been recalled from Egypt. Two kingdoms were thus formed, —that of Israel, consisting of ten tribes; and that of Judah, with only two,—Judah and Benjamin. Rehoboam relapsed into idolatry; and, in the fifth year of his reign, Shishak, king of Egypt, invaded his kingdom, and carried off all the golden ornaments of the temple. Rehoboam subsequently repented and replaced the ornaments of the temple, using brass, however, instead of the more precious metal. His reign was afterwards almost unbroken by war; but, after his death, Jeroboam invaded the kingdom with an army of 800,000 men. He was signally defeated, however, by Abijah. (See ABIJAH.) D. 973 B.C.

REICHENAU, rī'-ke-nou, a town of Bohemia, 18 miles from Koniggratz. Manf. Linen and woollen fabrics. Pop. 4,500.—Also the name of several other small towns in Germany.

REICHENAU, an island in the grand-duchy of Baden, in the Untersee, 4 miles from Constance. Ext. 3 miles long, with a breadth of 1. Pop. 1,500.

REICHENBACH, rī'-ken-bak, the name of several towns in Germany, the largest in Saxony, in the circle of Zwickau, 12 miles from Plauen. Manf. Woollens, cashmeres, cotton, and linen stuffs. Pop. 8,200.

REICHENBERG, or LIMBERK, rī'-ken-bairg, a town of Bohemia, in the circle of Bunzlau, on the Neisse, 58 miles from Prague. It has several churches, a royal and a normal school, and a theatre. Manf. Woollen, cotton, and linen stuffs. Pop. 14,000.

REICHENHALL, rī'-ken-hal, a town of Upper Bavaria, on the Saal, 8 miles from Salzburg. In its neighbourhood are large salt-works. Pop. 3,000.

REICHSTADT, rike'-stat, a town of Bohemia, 45 miles from Prague. Pop. 2,200.—In 1818 it was erected into a duchy for the son of Napoleon I.

REID, Major-General Sir William, reed, a distinguished English general of engineers, who received his education at the Royal Military Academy at Woolwich, and began his career as lieutenant of the Royal Engineers in 1809. He became captain in 1814, brevet lieutenant-colonel in 1837, brevet-colonel in 1851, and major-general in 1856. Within a year of receiving his first commission, he was sent to the Peninsula, and served to the end of the war. He was at the three sieges of Badajoz, the siege of Ciudad Rodrigo, the siege of the forts and the battle of Salamanca, the sieges of Burgos and San Sebastian, and battles of Vittoria, Nivelle, Nive, and Toulouse; and was wounded at Badajoz, Ciudad Rodrigo, and San Sebastian. He was present at the attack on Algiers under Lord Exmouth in 1816. In 1832 he was employed at Barbadoes in rebuilding the government buildings which had been destroyed by the hurricane of the preceding year; and then he first conceived the idea of endeavouring to trace the laws which govern the movements of these agents. Subsequently, as governor of Bermuda, Barbadoes, and Malta, as chairman of the executive committee of the Great Exhibition of 1851, and as the author of the "Law of Storms," he rendered signal services to his country. At the close of the Exhibition he was made a K.C.B., and the government of Malta was conferred upon him, which he administered during the Crimean war. His well-known work on the "Law of Storms,"—that is, on the laws of motion of the tropical whirlwinds,—was founded in a great measure on his own experience in the West Indies, where he had been on military duty before his government of Bermuda. This work is not merely a theoretical investigation, but of eminently practical value to all who have to navigate in the seas both of the East and West Indies. B. at Kinglassie, Fifeshire, 1791; D. 1858.

REID, Thomas, a learned Scotch divine, who was educated at the university of Glasgow, where he took his doctor's degree, and became professor of moral philosophy. His chief works are "An Inquiry into the Human Mind," and "Essays on the Intellectual and Active Powers of Man." B. at Strachan, Kincardineshire, 1710; D. 1790.

REIGATE, rī'-gait, a town of Surrey, on the Mole, 6 miles from Dorking. It stands on a rock of white sand, and has a church, a library, grammar-school, town-hall, and a market-house. Pop. with parish, about 5,000.—Here is a cave, in which, it is said, the barons met to arrange the articles of Magna Charta.

REIMS. (See RHEIMS.)

REINACH, rī'-nak, a town of Switzerland, 12 miles from Aargau. It has some calico-printing works. Pop. 3,000.

REINERZ, rī'-nairtz, a town of Prussian Silesia, 58 miles from Breslau. Manf. Woollens and linens. Pop. 2,500.

REINESIUS, Thomas, rī-ne'-si-us, a learned German critic. After being a burgomaster of Altemburg and counsellor to the elector of Saxony, he retired to Leipsic, where he practised medicine till his death. He published several learned and curious works on the Latin classics, and some lectures and epistles. B. at Gotha, 1587; D. 1667.

REINHOLD, Erasmus, rīne'-holte, an eminent German astronomer and mathematician, who was professor at the university of Wittemberg, and wrote some mathematical and astronomical works of a most important and valuable nature. B. at Saalfeld, 1511; D. 1553.

REINHOLD, Charles Leonard, a German metaphysician, who received his education among the Jesuits, but quitted them to pursue the study of philosophy. He afterwards repaired to Weimar, where he married the daughter of Wieland. In 1786 he published "Letters upon the Philosophy of Kant," and, in the following year, was appointed professor of philosophy at Jena, where his lectures were very numerously attended. In 1794 he went to Kiel, where he held the professorship of philosophy until his death. Reinhold was among the first to appreciate and propagate the theories of Kant; but he subsequently leant towards the ideas of Fichte. He conceived that a great deal of the misconception of the views of these philosophers arose from the obscurity of their language; and consequently undertook to compose a work the object of which was to reform the phraseology adopted in metaphysical works. He was a most prolific writer. He also produced a "Letter to Lavater and Fichte, respecting the Belief in God." B. at Vienna, 1758; D. at Kiel, 1823.

REISK, John, riske, a learned German writer, who published a treatise "On the Sibyls and other Oracles," "On Ahasuerus and Esther," "On the Malady of Job," "On the Images of Jesus Christ," and other works of erudition. B. 1641; D. 1701.

REISKE, John James, a learned German critic and physician, who became rector of the college of St. Nicholas, at Leipsic, and published, among many other learned works, "Oratores Græci," an edition of "Dionysius Halicarnassensis," the works of Plutarch, and a Latin translation of Abulfeda's "History of the Arabs." B. at Zorbig, near Leipsic, 1716; D. at Leipsic, 1774.

RELAND, Adrian, rā'-land, a learned Dutch writer, who, at the age of 24, was chosen professor of philosophy at Harderwick; whence he removed to Utrecht, on being appointed professor of oriental languages and ecclesiastical antiquities. His principal works are "Dissertations on the Medals of the Ancient Hebrews," "Introduction to Hebrew Grammar," an edition of Epictetus, and a magnificent work upon the antiquities of Palestine. B. at Ryp, North Holland, 1676; D. at Utrecht, 1718.

REMBANG, rem'-bang, a large and populous town of Java, on the north coast, 38 miles from Samarang. It is the capital of a Dutch residency. Pop. about 500,000.

REMBRANDT, Van Ryn, rem'-brant, an eminent Dutch painter and etcher. He acquired his art under several of the best painters of Amsterdam, and, early in life, grew famous. He had many pupils, whom he employed in making copies of his works, which he retouched and sold for large sums. His love of money was intense, and at his death he left a large fortune. In paintings of historical subjects he was less successful than in portrait, where he displayed a brilliancy of colouring and a power of light and shade that was truly astonishing. His best etchings realize from 30 to 100 guineas. Several fine paintings of his are in the National Gallery. B. near Leyden, 1606; D. at Amsterdam, 1669.

REMI, St., rem'-e, archbishop of Rheims, who converted Clovis to Christianity, and baptized that monarch. D. 533.

REMI, St., archbishop of Lyons, presided in the council of Valentia in 855. He supported the doctrine of St. Augustine on grace and predestination in some works which are extant. He died in 875.

REMI, Joseph Honoré, advocate in the parliament of Paris, who wrote a burlesque called "Days," in opposition to Young's "Night Thoughts;" but his principal work is an Éloge on Chancellor de l'Hopital, which was crowned by the French Academy in 1777, and censured by the Sorbonne. He also wrote the elogies of Molière, Colbert, and Fénélon. B. 1738; D. at Paris, 1782.

REMIREMONT, rem'-eer-mawnt, a town of France, in the department of the Vosges, on the Moselle, 14 miles from Epinal. Manf. Cottons, velvets, and iron wares. Pop. 5,500.

REMLINGEN, rem'-ling-en, a town of Bavaria, in Lower Franconia, 12 miles from Wurtzburg. Pop. 1,100.

REMO, St., rai'-mo, a seaport of Sardinia, on the Mediterranean, 14 miles from Oneglia. It has a coasting trade in fish, oil, and fruits. Pop. 7,500.

REMSCHEID, rem'-shide, a town of Rhenish Prussia, 18 miles from Dusseldorf. Manf. Principally iron wares. Pop. 12,500.

REMUSAT, rem'-oo-sa, a market-town of France, in the department of the Drôme, 12 miles from Nivres. Pop. 700.

REMUSAT, John Peter Abel, an eminent French orientalist, and professor of the Chinese and Tartarian languages at the College of France. He acquired, without the assistance of a tutor, the Chinese, Thibetian, and Mantchou languages. He was one of the founders of the Asiatic Society at Paris, and became conservator of the oriental manuscripts in the Bibliothèque Royale. His attainments as a Chinese scholar were very high, and he produced a number of works on the most difficult languages in the world, of a most excellent character. His principal productions were,—"Elements of the Chinese Grammar;" "Researches upon the Tartarian Languages," a "History of Buddhism;" an edition of a Chinese novel, entitled "The Two Cousins;" and a volume of Chinese tales. He also contributed several valuable articles to the "Biographie Universelle," and to the "Journal des Savans." B. at Paris, 1788; D. at the same city, 1832.

REMY, St., rai'-me, a town of France, in the department of the Mouths of the Rhone, 42 miles from Marseilles. Its principal industry consists of silk-spinning and woollen-weaving. Pop. 6,000.

RENAIX, ren'-ai, a town of Belgium, in East Flanders, 20 miles from Ghent. Manf. Linen, cotton, and woollen stuffs; also chicory and tobacco. Pop. 14,400.

RENAN, St., ren'-awng, a town of France, in the department of Finistère, 6 miles from Brest. Pop. 1,100.

RENAU D'ELIÇAGARAY, Bernard, ren'-o, a French mathematician and military engineer, who distinguished himself by his improvements in the construction and management of ships, and by the invention of a particular form of bombshell. He acted as engineer under Louis XIV. and Vauban, and at the siege of Gibraltar in 1704. He wrote "The Theory of Manœuvring Vessels," and several letters in defence of the work, against Huygens and Bernouilli. B. 1652; D. 1719.

RENAUDOT, Theophrastus, ren'-o-do, a French physician. He was the first who published, in France, a gazette, so called, as is supposed, from the Venetian coin una gazetta, for which such papers were originally sold at Venice. Renaudot obtained the privilege of publishing the "Gazette of France" for himself and family. His other works are, "An Abridgment of the Life of the Prince de Condé," and "The Life of Cardinal Mazarin." B. at Loudon, 1584; D. 1653.

RENAUDOT, Eusebius, a learned French writer, and grandson of the preceding. He entered into orders, and distinguished himself by his knowledge of the Arabic, Syriac, and Coptic languages. The Cardinal de Noailles took him to Rome, where Clement V. gave him the priory of Fossey, in Brittany. On visiting Florence, the grand-duke gave him apartments in his palace, and the academy of that city chose him a member. He was also a member of the French Academy and of other learned societies. His most important works are, a continuation of Nicole's book on the "Perpetuity of Faith," "History of the Jacobite Patriarchs of Alexandria," in Latin; "A Collection of the Ancient Oriental Liturgies," "Account of India and China," translated from the Arabic; and a translation of the "Life of Athanasius" from the Arabic. B. at Paris, 1646; D. 1720.

RENCHEN, rain'-ken, a town of Baden, on the Rench, 9 miles from Offenburg. Pop. 2,700.—Here, in 1796, the French defeated the Austrians, and entered Swabia. It has a station on the Basle and Manheim Railway.

RENDSBORG, rends'-borg, a fortified town of Denmark, on the Eyder, 18 miles from Kiel. It stands on an island at the commencement of the Kiel canal, and has extensive fortifications. Its principal public buildings are an arsenal, barracks, schools, houses of charity, and a house of correction. Manf. Pottery, tobacco, and stockings. Pop. 12,000.—This place was taken by the Swedes in 1643, and by the Prussians in 1848.

RENFREW, ren'-froo, an ancient royal burgh and parish of Scotland, in Renfrewshire, near the mouths of the rivers Cart and Clyde, 3 miles from Paisley. It is meanly built, consisting of one street and several by-lanes. The principal branch of trade is thread, but there are also soap and candle works. Pop. of the town, 3,000.—On the castle-hill stood a palace of Robert II., of which not a vestige now remains. Renfrew is connected with the river Clyde by means of a canal.

RENFREWSHIRE, ren'-froo-sheer, a county of Scotland, bounded E. by Lanarkshire, S. by the county of Ayr, and, on the remaining sides, it is nearly wholly washed by the Firth of Clyde. Area, 227 square miles. Desc. Diversified with hill and dale and with wood and water. The hilly or more elevated district is by far the most extensive. It forms the south and western parts of the county; but there are no rugged or lofty mountains. There is, however, a part of the county formed of gently-rising hills, interspersed with various copses, and watered at the bottom by sweetly winding rivulets. Rivers. The principal are the Clyde, the White Cart, Black Cart, Gryfe, and the Lavern. Pro. Wheat, oats, and grass. Minerals. Coal, lime, and freestone. Manf. Cotton stuffs and shawls. The inhabitants are much devoted to trade, more particularly to the different branches of the weaving manufacture, in which almost all the towns and villages are engaged. Pop. 162,000.

RENI, ren-e', a market-town of Russia, in Bessarabia, at the confluence of the Pruth and the Danube. Pop. 7,500.

RENI, Guido. (See GUIDO.)

RENNELL, Major James, ren'-nel, an eminent English geographer, who, early in life, entered the navy, and served under Admiral Parker at the taking of Pondicherry. At the age of 20 he abandoned the naval for the military service, having entered the engineers of the East-India Company. Under Lord Clive he served with considerable distinction, was wounded, and gained the rank of major. In 1782 he returned to England, and henceforth pursued his investigations in geography, history, and topography. He produced—"Map and Memoir of Hindostan;" "Marches of the British Army in the Peninsula of India during the Campaign of 1791;" "Observations on the Topography of the Plain of Troy;" "Treatise on the Comparative Geography of Western Asia," with a very valuable atlas; an "Investigation of the Currents of the Atlantic Ocean," a work which Lieutenant Maury, of the United States navy, afterwards extended and improved. Major Rennell also published, "Geographical System of Herodotus explained and examined," and a learned commentary upon the "Retreat of the Ten Thousand Greeks." Mungo Park was much indebted to his patient research and great acquirements in the production of his work on his African travels. He was a member of the Royal Society, and a frequent contributor to its "Transactions," as well as to those of the Antiquarian Society. A most interesting paper, read to the latter body, was his disquisition on the landing-place of Julius Cæsar in Britain. After his death, his remains were honoured with a place in Westminster Abbey. Though unacquainted with the Greek language, and knowing Herodotus only through a most inefficient translation, he, by virtue of his unrivalled sagacity, produced a work illustrative of "the father of history" which entitles him to the highest reputation as a geographer. B. near Chudleigh, Devonshire, 1742; D. 1830.

RENNES, ren, a town of France, capital of the department of the Ille-and-Vilaine, situate at the confluence of these two rivers, 60 miles from Nantes. The Vilaine divides the town into two parts, connected together by bridges. The one on the left bank is called the Lower and that on the right the Upper town, which stands on an eminence, and forms the finest and most considerable portion of the city. It has several fine squares, and the principal promenades are called the Cours and the Tabor. The public edifices are, the cathedral, with lofty towers and some relics; the building formerly the house of meeting for the parliament of Brittany; the town-hall, the arsenal, a college formerly belonging to the Jesuits, a normal school, school of artillery, and a university-academy for various departments. Manf. Sailcloth, thread, honey, wax, and linen goods. Pop. 40,000. Lat. 48° 7′ N. Lon. 1° 36′ W.—In 1357 this place was unsuccessfully besieged by the duke of Lancaster.

RENNIE, John, ren'-ne, a Scotch mechanician and civil engineer, who was the son of a farmer, and from his earliest youth had a great inclination for the study of what is termed "mechanical drawing." He also studied chemistry and mechanics under Drs. Black and Robison at Edinburgh, and, after working during some time as an operative mechanist, repaired to London about 1780. He was at first employed in the metropolis to superintend the construction of steam-engines and machinery; but, at a later period he became engaged in designing and erecting public works. He built a bridge at Kelso, the celebrated Waterloo bridge over the Thames, and the Southwark iron bridge, over the same river. The Grand Western Canal, from the mouth of the Exe to Taunton; the Aberdeen Canal, and the Kennet and Avon Canal, were his best works in inland navigation. He was no less distinguished as a designer of docks; London Docks, the East and West India Docks, and those of Greenock, Leith, and Liverpool, attesting to his great acquirements as a civil engineer. The designs for London Bridge were made by him, but were carried to completion by his son, Sir John Rennie, after his death. He likewise furnished plans for the improvement of the dockyards at Portsmouth, Plymouth, Chatham, and Pembroke; erected the pier at Holyhead, and designed the enlargements of the harbours of Berwick, New haven, &c. His remains were interred in St. Paul's Cathedral. B. at Phantassie, Haddingtonshire, Scotland, 1761; D. in London, 1821.

RENNIE, George, an eminent civil engineer, and eldest son of the preceding. After completing his scholastic education, he became an assistant to his father in the execution of the great works on which he was employed until his death. In 1818 he entered into partnership with his brother John, a civil engineer and manufacturer of machinery. He designed, improved, or extended many great engineering works in the United Kingdom and abroad. In Russia he carried out many works of the greatest magnitude, either in conjunction with his brother, Sir John Rennie (who was knighted upon the completion of London Bridge), or, after the dissolution of their partnership, alone. The firm over which he and his brother presided also constructed engines for the vessels of the French, Russian, Spanish, and Belgian governments. He wrote several important works on subjects connected with his profession, the most important of which were, "Experiments on the Strength of Materials," and on "The Frictions of Solids." B. in Surrey, 1791.

RENO, rai'-no, a river of Italy, rising in the Apennines of Tuscany, and, after a course of 75 miles, joining the Po, 14 miles from Ferrara.

RENSSELAER, ren'-se-ler, a county of New York, U.S. Area, 626 square miles. Pop. 75,000.

RENTZ, rentz, a town of France, in the department of the Pas-de-Calais, 12 miles from St. Omar, where the Spaniards were, in 1554, defeated by Henry II.

REPP, Thorlieff Gudmunsson, rep, an eminent modern Icelandic writer, who for a short time held the post of under-librarian to the Advocates' Library at Edinburgh. He contributed articles to the "Penny Cyclopædia," "Encyclopædia Britannica," and "Blackwood's Magazine;" and produced, among other important works, a Danish and English Dictionary, with Ferrall, and an edition of the "Sagas" in Icelandic. B. 1794.

REPTON, Humphrey, rep'-ton, an eminent English "landscape gardener," who, between the years 1785—1811, was engaged in improving the gardens of the English nobility and gentry throughout the kingdom. He published several works upon his profession, which were afterwards re-edited and improved by Mr. Loudon. B. at Bury St. Edmunds, 1752; D. 1818.

REQUENA, rai-kai'-na, a town of Spain, in the province of Cuença, 41 miles from Valencia. It has straight streets, houses tolerably built, and a neat square. Manf. Silks. Pop. 11,200.

REQUESTA, re-kes'-ta, a town of France, in the department of Aveyron, 20 miles from Rhodez. Pop. 4,500.

RESENIUS, Peter, re-se'-ni-us, a learned Danish writer, who studied law at Leyden, and professed that faculty at Padua. On his return to Denmark he was made counsellor of state. His chief works are, an Icelandic Dictionary, an edition of the "Edda" of the Icelanders. Of this last, Mallet gave a translation in his introduction to the "History of Denmark." B. at Copenhagen, 1625; D. 1688.

RESHD, reshd, the capital of Ghilan, in Persia, 16 miles from its port Enzelli, on the Caspian Sea. It imports manufactured goods, and exports silks, fruits, and gall-nuts. Pop. Unascertained.

RESINA, rai-se'-na, a town of Naples, built partly on the site of the ancient Herculaneum, 5 miles from Naples. Pop. 9,000.

RETFORD, EAST, ret'-ford, a market-town of Nottinghamshire, on both sides of the river Idle, over which there is a bridge, 30 miles from Nottingham. It has a Gothic church, town-hall, free school, an hospital, an almshouse, and a theatre. Pop. 3,000.—The church of West Retford is dedicated to St. Michael. It has also an hospital. Pop. 653.

RETHEL, rai'-tel, a town of France, in the department of the Ardennes, on the Aisne, 24 miles from Rheims. Manf. Woollens, cottons, linen, hats, and leather. Pop. 8,500.

RETHEL, Alfred, a celebrated German painter, whose genius for art was evinced at an early age; as, in his 15th year, he produced a series of crayon drawings, the composition, truthfulness of outline, and correct expression of which were very remarkable. His first large subject in oil was entitled "The Establishment of Christianity in Gaul," in which was displayed rare originality of treatment. Among his later pictures was one of which a strange story is told; it was called "Nemesis pursuing a Murderer," and was of such a forcible and harrowing character as to cause its owner, a certain personage of high rank, who had been guilty of some undiscovered crime, and who had won the painting in a lottery at Frankfort, to become a lunatic. He subsequently produced a series of frescoes, which are admitted to rank among the chefs-d'œuvre of German art. At a later period he took up his residence at Rome, where he devoted himself to the composition of a series of paintings illustrative of the campaigns of Hannibal. Not less remarkable for vigour of imagination and power of design, were his book illustrations; among which may be cited, "Death, the Consoler and the Avenger," and his drawings made for "Beeton's Illuminated Family Bible." B. at Aix-la-Chapelle, 1816.

RETHY, ret'-e, a town of Belgium, in the province of Antwerp, 6 miles from Turnhout. Pop. 2,300.

RETIMO, ret'-i-mo, a seaport-town of European Turkey, on the N. coast of the island of Candia, or Crete. It has a trade in soap and oil. Pop. 8,000.

RETZ, John Francis Paul de Gondy, Cardinal de, retz. He was descended from a powerful and wealthy family, and was educated for the church, a profession little suited to his unscrupulous and debauched disposition. In 1613 he was named coadjutor of the archbishop of Paris, his uncle; but, while he was soliciting the highest dignities in the church, he fought several duels. In the civil wars of the Fronde he raised a regiment, to which he gave the name of Corinth, because he was titular archbishop of that place. At length he made peace with the court, on condition of his being created a cardinal; but he still continued to cabal against the government, for which he was imprisoned at Vincennes and Nantes. He made his escape from the last place, and travelled in several countries. In 1661 he returned to France, and obtained his pardon and the abbey of St. Denis. This turbulent prelate wrote Memoirs of his own life, and the "History of the Conspiracy of Count Fiesco." B. at Montmirail, 1614; D. at Paris, 1679.

RETZSCH, Moritz, raitch, an eminent German designer, who, after studying at the Dresden Academy, became, in 1824, professor of painting in the same institution. It was not as a painter, however, but as a designer that he became famous. His etchings in outline, illustrative of Göthe and Shakspere, are works of great beauty and power, and became as popular in England as in the native country of the artist. He also produced a set of illustrations to Bürger's "Lenora," and to several of the poems of Schiller. B. at Dresden, 1779; D. 1857.

REUCHLIN, John, roik'-lin, a learned German writer, who acquired a profound knowledge of the Latin, Greek, and Hebrew languages. After pursuing his studies in France and Germany, he fixed his residence at Stutgard, where he was employed in state matters by some of the German princes. He wrote extensively upon the Hebrew language and the cabalistic art. B. at Pforzheim, 1455; D. at Stutgard, 1522.

RÉUNION, ILE DE LA. (See BOURBON.)

REUS, rai'-oos, a town of Spain, in Catalonia, 8 miles from Tarragona. Manf. Silk, cottons, leather, hats, brandy, and liquors. Pop. 26,000.

REUSS, roiss, a principality of Central Germany, in Upper Saxony, divided into two parts, of which the one adjoins the Prussian, the other the Bavarian territories. These parts are again subdivided into various districts. United area, 1,042 square miles. United pop. 193,000. Lat. between 50° 28′ and 51° 3′ N. Lon. between 11° 28 and 12° 20′ E.

REUSS, a river of Switzerland, rising on the S. side of Mount St. Gothard, and, after a course of 30 miles, falling into the Lake of Lucerne.

REUTLINGEN, roit'-ling-en, a town of Switzerland, in Bern, 4 miles from Thun. Pop. 1,300.

REUTLINGEN, a fortified town of Germany, in Wurtemberg, on the Echetz, 20 miles from Stutgard. Manf. Woollen, linen, and cotton stuffs. Pop. 13,000. This town was the first that embraced the principles of the Reformation in Swabia.

REVEL, rev'-el, a strongly-fortified seaport-town of Russia, the capital of Esthonia, on a small bay of the Gulf of Finland, 200 miles from St. Petersburg. It has an excellent and well-defended harbour. The town is divided into three parts, called the town, the suburb, and the Domberg; but the streets are narrow and irregular. It has numerous churches, an imperial palace, an admiralty, a town-hall, a collegiate episcopal seminary, a theatre, a public library, a military academy, several schools, infirmaries, and poor-houses. As a watering-place it is much frequented. Pop. 25,000. Lat. 59° 26′ 5″ N. Lon. 24° 45′ 2″ E.—This town was founded by Valdemar II., king of Denmark, in 1218; and afterwards sold to the Teutonic Knights. In 1710 it was taken from Sweden by the Russians, who in 1854 destroyed its roadsteads by sinking large blocks of stone to prevent the entrance of the Anglo-French fleet, whilst blockading the Russian ports in the Baltic during the same year. It was at one time the great emporium of the Hanseatic League for the trade with Novgorod.

REVEL, a town of France, 30 miles from Toulouse. Manf. Linen, woollens, stockings, and caps. Pop. 6,000.

REVELLO, rai-vail'-lo, a town of Sardinia, in Piedmont, 20 miles from Coni. It stands on a hill at the head of the Po. Pop. 5,300.

REVERE, re-vair'-ai, a town of Austrian Italy, on the Po, 16 miles from Mantua. Pop. 7,500.

REVIGNY, re-veen'-ye, a town of France, in the department of Meuse, 9 miles from Bar-le-Duc. Pop. 1,200.

REVILLA GIGEDO, rai-veel'-la, island of, a large island on the broken coast of North-west America. Ext. 50 miles in length and 25 in breadth. Lat. between 55° 6′ and 55° 55′ N. Lon. 131° W

REWHA, ru-ha', a state of Hindostan, comprising a part of Bogilcund. It is inclosed by the territory of the Bengal presidency, to which it is subsidiary. Area, 9,827 square miles. Pop. Unascertained. Lat. between 24° and 42° 40′ N. Lon. between 81° and 82′ E. —A TOWN of the same name, 70 miles from Allahabad. Pop. 7,000.

REYKIAVIK, ri'-ki-a-vik', the capital town of Iceland, near its S.W. coast. It has an observatory, a library, is the seat of the Icelandic Society, and the see of an archbishop. Pop. 1,200.

REYNIER, John Louis, rai'-ne-ai, a Swiss, who entered the corps of engineers of the French army, and rose by his skill and valour to the grade of adjutant-general in 1794, and to that of general of brigade in the following year. He served under Moreau in the army of the Rhine in 1796, accompanied Bonaparte to Egypt in 1798, and signalized himself by his bravery at the battle of the Pyramids. He defeated 20,000 Turks before El-Arish. After the murder of General Kleber he became involved in a dispute with his successor, quitted Egypt in 1801, and was, upon his return to France, disgraced and exiled. Recalled in 1805, he was given a command, and took part in the conquest of Naples and Calabria. He was subsequently minister of war at Naples, and fought at Wagram, in Spain, and in Russia, but was taken prisoner at Leipsic in 1813. Recovering his liberty, he repaired to Paris, where he resided until his death. He left some works upon Egyptian antiquities, &c. B. at Lausanne, 1771; D. at Paris, 1814.

REYNIER, John Louis Anthony, was brother of the preceding, and became a government official under Murat at Naples. He wrote, among other works, "Public and Rural Economy of the Ancient Peoples," and "Egypt under the Romans." D. about 1820.

REYNOLDS, Sir Joshua, ren'-olds, a celebrated English painter. He was the son of a clergyman, and was intended for the profession of medicine; but having a great taste for drawing, he resolved to make painting his profession, and accordingly was placed, in his 18th year, under Hudson, the portrait-painter. In 1749 he went to Italy, on board the vessel of the Honourable Mr. Keppel, his early friend and patron. After studying the works of the most illustrious masters at Rome during two years, he returned to London, where he found no encouragement given to any other branch of the art than portrait-painting. He was thus under the necessity of complying with the prevailing taste, and in that walk soon became unrivalled. The first picture by which he distinguished himself, after his return, was the portrait of Commodore Keppel. He did not, however, confine himself to portraits, but painted several historical pictures of high and acknowledged merit. When the Royal Academy was founded, in 1768, he was appointed president, which station he held, with honour to himself and advantage to the arts, till 1791, when he resigned it. He was also appointed principal painter to the king, and knighted. His literary merits, and other accomplishments, procured him the friendship of the most distinguished men of his time, particularly Johnson, Burke, Goldsmith, and Garrick; and Sir Joshua had the honour of instituting the celebrated literary club of which they were members. He was likewise a member of the Royal and Antiquarian societies; and was created doctor of laws by the universities of Oxford and Dublin. Sir Joshua's academical discourses on painting display the soundest judgment, the most refined taste, a perfect acquaintance with the works of the greatest masters, and are written in a clear and elegant style. B. at Plympton, Devonshire, 1723; D. 1792, and was buried in St. Paul's Cathedral.

RHADAMANTHUS, răd'-a-măn'-thus, a son of Jupiter and Europa, was born in Crete, which he left about the 30th year of his age. He passed into some of the Cyclades, where he reigned with so much justice, that the ancients declared he became one of the judges of Hades, and that he was employed in the infernal regions in obliging the dead to confess their crimes, and in punishing them for their offences.

RHAM, Rev. William Lewis, ram, a modern writer upon scientific agriculture, who was of Dutch parentage, but brought to England at an early age. After completing his education at the university of Cambridge, he entered upon holy orders, and was appointed to a living in Norfolk. He wrote the agricultural articles for the "Penny Cyclopædia," the greatest portion of which was subsequently reproduced in a work entitled "The Dictionary of the Farm;" an "Essay on the Analysis of Soils," and "Flemish Husbandry," for the "Library of Useful Knowledge." He was likewise a contributor of articles upon agriculture and rural matters to the "Gardener's Chronicle." B. at Utrecht, 1778; D. at Winkfield, Berkshire, 1843.

RHAZES, ra'-sez, a famous Arabian physician of great learning, who wrote more than two hundred works upon medicine. His treatise upon small-pox and measles is the most ancient account of those disorders extant. D. at Bagdad, about 932.

RHEIMS, rēs, an ancient city of France, in the department of the Marne, on the Vesle, in a fine plain, 25 miles from Châlons. It is surrounded with a ditch and earthen mound. The streets are in general wide and straight; in some quarters, however, they are winding and narrow. The town has six gates, all of a fine appearance, from the spacious and shady avenues leading to the city. The most remarkable public building is the cathedral, a vast Gothic edifice of the 12th century, and one of the finest specimens of that kind of architecture in France. The church of St. Remy is also worth notice, both for its architecture and as the depositary of the famous phial of oil with which the kings are anointed. The other buildings are the episcopal palace, town-hall, and the old gate of Mars. Manf. Cotton and woollen stuffs; also hats and stockings. Pop. 46,000.—Clovis was baptized in the cathedral of this place, after the battle of Tolbiac, in 496. In 1179 Philip Augustus was here consecrated, and all his successors till the revolution of 1830, with the exception of Henry IV., Napoleon I., and Louis XVIII. Many councils have been held here; and before the revolution of 1793, Rheims had a celebrated university.

RHEINBERG, rīne'-bairg, a town of Rhenish Prussia, 24 miles from Dusseldorf. Pop. 2,500.

RHEINE, rine-e(r), a town of Westphalia, 22 miles from Munster. It is the capital of a principality. Manf. Woollens, linen, and leather. Pop. 2,500.—The PRINCIPALITY has an area of 320 square miles and a population of 25,000.

RHEINSBERG, rīnes'-bairg, a town of Prussia, in the province of Brandenburg, 48 miles from Potsdam. It has a royal castle, in which Frederick the Great passed his youth. Pop. 3,000.

RHEINTHAL, rīne'-tal (i. e. 'the valley of the Rhine'), a district of the Swiss canton of St. Gall, lying along the Rhine, from the Lake of Constance to the lordship of Sax.

RHENANUS, Beatus, re-nai'-nus, a learned German critic, who was at first corrector of the press for Frobedius, and by that means formed an intimacy with Erasmus. He wrote a "History of Germany," edited Velleius Paterculus, and translated many works from the Greek and Latin. B. at Schlettstadt, Alsace, 1485; D. at Strasburg, 1547.

RHINE, rine, a celebrated river in Europe, having its source in the central and highest part of Switzerland, on the north-east side of Mount St. Gothard, at a height of 7,650 feet. Almost at the outset of its course it is joined by a surprising number of rivulets. It passes through the Lake of Constance, receiving a great addition to its volume, by the junction of the Aar and various other rivers; lower down, the Neckar and the Maine on the side of Germany, and the Moselle on that of France, swell its volume. Continuing its course to the north, it enters the Netherlands, and, turning to the west, divides into two great branches, of which the southern takes the name of the Waal, and receives the Maese, when it becomes like an arm of the sea, and flows into the German Ocean by Dort, Rotterdam, and Williamstadt. The northern, or smaller branch, is further divided, first above, and afterwards below, Arnheim; and the name of Rhine is finally retained by a small slow-flowing water, which passes Utrecht and Leyden in its way to the North Sea, which it enters by several branches, having a delta larger than that of any other European river. From its source to Mentz it is called the Upper Rhine, and from Mentz to Holland, the Lower Rhine. It has a direct course of about 360 miles; and, with its windings, about 600. Its basin comprises an area of 65,280 square miles.

RHINE, CIRCLES OF THE LOWER AND UPPER, two divisions of the German empire, abolished in 1806.

RHINE, LOWER, a department in the north-east of France, consisting of the north part of Alsace, and forming an oblong tract. Area, 1,635 square miles. Desc. Fertile; but covered with wood to the extent of about one-third of its surface. Pro. Corn, tobacco, beetroot, linseed, and hemp. Minerals. Iron and coal. Manf. Important and numerous. Pop. 590,000.

RHINE, UPPER, another department in the north-east of France, of an oblong form, the Rhine flowing along its eastern limit, and the long chain of the Vosges extending on its western side, in a course nearly parallel to that river. Area, 1,502 square miles. Desc. Well wooded and fertile. Pro. Various kinds of grain, tobacco, beetroot, madder, linseed, and hemp. Minerals. Silver, lead, iron, coal, asphalte, and granite. Manf. Cottons, silks, and a variety of others. Pop. 495,000;—Protestants, 57,000; Jews, 10,000; Anabaptists, 3,000; Catholics, 250,000.

RHINNS, or RUINS, OF GALLOWAY, rins, a peninsula of Wigtonshire, Scotland, separated from the rest of the county by Luce Bay and Loch Ryan. Ext. 28 miles long, with a varying breadth of from 2 to 5. Area, 116 square miles. It terminates in the S. in the Mull of Galloway.

RHODA, ro'-da, an island of Egypt, in the Nile, opposite Cairo, containing the pacha's gardens and the famous Nilometer. Ext. 2 miles long.

RHODE ISLAND, rode, including Rhode Island and Providence Plantations. One of the United States, bounded N. and E. by Massachusetts, S. by the Atlantic, and W. by the Connecticut. Area, 1,363 square miles. Desc. Mostly level, except in the north-west part, which is hilly and rocky. Rivers. The Pawtucket, Providence, Pawtuxet, Pawcatuck, and Wood rivers. There are also Narraganset and Providence bays, in which are numerous islands. Climate. Milder than that of Massachusetts, the cold of winter being less intense and the heat of summer less oppressive. Pro. The soil is generally better adapted for grazing than tillage. Here are found some of the finest cattle in New England; and corn, rye, barley, oats, and, in some places, wheat, are produced. There are numerous dairies, and the butter and cheese are of an excellent quality. Fruit thrives, especially the apple, of which more cider is made than is required for home consumption. The shores and rivers abound with fish. Minerals. Iron ore is found; also copper ore and coal. Manf. These consist chiefly of ironwares, cotton and woollen goods, leather, paper, oils, spirits, and straw bonnets. Pop. about 150,000. Lat. between 41° 18′ and 42° 1′ N. Lon. between 71° 0′ and 71 55′ W.

RHODE ISLAND, the island from which the above state takes its name, is situate in Narraganset Bay, near the coast of Massachusetts. Ext. 17 miles long, with a breadth of 5. Lat. 41° 25′ N. Lon. 71° 20′ W.

RHODES, rodes, an island of Asiatic Turkey, in the Mediterranean, near the coast of Asia Minor. Ext. 46 miles long, with a breadth of 18 at its widest part. Area, 420 square miles. Desc. Mountainous, being traversed by a range on which grow those forests of pine which supplied the ancient navies of the Rhodians, and are still in great demand for shipbuilding. Beneath this range rises a tract of lower hills, on which is raised the vine, which produces the perfumed wine so much prized by the ancients. The tract beneath, forming the greater portion of the island, slopes gradually down to the sea, and being watered by numerous streams, is capable of producing the most luxuriant crops. Pro. A great part of the island is left entirely waste, but the natural fertility of the soil is productive in corn, olives, pomegranates, lemons, wine, wax, honey, and figs. Manf. Silk, shoes, red leather, and umber. Exp. Wax, honey, figs, and other fruits. Imp. Colonial produce, woollens, iron, nails, shot, soap, cordage, hardware, coals, horses, cattle, carpets, and corn. Pop. 30,000. Lat. between 35° 53′ and 36° 28′ N. Lon. between 27° 40′ and 28° 12′ E.—In ancient times Rhodes was one of the most celebrated of the states of Greece, and distinguished, above all others, by its wealth, commerce, and naval power. It was among the last which yielded to the Roman arms, and was allowed even to enjoy the forms of liberty till the reign of Vespasian. In the Middle Ages the island became one of the latest retreats of the Knights of St. John of Jerusalem, who baffled the efforts of Mahomet II., the conqueror of Constantinople, and were not reduced by Solyman the Great till after one of the most memorable sieges recorded in history.

RHODES, a city and capital of the above island, standing at its N.E. extremity. From a distance it presents some vestiges of its ancient grandeur, but on entering, scarcely anything is found to correspond with the expectations thus excited. The streets are narrow and winding, devoid at once of regularity and elegance. The principal public buildings are the church of St. John, and another; the palace of the grand masters, and a convent, all large massy buildings, in the Gothic style. The churches are converted into mosques, and a large hospital is used by the Turks for a granary. Of all these buildings, the old palace is the largest and handsomest. The suburbs, occupied by the Greek inhabitants, are very beautiful, consisting of good stone houses, with gardens well stocked with all the fruits of the climate. Rhodes has two good harbours, separated only by a mole, running obliquely out into the sea. Many of its houses are unoccupied. The two extremities are defended by towers, distant 800 feet from each other, while, in the centre of the mole, there is a square tower 120 feet high. Manf. Red leather and shoes. Pop. about 15,000, of whom 8,000 are Turks and 3,000 Jews.—Here stood the famous Colossus, a statue of bronze, 70 cubits high, reckoned one of the seven wonders of the world. It was thrown down by an earthquake, and when the Saracens became masters of the island, they knocked it to pieces, and sold the fragments to a Jew of Edessa, nearly 980 years after its fall. Rhodes is looked upon as an impregnable fortress. In 1522 it capitulated to the Turks under Solyman the Magnificent.

RHODEZ, or RODEZ, ro'-dai, a town of France, capital of the department of the Aveyron, 70 miles from Toulouse. It is a gloomy place, with narrow and dark streets, and a cathedral tolerably built. It has also an academy, a public library, a neat school, and a small exchange. Pop. 10,300.

RHODOMAN, Laurence, rod'-o-man, rector of the university of Wittemberg, who translated Diodorus Siculus and many other Greek authors into Latin. B. in Saxony, 1546; D. at Wittemberg, 1606.

RHOE, MICKLE, ro, one of the Shetland Isles, on the south of the mainland. Ext. 2½ miles long and 2 broad. Pop. 270. Little Rhoe adjoins it.

RHONE, rone, a river in the south of Europe, rising in the Rhone Glacier, Switzerland, at the foot of Mount Furca, only 5 miles from the source of the Rhine, and at a height of 5,500 feet. It flows in a western direction through a long and wide valley of the Swiss canton of the Valois, and after being swelled by a variety of mountain streams, it passes through the Lake of Geneva. Flowing southwards, and being joined by the Saone and other streams, it discharges itself, after a course of nearly 650 miles, by three mouths, into the part of the Mediterranean called the Gulf of Lyons. Its basin has an area of 30,000 square miles.

RHONE, a department in the south-east of France, bounded by the departments of the Saone-and-Loire, the Ain, the Isère, and the Loire. Area, 1,050 square miles. Desc. Covered by those ranges which connect the Cevennes and the Vosges, and have the summits of Mont d'Or and Pilat. Pro. Corn and wine, some of which is excellent. Minerals. Coal, iron, and copper. Manf. Silks, cotton, linen, glass, paper, and hats. Pop. 575,000.

RHONE GLACIER, one of the grandest glaciers in Switzerland, in the N.E. part of the canton Valois.

RHONE, MOUTHS OF THE, a maritime department in the south-east of France, formed of a part of Provence, and bounded by the Mediterranean and the departments of the Gard, the Vaucluse, and the Var. Area, 2,000 square miles. Desc. Mountainous in various parts, and bordered by marshes. Pro. Corn, silk, wine, figs, almonds, and dried grapes. Cattle, horses, and sheep are reared, and fishing is followed on the coast. Minerals. Marble and salt. Manf. White soap, olive-oil, chemicals, essences, and perfumes. Sugar-refining, brandy-distilling, and sulphur-refining are also carried on. Pop. 430,000.

RHOS, ross, the name of several parishes in Wales, none of them with a population above 500.

RHUABEN, re-a'-ben, a town of Wales, in Denbighshire, 6 miles from Wrexham. Pop. 11,200.

RHYL, ril, a chapelry of N. Wales, in Flintshire, 5 miles from St. Asaph. Pop. 1,600.—It has a station on the Chester and Holyhead Railway.

RHYNS, or RINNS OF GALLOWAY. (See RHINNS OF GALLOWAY.)

RIAZAN, re-a-zan', the capital of a government of the same name, in European Russia, on the Oka, 110 miles from Moscow. It has an unusual number of churches. Pop. 9,000. The GOVERNMENT has an area of 16,227 square miles and a population of 1,365,000. Its chief products are hops, tobacco, rye, fruit, and garden stuffs.

RIBBLE, rib'-bel, a river of England, rising in the W. part of Yorkshire, and falling into the Irish Sea below Preston.

RIBEAUVILLE, re'-bo-veel, a parish and town of France, in the department of the Upper Rhine, 6 miles from Schelestadt. Manf. Calicoes. Pop. 7,400. It has a station on the Strasburg Railway.

RIBEMONT, reeb'-mawnt, a town of France, in the department of Aisne, 21 miles from Laon. Pop. 3,100. Here Condorcet was born, in 1743.

RIBERA, Anastasius-Pantaleon de, re'-bai-ra, a Spanish poet, called the Scarron of Spain. On account of his wit, he was entertained at the court of Philip IV. His poems, printed at Saragossa in 1640, are of the burlesque kind. B. at Madrid, 1586; D. 1660.

RIBERA, Jose. (See SPAGNOLETTO.)

RICARDO, David, re-kar'-do, an English writer upon political economy, who was educated for a commercial career by his father, a member of the London Stock Exchange. Having acquired a large fortune in the same pursuit, he, in 1819, entered the House of Commons, where he distinguished himself in the debates upon subjects of finance. As a writer his fame mainly depends upon his work entitled "The Principles of Political Economy and Taxation;" but he likewise made several important contributions to political economy in his essay on the "Influence of a Low Price of Corn on the Profits of Stock," "Proposals for an Economical and Secure Currency," "Protection to Agriculture," &c. In finance he took a foremost part, in debate, and as the author of "The High Price of Bullion a proof of the Depreciation of Bank Notes," and "Reply to Mr. Bosanquet's Practical Observations on the Report of the Bullion Committee." He remained in parliament until his death. B. in London, 1772; D. at Gatcomb Park, Gloucestershire, 1823.

RICAUT, or RYCAUT, Sir Paul, re'-ko, an English writer and diplomatist, who, in 1661, became secretary to the earl of Winchelsea, ambassador to Constantinople, and, while there, wrote "The Present State of the Ottoman Empire," published in London, 1670. He was subsequently consul at Smyrna during eleven years; and, in 1685, he became secretary for the provinces of Leinster and Connaught, in Ireland. King William appointed him his resident for the Hanse towns, where he remained ten years. His other works were,—"A Continuation of Knolles's History of the Turks;" "A Continuation of Platina's Lives of the Popes;" "A translation of Vega's Royal Commentaries of Peru." B. in London, about 1625; D. in London, 1700.

RICCARTON, rik'-kar-ton, a parish of Ayrshire, Scotland, on the Irvine. In it are coal-mines and brick-fields. Manf. Cotton goods. Pop. 5,000.

RICCI, Matthew, rit'-che, an Italian Jesuit, who went as missionary to the East Indies, and having finished his studies at Goa, was sent to China, where, on account of his skill in mathematics, he obtained the favour of the emperor, and was permitted to build a church at Pekin. Several of his letters and memoirs on China have been printed. B. at Macerata, 1552; D. at Pekin, 1610.

RICCI, or RIZZI, Sebastian, an eminent Italian painter, who visited and painted at Vienna, Paris, and London, at all which places he acquired considerable distinction. He decorated the ceilings and staircases of several mansions of the English nobility, and painted a picture of the Ascension, in the cupola of Chelsea Hospital. The staircase of Montague House, afterwards the British Museum, was also painted by him. After residing in London during ten years, he quitted it when Sir James Thornhill was appointed to paint the dome of St. Paul's Cathedral, a task which he deemed himself more qualified to perform. B. in the Venetian state, 1659; D. at Venice, 1734.

RICCI, Laurence, an Italian Jesuit, and the last general of the order, to which office he was elected in 1758; but when the society was suppressed in 1773, Ricci and some of his fraternity were confined in the castle of St. Angelo at Rome, where he died in 1775. B. at Florence, 1703.

RICCIA, rit'-cha, a town of Naples, in the province of Molise, 12 miles from Campobosa. It has a collegiate church and several others, with sulphur-springs in its neighbourhood. Pop. 4,700.

RICCIOLI, John Baptist, rit'-cho-le, an Italian Jesuit and astronomer, who became professor of divinity at Parma and Bologna; but is known chiefly by his mathematical works. He wrote treatises upon astronomy, geography, hydrography, and chronology. B. at Ferrara, 1598; D. 1671.

RICCOBONI, Louis, rik'-ko-bo-ne, an Italian actor and dramatic writer, who performed at the Italian theatre in Paris during some years; but, in 1729, renounced the stage, from religious scruples. He wrote several comedies, and a "Discourse of the Reformation of the Theatre;" observations on "Comedy" and on the "Genius of Molière;" "Historical Reflections on the Theatres of Europe," and a "History of the Italian Theatre." B. at Modena, about 1674; D. 1753.

RICH, James Claudius, rich, an eminent Oriental scholar, who was born in France, but was brought to England while an infant. By the time he had attained his 15th year, his remarkable talents for the acquisition of the Oriental languages enabled him to become versed in Arabic, Hebrew, Persian, Syriac, and Turkish. These acquirements gained for him, in 1803, the appointment of cadet in the service of the East-India Company. He afterwards became secretary to the consul-general in Egypt; but that functionary having died before Mr. Rich had entered upon his duties, he was permitted to travel through Egypt and Turkey, for the purpose of acquiring the Turkish and Arabic languages and dialects. Disguised as a Mamelukе, he travelled in Syria and Palestine, and, trusting to his knowledge of the manners of the country, entered the grand mosque at Damascus, with the pilgrims who were proceeding to Mecca. In 1807 he returned to Bombay, where he took up his residence at the house of Sir James Mackintosh, whose daughter he married. In 1808 he proceeded to Bagdad, as resident of the East-India Company. While holding that post, he made a valuable collection of manuscripts, gems, and coins, found at Nineveh, Bagdad, and Babylon; and also amassed the materials for his "Memoir on the Ruins of Babylon," which was published first at Vienna, and subsequently in England. In 1813 he was compelled, by the state of his health, to leave Bagdad; and he proceeded to Paris, stopping at Constantinople on his way; but he returned to his duties in 1815. He was awaiting instructions at Shiraz from Bombay, in which presidency he had received an appointment, when his death took place. His most important works were, "Second Memoir on Babylon," and "Narrative of a Residence in Koordistan." His collection of coins, manuscripts, &c., was purchased from his widow for the British Museum. B. near Dijon, France, 1787; D. at Shiraz, 1821.

RICHARD I., rich'-ard, king of England, surnamed Cœur de Lion, ascended the throne on the death of his father, Henry II., in 1189. His reign commenced with a fearful riot, and massacre of the Jews. In 1190, Richard joined the crusade with Philip-Augustus of France; but a division taking place between the two kings, the latter departed from Palestine. Richard remained in the East, where he displayed the most impetuous valour against Saladin, whom he defeated near Cæsarea; and having made a truce, embarked in a vessel, which was shipwrecked on the coast of Italy. He then travelled in disguise through part of Germany; but being discovered by his enemy Leopold, duke of Austria, he was made prisoner, and sent to the emperor Henry VI., who kept him confined in a castle in the Tyrol, bound with chains. At length he was ransomed by his subjects for 100,000 marks, and landed at Sandwich in 1194, after which he was crowned a second time. Philip-Augustus having, contrary to treaty, seized on part of Normandy, Richard invaded France with a large army; but a peace was concluded in 1196. The war was renewed in 1199, and Richard, in besieging the castle of Chaluz, in Aquitaine, received a wound from an arrow, of which he died. B. at Oxford, 1157; D. 1199.

RICHARD II. was the second son of Edward, prince of Wales, commonly called the Black Prince, and succeeded Edward III., his grandfather, in 1377. In his minority he displayed remarkable promptitude in quelling the dangerous insurrection headed by Wat the Tyler, in Smithfield. When that insurgent was slain by Walworth, lord-mayor of London, the young king, then about 15 years of age, rode up to the irritated populace, and said, "Follow your king; I will be your leader, and redress your grievances." The people, struck with astonishment, obeyed the call, and dispersed quietly to their own homes. When the government had thus quelled the revolt, no grievances were redressed, but, instead, more than 1,500 people were executed on the scaffold. The remainder of Richard's reign was unfortunate. Discontents prevailed among the nobility, of which Henry, duke of Lancaster, availed himself, and assumed the title of king. (See HENRY IV.) Richard was betrayed into his hands by the earl of Northumberland, in 1399, taken to London, and confined in the Tower, where he abdicated the throne before the assembled magnates of the kingdom. B. at Bordeaux, 1366; supposed to have been assassinated at Pontefract Castle, 1400.

RICHARD III. was the brother of Edward IV., and created duke of Gloucester. He caused his nephews, Edward V. and Richard duke of York, to be secretly murdered in the Tower; after which he was himself proclaimed king in 1483. The duke of Buckingham, who had assisted him in his usurpation, subsequently conspired against him, but was taken prisoner and beheaded. Henry, earl of Richmond, afterwards Henry VII., of the house of Lancaster, was abroad, but returned privately and landed at Milford, in Wales, where he was joined by a few followers, who soon increased. He then marched against Richard III., whom he encountered at Bosworth Field, where, after performing prodigies of valour, the king was slain, and his crown being found, it was placed on the head of Henry. The character of Richard III. has been most variously represented by different historians: Walpole declared that all the crimes attributed to him were mere fabrications. It is, however, certain that he was a man as unscrupulous as he was energetic and determined. B. at Fotheringay Castle, Northamptonshire, 1452; killed, 1485.

Richard Plantagenet, earl of Cornwall, titular king of the Romans, and emperor of Germany, was the son of John, king of England. He was elected to his German titles in 1256, but resided only a short time in the country. At the battle of Lewes, in 1264, he was taken captive by De Montfort, and was imprisoned in Kenilworth Castle. From his natural daughter Isabel, who became the wife of Maurice de Berkeley, the earls of Berkeley claim to be descended. D. at Berkhampstead, 1272.

Richard I., duke of Normandy, was the son and successor of William, surnamed "Long Sword." He took part in the elevation of Hugh Capet to the French throne. D. 996.

Richard II. was son and successor of the preceding, and formed an alliance with Robert II., king of France. His dominions were troubled by several internal dissensions, which he succeeded in quelling. He was succeeded by his son Richard, his eldest son. D. 1027.

Richard of Cirencester, an old English historian, who was a monk of the Benedictine monastery of St. Peter, Westminster. He wrote upon Saxon and British history, and a "Description of Britain" in Latin, the manuscript of which was discovered at Copenhagen in 1747. The historian Gibbon declares that the author "shows a genuine knowledge of antiquity very extraordinary for a monk of the 14th century." By some critics the genuineness of the work has been doubted, but it is included in a volume of Bohn's "Antiquarian Library." His "Historia ab Hengista" commences with the arrival of the Saxons in Britain. D. about 1402.

Richard, Louis, an eminent French botanist, who was dispatched by Louis XVI. to Guiana and Martinique, where he made a rich and vast collection of plants. During the revolution he remained in obscurity, but subsequently became professor of botany and a member of the French Institute. He produced an excellent edition of Bulliard's "Elementary Dictionary of Botany," and was also the author of a "Manual of Botany," which is a classical work in France. He likewise wrote articles on botany for various French scientific journals. B. at Versailles, 1754; D. 1821.

Richardson, Sir John, rich'-ard-son, an eminent Arctic traveller, who was, in 1801, sent to the university of Edinburgh, and afterwards entered the royal navy as assistant-surgeon. In 1819 he was attached to the Arctic expedition under Captain Franklin, as surgeon and naturalist, and again in 1825. After nearly two years of arduous service, he returned in 1827, and published an account of his services, in a narrative which was attached to the great work produced by Captain Franklin. After distinguishing himself by his works on the zoology of the northern parts of British America, he became, in 1838, physician to the fleet, in 1840 inspector of hospitals, and in 1846 was created a knight. In 1847, no tidings having been obtained of the vessels which had been dispatched to the Arctic regions under Sir John Franklin, three expeditions were sent out by the British government, the command of one of which was intrusted to Sir John Richardson. He started from Montreal, in Canada, in April, 1848, and returned to the same place at the close of the following year. He published a narrative of his journey, in a work entitled "The Arctic-Searching Expedition: a Journal of a Boat-voyage through Rupert's Land and the Arctic Sea, in Search of the Discovery-ships under Sir John Franklin." This work contained a large amount of valuable information relative to the geology, the natural history, and the mode of life of the Indians and Esquimaux inhabiting the country through which the expedition passed. As a naturalist, he produced some important effusions, the chief of which were, "The Zoology of the Voyage of H.M.S. Erebus and Terror, under the Command of Sir James Ross, during the years 1839-43;" the "Fossil Mammals" to the "Zoology of Captain Kellett's Expedition in 1845-51," and "Notes on the Natural History of Captain Sir Edward Belcher's Expedition, during the years 1852-54." B. at Dumfries, Scotland, 1787.

Richardson, Dr. Charles, a modern English philologist, who was educated for the profession of the law, but quitted it for philology. In 1805 he produced his "Illustrations of English Philology," and subsequently undertook the lexicographical portion of the "Encyclopædia Britannica." His greatest work was completed in 1837, under the title of "Richardson's Dictionary of the English Language," which is, in many respects, superior to that of Dr. Johnson. His subsequent works were on the study of languages, some remarks upon certain doubtful passages in the writings of Shakspere, and a number of valuable articles upon philology, inserted in the "Gentleman's Magazine." B. 1775.

Richardson, Samuel, an eminent English novelist. He was the son of a joiner, whose circumstances did not permit him to give the future author more than a very ordinary education; after which he was bound apprentice to Mr. Wilde, a printer in London. At the expiration of his time, he became foreman and corrector of the press in his master's establishment. At length he set up in business for himself, first in a court in Fleet Street and afterwards in Salisbury Square. He became one of the first printers in London; and, by the interest of Mr. Onslow, speaker of the House of Commons, obtained the printing of the journals of that house. In 1754 he was chosen master of the Stationers' Company, and in 1760 purchased a moiety of the patent of law printer to the king. In 1740 he made his first appearance as author, by publishing "Pamela," the outline of the plot of which he had heard some years before; and, says he, "I thought, if written in an easy and natural manner, suitable to the simplicity of it, it might possibly turn young people into a course of reading different from the pomp and parade of romance-writing, and, dismissing the improbable and marvellous, with which novels generally abound, might tend to promote the cause of religion and virtue." This work, which may be considered as the precursor of the regular English novel, at once became highly successful, and encouraged the author to proceed in the same career. His next performance was "Clarissa Harlowe," which is esteemed his masterpiece, though his novel of "Sir Charles Grandison" possesses great beauties. Besides these works, he published a volume of "Familiar Letters," for the use of young people; an edition of Æsop's Fables, with reflections; and a paper in the "Rambler." His correspondence with persons of eminence was published in 1804, with his life, by Mrs. Barbauld. Richardson possessed an amiable and friendly disposition, and had a strong sense of religion. B. in Derbyshire, 1689; D. near London, 1761.

Richardson, Jonathan, an English portrait-painter, who was one of the best English artists before Reynolds. He also wrote the "Theory of Painting," and an essay upon the art of criticism as it relates to painting. B. about 1665; D. in London, 1745.

Richborough, rich'-bur-o, a village of England, in the county of Kent, supposed to have been the first and principal station of the Romans. It is 2 miles from Sandwich, but no traces of the town are now to be found. The remains of the castle, by their immense mass, have alone withstood the ravages of time. It was ruined by the Danes in 1010.

Richelet, Cæsar Peter, reesh'-lai, a French lexicographer, who compiled a curious Dictionary of the French language, and also published a Dictionary of Rhymes and other works. B. at Cheminon, Champagne, 1631; D. at Paris, 1698.

Richelieu, Armand du Plessis de, reesh'-yu(r), a celebrated French cardinal and statesman. After completing his studies in divinity, he repaired to Rome, in order to obtain the bishopric of Luçon from the pope. On his return to France, he advanced himself into favour by an insinuating address, and for his eloquence was appointed almoner to Mary de' Medici, through whom he obtained, in 1616, the appointment of secretary of state; but the death of his friend the Marshal d'Ancre occasioned his temporary disgrace, on which he retired to Avignon. Louis XIII., however, recalled him to the ministry, and he soon took the lead in the management of public affairs. Having a great hatred towards the Calvinists, he pressed the siege of Rochelle in person, and, by his vigorous efforts, compelled it to surrender in 1628. He next devoted himself to the humbling of the house of Austria, at that period the greatest power in Europe. Gregory XV. made him a cardinal, and he was also created a duke and peer of France. Notwithstanding his ambition and cruelty, he had great qualities. He founded the French Academy, established the royal botanical garden, and was a liberal patron of men of letters. He wrote his own "Memoirs," which were published at Paris in 1823. B. at Paris, 1585; D. at the same city, 1642.

RICHELIEU, a town of France, on the Amable, 35 miles from Tours. Pop. 3,000.

RICHLAND, rich'-land, a county in the N. of Ohio, U.S. Area, 468 square miles. Pop. 21,000.—Also the name of several townships, none of them with a population above 5,000.

RICHLIEU CHAMBLY, or SOREL RIVER, sor'-el, a river of Lower Canada, which flows from Lake Champlain in a northerly direction, and, after a course of 75 miles, joins the St. Lawrence at Lake St. Pierre.

RICHLIEU ISLANDS, a cluster of islands in the river St. Lawrence, at the S.W. entrance of Lake St. Pierre, nearly 100 in number.

RICHMOND, rich'-mond, a town and parish of the county of Surrey, on an eminence on the S. bank of the Thames, 10 miles W. of St. Paul's Cathedral, London. It is a spot of great celebrity, both for the beauty of its scenery and from its being the seat of a royal palace during several centuries. This palace is now totally demolished, and its site occupied by several houses. The rich scenery of Richmond and its vicinity has been the theme of general admiration, and has attracted a number of families of distinction, whose seats render the town and neighbourhood remarkably gay and splendid. The town extends about a mile, or more, up the hill, from the Thames, skirted and intermingled with agreeable gardens. The church, dedicated to St. Mary Magdalen, consists of a nave, two aisles, and a chancel, built of bricks, with a square embattled tower at the west end. Among its monuments is one to Thomson, the poet, and also to Kean, the actor. In the village there are several almshouses and a charity-school. An elegant stone bridge, of five semicircular arches, was erected over the river here. Pop. 9,530. — RICHMOND PARK adjoins the town, and has a circuit of 8 miles. It is first mentioned in the reign of Edward I.; and several ornamental buildings were erected here by Caroline, George II.'s queen. George III. frequently resided here in the early part of his reign. At a short distance an observatory was erected, from designs by Sir William Chambers, and amply provided with the finest astronomical instruments. Part of the Old Park forms a grazing and dairy farm, formerly occupied by George III.; the remainder is occupied by the beautiful royal gardens, which in summer are opened to the public. The New, or Great Park, formed by Charles I., is well stocked with deer, and is inclosed by a brick wall.

RICHMOND, a market- and borough-town of the North Riding of Yorkshire, on the N. declivity of a lofty eminence rising from the bank of the Swale, 42 miles from York. It contains churches, a market-place, free grammar-school, mechanics' institute, and scientific society. It also has an ecclesiastical court for the district. Pop. 5,000.

RICHMOND, the name of several counties in the United States.—1. In the north part of Georgia. Area, 313 square miles. Pop. 17,000.—2. In New York, occupying all Staten Island. Area, 63 square miles. Pop. 18,000.—3. In the south part of North Carolina. Area, 648 square miles. Pop. 10,000.—4. In Virginia. Area, 200 square miles. Pop. 7,000.

RICHMOND, a maritime city of the United States, capital of Virginia, on the north side of James river, 150 miles from its mouth, and opposite Manchester, with which it is connected by two bridges. It is one of the most flourishing, wealthy, and commercial cities of the United States. Its public buildings are a capitol or state-house, a house for the governor, an armory, a penitentiary, a court-house, a gaol, an almshouse, and numerous churches for different sects of Christians. It has also a statue of Washington, in a spacious square. A canal with three locks is cut on the north side of the river, terminating at the town in a large basin. It has an extensive inland trade, and its foreign commerce is considerable. Lat. 37° 32′ N. Lon. 77° 23′ W.—Also the name of several townships, none of them with a population above 3,000.

RICHTER, Jean Paul, reezh'-ter, a distinguished German author, who was the son of a village organist, under whom he received his earliest education, but was afterwards sent to school, and finally, in 1781, to the university of Leipsic, where, although he suffered extreme want, he pursued a brilliant career. Having no other means of support, he determined to apply himself to literature, and produced two or three works, but obtained little success in his new employment. In 1785 he returned to the cottage of his mother, then a widow. He next found employment as tutor in a family, and continued to be thus engaged till his published works began to attract the attention of the German public. In 1797 he took up his residence at Leipsic, his name having by this time become esteemed by the best critics of his country. He made the acquaintance of Schiller, Wieland, and others, and after residing at various places, repaired to Baireuth, where, in 1807, he received an annual pension of 1,000 florins. Henceforth his life flowed on in the uneventful pursuit of literature. As a writer he is distinguished by his originality, profound learning, and, indeed, obscurity; for even among his countrymen a key to his works has been found necessary. An excellent translation of a fine work by him, entitled "Flower, Fruit, and Thorn Pieces," has been published. In "Carlyle's Miscellanies," some interesting essays on Richter's works are to be met with. Carlyle has likewise translated some specimens of the great German author in his "German Romance." B. near Baireuth, 1763; D. 1825. —The name of Richter has been borne by several learned German writers; one of whom, Charles Frederic Richter, wrote some esteemed works upon biblical antiquities. D. 1812.

RICIUS, Paul, rit'-si-oos, a converted German Jew, who taught philosophy at Pavia with great reputation. The emperor Maximilian appointed him his physician. He had a controversy with Eccius on the question whether the heavenly bodies are animated, which Ricius maintained in the affirmative. Flourished in the 16th century.

RICKMANSWORTH, rik'-mans-werth, a market-town and parish of Herts, on the Colne, 10 miles from St. Albans. Manf. Straw-plait, flour, and paper. Pop. 5,000.

RICORD, Philip, rik'-o, an eminent modern French physician, who went to Paris in 1820 to study his profession under Dupuytren, Lisfranc, and other celebrated men. He subsequently became the most extensively employed physician of the French capital, and although he specially studied and illustrated by his writings some particular forms of disease, he displayed, both in his works and in his writings, a profound acquaintance with all the ills that afflict humanity. So clear and elegant is the style in which his works were written, that his compatriots surnamed him the "Marivaux of Medicine." Among his more important works were a collection of observations and researches communicated to the Memoirs of the Academy of Medicine. B. 1800.

RIDLEY, Nicholas, rid'-le, a learned English bishop and martyr, who received his education at Pembroke College, Cambridge, where he was elected fellow in 1524. His great abilities and piety recommended him to the notice of Archbishop Cranmer, through whom he was made chaplain to the king. In the reign of Edward VI. he was nominated to the see of Rochester, and had a principal share in framing the Liturgy, Articles, and Homilies. In 1550 he was translated to the bishopric of London, and by his interest with the young king he obtained the foundation of the noble charities of Christ's Hospital, St. Bartholomew's, and St. Thomas's in Southwark. On the decease of Edward, he unfortunately joined the friends of Lady Jane Grey, for which, and his zeal in the Reformation, he was by Queen Mary sent to Oxford, to dispute with some of the popish bishops, and on his refusing to recant, was burnt there opposite Balliol College, in company with Bishop Latimer, in 1555. He wrote against transubstantiation, and after his death were printed his sermons and letters. B. in Northumberland, about 1500.

RIEGO, Raphael del Riego y Nunez, re-ai'-go, a Spanish patriot, who fought against the French in 1808, and was made prisoner; and, upon recovering his liberty, in 1814, became lieutenant-colonel of the regiment of Asturias. He shared in the conspiracy of 1819, and when Quiroja and others were arrested, he raised the standard of revolt, proclaimed the constitution of the Cortes, released Quiroja, overran Andalusia, forced Ferdinand VII. to accept the constitution, and was nominated captain-general of Aragon. In 1823 he attempted to oppose the French army which had come to the assistance of Ferdinand, but was captured, and delivered to the government of the king, who put him to death in 1823. He was the author of the patriotic hymn sung in 1820, which bears his name.

RIENZI, Nicholas Gabrino de, re-ain'-dze, an obscure Roman, but who had received an excellent education, which was improved by a strong will and vigorous understanding. He was sent by his fellow-citizens to Clement VI., at Avignon, in order to prevail upon that pontiff to return to Rome. His eloquence pleased the pope, though it did not persuade him. Rienzi, on his return, formed the design of making himself master of Rome, with the title of tribune. Having gained a considerable number of partisans, he entered the Capitol, harangued the people, and elevated the standard of liberty. He designed to unite the whole of Italy into one great republic, with Rome for its capital. For some time he was successful, his government was popular, and even Petrarch wrote in his favour, comparing him to Brutus. At length a conspiracy was formed against him, and, having lost the popular favour by his arrogance and tyranny, he was compelled to seek safety in flight, but was taken and put to death. The incidents of his life form the basis of one of the finest of Bulwer's novels, that called after the Roman tribune's name. B. about 1310; slain in a revolt, 1352.

RIETI, re-ai'-te, a town of Central Italy, in the States of the Church, 42 miles from Rome. Manf. Woollens. Pop. 12,000.

RIEUX, re'-u(r), several parishes and towns in France, none of them with a population above 3,000.

RIEZ, re'-ai, a town of France, in the department of the Lower Alps, on the Colostre, 40 miles from Aix. Pop. 2,900.—This place, under the Romans, held the rank of a colony.

RIGA, ri'-ga, or re'-ga, a city of European Russia, and the capital of Livonia, situate about 9 miles from the sea, in a large plain on the Dwina or Duna, which is here, in summer, crossed by a bridge of pontoons, 25 miles from Mitau. During the winter the river is crossed on the ice. The town stands on the right, the suburbs on the left bank of the river. Without being a regular fortress, Riga has considerable strength. The entrance of the river is guarded from maritime attacks by the fortress of Duramunde. Of the public buildings, the principal are the town-house, the exchange, the house of assembly for the states or representatives of Livonia, the arsenal, the hospital of St. George, and the Catharinenof, a public library, academy, cabinet of natural history, an observatory, and a society of Lithuanian literature. The church of St. Peter is remarkable for its fine tower, commanding a magnificent view of the harbour. The export trade is chiefly managed by English and Scotch houses; the principal articles being timber, flax, hemp, and corn. The manufactures are insignificant. Pop. 67,000. Lat. 56° 5′ 1″ N. Lon. 24° 7′ 45″ E.

RIGA, a township of the United States, in the W. of New York. Pop. 2,500.

RIGA, GULF OF, a bay of the Baltic, between the coasts of Courland, Livonia, and Esthonia.

RIGALTIUS, or RIGAULT, Nicholas, re'-golte, a learned French philologist. He was educated among the Jesuits, who endeavoured to prevail upon him to enter their order, which he refused, and embraced the profession of an advocate. On Casaubon's going to England, Rigault succeeded him as librarian to the king, who appointed him procureur-general of the supreme court of Nanci. He was afterwards intendant of the province of Toul. His works are—excellent editions of Martial, Juvenal, Tertullian, and Minutius Felix, with observations and notes upon other classics. B. at Paris, 1577; D. at Toul, 1654.

RIGAUD, Hyacinth, re'-go, an eminent French portrait-painter, who became director of the Academy of Painting, and was granted letters of nobility, and the order of St. Michael, by Louis XV. He has been called the Vandyck of France. B. at Perpignan, 1659; D. at Paris, 1743.

RIGHI, THE, re'-ge, a mountain of Switzerland, 8 miles from Schwytz. Height, 5,905 feet.

RIGNANO, reen-ya'-no, the name of several towns of Italy, none of them with a population above 3,500.

RILEY, John, ri'-le, an English painter, who, after the death of Sir Peter Lely, gained considerable reputation and employment as a portrait-painter. B. in London, 1646; D. 1691.

RIMINI, re'-me-ne, a city of Central Italy, in the States of the Church, on the Marecchia, 2 miles from the Adriatic. Its streets are straight, and contain several churches and family mansions of Istrian marble. The cathedral is also ornamented with beautiful marble. The church of St. Francis, a fine edifice of the 15th century, has a profusion of sculptures, statues, and bas-reliefs; and there are several valuable remains of Roman antiquities. Manf. Silk, glass, and earthenware. Pop. 16,000.—Rimini, called formerly Arminum, from the river Arminus, which washed its walls, is very ancient, and formed at one time a small independent republic.

RINGWOOD, ring'-wood, a market-town and parish of Hampshire, on the Avon, 30 miles from Winchester. It is noted for its breweries of strong beer and ale. Pop. 4,000.—The town is ancient, and has a station on the Dorchester branch of the South-Western Railway.

RINTELN, rin'-teln, a town of Germany, on the Weser, 30 miles from Hanover. Pop. 3,500.

RINUCCINI, Octavio, re-noo-che'-ne, an Italian poet, who accompanied Mary de' Medici to France, and became gentleman of the chamber under Henry IV. The operas of Rinuccini are greatly admired, and his poetry is elegant. B. at Florence, about 1560; D. at the same city, 1621.

RIO, re'-o, a prefix to the names of numerous towns in Brazil, with populations varying between 4,000 and 11,000.

RIO ARIBO, a'-re-bo, a county of the United States, in New Mexico. Area, 56,000 square miles. Pop. 8,000.

RIOBAMBA, NUEVO, re-o-bam'-ba, a town of Ecuador, S. America, at the extremity of an extensive valley, 84 miles from Guayaquil. The old town was almost ruined by the irruptions of the volcano of Cotopaxi, in 1698 and 1746; and in 1797 it was destroyed by an earthquake. It has been rebuilt in a more convenient spot. Pop. Unascertained.

RIO BRANCO, or PARIMA, pa-re-ma', a river of Brazil, rising near the source of the Orinoco, in lat. 3° N. and lon. 64° W., and, after a course of 700 miles, falling into the Rio Negro, 70 miles from Barcellos.

RIO BRAVO DEL NORTE. (See RIO GRANDE.)

RIO DAS MORTES, reo das mor-tais, a river of Brazil, in the province of Matto Grosso, joining the Aragua after a course of 500 miles.

RIO DE JANEIRO, re'-o ja-nai'-ro (Port. re'-o dai zha-nai'-rer-o), the metropolitan province of Brazil, taking its name from the river Janeiro, which runs through it. It is bounded N. by the province of Espiritu Santo, E. and S. by the Atlantic Ocean, and W. by the extensive region of the Minas Geraes. Area, 16,960 square miles. Desc. Extremely fertile, producing sugar in great abundance, which is accordingly one of its chief exports. The other products are coffee, cotton, maize, rice, indigo, cacao, and fine woods. The country is mountainous, and is well wooded and watered. Pop. about 600,000, of whom half are slaves. Lat. between 21° 23′ and 23° 20′ S. Lon. between 40° 53′ and 44° 40′ W.

RIO DE JANEIRO, a city of South America, and the capital of Brazil, situate at the head of a large bay. The town stands on a tongue of land close to the shore, on the west side of the bay, at the foot of several high mountains which rise behind it. The houses are generally built of stone or brick. The streets are straight, well paved, and have excellent foot-paths, though they are extremely dirty. The numerous convents and churches are, according to some accounts, well built, while, according to others, they are of a gloomy aspect, and loaded with ornaments executed without taste. The cathedral is in a superior style of architecture. Parallel with the beach runs the main street, called Rua de Dereito, from which the minor streets branch off at right angles, and are intersected by others at regular distances. The imperial palace skirts the beach, and is seen to great advantage from the landing-place, which is within sixty yards of its entrance. The other public buildings are the naval and military arsenal, a public hospital, a national library, colleges, and other educational establishments. It has, besides, several scientific institutions, a museum of natural history, a botanic garden, and a theatre. The harbour is one of the finest known, and indeed can scarcely be excelled for capaciousness, and the security which it affords to vessels of every description. The entrance into it from the sea does not exceed a mile from point to point: it afterwards widens to about three or four miles, and is intersected in every direction with heavy batteries; all the numerous little islands with which it is interspersed being crowned with artillery. This city is the chief mart of Brazil, and especially of the provinces of Minas Geraes, St. Paul's, Govazes, Cayaba, and Corritiva. The mining districts, being most populous, require the greatest proportion of consumable goods, and in return send the most valuable articles of commerce: hence innumerable troops of mules are continually travelling to and from those districts. Imp. These consist in immense quantities of dried beef, tallow, hides, grain, salt provisions, flour, household furniture, pitch, tar, wax, oil, sulphur, woods, slaves, wine, and oil. Exp. Cotton, sugar, rum, ship-timber, various fine cabinet-woods, hides, tallow, indigo, and coarse cotton cloths. Among the more precious articles are gold, diamonds, topazes of various colours, amethysts, tourmalines, chrysoberyls, aqua-marinas, and wrought jewellery. Pop. about 210,000, slaves inclusive. Lat. 22° 56′ S. Lon. 42° 1′ 30″ W.

Ripaglia, or Ripaille, re-pal'-ye-a, a village of Sardinia, 20 miles from Geneva. Here is a farm-house, formerly the convent to which Amadeus VIII., subsequently Pope Felix V., retired, after his renunciation of both dignities he held.

Ripley, rip'-le, a market-town and parish of England, in Yorkshire, on the Nyd, 5 miles from Knaresborough. It has a station on the Leeds and Thirsk Railway. Pop. 1,300.—The name of several other small places in England.

Ripley, a county of the United States, in Indiana. Area, 439 square miles. Pop. 15,000.—Another in Missouri. Area, 1,080 square miles. Pop. 4,000.

Ripon, rip'-on, a market-town and borough of Yorkshire, near the confluence of the Ure and the Skell, 23 miles from York. It consists almost entirely of narrow and crooked lanes. The church is a large and venerable Gothic structure, and considered one of the best-proportioned churches in England. It has of public buildings, besides an episcopal palace, several charities and schools, a mechanics' institute, public rooms, with a library. Manf. Flax and saddletrees. Pop. of borough, 6,080.—It is the birthplace of Bishop Porteous.

Riposto, re-pos'-to, a town of the island of Sicily, on the E. coast, 10 miles from Taormina. Pop. 4,000.

Ripperda, John William, Baron de, rip-pair'-da, a Dutch adventurer, who was descended of an ancient Spanish house. He served some time as colonel of infantry in the Dutch service during the war of the Succession, and, in 1715, was nominated ambassador to the court of Spain, where he gained the favour of Philip V., who made him a grandee of the kingdom, and minister of war and finances; but afterwards he fell into disgrace, and was imprisoned at Segovia. He escaped thence, and, going through Portugal, reached England; whence he went to Holland. Lastly he made a voyage to Morocco, where he turned Mahometan, but endeavoured to introduce a new religion, compounded of Christianity, Judaism, and Mohammedanism. B. at Gröningen, about 1677; D. at Tetuan, 1737.

Ristori, Adelaide, ris'-to-re, an eminent Italian actress. She was the daughter of a strolling player, and played, herself, children's parts at the age of 4 years. At 15 she attracted the notice of the famous tragic actress Charlotte Marchionni, who gave her some invaluable counsel. Upon her marriage with the young Marquis del Grillo, she retired from the stage; but was induced to return to it by the triumphs she obtained when playing for a single occasion at the benefit of one of her old friends. She was playing at Rome in 1849, and divided her time between the theatre and her duties as an attendant upon the wounded in hospital. In 1855 she appeared at Paris, where she excited the utmost enthusiasm. On repairing to London, shortly afterwards, an equally brilliant reception greeted her. The talents of Madame Ristori were rich and varied: tragedy, comedy, and even broader dramatic works, were all within the compass of her genius. B. at Cividale, 1821.

Ritchie, Leitch, ritch'-e, a modern Scotch littérateur, who was educated for commercial pursuits; but, after having acted as clerk in several Scotch and London firms, he resolved to devote himself to literature as a profession. He was a contributor to journals, magazines, and reviews; wrote several novels and sketchy books of travel; and was, for some time, editor of "Chambers's Journal." He was best known by his novels "Schinderhannes" and "The Magician." B. at Greenock, at the beginning of the present century.

RITSON, Joseph, rit'-son, an English lawyer and eminent antiquary. He became a conveyancer in Gray's Inn; but having purchased, in 1785, the office of high bailiff of the liberties of the Savoy, he devoted the remainder of his life to literature. His principal works are "Observations on Johnson and Steeven's Edition of Shakspere," "Cursory Criticisms on Malone's Edition of Shakspere," "Observations on Warton's History of English Poetry," "Collection of English Songs" and of Scotch Songs, "English Anthology," "Metrical Romances," "Bibliographia Poetica." B. at Stockton, Durham, 1752; D. 1803.

RITTENHOUSE, David, rit'-ten-house, an eminent American astronomer, who served his apprenticeship to a clockmaker, and was afterwards a farmer; but pursued his mathematical and astronomical studies with such success, that, in 1769, the American Philosophical Society requested him to make observations on the transit of Venus over the sun's disc, which he performed with great accuracy. He succeeded Franklin as president of that society. Several of his papers are in the American Transactions. B. at Philadelphia, 1732; D. 1796.

RITTER, Karl, rit'-ter, a modern German geographer, who, upon the completion of his studies at the university of Halle, became a tutor in a nobleman's family, and made a tour with his pupils in Italy, France, and Switzerland. In 1820 he was appointed professor extraordinary of geography in the university of Berlin, after which time he devoted himself to his favourite science. His most important works were "Portico of a History of the European Peoples before Herodotus," "Geography in Relation to the Character and History of Mankind," "An Introduction to Universal Comparative Geography," "A Glance at the Sources of the Nile," and "A Glance at Palestine and its Christian Population." He was a member of the Academy of Berlin, and a foreign member of the Royal Society of London. B. at Quedlinburg, 1779.

RIVA, or REIF, re'-va, a town of Austrian Italy, on the Lake of Como, 6 miles from Chiavenna. It has a castle and monasteries, and its vicinity furnishes olives, oranges, and lemons. Pop. 5,000.

RIVA, the name of several places in Sardinia, none of them with a population above 2,200.

ROBERT I., king of France, rob'-ert, was the second son of Robert the Strong, and younger brother of Eudes, who also became king of France. He was chosen king at Soissons, in 992, to the prejudice of Charles the Simple. He was, however, killed at the battle of Soissons, in the following year. Hugh the Great was his son, and Hugh Capet his grandson.

ROBERT II., king of France, called the Sage and Devout, was crowned in 996, on the death of Hugh Capet, his father. He married his cousin Bertha, but Pope Gregory V. declared the marriage void, and excommunicated the king, who took for his second wife the daughter of the count of Arles and Provence. B. about 970; D. 1031. He was an accomplished prince.

ROBERT I., duke of Normandy, rob'-ert, surnamed the "Magnificent" and the "Devil," succeeded his father, Richard II., having, it is said, poisoned his elder brother Richard. He repressed several revolts in his dominions, assisted Boudouin IV., count of Flanders, and attempted to defend Alfred and Edward, the sons of Edmund, who had been excluded from the English throne by Canute. To expiate the errors of his youth, he made a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, but died upon his return, it is said of poison. He left only one son, the celebrated William the Conqueror. D. at Nicæa, 1035.

ROBERT II., duke of Normandy, was the eldest son of William the Conqueror. He had recourse to arms against his father, who was compelled to cede the duchy of Normandy to him. He sold nearly a third of his territories to his younger brother Henry, afterwards Henry I. of England, for the sum of £3,000. The latter invaded Normandy in 1105, and, after a sanguinary battle beneath the walls of Tenchebrai Castle, Robert, with 400 of his knights, was taken prisoner. He was afterwards confined for the remainder of his life in Cardiff Castle. Some historians assert that his sight was taken away by his merciless brother Henry, but William of Malmesbury declares that his only punishment was that of solitary imprisonment during twenty-eight years. B. 1087; D. 1135.

ROBERT I., king of Scotland. (See BRUCE, Robert.)

ROBERT II., king of Scotland, was the son of Walter, the Stewart of Scotland, and was the founder of the house of Stuart. During the infancy and exile of David II., the successor of Bruce, the Stewart held the reins of government, in conjunction with the earl of Moray. The portrait of this gallant founder of a line of Scottish and English kings was thus given by Fordun: "He was a comely youth, tall and robust, liberal, gay, and courteous; and for the innate sweetness of his disposition, generally beloved by true-hearted Scotchmen." When David II. was taken prisoner by the English, at Neville's Cross, in 1346, the Stewart was for the third time appointed regent, and, during the subsequent 11 years, administered the affairs of the kingdom with remarkable sagacity. In 1359, two years after the release of the king, the Stewart was created earl of Strathearn, and, upon the death of David, in 1371, he was declared king by the title of Robert II. After the demise of Edward III. of England, hostilities were renewed between the two countries, and, while the English laid waste the north in one direction, the Scotch advanced into England, and appeared before Carlisle. After a short truce, the battle of Otterburne, or Chevy Chace, was fought, between the English, under Earl Percy, and the Scotch, under Earl Douglas. The Scotch were victorious, but at the cost of their leader's life. King Robert had now grown old and infirm, and the nobles of the kingdom began to regard Robert, his son, as their leader. In 1389 he retired to his estate in Ayrshire, and remained in seclusion until his death. B. 1316; D. 1390.

ROBERT III., king of Scotland, was the son and successor of the preceding. During the first nine years of his reign he ruled in peace; but, in 1399, Henry IV. of England marched, at the head of a large army, into Scotland as far as Edinburgh, which city was successfully defended by the duke of Rothsay, the king's eldest son. In 1391 Hotspur (Henry Percy) advanced to Preston, in East Lothian, and the king's troubles were augmented by the death, at the age of 24, of his eldest son, the duke of Rothsay, who had been seized, imprisoned, and, it is supposed, murdered, by his uncle, the duke of Albany. Shortly afterwards, his army was twice defeated by the English, and the king, suspicious of the ambitious designs of his brother, the duke of Albany, sent his only surviving son, James, earl of Carrick, to France; but the prince was captured on his voyage by an English vessel. (See JAMES I. of Scotland.) This last misfortune broke the heart of the Scottish king. B. about 1340; D. 1406.

ROBERT, Herbert, an eminent French architectural painter, who made drawings of nearly all the great monuments and buildings of Rome. His most celebrated pictures are,—"The Catacombs of Rome;" "The Burning of the Hôtel-Dieu at Paris;" "The Tomb of Marius;" and "The Musée Napoléon." B. at Paris, 1733; D. at the same city, 1808.

ROBERT, Leopold, an eminent French painter, who studied under Gerard and David, and perfected his talents in Italy, where he executed many of his finest pictures. His greatest works are, the "Neapolitan Improvisatore," "The Reapers," and "Venetian Fishermen." B. 1797; committed suicide at Venice, 1835.

ROBERT, Nicholas, an eminent French miniature-painter, who also excelled in depicting flowers, plants, and insects. For Gaston, duke of Orleans, he painted a magnificent collection of miniatures of all those objects. It is preserved in the Cabinet du Roi at Paris. B. at Langres, about 1710; D. 1784.

ROBERT OF GENEVA was elected pope by fifteen cardinals, in 1378, and took the name of Clement VII. He was recognized as head of the Church in Spain, France, Scotland, and Sicily, whilst the rest of the Christian world acknowledged Urban VI. as the true pontiff. This double election caused a long schism, which continued till some time after his death. D. at Avignon, 1394.

ROBERT OF GLOUCESTER, an old English historian, whose Chronicle of English affairs was written in verse, and ends shortly before the commencement of the reign of Edward I. He is supposed to have been a monk in the abbey of Gloucester, but nothing is known as to his personal history. There are several copies of his work, which was edited by Hearn, and published in 1724. Lived in the 13th century.

ROBERT OF LINCOLN, surnamed Grosseteste or Greathead, an English prelate, who, in 1235, succeeded to the important diocese of Lincoln. He was a learned divine, and a firm supporter of the rights of the English church against the pope, the king, and several of the most powerful persons. He made a number of translations from the Greek, some of which have been printed. B. about 1175; D. 1253.

ROBERTS, David, an eminent Scotch painter, who was intended for the trade of a house-painter, but who, about 1821, went to London, where, during several years, he worked as a scene-painter, in conjunction with his friend Stanfield. By degrees he abandoned scene for architectural painting, and having obtained some success in the latter walk, he visited Spain in 1832, and upon his return, published a collection of drawings, entitled "Spanish Sketches," which fixed his reputation. From that period his rise was rapid; he became A.R.A. in 1839, and two years afterwards a full academician. To enumerate a few of the best subjects of this confessedly the finest architectural painter in England, will serve to show the bent of his genius. Perhaps the greatest work of the kind which has ever been given to the world is his "Holy Land, Syria, Arabia, Egypt, and Nubia," a collection of lithographs which were admirably placed upon the stone by Mr. Louis Haghe. His best Eastern pictures were,—"The Outer Court of the Temple at Edfou," "Jerusalem from the Mount of Olives," and the "Statues of the Vocal Memnon on the plain of Thebes." His "Chancel of the Collegiate Church of St. Paul at Antwerp" is a magnificent effort of pictorial art, and is contained in the national collection at the South Kensington Museum. "Rome," "Christmas-day in St. Peter's at Rome," "Approach to the Grand Canal," are among his best Italian subjects. B at Stockbridge, Edinburgh, 1796.

ROBERTSON, rob'-ert-son, a county of West Tennessee, U.S. Area, 184 square miles. Pop. 16,500.—Another in the S. part of Carolina. Area, 890 square miles. Pop. 13,000.

ROBERTSON, Stephen Gaspar, an eminent French natural philosopher and aeronaut, who became professor of physics at Liége, and perfected the mirror of Archimedes, invented phantasmagoria, and improved the parachute. He made several balloon ascents, in which he collected a body of valuable observations in meteorology. He was the author of several volumes of scientific memoirs. B. at Liége, 1762; D. at Paris, 1837.

ROBERTSON, William, an historian and divine of the church of Scotland. He was educated at the university of Edinburgh, where he took the degree of doctor in divinity; and, having entered into orders, became one of his majesty's chaplains in ordinary for Scotland, and was offered considerable preferment in the church of England, which he declined. His first work was the "History of Charles V.," in which are displayed superior powers of discrimination, together with an elegant and very luminous style. For this he was appointed royal historiographer for Scotland. He was also elected principal of the university of Edinburgh. His other works were, the "History of Scotland," not altogether void of partiality; the "History of America," and an "Historical Disquisition concerning India." He was a man of amiable manners and brilliant accomplishments. An enlarged and improved edition of his "History of Charles V." has been published by Mr. Prescott. B. at Edinburgh, 1721; D. near Edinburgh, 1793.

ROBERVAL, Gilles Persone de, rob'-air-val, a French mathematician, who became professor of mathematics at Paris, where he acquired the esteem of Gassendus and Morin. He succeeded the latter in the mathematical chair of the Royal College. His principal works were, a "Treatise of Mechanics," inserted in the "Harmonie" of the Abbé Mersenne; and an edition of Aristarchus Samius. B. at Roberval, 1602; D. 1675.

ROBESPIERRE, Francis Maximilian Joseph Isidore, robes'-peer, a famous French revolutionist, who was the son of a provincial advocate, and was educated at the expense of the bishop of Arras. After completing his studies at Paris, he entered upon the profession of the law, but with no great success. Upon the outbreak of the Revolution he became a member of the National Assembly, and in a short time rose to be chief of the Jacobins. He declared that "France must be revolutionized," and was soon named public accuser. Having risen to power, he, to maintain it, had recourse to the most cruel expedients. The prisons were crowded with unfortunate victims of all ages and of both sexes. Numbers were daily put to death, and the streets were deluged with blood. At length a conspiracy was formed against him: he was accused of seeking his own aggrandisement by getting rid of his old colleagues, and was condemned to death. He was taken, but contrived to effect his escape, and marched against the Convention; yet he had not sufficient personal courage to turn the tide once more in his own favour, and was again taken prisoner. He attempted to destroy himself by a pistol-shot, but only succeeded in breaking his jaw, and in that condition was, with twenty-two of his associates, dragged to the scaffold. His character has been decried, but deservedly so. He was cowardly and cruel, but eloquent and unmercenary. His partisans surnamed him the "Incorruptible," and at his death he was worth but 50 francs. His mean and low qualities were so greatly in excess of the better faculties, that he rendered himself as great a foe to democracy as to monarchy and aristocracy. B. at Arras, 1759; guillotined, 1794.

ROBESPIERRE.

Robin Hood, rob'-in hood, a famous hero in English ballad poetry. He was the captain of a band of outlaws, who made the forest of Sherwood, in Nottinghamshire, their haunt, whence they made excursions into different parts of England. He had a celebrated second under him, called Little John, and, according to Stowe, they continued their marauding course of life, without being brought to justice, from 1189 to 1247. The most complete edition of the ballads in which his deeds are sung is that of Gutch, 1847.

Robins, Benjamin, rob'-ins, an eminent English mathematician and artillerist. His parents were Quakers; but he abandoned that form of faith soon after he had settled in London as teacher of mathematics. He distinguished himself by confuting a memoir by Bernouilli on the "Force of Bodies in Motion," and by a demonstration of the last proposition of Newton's "Treatise on Quadratures." In 1742 he published his "Principles of Gunnery," the result of his own experiments,—an admirable work, which is without a superior in its particular walk, even at the present day. He also contributed to the improvements in the royal observatory at Greenwich, and, in 1749, was appointed engineer in general to the East-India Company. B. at Bath, 1707; D. at Madras, 1751.

Robinson, Rev. Edward, rob'-in-son, a learned American divine, who, upon the completion of his educational career, repaired to Paris, and aft rwards to Halle, in Prussia, in order to study the Oriental languages and literature. After spending some time in the Holy Land, he, in 1841, produced his "Biblical Researches in Palestine, Mount Sinai, and Arabia Petræa," a very learned and valuable work. After his return to his native country, he became professor of biblical literature in the Theological Seminary at New York. He also translated the Greek Lexicon of Buttmann and the Hebrew Lexicon of Gesenius; and wrote "Commentary on the Apocalypse," "Dictionary of the Bible," and "Harmony of the Four Gospels in English." B. at Southington, Connecticut, U.S., 1794.

Robison, John, rob'-i-son, a Scotch mathematician, who became professor of natural philosophy at Glasgow. In 1770 he accompanied Admiral Sir Charles Knowles to Russia, and was made director of the marine cadet academy at Cronstadt. On his return to his native country, he was appointed professor of natural philosophy at Edinburgh. He was the author of the "Elements of Mechanical Philosophy," some articles in the "Encyclopædia Britannica," and a curious work entitled a "History of the German Illuminati." B. at Boghall, Stirling, 1739; D. at Edinburgh, 1805.

Rob Roy, rob roi', 'Robert the Red,' a famous Highland freebooter, whose real name was Robert Macgregor, but who took that of Campbell in consequence of the clan Macgregor being outlawed. Previously to the rebellion of 1715, in which he joined the standard of the Pretender, he had been a trader in cattle; but the duke of Montrose having deprived him of his estates, he made reprisals upon the property of the latter. During some time he continued to levy "black mail" upon his enemies, notwithstanding every effort made to capture him. This bold, active, and courageous outlaw forms the hero of one of Sir Walter Scott's immortal novels. B. about 1660; D. subsequently to 1743.

Robusti, Jacopo. (See Tintoretto.)

Rocca, rok'-ka, a prefix to numerous towns and villages of Italy, with populations ranging between 1,000 and 5,000.

Rocella, La, ro-chail'-la, a town of Naples, in Calabria Ultra, 9 miles from Gerace. Pop 5,000.

Rochdale, roch'-dail, a town of Lancashire, on the Roche, over which is a neat stone bridge of three arches, 12 miles from Manchester. Its public buildings are an ancient parish church, chapels, schools, assembly-rooms, town-hall, literary institution, and theatre. Manf. Flannels, kerseys, coarse calicoes, baizes, fustians, hats, and machinery. Pop. about 100,000.—It has a station on the Manchester and Leeds Railway; and its commerce is greatly facilitated, both on the E. and W., by the Rochdale and Bridgewater canals.

Roche, rozh, a parish of Cornwall, 5 miles from Colomb-Major. Pop 2,000.

Roche, La, a prefix to the names of numerous towns and villages in France, with populations ranging between 1,000 and 3,000.

Roche, a town of Switzerland, with extensive saltworks, 20 miles from Geneva.

Rochefort, rosh'-for, a parish and town of France, in the department of the Lower Charente, on the Charente, 18 miles from La Rochelle. The streets are broad, straight, and laid out on a plan of perfect regularity. Nearly in the centre of the town is a spacious square. It forms the third military port of France. The principal objects of interest are, the arsenal, a cannon-foundry, the barracks, extensive magazines of naval stores, and the docks; likewise the civil and marine hospital, and the navigation school. The harbour is one of the great naval stations of the kingdom, and is protected by forts. It is formed by the Charente, which, if not wide, is secure, and capable, from its depth, of admitting vessels of great size. Attached to it are a prison for 1,000 convicts, and a naval hospital. Manf. Cordage, stoneware, and oil; also sugar-refining is carried on. Pop. 25,000. Lat. 45° 56′ 6″ N. Lon. 57′ 7″ W.

Rochefort, William de, a French writer, who was a member of the Academy of Inscriptions and Belles-Lettres, and published a faithful and elegant translation of Sophocles. He also wrote a "Refutation of Mirabaud's System of Nature," and other works. B. at Lyons, 1731; D. 1788.

Rochefort, William de, chancellor of France under Louis XI. and Charles VIII. He was at first employed in the service of the dukes of Burgundy, but quitted his posts to assume the former office, which he filled with considerable distinction. B. 1433; D. 1492.

Rochefoucauld. (See La Rochefoucauld.)

Rochejaquelein. (See La Rochejaquelein.)

Rochelle, La, ro-shel', a parish and town of France, capital of the department of the Lower Charente, at the bottom of a small gulf of the Atlantic, 76 miles from Nantes. Its fortifications, the work of the famous Vauban, are in good condition. It is entered by seven gates, and the streets are bordered by arcades. The town is well built, the streets broad, and, in general, straight. The principal public buildings are the cathedral, hospital, orphan-house, and the exchange. La Rochelle has long been an interesting place in a commercial point of view; its port stretches into the interior of the town, and is capable, at high water, of admitting vessels of great burden. Its entrance is defended by two old Gothic towers, of great height, and crossed by a ponderous iron chain. The roadstead, formed by two projecting points of land, is protected by the islands of Ré and Cleron. Manf. Glass, earthenware, and cotton-twist. Its trade, both to the colonies and to European ports, is considerable. Pop. 17,000. Lat. 46° 9′ 21″ N. Lon. 1° 9′ 16″ W.—La Rochelle is an ancient town, and was, for some time, in possession of the English, prior to 1224, when the French retook it. In 1628, after being frequently attacked by the Catholics, it was taken by Louis XIII., after a memorable siege of thirteen months.

ROCHESTER, roch'-es-ter, a very ancient city of the county of Kent, on the Medway, 7 miles from Gravesend. On the east it is connected by a continued range of buildings with the town of Chatham, and on the west by a bridge with Stroud. The principal public buildings are the castle, the cathedral, churches, town-hall, bridge, formerly of stone, as shown in the engraving, but now of iron, and Watt's charity-house and dormitories. The castle stands on an eminence rising abruptly from the river on the west, and was built by Bishop Gundulph, the first bishop after the Norman Conquest. The cathedral appears to have been the work of different ages. It is in the form of a cross, and is divided into a nave, aisles, two transepts, and a choir, with a low tower, and a spire rising at the intersection of the nave and great transept. Several of its monuments are curious, both from their antiquity and workmanship. Adjoining to the cathedral are the remains of the chapter-house and cloister, belonging to the priory, which exhibit a very beautiful series of Norman arches and ornaments, but in a state of great dilapidation. The other buildings are, a town-hall, a custom-house, theatre, assembly-rooms, baths, and various schools. Pop. of borough, 15,000.—Rochester was a Roman station, but did not attain any celebrity until more than a century after the arrival of the Saxons. Its bishopric is, after Canterbury, the most ancient in England, as it is, also, the smallest. It was founded in the beginning of the 7th century. The city is connected with Gravesend by railway.

ROCHESTER, a city of the United States, in Genesee county, New York, 7 miles from Ontario. Pop. 37,000. —The name also of several townships.

ROCHESTER, John Wilmot, Earl of, a celebrated English nobleman and poet. He displayed unusual powers of wit and a fertility of imagination; but he disgraced his fine qualities by the most dissolute principles and licentious conduct. His days were shortened by intemperance, but he died sincerely penitent. His satirical poems are keen, yet they were defaced by obscenity and impiety. It must be mentioned to his credit, that before his death he ordered all his licentious writings to be destroyed. On one occasion his bold wit found expression in a mock epitaph written upon the door of Charles II.'s bedroom:—

"Here lies our sovereign lord the king,
Whose word no man relies on;
Who never says a foolish thing,
Nor ever does a wise one."

B. in Oxfordshire, either 1647 or 1648; D. 1680.

ROCHESTOWN, roch'-town, two parishes in Munster, Ireland, neither with a population above 500.

ROCHLITZ, rok'-litz, a town of Saxony, on the Mulda, 28 miles from Leipsic. Manf. Woollen and cotton stuffs. Pop. 1,500.

ROCHON, Alexis Marie, rosh'-awng, a French astronomer and navigator, who became, in 1704, curator of the cabinet of physics and optics to the king. In 1790 he was dispatched to London on a mission relative to the reform of the weights and measures, and was subsequently appointed member of the commission for regulating the French coinage, and of the French Institute. In 1790 he constructed a lighthouse at the entrance to the harbour of Brest. He wrote extensively upon scientific subjects, his most important works being, "Memoirs upon Mechanics and Natural Philosophy;" "Essay on Ancient and Modern Money." He also wrote, "Voyages in the East Indies and in Africa," and a "New Voyage to the South Sea." B. at Brest, 1741; D. 1817.

ROCK, rok, a county of the United States, in Wisconsin. Area, 720 square miles. Pop. 21,000.

ROCKBRIDGE, rok'-bridj, a county of Virginia, U.S. Area, 652 square miles. Pop. 17,000.

ROCKINGHAM, rok'-ing-ham, a county of the United States, in the S.E. part of New Hampshire. Area, 812 square miles. Pop. 51,000.—2. In the central part of Virginia. Area, 769 square miles. Pop. 21,000.—3. On the N. side of North Carolina. Area, 412 square miles. Pop. 14,500.—The name also of several townships.

ROCKINGHAM, Charles Watson Wentworth, Marquis of, an English statesman, who was the son of the first marquis of Rockingham. In 1750, he entered the House of Lords, and immediately afterwards took a foremost part in the debates of that assembly. Horace Walpole, however, in his "Memoirs of the Last Ten Years of the Reign of George II.," makes several uncomplimentary references to the future prime-minister. In 1752 he says of him, "The young marquis of Rockingham entered into a debate so much above his force, and partly applied the trite old apologue of Menenius Agrippa, and the sillier old story of the fellow of college, who asked why we should do anything for posterity, who had never done anything for us!" His consistent and honourable character, and his steady adherence to the principles of Whiggism, nevertheless enabled the young statesman to rise gradually but certainly. He became a knight of the Garter in 1760, and five years later was appointed first lord of the Treasury and prime-minister, holding office during a year. Upon the retirement of Lord North from the head of affairs, in 1782, the marquis of Rockingham again succeeded to power, and held place until his death, which took place a few months afterwards. He was a statesman of but mediocre talents. B. 1730; D. 1782.

ROCK-ISLAND-CITY, a city of the United States, in Illinois, 150 miles from Springfield. Pop. 4,000.

ROCKLAND, rok'-land, a county of the United States, in New York. Area, 172 square miles. Pop. 18,000.—Also a township of Pennsylvania. Pop. 2,000.

ROCKY MOUNTAINS, rok'-e, a great ridge of mountains in North America. They run the whole length of the continent, from Mexico to the Arctic Sea, an extent estimated at 4,600 miles.

ROCROY, ro'-krwaw, a parish and town of France, in the department of Ardennes, 15 miles from Mezières. Pop. 1,200.—Here the Spaniards were defeated by the great Condé in 1643.

RODA, ro'-da, a town of Germany, in the circle of Eisenberg, 8 miles from Jena. Pop. 3,000.

RODERICK, rod'-e-rik, the last of the Visigothic kings of Spain. He was the son of Theodofred, duke of Cordova, who had been deprived of his sight by King Witiza; but Roderick revolted against, and, after defeating, deprived him of his crown. The sons of Witiza sought the aid of the Arabs, who prepared to invade Spain; and in 710 landed, under the command of Tarif, at Tartessus, now Tarifa. In the following year the Arabs again landed in greater force, at the foot of the rock of Calpe. The expedition was under the command of Tarik, and the place of landing was termed Gebel Tarik, which became corrupted into Gibraltar. The Arabs advanced into the interior, and were met at Medina Sidonia by Roderick, with a large but badly-disciplined army. A series of desperate engagements, occupying nine days, ensued, and resulted in the defeat of the Goths, the flower of whose chivalry, together with Roderick himself, were slain. Scott, Southey, and Irving have chosen the conquest of Spain by the Moors for the subject of some of their most admirable works.

RODEZ. (See RHODEZ.)

RODNEY, George Brydges, Lord, rod'-ne, a gallant English admiral, who entered the navy in his 12th year, and distinguished himself in several actions. In 1759 he was created rear-admiral, and was employed to bombard Havre-de-Grace. In 1761 he was sent against Martinique, which island, together with Santa Lucia and Granada, he captured, and for his services was created a baronet. Owing to an electioneering contest for Northampton, and other causes, he was reduced to such a state of pecuniary embarrassment as to be obliged to reside on the continent, where, in the American war, he was tempted by the Count de Sartines, by brilliant offers, to enter into the French service. These overtures he refused; of which De Sartines liberally informed the British government, by whom Sir George was recalled home, and obtained a command. In 1780 he defeated the Spanish fleet and took several ships. This was soon after followed by a more splendid victory and the capture of the Spanish admiral, Don Juan de Langara. But the most important exploit of this brave admiral was the defeat of the French fleet under Count de Grasse in the West Indies, in 1782, when the French admiral and a number of his ships were taken. For this he was created a peer and obtained a pension. B. at Walton-upon-Thames, Surrey, 1718; D. 1792.

RODOLPH OF HAPSBURG. (See RUDOLPH.)

RODOSTO, ro-dos'-to, a town of European Turkey, in Romania, or Rumili, near the Sea of Marmora. It has well-built streets, several good public buildings, and an excellent harbour. Pop. perhaps 35,000.

RODRIGUES, ro'-dre-gais, an island in the Indian Ocean, belonging to Britain, 330 miles from the Mauritius. Ext. 12 miles long, with a breadth of from 3 to 6. Lat. 19° 4′ S. Lon. 63° 25′ E.

RODRIGUEZ, Ventura, a Spanish architect, who, in 1733, assisted Juvara in making the designs for the new palace at Madrid. In 1752 he became professor of architecture in the Academy of St. Fernando at Madrid. He designed a very large number of cathedrals, colleges, and churches throughout Spain, and was justly styled by his countrymen the restorer of architecture in his native country. B. at Cienpozuelas, 1717; D. at Madrid, 1785.

RODRIGUEZ, John, a celebrated Spanish Jesuit missionary, who went to Japan, where he became interpreter to the emperor Taikosama. He was excepted from the proscriptions decreed against the missionaries, and took up his residence at Nangasaki, where he composed, among other works, a Japanese Grammar. B. 1559; D. 1633.

ROE, Sir Thomas, ro, an English statesman, who, in 1614, was sent ambassador to the Great Mogul, at whose court he remained nearly four years; of which embassy he published a very curious and interesting account. He subsequently acted in the same capacity at Constantinople. During his residence in the East he made a large collection of valuable manuscripts in the Greek and Oriental languages, which, in 1628, he presented to the Bodleian library. He also brought over the famous Alexandrian MS. of the New Testament, sent from Cyril, patriarch of Constantinople, to Charles I. In 1629 he was sent to negotiate peace between the kings of Poland and Sweden, in which he succeeded. In 1641 he went as ambassador to the diet of Ratisbon, and, on his return, was made a privy counsellor and chancellor of the Garter. B. in Essex, about 1580; D. 1644.

ROEBUCK, John Arthur, ro'-buk, a modern English politician, who went at an early age to Canada, but returned to England in his 23rd year to study for the English bar, to which he was called in 1831, and, in the following year, was returned as member of parliament for Bath. This seat he lost in 1837, but he was re-elected in 1841. He again lost this seat in 1847, but was returned, unopposed, for Sheffield in 1849. As an "extreme liberal," he sided with no great party in the house, but chose rather the part of an independent critic of the measures which were proposed in the national council-chamber. His powers as an orator were considerable, though strongly tinged with asperity, a quality which often brought him into collision with the Whigs. He became queen's counsel in 1843, and was also chairman of several companies. As an author, he produced a "History of the Whig Party;" "The Colonies of England;" and likewise contributed to the "Westminster Review." In 1855 he moved for an inquiry into the condition of the army before Sebastopol, which being carried against the Aberdeen ministry, they resigned. As chairman of that committee, he acted in such a manner as to earn from the nation the gratitude due to the efforts of an honest and independent politician. B. at Madras, 1801.

ROELAS, Juan de las, ro'-ai-las, a celebrated Spanish painter, who is supposed to have studied under Titian, at Venice. "No one," says Ford, in his "Handbook of Spain," "ever painted the sleek grimalkin Jesuit like Roelas." His best works are,—the "St. Iago" in the cathedral of Seville; a "Holy Family with Jesuits," and a "Nativity." B. about 1560; D. 1625.

ROEMAR, Olaus, re(r)'-mar, a Danish astronomer, who was educated at Copenhagen, and, on visiting Paris in 1671, became mathematical tutor to the dauphin. He also received a pension from Louis XIV., and assisted Cassini and Picard in performing the survey of France, and, during his ten years' stay in the kingdom, he made many important discoveries in astronomy, as well as inventing some new and excellent forms of astronomical apparatus. In 1681 he was recalled to his native country, and received from the king of Denmark the appointment of professor of astronomy at Copenhagen. His celestial observations, under the title of "Basis Astronomiæ," were printed by his pupils in 1735. B. at Arhusen, Jutland, 1644; D. at Copenhagen, 1702.

ROERMOND, rer'-mont, a town of the Netherlands, 28 miles from Maestricht. Manf. Woollens, soap, leather, beer, and vinegar. Pop. 9,500.

ROESKILDE, re(r)s'-kild, a town of Denmark, in the island of Zealand, 20 miles from Copenhagen. In the Middle Ages it was a residence of the Danish kings. Pop. 3,000.

ROGASEN, ro'-ga-sen, a town of Prussian Poland, 21 miles from E. Posen. Manf. Woollens, linens, and leather. Pop. 5,000.

ROGER OF HOVEDEN. (See HOVEDEN.)

ROGERS, Henry, roj'-ers, a modern English essayist, who received his education at Highbury College, and, for some time, officiated as an Independent preacher. Relinquishing this employment in consequence of ill-health, he became professor of the English language and literature in University College, London, which post he subsequently vacated to assume the chair of philosophy at Spring-Hill Independent College, Birmingham. He contributed extensively to the pages of the "Edinburgh Review;" and, selecting subjects similar with those which had been formerly chosen by Lord Macaulay, he won a high position by his able and elegant treatment of them. A collection of his essays, critical, historical, biographical, and speculative, was published in 1850, and again, in an enlarged form, in 1855. As a writer upon the religious opinions of the present time he was very successful, and produced, among other popular works upon that subject, "The Eclipse of Faith," and a "Defence" of the book, in reply to Mr. Francis Newman. He also wrote "The Life and Character of John Howe, M.A.," with an analysis of his writings; and "General Introduction to a Course of Lectures on English Grammar and Composition." B. at St. Albans, Herts, 1806.

ROGERS, Samuel, an eminent English poet, who was the son of a London banker, in whose house of business he was placed, after having received an efficient private education. From his earliest years he had a determination towards poetry, and, at the age of 23, he produced his first volume of verses, under the title of "An Ode to Superstition, and other Poems." This was in the year 1786, an important period in the annals of English poetical literature; for, as an eminent critic observes, "the commencement of a new era in British poetry dates almost exactly from this year. For a year or two before 1786 there had been manifestations of a new poetic spirit, differing from that of the 18th century as a whole, and more particulary from that of Darwin, Hayley, and the Della Cruscans, who represented the poetry of the 18th century in its latest and dying stage. Crabbe, for example, had published his 'Library' in 1781, and Cowper had made his first distinct appearance as a poet in 1782, when he was already in his 52nd year. Crabbe's 'Village' was published in 1783, and Cowper first made an effective impression by the publication of his second volume, including his 'Task,' in 1785. Thus Rogers was heard of as a poet almost at the same time as Crabbe and Cowper. But more exactly contemporary with Rogers than either Crabbe or Cowper, was Robert Burns, the first edition of whose poems appeared in that very year (1786) which saw Rogers's début as an author." Between the appearance of his first publication and that of his second, "The Pleasures of Memory," which was given to the world in 1792, he travelled upon the continent and in Scotland. Six years later he brought out another volume, after which he remained silent during fourteen years; for he added nothing to his poetical works until the year 1812, when he published a fragment entitled "Columbus." During this interval, however, he had retired from active participation in the affairs of the bank, and had given himself to the cultivation of the friendship of the celebrities of his time. "The house of Rogers, in St. James's Place, became a little paradise of the beautiful, where, amid pictures and other objects of art, collected with care and arranged with skill, the happy owner nestled in fastidious ease, and kept up among his contemporaries a character in which something of the Horace was blended with something of the Mæcenas." "Jaqueline" was put forth in 1814, "Human Life" in 1819; and in 1822, the poet, then 60 years of age, produced the first part of his "Italy." The complete edition of this latter poem was not published until 1836, when it appeared in a magnificent form, having been illustrated, under his own direction, by Stothard, Turner, and Prout, at a cost of £10,000. Up to his 91st year he wrote an occasional piece, composed, like all his works, with laborious slowness, and polished line by line into elegance. "But, on the whole," says a writer of a sketch of his life, "it was in his character as a superannuated poet, living on the reputation of his past performances, drawing the artists, and wits, and men of rank of a more modern age around him, and entertaining them with his caustic talk and his reminiscences of the notable persons and events of former days, that he figured in a select portion of London society during the last twenty years of his existence." That he was a shrewd observer and brilliant talker, besides a poet, is evidenced by the publication of his "Table Talk," which appeared after his death. "We have in his works a classic and graceful beauty," says an eminent critic; "no slovenly or obscure lines; fine cabinet pictures of soft and mellow lustre, and, occasionally, trains of thought and association that awaken or recall tender heroic feelings." He had been in the habit of taking constant exercise till within a short time before his death, and was at last only prevented from appearing in public by an accident with which he met in the streets. B. at Newington Green, near London, 1763; D. 1855.

ROGERS, John, an eminent English divine, who became chaplain to the factory at Antwerp, where he assisted Tindal and Coverdale in translating the Bible into English. In the reign of Edward VI. he returned to England, and obtained a prebend in St. Paul's cathedral, where he was a frequent and zealous preacher. He was the first person executed in the succeeding reign, being burnt at the stake in Smithfield in 1555.

ROGERS, John, a learned English divine, who became fellow of Corpus Christi College, Oxford. He wrote an able treatise on the indivisibility of the Church, against Hoadley, and Sermons. B. in Oxfordshire, 1679; D. 1729.

ROGET, Peter Mark, ro'-zhet, a modern physician and physiologist, who studied his profession at Edinburgh, and afterwards settled in practice at Manchester, where he became physician to the lunatic asylum and fever hospital. He repaired to the metropolis at a later period, and was elected fellow and secretary of the Royal Society, and lecturer on physiology at the Royal Institution of Great Britain. His works were both numerous and important, the chief of them being one of the Bridgewater treatises; treatise on Physiology and Phrenology; articles for the "Encyclopædia Britannica" and the "Cyclopædia of Practical Medicine;" and papers published in the Transactions of various learned and scientific societies. He was a fellow of the Royal College of Physicians, and of the Astronomical, Zoological, Geographical, and Entomological societies. Apart from the scientific researches which engaged his pen, he produced an excellent work, entitled "A Thesaurus of English Words and Phrases, arranged and classified so as to facilitate the Expression of Ideas, and assist in Literary Composition." B. in London, 1779.

ROHAN, Henry, Duke of, ro'-an, prince of Leon. He distinguished himself by his bravery at the siege of Amiens, and thereby obtained the friendship of Henry IV., after whose death he became the chief of the Huguenots in the reign of Louis XIII.; but upon the taking of Rochelle and the establishment of peace in 1629, he retired to Venice, where he was chosen generalissimo of the armies of the republic against the imperialists. He was subsequently recalled by the king, who employed him in the Grisons against the Germans and Spaniards. But the duke in 1637 gave up his command, and entered the service of the duke of Saxe-Weimar, by whose side he received a mortal wound at the battle of Rheinfelden. He wrote the "Interests of Princes;" "The Perfect Captain; or, an Abridgment of Cæsar's Commentaries;" "On the Government of the thirteen Cantons;" and Memoirs. B. in Brittany, 1579; D. 1638.

ROHAN, Louis, Prince of, generally called the Chevalier de Rohan, who became colonel of the guard under Louis XIV. He was a brave but unprincipled man, and engaged in a plot to deliver Quilleboeuf to the Dutch, which being discovered, he was sentenced to death. B. about 1635; executed 1674.

ROHAN, Cardinal de, a French prelate, who became the dupe of the Countess de Lamotte and others, by whom he was induced to purchase for Queen Marie-Antoinette a magnificent collar of diamonds, in the hopes of obtaining her favours. On the discovery of the affair, he was, in 1785, brought to trial before the parliament and acquitted, but was exiled from the French court. B. 1734; D. 1803.

ROHAULT, James, ro'-holte, a French philosopher, who became a zealous defender of the Cartesian system, of which he published a popular view. Of this work Dr. Samuel Clarke gave an edition, with notes, adapting it to the Newtonian system. He was also the author of "Elements of Mathematics," and a treatise on Mechanics. B. at Amiens, 1620; D. 1675.

ROHILCUND, ro-hil-koond', properly KUTTAHER, an extensive district of Hindostan, formerly belonging to the province of Delhi, but now included in the district of Bareilly. It lies between the Ganges and Gogra, between lat. 28° and 30° N.

ROHTUK, ro-took', a district of British India, in the division of Delhi. Area, 1,340 square miles. Pop. 295,000.—The TOWN of the same name is 42 miles from Delhi. Pop. 10,500.

ROLAND, ro'-land, a celebrated hero of chivalric romance. He was one of the paladins of Charlemagne, whose nephew he is by some stated to have been. His character was that of a brave warrior,—devoted and loyal. Charlemagne appointed him commandant of the Marches of Brittany, and afterwards took him with himself to the conquest of Spain. Returning from that expedition, he fell into an ambuscade at Roncesvalles, where, together with the flower of the French chivalry, he perished in 778. His adventures are celebrated in the famous continental romance entitled the "Chanson of Roland." He is also the hero of the "Roland Amoureux" of Boiardo, and of the "Orlando Furioso" of Ariosto. The town of Rocamadour, in France, pretends to be in possession of the "Durandal," or the celebrated sword of Roland.

ROLAND DE LA PLATIÈRE, John Marie, a French

statesman, who was designed for the church; but, relinquishing his studies, became engaged in commercial pursuits. In time, his commercial abilities being very great, he became inspector-general of the manufactories of Picardy, and afterwards of those of Lyons, of which city he was subsequently nominated deputy to the Constituent Assembly. In 1792 he became minister of the interior, but did not long retain the office. When the party of Girondists, to which he belonged, was proscribed, he fled from Paris, leaving his wife, who refused to accompany him, behind. He retired to Rouen, where, on hearing of the execution of his wife, he ran himself through the body, in 1793. He wrote some works on the cotton and linen manufactures, "Letters from Switzerland, Italy, Sicily, and Malta," and a "Dictionary of Manufactures and Arts." B. near Lyons, 1732.

ROLAND, Marie-Jane-Philipon, the wife of the preceding. Her father was an engraver named Philipon, who was eminent in his profession, and gave her an excellent education. At the age of 25 she married M. Roland, though there was a great disparity in their ages. She rendered important services to him in his capacity of minister of the interior; and most of the official writings which he published were the productions of her masculine mind. On his flight, she was sent to the prison of the Abbaye, and, after an imprisonment of some weeks, was released; but she had scarcely reached her own house before she was again apprehended. In her last confinement she wrote an interesting work, entitled "An Appeal to Posterity," or Historical Notices, Anecdotes, and Memoirs of herself. At length she was dragged before the revolutionary tribunal, and sentenced to the guillotine, which she endured with great fortitude, saying, as she looked on the statue of Liberty, "O Liberty, what crimes are committed in thy name!" B. at Paris, 1756; guillotined, 1793.

ROLLIN, Charles, rol'-lă, a celebrated French writer, who, after studying in the college of Plessis and at the Sorbonne, became successively professor of languages, rhetoric, and eloquence. In 1694 he was appointed rector of the University of Paris, where he revived the study of Greek, and introduced many important regulations in the academical exercises. His principal works were, an edition of Quintilian; treatise on "Studying and Teaching the Belles-Lettres;" "Ancient History of the Egyptians, Carthaginians, and Babylonians;" "History of Rome from the Foundation of that City to the Battle of Actium;" and "Miscellaneous Pieces." B. at Paris, 1661; D. 1741.

ROLLO, rol'-lo, a chieftain of Norway, who, being driven from that country by the king of Denmark, landed in Normandy, which was ceded to him by Charles the Simple in 911. Rollo embraced the Christian religion in the following year, and was baptized by the name of Robert. He assumed the title of duke of Normandy, married Gisele, the daughter of the French king, and was the ancestor of William the Conqueror. D. either in 920 or 927.

ROMA. (See ROME.)

ROMAGNA. (See STATES OF THE CHURCH.)

ROMAGNOSI, Gian Domenico, ro'-man-y -se, a distinguished Italian jurist, who became doctor of law of the university of Parma in 1786. He commenced practice as an advocate, and soon became celebrated. He also published several legal works, which were well received in Germany, as well as in his native country. In 1806 he was invited by Napoleon I. to Milan, to assist in the compilation of a criminal code. In the following year he became professor of civil law in the university of Pavia. At the downfall of Napoleon, in 1814, he lost all his public appointments, and henceforth devoted himself to private teaching and to the composition of works on jurisprudence. His legal treatises, which are regarded as among the soundest in the whole range of Italian legal literature, were very numerous. The best known are, "Code of Criminal Procedure for the Kingdom of Italy;" "Fundamental Principles of Administration;" "Introduction to the Study of Universal Public Law;" and several treatises supplied to the "Statistical Annals of Milan." A monument to his memory was raised at Milan. B. near Piacenza, 1761; D. at Milan, 1835.

ROMAIN, ST., ro'-mă, the name of numerous parishes and villages of France, none of them with a population above 3,000.

ROMAINE, William, ro'-main, an English divine and theological writer, who, upon entering into orders, became a frequent preacher before the university of Oxford, till his strongly Calvinistic religious sentiments caused him to lose his appointments at that seat of learning. He then removed to London, where he continued to preach in various churches, to large congregations, almost to his death. He was the editor of Calasio's "Concordance to the Hebrew Bible," in which he made some unwarrantable alterations to serve the Hutchinsonian doctrine. B. at Hartlepool, Durham, 1714; D. in London, 1795.

ROMAN, ro'-man, a town of Moldavia, 36 miles from Jassy. It is the see of a Greek bishop, and has Roman antiquities. Pop. Unascertained.

ROMANELLI, ro-ma-nail'-le, John Francis, an eminent Italian, who was the disciple of Pietro da Cortona, whose style he imitated. Louis XIV. employed him extensively, and many of his works are contained in the Louvre at Paris. B. at Viterbo, 1617; D. 1662.

ROMANIA, RUMELIA, or RUMILLI, ro-mai'-ni-a, roo-me'-li-a, room'-e-le, a province, or rather portion of European Turkey, at the S.E. extremity of Europe. It is divided from Asia Minor by the Sea of Marmora and the Straits of the Bosphorus and Dardanelles, and has on the N. the Balkan mountains, S. the Ægean Sea, E. the Black Sea, and W. Macedonia. Area, 30,000 square miles. Pop. 2,200,000. Lat. between 40° and 42° N. Lon. between 20° 40' and 29° E.

ROMANO, ro-ma'-no, a town of Austrian Italy, 26 miles from Milan. Pop. 3,200.

ROMANO, Julio, a celebrated Italian painter and architect, whose family name was Bippi. He was the disciple of Raphael, who made him his heir. His greatest pictures are, "The Fall of the Giants," and "The Battles of Constantine." He built some fine structures at Mantua, where he was patronized by the duke. B. at Rome, 1492; D. 1546.

ROMANOV, Michael, ro-ma-nof', czar or emperor of Russia, was elected by a council of the states at Moscow in 1613; but had to combat the rival pretensions of Sweden and Poland. After a short war, he concluded a peace with Sweden 1617, by which he ceded to Gustavus Adolphus a large portion of territory. In the following year he signed a truce with Vladislaus, king of Poland, who had advanced to the walls of Moscow. Directed by the sage counsels of his father, Michael would have advanced the civilization of his country, had not his death prematurely taken place in 1645. He left his throne to his son Alexis. The dynasty of Romanov reigned in Russia from the year 1613 until 1732, when it became extinct, in the person of the empress Elizabeth, who died without issue. It was succeeded by the dynasty of Holstein-Gottorp, with which it was connected by ties of marriage, Charles Peter Ulric, who reigned after Elizabeth, under the name of Peter III., being the son of her sister Anna Petrowna, duchess of Holstein-Gottorp, and daughter of Peter the Great.

ROMANS, ro'-mawng, a town of France, in the department of the Drôme, on the Isère, with a bridge over that river, 10 miles from Valence. Manf. Silk and woollen fabrics. Pop. 11,000.

ROMANUS I., ro-mai'-nus, emperor of the East. He was an Armenian, and became a soldier in the army of the emperor Basil, whose life he saved in a battle against the Saracens, which proved the foundation of his fortune. Constantine IX. (or VII.), whose daughter he espoused, associated him in the empire in 919. He displayed great military talents, and to his other eminent qualities added the virtues of humanity and piety. D. 948.

ROMANUS II., called the Younger, was the son of Constantine Porphyrogenitus, whom he poisoned and succeeded in 959. He died of intemperance or of poison in 963.

ROMANUS III. obtained the imperial throne by his marriage with Zoe, daughter of Constantine the Younger, in 1028. He was a weak prince, and was murdered by his wife, 1034.

ROMANUS IV., surnamed Diogenes, succeeded, in 1068, Constantine Ducas, whose widow Eudocia he married. He defeated the Turks, who had ravaged the empire, but, in 1071, he was taken prisoner by them, but was set at liberty on payment of a heavy ransom, by the sultan Alp Arslan. He was subsequently dethroned by Michael, the son of Constantine Ducas, who deprived him of his eyes. D. 1071.

ROMANZOV, Marshal, ro'-man-zof, a celebrated Russian general, who, under the reign of Catherine II., distinguished himself by his victories over the Turks at Bender, Ismailoff, and other places. In 1771 he crossed the Danube, and advanced as far as Shumla, where the Turks were encamped. After the signature of peace in 1774, the empress loaded him with honours, and created him governor of Ukraine. D. 1796.

ROMANZOV, Nicholas, Count, an eminent Russian statesman, son of the preceding, who, after holding various minor offices, became minister for foreign affairs in 1807. He was present at the interview between Napoleon I. and Alexander at Erfurt in the following year; signed the treaty of peace with Sweden in 1809; the treaty of alliance with Spain in 1812; and, in 1814, retired from public life, in order to devote himself to the cultivation of letters and the arts. At his expense were produced the "Diplomatic Code of Russia;" "History of the Byzantine writer Leo Diaconus;" a Russian translation of the "History of the Mongols and Tartars by Abdul-Ghazi." In 1817 he dispatched a Russian expedition under Captain Kotzebue, upon a scientific voyage round the world, entirely at his own cost. He likewise invited Mr. Heard, an Englishman, to superintend the formation of Lancasterian and Industrial schools upon his estate of Homel, in the government of Mohiloff. B. 1753; D. 1826.

ROMANZOV, several islands of the Pacific Ocean, Low and Mulgrave archipelagos.

ROMBOUTS, Theodore, rom'-boots, a Dutch painter, who was the disciple of Abraham Janssens, and excelled in painting historical subjects and conversational pieces, and attempted to rival Rubens, but without success. B. at Antwerp, 1597; D. at the same place, either 1637 or 1640.

ROME, rome, a famous city of Italy, formerly the seat of the Roman empire, situate chiefly on the left bank of the Tiber, 16 miles from its mouth in the Mediterranean. The space inclosed by walls approaches to the form of a square, of three, or somewhat more than three, miles each way, the circuit of the walls being in all about 16 miles. This is equal to the circumference of Rome in its greatest splendour; but of the seven eminences on which the former city stood, several of them are now covered with vineyards, corn-fields, or villas, the close population being confined to the level tract between the eminences and the river, and occupying little more than a third of the space included within the walls. The most regularly built part of Rome is that which is adjacent to the northern gate, called Porta del Popolo, and the quarter of Borgo, on the right of the river. The great drawback on its beauty as a city, is the mixed nature of its buildings, a mansion, entitled to the name of palace, being too often placed amidst a group of hovels. The points from which the city can best be viewed, are the Pincian hill, Mount Janiculum, the tower of the Capitol, and the tops of the Trajan or Antonine columns. The streets have seldom any footpavement; they are in general narrow. Three of the finest are those which diverge from the Piazza di Popolo, near the northern gate; viz. the Corso, extending to the foot of the Capitol; the Strada del Babbuina, ending in the Piazza di Spagna, and the Strada di Ripetta, leading to the Tiber. The Corso is the great public walk of Rome, and the scene of carnival festivities. The squares are small, but numerous, and, in general, adorned with obelisks, fountains, or other monuments. The space in front of St. Peter's church is a large area of an oval form, surrounded with a magnificent colonnade, the work of the celebrated Bernini. The Roman forum was anciently bordered with temples and lined with statues, and is now called Campo Vaccino. Among the ancient edifices, the Pantheon or Rotonda, a structure distinguished equally for solidity and elegance, is conspicuous. A still more imposing object is the Coliseum, or amphitheatre of Vespasian, a structure of an oval form, 581 feet in length, 481 in breadth, and 1,616 in circumference; being the largest amphitheatre ever known. At a short distance from this, near the Viminal and Quirinal hills, stands a portion of the vast baths of Dioclesian, now converted into a convent. Of the triumphal arches of ancient Rome, the only one remaining entire is the arch of Constantine, with its pillars, statues, and bas-reliefs, all of the finest marble. The arch of Septimus Severus is also of marble, but its bas-reliefs are much damaged. The arch of Titus has also suffered greatly. The Colonna Trajana, or Trajan's pillar, still stands on the spot where it was erected by that emperor, and is yet covered with admirable bas-reliefs. The pillar erected in honour of the emperor Marcus Aurelius is of equal or somewhat greater height, but of inferior execution. Of the ancient aqueducts, there remain only three; yet their supply of water is extremely copious. As to public baths, those great objects of Roman luxury, there remain of those of Caracalla little except the walls; but the baths of Titus are in better preservation. No city in Europe is superior to Rome in the number and magnificence of its churches. The church of St. Piedro di Vincoli is regarded as the most ancient in Rome, and is a noble hall, supported by 20 pillars of Parian marble, and adorned with elegant tombs. That of St. Martin and St. Silvester is built of part of the materials of the baths of Titus, and is a beautiful edifice. The church of St. Andrea, on Monte Cavallo, though small, is highly finished; that of St. Cecilia, in Trastevere, as well as the churches of St. Maria in the same quarter, St. Sebastiano and St. Piedro in Montorio, are all of great antiquity. The last contains the famous picture of the Transfiguration, by Raphael. Santa Maria Egizinea, a building of the Ionic order, is supposed to be the ancient temple of Fortuna Virilis, and Santa Maria Sopra Minerva, a temple of that goddess; while the church of Ara Cœli is considered as occupying the site of the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus. The Pantheon, and the seven patriarchal basilicæ, or cathedrals, are all remarkable for their architecture. The Pantheon, built in the reign of Augustus, and called, from its circular form, the Rotonda, contains the busts of a number of eminent characters. Of the cathedrals, Santa Maria Maggiore, a noble structure, is situate on the Esquiline mount, and has two fronts, each of modern architecture. St. Giovanni, in Laterano, is the regular cathedral of the bishop of Rome. Of the remaining churches, many of them are remarkable for architectural beauty, and altogether they number 354. In the church of St. Peter's, the arts of architecture, sculpture, and painting are all exhibited in the highest perfection. The original structure was erected by Constantine, and was repaired and improved in after-ages. The most celebrated architects of modern times, Bramante, Raphael, Michael Angelo, Vignola, Maderno, and Bernini, have displayed their talents on this vast undertaking. It has a length of 613 feet and a width of 286. Its height, to the top of the cross, is 434 feet 9 inches. The interior corresponds perfectly with its outward grandeur. The patriarchal chair of St. Peter is a throne, elevated to the height of 70 feet. The high altar has below it St. Peter's tomb, above it a magnificent canopy of brass, towering to the height of 132 feet. Here are three palaces of the pope; viz., the Lateran, the Quirini, and the Vatican. The first is close to the patriarchal church of that name, and is striking by its size and height. The Quirinal palace has become, from the height and salubrity of its situation, the summer residence of the popes. Its exterior presents two long fronts, plain and unadorned. The palace of the Vatican stands on an eminence, to the north-west of the city, near St. Peter's. Its exterior presents neither magnificence nor symmetry, having been erected by different architects at different eras, and forming, not one, but an assemblage of edifices. Its extent is immense, and the number of its rooms, great and small, is estimated at 4,422. Part of it is built with grandeur, and its walls are adorned with the cartoons of Raphael and Michael Angelo. Here also are collections of medals and other antiques, apartments cased with marble or paved with Roman mosaic, containing vases, candelabras, and altars, besides the celebrated statues of the Apollo Belvedere, the Laocoon, and the Antinous. The family mansions in Rome are termed palaces, and are in great numbers; but the far greater part of them are less remarkable for their outward architecture, than for their size and internal decorations. The Palazzo Doria is one of the finest in the city, presenting three large fronts, inclosing a spacious court surrounded with a piazza. It has a fine staircase, which leads to a magnificent gallery filled with pictures. The Palazzo Ruspoli has a still finer staircase, consisting of four flights, of thirty steps each, each step of a single piece of marble, nearly ten feet long and two broad. The Corsini palace is remarkable for its size, its furniture, and its gardens. The Palazzo Orsini, that of Giustiniani, of Attieri, and of Ciciaporci, are all distinguished buildings The Palazzo Farnese is of great size, and occupies one side of a handsome square. There are various others, some of which are rich in the paintings of the first masters. Rome is well supplied with hospitals, but they are conducted on an antiquated plan, and very deficient in interior order and arrangement. The Tiber, though deep, is only about 200 feet wide, and is crossed at Rome by several bridges. Rome is the seat of various seminaries. The university is of the first rank, and was founded in 1244. The Propaganda, or college for the diffusion of the Christian faith, is on an extensive scale, containing a number of youths of different nations, and a press for printing books in more than thirty languages. There are likewise several literary associations. In the Ripa Grande 800 children are instructed in arts and trades, and there are numerous schools of painting, sculpture, and architecture. Of the libraries, by far the largest is that of the Vatican. The other libraries are those of the Augustines, of the Dominicans, of the Barberini, Chigi, Colonna, and Corsini families; also the Collegio Romano, with its museum of antiquities and cabinet of natural history. The university library is called, from its founder, Pope Alexander VII., the Alexandrine library; and the library del Emo contains a collection of medals and mathematical instruments, along with a museum of natural history. Manf. Few, and chiefly consisting of woollens, silks, velvets, hats, gloves, stockings, liquors, pommade, and artificial flowers. Pop. about 180,000, exclusive of visitors. Lat. 41° 53′ 52″ N. Lon. 12° 28′ 40″ E.—The ancient Romans were famed for their idolatry; for they made gods and goddesses of almost everything. They were governed by seven kings for about 220 years. During the next 488 years they were governed by consuls, tribunes, decemvirs, and dictators, in their turns. They were afterwards ruled over by sixty emperors for the space of 518 years. Their wars with the Carthaginians, Spaniards, Gauls, Mithridates of Pontus, Parthians, and Jews, were the most noted. The Roman empire was subsequently much distracted by commotions, and in 410 the city was taken and burnt. By the different invasions of several barbarous nations, the empire was greatly reduced; and about the middle of the 15th century the eastern part was wholly seized by the Ottoman Turks. Near the end of the 8th century, when the pope had got himself made a civil prince, a shadow of the Roman empire was erected in Germany. In 1527, the city was invested by the emperor Charles V.'s army, and the general, to prevent a mutiny, promised to enrich them with its spoils. The general himself was killed as he was planting a scaling-ladder against the walls; but his soldiers, rather enraged than discouraged by his death, mounted to the assault with the utmost valour, and entering the city sword in hand, executed all those brutalities which may be expected from ferocity excited by resistance, and from insolence which takes place when that resistance is no more. In 1809 Rome became the capital of the department Rome, in the French empire, and so remained till 1814. In 1848 an insurrection in the city compelled the Pope to flee from it in disguise, and in the following year a republican form of government was attempted to be set up. The Pope was declared divested of all temporal power; but the intervention of a French force overturned the government and enabled him to return. While we write (1861), it is expected by many that the papal government will soon cease to exist.

ROME, a township of the United States, in New York, 98 miles from Albany. Pop. 8,000. It has a station on the Syracuse and Erie Railway.

ROMEN, or ROMNY, rom'-ne, a town of Russia, on the Sula, 90 miles from Poltewa. Pop. 2,500.

ROMFORD, rum'-ford, a market-town of England, in Essex, 14 miles from London. Near the middle of the town stand the market-house and town-hall. The church is an ancient building, consisting of a nave, chancel, and north aisle, with a tower at the west end. There are, besides, an almshouse, a workhouse, and a cavalry barracks. Pop. 6,000. It has a station on the Eastern Counties Railway.

ROMHILD, rom'-hilt, a walled town of Germany, 13 miles from Meiningen. Manf. Woollens. Pop. 2,000.

ROMILLY, ro-me'-ye, the name of several parishes and towns in France, none of them with a population above 4,000.

ROMILLY, Sir Samuel, rom'-il-le, an eminent English lawyer, whose father, a jeweller, was the son of a French Protestant, who had taken refuge in England after the revocation of the edict of Nantes. Samuel was placed to the trade of his parent, and, being of a serious and retiring disposition, he employed his leisure in remedying the defects of the very limited education he had received. The pecuniary means of his father having become considerably increased, he was articled at his own desire to a clerk in chancery; but at the expiration of his term, in 1778, instead of resting satisfied with his clerkship in chancery, he resolved to qualify himself for the profession of a barrister. In 1783 he was called to the bar. After remaining for several years with but little employment, he attracted the favourable notice of Lord Lansdowne, who had conceived a high opinion of his abilities, in consequence of the perusal of a small effusion by him, entitled "On the Constitutional Power and Duties of Juries." His rise was henceforth certain and rapid. After attaining to a large practice as a chancery lawyer, he, in 1800, became king's counsel; in 1806 he was knighted, appointed solicitor-general, and elected a member of parliament. In the House of Commons he distinguished himself by his impressive eloquence on the Whig benches. He advocated the reform of parliament, the abolition of the slave-trade, the mitigation of the severity of the criminal code, and the emancipation of the Roman Catholics. He published one of his speeches, in a pamphlet entitled "Observations on the Criminal Law, as it relates to capital punishment, and on the mode in which it is administered." Throughout the remaining years of his life he nobly persevered in his efforts to effect an amelioration of the terribly severe laws relative to the execution of criminal justice; there being, at that period, almost 300 crimes punishable by death. After the dissolution of parliament, in 1818, he was elected for Westminster; but, having about that time lost his wife, his mind was affected to such a degree that, in a fit of delirium, he put an end to his life. B. in London, 1757; D. 1818.

ROMNEY, George, rum'-ne, an excellent English painter, who was apprenticed to an itinerant artist, whom he soon surpassed. In 1762 he went to London, where he became a favorite portrait-painter. As soon as he had realized a sufficiency to enable him to visit Italy, he crossed the Alps, and, after studying there with avidity, returned to London, where he rapidly acquired fame and fortune. B. at Dalton, Lancashire, 1734; D. at Kendal, 1802.

ROMNEY, NEW, a market-town and borough of Kent, one of the Cinque Ports, 22 miles from Canterbury. It has an ancient church, and the hall or Brotherhood-house, where the mayors, jurats, and commons of the Cinque Ports, and of the two towns of Rye and Winchelsea, usually keep their court, called the Brotherhood. Pop. 1,100.—ROMNEY MARSH is a large piece of rich pasture-ground, secured from the sea by an immense embankment, under the management of a corporation.

ROMORANTIN, rom'-o-ran-tin, a town of France, in the department of the Loire-and-Cher, on the Saudre, 25 miles from Blois. Manf. Woollens, tapes, and leather. Pop. 8,000.—Here, in 1560, the chancellor L'Hopital issued the famous edict of Romorantin, preventing the Inquisition in France.

ROMSDAL, roms'-dal, a district of Norway, extending from the Snechaten W., to the Atlantic N.W. Area, 5,948 square miles. Pop. 78,000.

ROMSEY, rum'-se, a market-town of Hants, on the Test, 8 miles from Southampton. It has a spacious church, almshouses, charity-school, and is the head of a poor-law union. Pop. 6,000.

ROMULUS, rom'-u-lus, the founder of Rome, and brother of Remus, was the son of Rhea Sylvia, daughter of Numitor, king of Alba. She was placed among the vestals, but being delivered of these two children at a birth, declared that the god Mars was their father. Amulius, who had usurped the throne of Numitor, his brother, caused the children to be thrown into the Tiber, where they were found by Faustulus. On coming of age, they discovered their origin, put Amulius to death, and reinstated Numitor. A difference, however, arose between the two brothers, and Romulus put Remus to death. He afterwards founded the city of Rome, by collecting a number of strangers, and died B.C. 715.—Such is the story given by Plutarch, but modern writers, following the researches of Niebuhr, declare that for the most part it is little more than a poetical legend.

RONA, ro'-na, a small island in the Northern Ocean. Lat. 58° 32′ N. Lon. 6° W.—2. A small island of the Hebrides.—3. A small island of Scotland, near the island of Rasay.

RONALDSHAY, NORTH and SOUTH, ron'-ald-shai, two small islands of the Orkneys

RONCESVALLES, ronce'-val (Sp. ron-thais-val'-yais, Fr. RONCEVAUX, rons'-vo), a frontier village of Spain, Navarre, 22 miles from Pamplona. Here the rear-guard of the army of Charlemagne was destroyed, under Roland, in 778.

RONCO, ron'-ko, the name of several villages in Northern Italy, none of them with a population above 2,000.

RONDA, ron'-da, a city of Spain, in Granada, on the Guadiaro, 42 miles from Gibraltar. It consists of the town and a large suburb called El Mercadello, on the other side of the river. It has several churches, monasteries, and convents. Few towns can be more romantically situate. It stands on the summit of a rocky mountain, divided by a deep ravine or fissure, over which there are three bridges, each of a single arch, the one at the height of 120 feet above the water, but the other at the almost unparalleled height of 280 feet. Manf. Principally leather and silk stuffs. Pop. 16,000. In the 11th century this place was the capital of the Moorish chief Abu-Malik.

RONGE, Johannes, ronj, a modern German religious reformer, who was the son of a small farmer, and was educated for the Roman Catholic priesthood. In 1842 he was, however, deprived of his charge for publishing a letter in which some errors and abuses of the Roman Catholic church were condemned. In 1844 he published a letter to the bishop of Breslau, in which he denounced the "Holy Coat," then being exhibited at Treves, as an imposture. The religious movement inaugurated by that epistle led to the foundation of a German Catholic church independently of the papacy. Ronge was regarded as the apostle of the new church, and travelled over his native country making converts. He was called a "second Luther," and in a few years assisted in instituting upwards of 200 societies; but, subsequently to the revolution of 1848, the German governments determined to suppress these new congregations. Ronge became an exile in England, where he devoted himself to preaching to his fellow-countrymen in London, and to the propagation of Frœbel's system of infant education; upon which subject he published a book, entitled "A Practical Guide to the English Kinder-Garten (Children's Garden), being an Exposition of Frœbel's System of Infant Education." B. at Birchofswalde, Silesia, 1813.

RONNE, ron, a town of Denmark, in the island of Bornholm, in the Baltic, 93 miles from Copenhagen. It is defended by batteries, and has an hospital and a grammar-school. Manf. Woollens and tobacco. Pop. 4,100.

RONNEBURG, ron'-ne-boorg, a town of Germany, 60 miles from Dresden. Manf. Woollens, porcelains, and leather. Pop. 6,000.

RONSARD, Peter de, ron'-sar, a French poet, who was page to the duke of Orleans, and afterwards served James V., king of Scotland; in which country he remained two years, and then returned to France, where he was employed in several negotiations of importance. He subsequently retired from court, and, on taking orders, obtained some ecclesiastical benefices. His poems were, in his age, so much esteemed as to procure him the title of the "Poet of France." The best edition of his poems is that of Paris, 1623. B. in the Vendômois, 1524; D. near Tours, 1585.

RONSAY AND EGLISHAY, ron'-sai, a parish of Scotland, in the county of Orkney. It comprises several small islands. Pop. 12,300.

ROOKE, Sir George, rook, a gallant English admiral, who entered the navy at an early age, and rose by his merit to the first honours of his profession. He gave eminent proofs of his skill and courage in many expeditions, particularly in burning thirteen of the French ships at La Hogue, and in the glorious action off Vigo. In 1704 he took Gibraltar by bombardment, after which he obtained a decisive victory over the French fleet off Malaga, in which desperate fight the English lost 2,000 and the French 3,000 men. Notwithstanding these eminent services, he was, by the influence of the Whig party, obliged to resign the command; whereupon he retired to his estate in Kent. B. in Kent, 1650; D. 1709.

ROOKE, Laurence, an English astronomer, who, in 1652, was chosen Gresham professor of astronomy at the university of Oxford, which office he afterwards exchanged for that of geometry. He was one of the first members of the Royal Society, and wrote "Observations on Comets;" "Directions to Seamen;" "Method of observing the Eclipses of the Moon;" and "Observations on the Eclipses of the Satellites of Jupiter." B. in Kent, 1623; D. 1662.

ROOME, Edward, room, an English lawyer, who became solicitor to the treasury. He wrote some satirical papers called "Pasquin," against Pope, who gave him a place in his "Dunciad." He was also the author of a dramatic piece called "The Jovial Crew." D. 1729.

ROOTHING, root'-ing, the name of numerous parishes in England, none of them with a population above 500.

ROQUE, ST., rok, a town of Spain, in Andalusia, on an eminence about 8 miles from Gibraltar. Pop. 7,000.

ROQUEVAIRE, rok'-vair, a parish and market-town of France, in the department of the Mouths of the Rhone, 11 miles from Marseilles. Manf. Soap, olive-oil, and silk. Pop. 1,600.

RORAAS, ro'-ros, a town of Norway, 67 miles from Drontheim. It is noted for its copper-mines. Pop. 3,500.

ROREE, or LOHUREE, ro-ree', a town of Scinde, on the Indus, 20 miles from Shikarpoor. Manf. Coarse paper, leather, and silks. Pop. 8,000.

ROROTANGA, ro'-ro-tan'-ga, an island of the Pacific Ocean, Cook Islands. It has an elevated surface, and many of its population are converted to Christianity. Lat. 21° 16′ 5″ S. Lon. 159° 18′ W.

RORSCHACH, ror'-shak, a town of Switzerland, on the Lake of Constance, 6 miles from St. Gall. Pop. 2,800.

ROSA, SALVATOR, sal-va'-tor ro'-sa, an eminent Italian painter, who excelled in painting combats, sea-pieces, and landscapes of romantic scenery, with banditti. He painted with the greatest rapidity, and was also a musician, poet, architect, and an excellent comic actor and improvisatore. His satirical poems so deeply irritated his enemies, that he was compelled to seek an asylum under the Medicis at Florence. There is a landscape by him in the National Gallery. B. near Naples, 1615; D. at Rome, 1673.

ROSA, MOUNT, a mountain of the Alps, next to Mont Blanc, the highest in Europe. Height, 15,206 feet.

ROSA MORADA, a town of the Mexican Confederation, in the department of Smaloa, to the S. of Cahacan. In its neighbourhood coffee and indigo grow wild. Pop. 4,000.

ROSAMOND CLIFFORD, ros'-a-mond, usually called Fair Rosamond, was the daughter of Walter de Clifford, baron of Hereford. She was the favourite mistress of Henry II., who is reported to have secreted her in a labyrinth at his palace of Woodstock, where, according to some writers, she was discovered and poisoned by Eleanor, queen of that monarch. But it seems more certain that she died in the nunnery of Godstow, in Oxfordshire. She had two sons by Henry,—William, called Long-sword, and Jeffery, who became archbishop of York. D. about 1173.

ROSAS, Don Juan Manuel de, ro'-sas, ex-president of the Argentine Confederation. He was descended of an old Spanish family, and having displayed bravery and capacity in some minor appointments, was, in 1831, nominated captain-general or governor of Buenos Ayres. In 1835 he became president of the Argentine Confederation; but by seeking to obtain for the province of Buenos Ayres a preponderating influence and advancement, he became embroiled with Brazil, and afterwards with France and England, in consequence of an attack made upon Monte Video. Defeated in 1845, he nevertheless offered an obstinate resistance until 1850, when the states under his rule revolted against his tyrannical measures. Urquiza was nominated president, and in 1851 he totally defeated Rosas, who was compelled to make his escape from the country, and to take refuge in England. B. at Buenos Ayres, 1793.

ROSCIUS, Quintus, rosh'-i-us, an illustrious Roman actor, who became the most famous performer of his age, and is said to have received about a thousand denarii per day (upwards of £36) for his acting. Cicero, who speaks in the highest terms of his talents, undertook his defence against Fannius. The Roman state assigned him a considerable pension, which he appears to have deserved as much by his virtues as his abilities. D. about 61 B.C.

ROSCOE, William, ros'-ko, an eminent English writer, who was the son of a market-gardener near Liverpool, and having been placed for a short period in a bookseller's shop, was afterwards articled to an attorney. In 1774 his term expired, and he became an attorney; but in the meanwhile he had studied the Greek and Latin, and mastered the French and Italian languages. He also wrote some verses, one of which, upon the art of engraving, led to his introduction to Sir Joshua Reynolds. At the outburst of the French revolution he defended its principles against the strictures of Burke. In 1796 appeared his fine "Life of Lorenzo de' Medici," a work which soon acquired for him a high reputation, and was translated into French, German, and Italian. His "Illustrations Historical and Critical of the Life of Lorenzo de' Medici" followed; and, in this work, he defended himself against a considerable amount of adverse criticism to which he had been subjected. The "Life and Pontificate of Leo X." was his next production, and formed a sort of continuation of the former work; and both illustrating, as they did, a brilliant period of modern Italian history, were hailed as splendid contributions to literature. He subsequently became member of parliament and partner in a banking-house. In the House of Commons he voted with the Whigs, and advocated the abolition of the slave-trade. B. near Liverpool, 1753; D. at the same city, 1831.

ROSCOF, ros'-kof, a maritime town of France, in the department of Finistère, 13 miles from Marlaix. Pop. 1,400. Here, in 1558, Mary Queen of Scots disembarked when on her way to marry the Dauphin of France.

ROSCOMMON, ros-kom'-mon, an inland county of Ireland, in the province of Connaught, separated from the counties of Longford and Westmeath by the river Shannon on the east. It is bounded on the S. by Galway, W. by Mayo, N. by Sligo, and N.E. by Leitrim. Area, 969 square miles. Desc. Generally flat and open, in some places sprinkled with rocks, in many interrupted by extensive bogs, and but little diversified with hills. Rivers. The Shannon, which, in a course of 50 miles, forms several fine lakes. The Suck divides it from Galway. Pro. Oats and potatoes are the principal crops. This county has long been famed for its pastures; but, with the increase of population, pasture has given way to tillage. Manf. Linen and woollen stuffs. Pop. 175,000.

ROSCOMMON, the chief town of the above county, 68 miles from Dublin. It has a church, gaol, and an infirmary. Manf. Woollen, flannels, shoes, and earthenware. Pop. 3,300.

ROSCOMMON, Wentworth Dillon, Earl of, an English writer, who received his first education at the seat of the earl of Strafford, his uncle, in Yorkshire. At the fall of Strafford he was sent to Caen, in Normandy, where he had for his tutor the eminent scholar Bochart. At the Restoration he was made captain of the band of pensioners, which post he afterwards resigned, and went to Ireland, where he was appointed captain of the guards; but, dissipating his fortune by gaming, he returned to court, and was made master of the horse to the duchess of York. He now altered his course of life, married a daughter of the earl of Burlington, and applied himself to poetry. He wrote "Essay on Translated Verse;" "Horace's Art of Poetry translated into English blank verse;" and a collection of prologues and epilogues to plays. His poetry is neat and elegant, but of no extraordinary excellence. His remains were interred in Westminster Abbey. B. about 1633; D. 1684.

ROSCREA, ros-kra', a market-town of Ireland, in Munster, 6 miles from Borris-in-Ossory. Manf. Coarse woollens. Pop. 3,500.

ROSE, rose, several townships in the United States, none of them with a population above 2,500.

ROSENAU, ros'-e-nou, a town in the north of Hungary, 9 miles from Gomer. Manf. Woollens, stoneware, leather, and paper. Pop. 9,000.

ROSETTA, ro-set'-ta, a seaport-city of Egypt, near the mouth of that branch of the Nile which now forms one of the two great channels by which it enters the sea, 40 miles from Alexandria. It was built by one of the caliphs in the 9th century. The streets are very narrow, and each successive story projects over that beneath, till at the top the opposite houses almost meet. Upon the whole, however, though the streets are not straight, and though there is no remarkable edifice, Rosetta, compared with other Eastern cities, has a neat and pleasing appearance. It is still more distinguished by the beauty of its environs, being completely embosomed in a grove of date, banana, sycamore, and other trees. The people are more employed in agriculture, and contain a smaller proportion of the rude Bedouins, or wandering Arabs, than in any other parts of Egypt. Rosetta furnishes red cotton yarn, dressed flax, linen, and silk dyes, for the dresses common in the East. Pop. 4,000. Lat. 31° 24′ 31″ N. Lon. 30° 28″ 35′ E. In 1798 this place was taken by the French, and, in 1807, it was besieged by the British.

ROSEWELL, Thomas, rose'-wel, an English Presbyterian divine, was sent to prison, in 1684, on a charge of high treason. At his trial, the charge amounted to nothing more than to his saying in a sermon some thing disrespectful of the king's pretensions to curing the evil or scrofula. Notwithstanding the absurdity of the indictment, he was found guilty, but Charles II. granted him a pardon. B. in Somersetshire, 1630; D. 1691.

ROSHEIM, ros'-hime, a town of France, in Alsace, 14 miles from Strasburg. Manf. Cotton fabrics. Pop. 4,000.

ROSIÈRES, ro'-se-air, the name of several parishes and towns in France, none of them with a population above 3,000.

ROSLIN, ros'-lin, a village of Scotland, in the county of Mid-Lothian, remarkable for an ancient chapel and castle, 7 miles from Edinburgh. The chapel, built 1446, is in a beautiful and rich style of architecture. It contains the tombs of many of the earls of Orkney and Roslin.

Ross, Sir John, ross, an English admiral and arctic navigator, who commenced his career as a volunteer on board the Pearl frigate, in 1786. During the subsequent five years he served on board various ships of the royal navy, but then joined the mercantile marine, returning, however, to the royal service in 1799, as midshipman of the Weazel sloop of war. He became a lieutenant in 1805, and was severely wounded in the following year in a desperate cutting-out expedition under the batteries of Bilbao, a feat which was rewarded by a pension of £98 a year. He continued to serve with distinction until the end of the war in 1815, by which time he had attained the rank of commander, and was, in 1818, appointed to the command of the Isabella discovery-vessel, and was sent out, in company with the Alexander, under Lieutenant Parry, to ascertain the existence or non-existence of a north-west passage. The vessels penetrated some distance up Lancaster Sound, when the Isabella, which was far ahead of the Alexander, suddenly altered her course, Ross having imagined that he perceived land round the bottom of the bay, forming a chain of mountains connected with those which extended along the north and south sides. Parry, in the Alexander, was also ordered to turn eastward, although the latter declared that the supposed "Croker Mountains" did not, in reality, exist. (See PARRY, Sir William Edward.) The vessels thereupon returned to England, and Ross was promoted to post-rank. In 1819 he produced a narrative of his voyage, and in 1827 attempted to reach the north pole; after which he again went upon a voyage of discovery to the Arctic Seas, in a vessel equipped at the expense of Sir Felix Booth, sheriff of London. His nephew, Commander James Clark Ross, accompanied him, and the ship left the Thames in 1829. They reached Felix Harbour, in the Gulf of Boothia, where, after being several times frozen up, Captain Ross was compelled to abandon his ship, in 1832. They struggled on in boats and sledges, gaining the entrance of Lancaster Sound in August, 1833. There they met with the old vessel of Ross, the Isabella, which was at the time upon a whaling voyage. He inquired the name of the ship, and was informed that it was the Isabella, once commanded by Captain Ross. "On which," says he, "I stated that I was the identical man in question, and my people were the crew of the Victory." He reached England in September, 1833, and was knighted and created a companion of the Bath. The narrative of his second voyage was published in 1835; in 1839 he was appointed consul at Stockholm; in 1850 he was dispatched in search of Sir John Franklin, and, having deemed himself neglected by the government, produced a "Narrative of the Circumstances and Causes which led to the failure of the Searching Expeditions sent by Government and others for the Rescue of Sir John Franklin." He reached the grade of rear-admiral in 1851. In addition to the works already quoted, he produced a "Treatise on Navigation by Steam," "Memoirs and Correspondence of Admiral Lord de Saumarez," and "Letters to Sea Officers." B. in Wigtownshire, Scotland, 1777; D. in London, 1856.

Ross, Sir James Clark, captain in the royal navy, and nephew of the preceding, under whom he served as midshipman at the commencement of his career. Between the years 1819 and 1827 he served under Sir William Edward Parry, in four expeditions to the Arctic Seas. In the latter year he was promoted to the rank of commander, and after his return from the second voyage of his uncle, he was, in 1834, created post-captain, in reward of his discovery of the northern magnetic pole. He was next engaged in performing a magnetic survey of Great Britain. In 1839 he was placed in command of an expedition to the Antarctic Seas, the object of which was magnetic investigation. After an absence of four years, during which a vast and valuable body of information relative to magnetism, meteorology, geography, zoology, and botany, was collected, he returned to England. He had discovered a large continent in the Antarctic regions, to which he gave the name of Victoria Land, and an active volcano, 12,000 feet high, which he named Mount Erebus. In 1848 he went out in search of Sir John Franklin, but, like the other explorers, unhappily met with no success. He was one of the most skilful and scientific officers in the royal navy, was accorded the degree of D.C.L. by the university of Oxford, and was fellow of the Royal, Geographical, Astronomical, and other societies. In 1844 he was created a knight. He produced a "Voyage of Discovery and Research in the Southern and Antarctic Regions, during the years 1839-43; with plates and woodcuts." B. in London, 1800.

Ross, Sir William Charles, a distinguished English miniature-painter, whose parents were both devoted to the arts; his father as a miniature-painter and drawing-master. By the time he was 9 years of age, the proficiency in drawing of "little Ross" was almost unprecedented. In the year 1808, at the age of 13, he was admitted a student of the Royal Academy, where his assiduous study attracted the notice of many. The first ambition of the young aspirant was to excel in historical art, and from Benjamin West, the president of the time, he received much kind precept. At 15 he obtained prizes for large chalk drawings, which were remarkable for correctness and beauty of finish. When he was about 20, however, he altered his course, and adopted that branch of art in which he became unrivalled. He soon attracted the notice of the higher class of patrons, and from that time until the unfinished portraits of the duke and duchess d'Aumale in 1857, he painted the chief beauties and highest dignities of the British aristocracy and the various members of the royal families of England and Belgium. In 1837 he was appointed miniature-painter to the queen, and in 1838 he was elected associate of the Royal Academy, in 1842 academician, and in the same year was knighted. The desire for historical composition adhered so strongly to him, that so late as 1843, a cartoon by him, "The Angel Raphael discoursing with Adam," was exhibited at Westminster Hall, and obtained one of the premiums of £100. "None of the aristocratic beauties," says a critic, "none of the sweet children, the latter the most exquisite and difficult achievements of his hand, but may be proud to display the beautiful and touching records he left of their youth and infancy. In what also, in spite of all abstract modern theory, must ever be considered the painter's chief praise, his colouring, Sir William Ross was equally admirable. In the colouring of flesh, he is, by turns, as tender, pearly, and blooming as Vandyke and Sir Joshua Reynolds. No one ever made the complexion of woman and child so delicate, with at once so much variety of tint and so little sacrifice of truth. The whitest hands of his highest-born—and those hands are some of his most precious morsels—have still real, warm human blood in them." B. in London, 1794.

ROSS AND CROMARTY.—One of the most extensive counties in Scotland, extending from the eastern to the western seas, taking in the whole breadth of the island, and having the insular district of Lewis politically annexed to it. It is bounded N. by Sutherland, E. by Cromarty and the Moray firth, S. by Inverness-shire, and W. by the ocean. Area, 2,953 square miles. Desc. Very irregular, being much indented by numerous lakes and firths, particularly the firths of Cromarty and Dornoch on the east coast, and on the west those of Loch Carron, Loch Broom, and various other inlets of the sea. The eastern coast, to a short distance from the sea, is well improved, abundantly fertile, and ornamented with a variety of country seats. Beyond this tract, the inland districts become rude, lofty, and terrific; but, though wild and mountainous, there are many pleasant glens, or valleys, which afford abundance of pasture for black-cattle and sheep. Some of the mountains are of great height. Rivers. The principal are the Conon, the Orrin, the Beauly, which forms its boundary with Inverness-shire, and Oickel, which is the boundary with Sutherland. Lakes. Numerous in the valleys; the chief of which are Loch Mari, Loch Fannich, Loch Morrar, Loch Lichart, in which many streams have their sources. Pro. Wheat and timber are raised, but the greater portion of the county is devoted to pasture and cattle-raising. Pop. 83,000, including Cromarty and other detached portions belonging to the county. (See CROMARTY.)

Ross, a market-town and parish of Herefordshire, on the Wye, 12 miles from Hereford. It has a church, hospitals, charities, workhouse, market-house, and mechanics' institute. Its streets are rough and narrow. It is noted for its cider. Pop. 4,200.

Ross, a seaport-town of Ireland, in the county of Cork, on a bay to which it gives name, 25 miles from Cork. Its cathedral is a small Gothic structure, and it has a market-house and a court-house. It is the seat of an episcopal see, which comprises 32 parishes. Pop. of town, 1,200.

Ross, the name of numerous localities of Ireland, some of which have merely a local celebrity.

Ross, a county of Ohio, U.S. Area, 650 square miles. Pop. 35,000.

Ross, NEW, a seaport-town of Ireland, in the county of Wexford, on a large navigable stream, formed by the Nore and the Barrow, 12 miles from Waterford. It is inclosed by old walls, and has churches, chapels, monastic establishments, and an infirmary. Its trade is considerable in agricultural produce. Pop. 9,200. A severe battle was fought here in 1798, between the king's troops and the Irish insurgents.

ROSSANO, ros-sa'-no, a town of Naples, in the province of Calabria Citra, 16 miles from Carnati. It has a cathedral, and is the birthplace of Popes John VII. and XVII. Pop. 7,500.

ROSSBACH, ros'-bak, a town of Saxony, 16 miles from Halle, where, in 1757, Frederick the Great defeated the French and Imperial armies.

ROSSE, William Parsons, Earl of, ross, a modern astronomer and constructor of the magnificent instrument called the "Monster Telescope." He received his education at Magdalen College, Oxford, and succeeded to the earldom on the death of his father, in 1841. His best claim to distinction was the magnificent telescope erected under his personal superintendence at Birr Castle, near Parsonstown. It is the largest ever constructed; its speculum is almost six feet in diameter, its tube fifty-six feet in length; and to complete it cost its designer years of anxious labour and experiment, and a great expenditure of money. By its means a more extended knowledge of the surface of the moon, and of the nebulæ has been gained. In 1855 he was created a knight of the Legion of Honour, having previously acted as president of the Royal Society; he was likewise a member of most of the learned and scientific bodies in Europe. He wrote an account of the monster telescope, the manufacture of its specula, and full descriptions of the machinery; "Letters on the State of Ireland;" and "Memorandum presented to the Council of the Royal Society for rendering the Council of the Society more efficient." D. 1800.

ROSSEL, ros-sel', a town of East Prussia, 51 miles from Konigsberg. Manf. Linen and woollen fabrics. Pop. 3,000.

ROSSIENA, ros'-se-ai'-na, a town of Russia, in the circle of Dubissa, 100 miles from Vilona. It has several churches and a Piarist college. Pop. 6,000.

ROSSINI, Gioacchino, ros-se'-ne, an illustrious Italian composer, who was the son of a strolling musician, by whom he was taught the rudiments of his art; but, having a fine voice, he was placed under a skilful tutor in order to acquire the art of vocalization. At 12 years of age he sang in the churches of Bologna; and when, at 15, his voice broke, he was entered of the Lyceum of Bologna, in order to acquire a more abstruse knowledge of the musical art. Young Rossini, however, regarded the study of double counterpoint as drudgery, and happening to hear his master, Padre Mattei, observe one day that single counterpoint was sufficient knowledge for a composer who only aspired to write the lighter kinds of music,—"Do you mean to say, Padre," he exclaimed, "that with what I have learned already I could write operas?" "Why, yes," answered the Padre. "Then," replied Rossini, "I mean to write operas; and I don't want any more lessons." But although he took no more lessons from Mattei, he laboured assiduously at the task of self-instruction. In 1813 he produced his opera of "Tancredi," which at once made its composer famous throughout Europe. Encouraged by this success, he produced a number of other works in quick succession, all of which, however, were inferior to the work which brought him into popularity. In 1816 he produced his world-famous "Barber of Seville," at Rome. Those of his later works, which still keep the stage, are "La Cenerentola," "La Gazza Ladra," "La Donna del Lago," and "Guglielmo Tell." This last was written at the age of 37, and with it closed the career of Rossini as a composer. "An additional success would add nothing to my fame," he said; "a failure would injure it." After holding the post of manager of the Italian Opera at Paris during some time, he, in 1836, returned to his native country, where he continued to reside till 1856, when he repaired to Paris once more. He seemed, however, to have totally forgotten the enthusiasm of his younger days for music; even so far as never to visit the theatres. B. at Pesaro, near Bologna, 1792.

ROSSINVER, ros'-sin-ver, a parish of Ireland, in Connaught, and comprising the village of Kinlough. Pop. 12,000.

ROSSLYN, Alexander Wedderburne, Earl of, ross'-lin, an eminent lawyer, who received his education at the university of Edinburgh, and, in 1752, was admitted an advocate at the Scotch bar. In the following year he entered himself of the Inner Temple, and was called to the English bar in 1757. He was indefatigable in his profession, and in 1763 he obtained a silk gown, as king's counsel. Not long afterwards, he was returned to parliament for Richmond. He joined Mr. George Grenville in opposition, and distinguished himself by his eloquence on several occasions. On the death of his friend, Mr. Wedderburne accepted the office of solicitor-general, and zealously supported government in the endeavour to subjugate America. In 1778 he was made attorney-general, and in 1780 was appointed chief justice of the Common Pleas, being at the same time created Baron Loughborough. On the formation of the coalition ministry of Lord North and FOX, Lord Loughborough gave his aid to that administration, and afterwards voted with them in opposition; but in 1793 he was made lord chancellor, and he supported government with energy during the war with France. In 1801 he was created Earl Rosslyn, and resigned the seals the same year. His remains were interred in St. Paul's Cathedral. His lordship wrote a pamphlet entitled, "Observations on the State of the English Prisons, and the Means of improving them." B. in Scotland, 1733; D. 1805.

ROSSWEIN, ross'-vine, a town of Saxony, 24 miles from Dresden. Manf. Woollens and other stuffs. Pop. 6,000.

ROSTOCK, ros'-tok, a seaport town of Germany, in Mecklenburg-Schwerin, on the Warnow, 9 miles from its mouth in the Baltic, and 44 miles from Schwerin. It is surrounded by old fortifications, has three suburbs, and is divided into three parts,—the old, middle, and new towns. The principal edifices are a grand-ducal mansion, and a university on a small scale. There are, also, a poor-house, a Lutheran convent, and a statue to Marshal Blucher, who was a native of this place. Manf. Canvas, linen, ships' anchors, soap, and vinegar. There are, besides, breweries, distilleries, and sugar-refineries. Its trade is extensive. Pop. 24,000. This was, for a lengthened period, one of the Hanse towns, and, until lately, retained some privileges.

ROSTOPCHIN, or RASTOPCHIN, Count Feodor Vasilievitch, ros-top'-chin, a Russian general, who held the chief command at the city of Moscow when that city was burned at the approach of Napoleon I., in 1812. He was descended of an old Russian family, which could trace its descent in a direct line from a son of Genghis Khan. After concluding his education, and making the tour of Europe, he became an officer of the Guards, and the favourite of the grand-duke Paul, who created him a count. He subsequently fell into disgrace, but was again preferred to high appointments, under the emperor Alexander, who also gave him the command at Moscow. Napoleon proclaimed that the great conflagration, which proved so destructive to his army, was kindled at the orders of Rostopchin. In 1823, however, the Russian count, who was then a resident at Paris, produced his small work, called "The Truth as to the Conflagration of Moscow." In that pamphlet he commenced: "Ten years have elapsed since the conflagration of Moscow, and I am still pointed out to history and posterity as the author of an event which, according to the received opinion, was the principal cause of the destruction of Napoleon's army, of his subsequent fall, the preservation of Russia, and the deliverance of Europe. Certainly there is something to be proud of in such splendid claims as these; but having never usurped anybody's rights, and being tired of hearing the same fable constantly repeated, I am going to make known the truth, which alone ought to dictate history." He went on to declare that the fire was not the result of a preconcerted plan, but that it originated in many of the shopkeepers and others having voluntarily applied the flame to their own dwellings. Byron represents it as a national act:—

"To this the soldier lent his kindling match,
To this the peasant gave his cottage thatch,
To this the merchant flung his hoarded store,
The prince his hall—and Moscow was no more!"

The French, nevertheless, adhere to the opinion that Rostopchin was the author of the conflagration. He returned to Russia in 1825. He was a spirited and witty writer, and produced several works, and also wrote a singular piece of biography, entitled "My Memoirs, written in Ten Minutes." B. 1765; D. at Moscow, 1826.

ROSTOV, ros-tof', a town of European Russia, in the government of Jaroslovl. It contains a richly-ornamented cathedral, an archiepiscopal mansion, a seminary, and five churches, besides being an entrepôt for the trade of the countries traversed by the Don. Pop. 11,000.

ROTA, ro'-ta, a maritime town of Spain, in Andalusia, 7 miles from Cadiz. It has a castle and a monastery, and is noted for its wine. Pop. 8,000.

ROTHENBURG ON THE TAUBER, ro'-ten-boorg, an old and irregularly-built town of Bavarian Franconia, 29 miles from Wurtzburg. It contains a square, and several public buildings. Pop. 5,600.

ROTHENBURG, the name of several towns in Germany, none of them with a population above 3,700.

ROTHENTHURM, ro'-ten-toorm, a village of Switzerland, 6 miles from Schwytz. Not far from this place is Morgarten, the scene of a total defeat of the Austrians by the Swiss in 1315.

ROTHERHAM, roth'-er-ham, a market-town and parish of the West Riding of Yorkshire, near the confluence of the rivers Rother and Don, 6 miles from Sheffield. The parish church is a handsome Gothic building, erected in the reign of Edward IV. There are various other churches, chapels, a court-house, market-house, public library, a college of the Independents, almshouses, a workhouse, and different schools. Manf. Iron goods, machinery, starch, rope, glass, and soap. In its neighbourhood coal is abundant. Pop. of parish 17,000, of town 6,700.

ROTHERHITHE, or REDRIFF, roth'-er-hithe, a village and parish of Surrey, on the Thames, about a mile and a half east of London Bridge. It is noted for its dockyards, of which it contains a large number, and in which its population is principally employed. Pop. 18,000.

ROTHESAY, roth-sai', a parish and royal burgh of Scotland, in the island of Bute, at the bottom of an extensive bay, 30 miles from Glasgow. It has two churches, numerous chapels, schools, and custom and excise offices. Manf. Cotton-spinning, and it has shipbuilding-docks. The herring, salmon, haddock, and whiting fisheries are prosecuted. Pop. 7,300.

ROTHSCHILD, Meyer Anselm, roth'-child, the founder of the celebrated commercial family which bears his name. He was designed for the Jewish priesthood; but becoming an orphan in his 11th year, he was placed in a banking-house at Hanover. After acquiring some little capital, he returned to Frankfort, where he began business upon a modest scale as banker or exchange-broker. His skill and reputation for probity gained for him general confidence, and, in 1801, he became banker to the landgrave of Hesse, whose private fortune was preserved through the tact of Rothschild during the troubled period when Napoleon I. held undisputed sway over Germany. The house subsequently attained unexampled prosperity, and upon the death of Meyer Anselm, his sons were left a legacy of enormous wealth and boundless credit. He had ten children, five of whom were sons. The eldest, Anselm, was the chief of the Frankfort house, Solomon of that of Vienna; Nathan settled at Manchester in 1800, and afterwards in London. He was regarded as the ablest of the family, and to his sagacity is principally due the great prosperity of the house. He advanced money to the English government during the last years of the continental war, and was the first to introduce foreign loans into England. Charles was established at Naples, and James at Paris. Although widely separated from each other, the five brothers were in reality but the heads of departments of one great firm. Meyer Anselm Rothschild was B. at Frankfort-on-the-Maine about 1750; D. 1812.

ROTHSCHILD, Lionel Nathan, Baron de, was the eldest son of Nathan. He was elected as one of the members of parliament for the city of London in 1847, but was precluded from taking his seat because he would not make his oaths "on the true faith of a Christian." A resolution was, however, formed at a subsequent period, in consequence of which he was enabled to take his seat. B. in London, 1808.

ROTHWELL, roth'-wel, a parish of Northamptonshire, 4 miles from Kettering. Pop. 2,500, mostly employed in the manufacture of silk plush for hats.

ROTHWELL, a township of the West Riding of Yorkshire, 5 miles from Wakefield. Manf. Woollen goods. Pop. 7,600.

ROTTECK, Charles Von, rot'-tek, an eminent German historian and statesman, who was appointed professor of history at the university of Baden, in 1798. He travelled through Europe to increase his knowledge of constitutional law, and, after his return, published several works remarkable for their liberal tendency. In 1806 he was appointed councillor to the grand-duke of Baden, and afterwards professor of law and political economy at Fribourg. He subsequently became vice-president of the Chamber of Baden, wherein he zealously defended public liberty, and especially the liberty of the press. He edited a political dictionary, and was the author of several valuable historical works. B. in Baden, 1775; D. 1840.

ROTTEE. (See ROTTI.)

ROTTENBURG, rot'-ten-boorg, a town of Germany, in Wurtemberg, on the Neckar, 12 miles from Reutlingen. Manf. Paper and leather. Pop. 6,400.

ROTTERDAM, rot'-ter-dăm', an important commercial city of the Netherlands, in South Holland, on the north bank of the Maese, which here resembles an arm of the sea, 40 miles from Amsterdam. The form of the city is triangular, its longest side stretching along the bank of the river. It is traversed by the Rotte, a broad canal, which here joins the Maese, and is, even more than other towns in Holland, intersected by canals, which divide the half of it near the river into several insulated spots connected by drawbridges. These canals are almost all bordered with trees. The row called the Boomtjes is the finest in the city, as well in regard to buildings, as for its pleasant prospect across the Maese. Next to the Boomtjes comes the Haringvliet. The other streets are, in general, long, but narrow. The houses of the whole are rather convenient than elegant; their height is of four, five, or six stories. Of the public buildings the principal are the exchange, the church of St. Lawrence, several other churches, the town-house, the admiralty, the academy, the theatre, the central prison of the Netherlands, charitable institutions, and schools. Manf. Tobacco, soap, leather, paper, distilleries of gin or Geneva, and sugar and salt refineries. Rotterdam contains both an English Episcopal and a Scotch Presbyterian church, there being more English residents in Rotterdam than in any other town in the Netherlands. Pop. 85,000. Lat. 51° 55′ 3″ N. Lon. 4° 29′ 5″ E. Rotterdam is a place of considerable antiquity. It became a privileged town, and was surrounded with walls, in the 13th century. Along with the general commerce of Holland, it suffered by the invasion of the French; but the overthrow of Napoleon I. proved the harbinger of its reviving prosperity. It communicates by canals with Delft and the Hague, with Germany by steamers on the Rhine, and with Utrecht, Amsterdam, the Hague, and Arnheim, by railway.

ROTTWEIL, rot'-vile, a town of Wurtemberg, 42 miles from Constance. It has an exchange and hospital. Manf. Linen and flax. Pop. 4,000.

ROUBAIX, roo'-bai, a parish and town of France, in the department of the North, 6 miles from Lille. It is abundantly supplied with water from Artesian wells. Manf. Woollens, Turkish satins, camelots, and serges. Pop. 35,000.

ROUBILIAC, Louis Francis, roo-bil'-i-ak, an eminent sculptor, who was a native of France, but who settled at an early age in England, where he became the most popular sculptor of his time. His best works are,—the statue of George II. in Golden Square, London, of Shakspere in the British Museum, of Handel in Westminster Abbey, of Sir Isaac Newton at Cambridge, and of the duke of Argyle, Marshal Wade, and the Nightingale family, in Westminster Abbey. B. at Lyons, about 1695; D. in London, 1762.

ROUEN, roo'-a, rwa, a city in the north of France, the capital of the department of the Lower Seine, and formerly of Normandy, 68 miles from Paris. It is situate on the right bank of the Seine, in a fertile, pleasant, and varied country. The streets, though, in general, straight, are narrow and dirty, and some of the houses are of wood. The most agreeable part of the town is that which adjoins the Seine. The public buildings of interest are, the cathedral, built by William the Conqueror, and said to be one of the finest specimens of Gothic architecture in France; the church of St. Ouen, likewise a fine Gothic building, situate nearly in the centre of the town; and that of St. Maclou, considered a master-piece of its kind. The other churches and convents of the city are of little note in point of architecture. Besides these, there are a town-house, or municipality, barracks, old castle, prisons, an exchange, hospital, and the public markets. There are two bridges over the Seine, one of stone and another of iron, connecting the town with the suburb of St. Sever; also various literary societies and schools, an academy of belles-lettres, a society of agriculture and the arts, a central school, classes for medicine and surgery, a navigation and drawing school, together with a public library, a collection of paintings and natural history, and a botanical garden. Manf. Cotton goods, woollens, linens, iron-ware, paper, hats, pottery, wax, cloth, and sugar-refineries. Dyeing, both of woollens and cotton, is also conducted with care and success. Pop. 101,000. Rouen has frequently been taken and retaken. In 1418 it was taken by Henry V., and Joan of Arc was, in 1431, burned here. A statue to her memory has been erected on the spot. It is the birthplace of the two Corneilles and of Fontenelle.

ROUFFACH, roof'-fak, a parish and town of France, in the department of the Upper Rhine, on the Ombach, 9 miles from Colmar. Manf. Leather and cotton goods. Pop. 3,700. It has a station on the Strasburg and Basle Railway.

ROULERS, roo'-lai, a town of Belgium, in West Flanders, on a branch of the Lys, 10 miles from Courtrai. Manf. Chiefly linen goods. Pop. 9,500.

ROUSSEAU, John Baptist, roos'-so, a French poet, who was the son of a shoemaker. He, however, received a liberal education, and wrote some poetical pieces in his youth, which brought him into so much notice, that Marshal Tallard took him to England as his secretary. Several virulent satires having been circulated against persons of eminence, to whom Rousseau was known to have an aversion, the general voice attributed them to him; when, so great was the odium he incurred, that he was banished from the kingdom. He then went to Switzerland, and being introduced to Prince Eugene, accompanied him to Vienna. He afterwards lost the favour of the prince, on which he went to Brussels, where he contracted an intimacy with Voltaire, which ended in a quarrel, and the two poets lampooned each other without mercy. Besides his epigrams, sonnets, and other poems, he wrote some comedies and letters. B. at Paris, 1670; D. at Brussels, 1741.

ROUSSEAU, John James, a celebrated French author, was the son of a watchmaker. His mother died while he was a child, which, he says, was the first of his misfortunes. Among the earliest books which fell in his way were Plutarch and Tacitus. His education, however, was very confined, and he was put apprentice to an engraver; but, according to his own account, he learned nothing but lying and pilfering. He ran away from his master, and in a destitute condition was taken under the protection of a lady named Madame de Warens, who had quitted the Protestant religion for the Catholic. This lady appears to have had somewhat of the zeal of proselytism in her charity, for she sent the young fugitive to a Roman Catholic seminary at Turin. He did not long remain there, but hired himself as footman to a lady, who died shortly after. Having some talents for music, he set up as a teacher of that art at Chamberi, whence, in 1740, he went to ROUSSEAU.

Lyons, and afterwards to Venice as private secretary to the French envoy. In 1745 he repaired to Paris, where he lived in great poverty during some time, till Dupin, the farmer-general, gave him a place in his department. In 1750 he obtained a prize from the academy of Dijon for the best essay in answer to the question "Whether the re-establishment of the arts and sciences has conduced to the purity of morals?" This success prompted him to produce a discourse upon "The Origin of Inequality among Mankind." In 1758 he published a letter to d'Alembert upon the project of establishing a theatre at Geneva. In this letter, which was well written, he declared himself as adverse to theatrical exhibitions, though he had before published a comedy, and also a pastoral, both adapted for the stage. He next published his "Dictionary of Music." He had previously produced a dissertation on French music, or rather a censure of it. In 1761 appeared his romance of the "New Heloise." It is in the form of letters, exhibiting a strange mixture of beauties and deformities; but it was read with avidity. This work was eclipsed by his "Emile," a moral romance, in which he condemns every other mode of education but that of following nature. Rousseau, in this work, attacks the prophecies and miracles of the Christian religion, while he praises the gospel, and draws a beautiful picture of its Divine Author. The parliament of Paris condemned the book, and prosecuted the writer, who fled to Switzerland, where he received so many insults on account of his principles, that he returned to Paris, and on the invitation of Mr. Hume went to London in 1766, where he found a quiet asylum during a short period; but, having quarrelled with his friend, he went back to France, and sometimes appeared in the Armenian dress. He was of a restless, proud, and fretful disposition, imagining that there was a conspiracy of men of letters against him, and that all mankind were his enemies. His works have been published in twenty-two volumes by Lefevre. Byron, whose mental character much resembled that of Rousseau, thus finely describes him in "Childe Harold:"—

"His life was one long war with self-sought foes,
Or friends by himself banish'd; for his mind
Had grown suspicion's sanctuary, and chose
For its own cruel sacrifice, the kind,
'Gainst whom he raged with fury strange and blind.
But he was phrenzied—wherefore, who may know?
Since cause might be which skill could never find;
But he was phrenzied, by disease or woe,
To that worst pitch of all which wears a reasoning show.

"For then he was inspired, and from him came,
As from the Pythian mystic cave of yore,
Those oracles which set the world in flame,
Nor ceased to burn till kingdoms were no more."

D. at Geneva, 1712; D. near Chantilly, 1778.

ROUSSELAR, roos'-se-lar, a town of the Netherlands, in East Flanders. Pop. 3,100.

ROUSSILLON, roos-see'-yuwng, a town of France, in the department of the Isère, 12 miles from Vienne. Pop. 1,600.—Also an old province of France, now embraced in the department of the Pyrénées Orientales.

ROVEREDO, rov-a-rai'-do, a town of Austria, in the Tyrol, on the Lens, 12 miles from Trent. It has an English conventual establishment, a seminary, and a public library. Manf. Tobacco and leather. Pop. 8,000.

ROVIGNO, ro-veen'-yo, a town of Austrian Illyria, on the coast of Istria, built on a rock which projects into the sea, und forms two good harbours, 40 miles from Trieste. Manf. Sail-cloth, and it has an extensive tunny fishery. Pop. 11,000.

ROVIGO, ro-ve'-go, a town of Austrian Italy, Lombardy, capital of a delegation, on a branch of the Adige, 36 miles from Venice. It is surrounded with a wall and moat, and has on the east a fortified castle, several churches, convents, charitable institutions, and an academy of arts. Pop. 10,000.

ROW, ro, a maritime parish of Scotland, on the Gare Loch, in Dumbartonshire. Pop. 4,500.

ROWAN, ro-an', a county of North Carolina, U.S. Area, 332 square miles. Pop. 15,000.

ROWANDIZ, ro'-an-deez, a fortified town of Turkish Kurdistan, 75 miles from Mosul. It has a castle, and is the residence of a bey. Pop. Unascertained.

ROWE, Nicolas, ro, an English dramatic poet, who was educated at Westminster school, after which he, in his 16th year, entered of the Middle Temple, where he was called to the bar, but never distinguished himself in that profession. At the age of 25 he produced his "Ambitious Stepmother," a tragedy, which was so well received as to encourage him to pursue the dramatic career, which he did with increasing reputation. He was appointed under-secretary of state, and, upon the accession of George I., was made poet-laureate, and land-surveyor of the customs in the port of London. Besides his tragedies, he wrote some poems, and translated Lucan's "Pharsalia" and Quillet's "Callipædia" into verse. His remains were interred in Westminster Abbey. B. at Little Beckford, Bedfordshire, 1673; D. 1718.

ROWLEY, ro'-le, a monk of Bristol. (See CHATTERTON.)

ROWLEY, William, an English dramatic writer. He was a comic actor of some reputation in the reign of James I., and was assisted in one of his plays by Decker, Ford, and others; and in another by, it is supposed, Shakspere.

ROXANA, rox-a'-na, the wife of Alexander the Great, was the daughter of a Bactrian prince, and celebrated for her beauty. At the death of Alexander she was pregnant of a son, who was named Alexander the Younger. Cassander put to death both the mother and her son, 312 B.C.

ROXBURGH, William, rox'-bur, an eminent Scotch botanist, was a physician in the service of the East-India Company, and while employed at Samulcottah, introduced pepper, coffee, cinnamon, the bread-fruit tree, &c., to the plantations of the district. In 1793 he became superintendent of the botanic garden at Calcutta. He caused two thousand drawings of the plants he had discovered to be made, and sent them to the Court of Directors. His researches led to the publication of the celebrated "Flora Indica," and "Coromandel Plants," which latter was produced subsequently to his death. D. 1815.

ROXBURGH, a parish and village of Scotland, pleasantly situate on the Teviot, about a mile from Kelso. Pop. of the parish, 1,000.

ROXBURGHSHIRE, sometimes called TEVIOTDALE, a county of Scotland, of a very irregular form, bounded E. and S.E. by Northumberland, S. by Northumberland and Cumberland, S.W. and W. by the counties of Dumfries and Selkirk, and N. and N.W. by Berwickshire and a small portion of Mid-Lothian. Area, 715 square miles. Desc. Diversified, and exhibiting many scenes both beautiful and romantic. The south and west divisions of the county are mountainous, but the east and north are generally flat and fertile. The ridge of hills by which the county is traversed is of considerable elevation, and has mostly sloping sides covered with a green sward to the very top. Rivers. The Tweed, the Teviot, the Gala, the Leader, the Allan, the Eden, the Hermitage, and the Liddal. The Ale and Borthwich are northern branches of the Teviot, which, on the south, is augmented by the Kale, the Oxnam, and the Jed; and nearer to its source it receives the Rule, the Slittridge, and the Allen. Pro. Green crops and wheat. On the hills large numbers of Cheviot sheep are fed. Minerals. Coal, lime, and freestone. Manf. Principally woollen goods. Pop. 52,000. In many parts of this county there are sepulchral tumuli, or cairns, in which stone coffins and urns, containing human bones and ashes, have been found. There are also Druidical circles, or places of worship, and other antiquities.

ROXBURY, rox'-ber-e, the name of several townships in the United States, none of them with a population above 19,000. The largest is 2 miles from Boston.

ROY, Julian le, roi, a celebrated French clock and watch maker, who, from his earliest years, evinced a great aptitude for mechanical pursuits, and in 1713 was admitted into the company of Clockmakers at Paris, where he acquired a high reputation. B. at Tours, 1686; D. at Paris, 1759.

ROY, Peter le, son of the preceding, became watchmaker to the king, and published, "Mémoires pour les Horlogers de Paris," and "Treatise on the Labours of Harrison and Le Roy for the Discovery of the Longitude at Sea." D. 1785.

ROY, Julian David le, another son of Julian, became a member of the National Institute, and attached himself to architecture. He wrote, "On the Ruins of the finest Monuments of Greece;" "On the Construction of Christian Temples;" "Observations on the Edifices of the Ancients."

ROY, Major-General William, an eminent British geodesist, who conducted the first trigonometrical survey of the United Kingdom, which was commenced in 1787. At the same time the national observatories of Paris and Greenwich were connected by means of a series of triangles. An able account of the instruments he used, and of the nature, object, and result of his operations, was published in the Philosophical Transactions. In the same year he transmitted to the Royal Society a paper called "Experiments and Observations made in Britain in order to obtain a Rule for Measuring Heights with the Barometer." He was also the author of a valuable work, entitled "The Military Antiquities of the Romans in Britain," in which he traced the march of Agricola from South into North Britain, and gave a description of the wall of Antoninus Pius, commonly called Grime's Dyke. At the outset of his career he had been employed in surveying and mapping, first the Highland districts, and afterwards the whole of Scotland. At his death he was fellow of the Royal Society, surveyor-general of the courts, deputy quarter-master-general, and major-general of the royal artillery. D. in London, 1790.

ROYSTON, roi'-ston, a market-town of Hertfordshire, and partly also of Cambridgeshire, 12 miles from Cambridge. It has a church, which is the principal remains of an ancient priory, and consists of a nave, chancel, and aisles, with a low tower. In a cave under the market-place is a subterraneous chapel, supposed to be of Saxon origin. Pop. 2,500.

ROYSTON, a parish of the W. Riding of Yorkshire,

4 miles from Barnsley. Pop. 4,100.—It has a station on a branch of the North Midland Railway.

ROYTON, roi'-ton, a township of Lancashire, 4½ miles from Rochdale. Manf. Cotton goods. Pop. 7,000.

RSHEV-VOLODIMIROV, rshev-vo-lod'-i-mi-roc, a town of European Russia, in the government of Tver, on the Volga, 144 miles from Moscow. It contains numerous churches, most of them small; schools, and an hospital. Pop. 16,000.

RUABON, ri(r)-a-bon, a parish of North Wales, in Denbighshire, 5 miles from Wrexham. Pop. 12,000.

RUATAN, roo'-a-tan, an island in the Bay of Honduras, off the N. coast of Central America. Ext. 30 miles long and 8 broad. Pop. 4,000.

RUBENS, Peter Paul, roo'-bens, roo'-bans, a famous painter, and the greatest of the Flemish school. After studying under several of the most eminent of the Flemish artists, he went to Italy, where he greatly improved himself by the study of the works of the best masters, but chiefly Titian and Paul Veronese. He sojourned at Rome, Florence, Mantua, and Genoa, and in 1609 settled at Antwerp, where he gained so great a reputation as to be sent for to Paris to paint the gallery of the palace of Luxembourg. He was afterwards employed by the infanta Isabella and the king of Spain in some important negotiations, which he executed with such credit as to be appointed secretary of the privy council. On going to England as ambassador from the king of Spain, he obtained the favour of Charles I., who conferred on him the honour of knighthood, and made him some valuable presents. While in England, he sketched the design for the ceiling of the banqueting-house at Whitehall. He subsequently returned to Antwerp, where he resided till his death. B. at Cologne, 1577; D. at Antwerp, 1640.

RUBICON, ru'-bi-kon, the ancient name of a small river in the north-east of Italy, noted chiefly as the limit prescribed by the Roman senate to the advancing of Cæsar, when that commander became suspected of aiming at the chief authority. It rises on the borders of Tuscany, and, after a course of 20 miles, falls into the Adriatic, 9 miles from Rimini.

RUBINI, J. B., roo-be'-ne, a celebrated Italian vocalist, who was the son of a professor of music, and was at first engaged as an instrumentalist in the orchestra of the theatre of Romano. He subsequently appeared as a singer at Bergamo, and at Brescia and Florence, but with small success. In 1825 he made his début at Paris, and was received with enthusiasm. His popularity soon afterwards became as great in England and in Italy. His voice was a tenor of the most beautiful and extensive kind, and, as an actor, he displayed much fervour and intelligence. B. at Romano, 1795; D. 1854.

RUBINSK, roo'-binsk, a town of Russia, 52 miles from Jaroslavl. It is a great centre of the internal commerce of the empire. Pop. 4,000.

RUBRUQUIS, William de, roo'-broo-ke, an eminent traveller of the Middle Ages. He was a monk of the Franciscan order, and his real name was Ruysbrock, which, according to the pedantic custom of his time, he changed into the Latinized form. In 1253 he was sent by Louis IX. into Tartary to preach the gospel to the Mongols. After undergoing dreadful fatigues, he and his two companions succeeded in gaining the encampment of Baatu-Khan, upon the banks of the Volga. They next proceeded, under the escort of Baatu-Khan, to Mandchu-Khan, the Tartar emperor. In 1254 he was presented to Mandchu-Khan, at whose court he found ambassadors from Persia, India, and Turkey. He was subsequently sent back to the court of Baatu, his journey occupying four months and ten days; during which he was but one day off his horse. He finally returned through Armenia, Persia, and Asia Minor, to Tripoli in Syria, after an absence of two years and six months. It is doubtful whether he was afterwards allowed to leave Syria, where he was ordered to take up his residence in a monastery, by the superior of his order. An account of his travels was transmitted to King Louis, at Paris. B. at Brabant, about 1230; D. subsequently to 1293.

RUDDIMAN, Thomas, rud'-di-man, a Scotch schoolmaster and printer, who was, during nearly fifty years, keeper of the advocates' library at Edinburgh. He completed the "Diplomata et Numismata Scotiæ," to which he wrote an excellent preface. He also published "Institutions of Latin Grammar," and some other works. B. at Raggel, Banff, Scotland, 1674; D. at Edinburgh, 1757.

RUDGELEY, or RUGELEY, ruje'-le, a well-built market-town of Staffordshire, near the Trent, here crossed by an aqueduct of the Trunk Canal, 8 miles from Stafford. Manf. Felt, hats, and chemicals. Pop. 4,200. It has a station on the Trent Valley branch of the London and North-Western Railway.

RUDOLPH I. of Hapsburg, ru'-dolf, the founder of the reigning house of Austria, and emperor of Germany, surnamed the "Clement," was elected in 1273. He defeated Ottocar, king of Bohemia, who did him homage; but, afterwards renewing the war, Ottocar lost his kingdom and his life. B. about 1218; D. 1291.

RUDOLPH II., son of the emperor Maximilian II., became king of Hungary in 1572; of Bohemia in 1575; was elected king of the Romans the same year; and, in 1576, ascended the imperial throne. His reign was unfortunate; the Turks ravaged his territories; and his brother Matthias having revolted against him, obtained the kingdoms of Hungary and Bohemia. Rudolph was, however, a patron of science, and had some skill in astronomy. B. 1552; D. 1612. (See Germany, Adolphus of Nassau, Albert I., Albert II., Frederick III., Maximilian I., Charles V., Ferdinand I., Maximilian II., Matthias, Ferdinand II., Ferdinand III., Leopold I., Joseph I., Charles VI., Francis I., Joseph II., Leopold II., Francis II.)

RUDOLSTADT, roo'-dol-stat, a well-built town of Germany, on the Saale, over which is a stone bridge, 18 miles from Weimar. It is inclosed by walls, has a cathedral, library, and picture-gallery. Pop. 6,000.

RUEIL, roo'-ail, a town of France, 5 miles from Paris. Pop. 5,000. It has a station on the railway to St. Germains.

RUFFACH, roof'-fak, a town of France, 27 miles from Bale. Pop. 3,300.

RUFFEC, roof'-fek, a town of France, in the department of the Charente, 25 miles from Angoulême. Pop. 4,000.

RUFINUS, ru-fi'-nus, a father of the Church, who was for some years the most intimate friend of St. Jerome, but, attaching himself to the tenets of Origen, an opposition between them ensued, and they wrote against each other with great asperity. Rufinus retired to Palestine, where he founded a monastery on Mount Olivet, and had numerous followers. He translated into Latin the works of Josephus, and several of the writings of Origen. He also gave a version and continuation of Eusebius, and wrote a "Defence of Origen," "Lives of the Fathers of the Desert," "Explanation of the Creed," and other works. B. at Aquileia, about the middle of the 4th century; D. in Sicily, about 410.

RUFUS, or RUPHUS, ru'-fus, a physician of Ephesus, who gained a great reputation in the reign of Trajan. Of all his works two only are extant. These are,—a work upon anatomy as it was understood in his time, and another upon the diseases of the bladder. Flourished about the commencement of the 2nd century.

RUFUS, William. (See WILLIAM II.)

RUGBY, rug'-be, a parish and an irregularly-built market-town of Warwickshire, on the Avon, 80 miles from London. It has a celebrated public school, brought into high reputation by Dr. Arnold, and little trade beyond what is caused by railway traffic. Pop. 7,000. It has a station on the London and North-Western Railway, and is the terminus of a branch of the Great Western Railway.

RUGEN, roo'-gen, an island in the Baltic, opposite to Stralsund, and separated from Pomerania by a narrow channel about a mile in breadth. Area, 361 square miles. Desc. Fertile and well wooded. Large quantities of corn and numbers of cattle are shipped to Stralsund. Its fisheries are important. Pop. 42,000. Lat. 53° 41′ 12″ N. Lon. 13° 31′ 27″ E.

RUGENDUS, George Philip, roo-gain'-doos, an eminent German battle-painter, who studied in Italy, and was, during several years, a member of the Society of Flemish Painters at Rome. In 1695 he returned to Augsburg, and from the siege of that city, in 1703, he derived valuable opportunities of perfecting himself in the department of art he had chosen. His paintings and etchings of battles and skirmishes were of remarkable excellence. One of his finest works, the "Siege of Augsburg," is contained in a museum in that city. Having lost the use of his right hand, he executed his works with the left during many years. There is a fine picture of the battle of Blenheim by him. B. at Augsburg, 1666; D. at the same city, 1742. His son, Christian Rugendus, was a celebrated engraver, and produced many fine prints after his father's paintings.

RUGENWALDE, roo'-gen-val'-de(r), a town of Prussian Pomerania, on the Wipper, 9 miles from Köslin. Manf. Linens, woollens, and sail-cloth. Pop. 5,000.

RUHNKEN, David, roon'-ken, a learned German critic. He became professor of history, and librarian of Leyden. His Commentaries were written in an elegant Latin style, and he edited a number of the ancient classics. B. in Pomerania, 1723; D. 1798.

RUHRORT, roo'-rort, a town of Rhenish Prussia, 16 miles from Dusseldorf. Manf. Cotton goods, and it has a transit trade. Pop. 3,800.

RULSK, or RYLSK, rilsk, a town of Russia, in the government of Koursk, and 62 miles from the town of that name. It has many churches, several schools, and two annual fairs. Pop. 6,000.

RUM, rum, an island of the Hebrides. Ext. 9 miles long and from 5 to 7 broad. Pop. 170.

RUMBOWE, room'-bo, an inland state of the Malay peninsula. Area, 400 square miles. Pop, 10,000. Lat. 2° 49' N. Lon. 102° 30' E.

RUMBURG, room'-boorg, a town of Bohemia, 58 miles from Prague. Manf. Woollens, cottons, and linens. Pop. 5,000.

RUMFORD, Benjamin Thompson, Count, rum'-ford, an American natural philosopher and philanthropist, who was at first engaged in mercantile pursuits, afterwards studied medicine, and then became a schoolmaster at Rumford, in New Hampshire. In the contest between England and America he espoused the royal cause, and, having married a wealthy widow, was enabled to raise a regiment of dragoons. He repaired to England in 1784, and was created a knight. Afterwards, proceeding to Bavaria, he obtained a distinguished position in the service of that state, where he was engaged in several schemes of social amelioration, and was created a lieutenant-general and a count, taking his title from Rumford, now Concord, in the United States. About 1797 he returned to England, where he distinguished himself by his experiments in the science of natural philosophy, and in assisting to found the Royal Institution. In 1802 he took up his residence at the French capital, where he married his second wife, the widow of the celebrated chemist Lavoisier. After being separated from this lady, he fixed his residence near Paris, and remained there until his death. In Bavaria and in England he projected many important improvements in social economy, accounts of which are contained in his "Essays, Political, Economical, and Philosophical." His projects for relieving the condition of the poor were as sound as they were benevolent. As a philosopher his fame partly rests upon his papers on natural philosophy and mechanics, contributed to the Transactions of the Royal Society. B. at Woburn, Massachusetts, 1752; D. near Paris, 1814.

RUNCORN, run'-korn, a township and parish of Cheshire, 4 miles from Frodsham. In the vicinity of the town are valuable stone-quarries. Pop. 16,000. It has a station on the London and North-Western Railway.

RUNGPOOR, roong-poor', the capital of a district of the same name, in Bengal, on the Goggot river, 125 miles from Moorshedabad. Pop. Unascertained.—The DISTRICT has an area of 4,130 square miles and a population of 2,580,000. It is watered by the Brahmapootra, and produces indigo, wheat, silk, tobacco, cocoa-nuts, and bamboos.

RUNJEET SINGH, roon'-jeet sing, the founder of the Sikh empire. He was the son of a military chieftain, and at the age of 17 displayed his ambitious and warlike instincts by making inroads upon the territories of his weaker and more effeminate neighbours. In 1799 he obtained the grant of the province of Lahore from the shah of Afghanistan, for military services rendered to him. During the subsequent thirty years his career was that of acquisition by craft, or conquest by force, of large tracts of surrounding territory. By the time he had reached his 29th year he had made himself master of a vast country, and had approached the boundaries of the British possessions. In 1809 he entered into a treaty, by which he engaged "to preserve peace and amity with the British; not to keep more troops on the left bank of the Sutlej than were necessary for preserving his territories;" which engagement he, crafty and prudent as he was courageous, faithfully kept during the remainder of his life. He subsequently made himself ruler of Goojerat, Moultan, Peshawur, and Cashmere, where by stratagem he obtained possession of the celebrated Koh-i-noor diamond, now the property of her Majesty Queen Victoria. Having thus extended his dominions upon every side, he assumed, in 1819, the title of maharajah (king of kings). At a later period he invited the European generals Allard, Ventura, and Court, to organize his army; and it was through these officers that the Sikh soldiery became so highly disciplined. Despite his active and ambitious disposition, he had always indulged in excesses; so that, in his 50th year, he became disabled by bodily ailments, and in the last few years of his life could not even stand without support. At his death he left money, jewels, horses, elephants, &c., to the value of at least £12,000,000. B. at Gugaranwala, west of Lahore, 1780; D. 1839.

RUNNYMEDE, run'-ni-meed, is 5 miles from Windsor, in Surrey. This spot is celebrated for the conference held here in June, 1215, between King John and the barons of England.

RUNNYMEDE.

RUPERT, roo'-pert (Prince Robert Rupert of Bavaria), generally called Prince, was the son of Frederick V., elector palatine, by Elizabeth, daughter of James I. He went to England at the beginning of the civil war, and, embracing the cause of his uncle Charles I., proved himself brave and impetuous, but rash and unskilful as a general of the royalist cavalry. At Marston Moor his want of discretion was the ruin of the king's cause; and, having subsequently surrendered Bristol to the parliamentarians, after a mere show of defence, he was deprived of his command. He was, however, appointed commander of the king's ships, and served upon the Irish coast; but after being blockaded in port, and chased over the sea by Blake, his vessels were nearly all destroyed by the latter, in 1651. In the reign of Charles II. he commanded the fleet, and distinguished himself in several actions with the Dutch. The last years of his life were occupied with philosophical pursuits, and in making experiments in chemistry, engraving, painting, and mechanics. He is stated, but erroneously, to have been the inventor of mezzotint engraving. B. 1619; D. in London, 1682.

PRINCE RUPERT.

RUPPIN, NEW, roop'-pin, a regularly-built town of the Prussian province of Brandenburg, 40 miles from Berlin. It has a church, school, council-house, barracks, and an hospital. Pop. 10,000. Old Ruppin is a little farther to the north. Pop. 2,000.

RUREMONDE. (See ROREMOND.)

RURN ISLANDS, rurn, a group in the Pacific Ocean, discovered by Kotzebue, in 1816. Lat. between 15° 10′ and 15° 30′ S. Lon. 151° E.

RUSH, rush, a county of Indiana, U.S. Area, 442 square miles. Pop. 17,000.—Also the name of several townships, none of them with a population above 2,500.

RUSHWORTH, John, rush'-werth, an industrious English compiler, who was educated first at Oxford, and was afterwards called to the bar. In 1640 he was appointed assistant clerk at the House of Commons, being expert in taking down speeches in shorthand. He was employed by the parliament in several capacities; and his relation, Sir Thomas Fairfax, general of the forces, made him his secretary. He sat for Berwick in Richard Cromwell's parliament. His "Historical Collections of Private Passages of State" have proved of inestimable service to the historians of the Revolution. B. in Northumberland, about 1607; D. in the King's Bench prison, 1690.

RUSKIN, John, rus'-kin, a modern English art critic. He was the son of a merchant in London, where he was accustomed, he says, "to no other prospect than that of the brick walls over the way; and had no brothers, nor sisters, nor companions." From a very early age he was indulged with a travelling life; and to his London birth he attributes the great charm of change and adventure which the beauties of nature had for him, and which a country-bred child would not have felt. He received his education at the university of Oxford; but although his academic career was highly successful, his mind was mainly fixed upon the study of art. Many of the best painters of the English school of landscape-painting engaged his attention; but Turner became his idol. In 1843 he produced the first volume of his remarkable work on art, under the title of "Modern Painters, their Superiority in the Art of Landscape-painting to all the Ancient Masters." The English reading public were startled at the bold paradoxes, the affluence of words, and the poetical feeling of the new writer upon art, who denounced "Claude, Poussin, Salvator Rosa, Cuyp, Berghem, Ruysdael, Hobbima, Teniers (in his landscapes), Paul Potter, Canaletti, and the various Van-somethings and Back-somethings, more especially and malignantly those who have libelled the sea." This remarkable work was completed in five volumes in 1860. Meanwhile the author had produced, in 1849, the "Seven Lamps of Architecture," in which, in a strain of fervid eloquence, he sought to prove that "the attributes of a building were those of action, voice, and beauty," and adorned his bold theories with a multitude of ethical and philosophical dissertations. "The Stones of Venice" followed, comprising three volumes, and containing an impassioned rhapsody upon the architecture, the historical associations, and picturesque beauty of the fallen city. His Lectures upon Architecture and Painting, delivered at Edinburgh, "Notes on the Construction of Sheep-folds," and a pamphlet upon the opening of the Crystal Palace, followed, and were in time succeeded by a brochure upon Pre-Raphaelitism. The band of young and enthusiastic English painters who, in 1849, sought to effect a revolution in the pictorial art of their time, and who styled themselves the "Pre-Raphaelites," were claimed as his followers by Ruskin, who declared that their style was evolved from a study of the principles enunciated in his "Modern Painters;" and it was to make known the beauties and the art-knowledge exhibited in their productions, that he put forth his pamphlet entitled "Pre-Raphaelitism." Not less eloquent in style, or authoritative in tone, were his "Notes on the Principal Pictures exhibited in the Royal Academy," which for several years in succession he published. In 1851 he produced a charming fairy tale, entitled "The King of the Golden River, or, the Black Brothers." While, as a writer, he was almost universally admired for his brilliancy of expression and exposition, there were many dissentients from his views, who declared that he was wayward, paradoxical, and too pretentious. It must, however, be granted, that so much genius and devotion given to one pursuit, entitled him to be honoured among his countrymen. B. in London, 1819.

RUSSA, roos'-sa, a town of Russia, on the Polista, 38 miles from Novgorod. It has several churches, a convent, with tanneries and distilleries. Pop. 6,000.

RUSSELL, rus'-sel, a county in the S.W. part of Virginia, U.S. Area, 1,312 square miles. Pop. 12,000.

RUSSELL, Dr. Alexander, physician to the English factory at Aleppo. In 1755 he published the "Natural History of Aleppo," an excellent work, which has been reprinted and translated into different languages. He returned to England in 1759, and became physician to St. Thomas's Hospital. B. at Edinburgh, about 1700; D. in London, 1768.

RUSSELL, John Scott, a modern Scotch engineer, who studied mathematics and the physical sciences at Edinburgh and Glasgow, where he graduated in 1824. After being engaged in shipbuilding operations at Greenock, and as the head of an engineering establishment at Edinburgh, he went to London in 1844, where he directed his attention to the construction of iron vessels. In 1835 he built a ship upon his newly-discovered "wave principle," which, together with other vessels subsequently constructed upon the same model, was perfectly successful. His greatest achievement, however, was the Great Eastern, a marvel of skill and mechanical science. In one of her voyages across the Atlantic, that vessel attained, for many hours at a time, a speed of sixteen miles; while her passengers were said to have known nothing of that distressing concomitant of marine travelling, sea-sickness. He was a fellow of the Royal Society of London, secretary of the Society of Arts, and was one of the most active members of the Commission of the Great Exhibition of 1851. In 1837 he received from the Royal Society of Edinburgh, of which he was a member, a gold medal, for his proposed improvements in the form of vessels. B. in the Vale of Clyde, 1808.

RUSSELL, Lord John, a modern English statesman, was the youngest son of the sixth duke of Bedford. He received his education at Westminster school and at the university of Edinburgh, where he had the celebrated Dugald Stewart among his teachers. In 1813, he being then in his 21st year, he entered the House of Commons as the representative of the Whig borough of Tavistock, which was at the disposal of his father. The strong ministry of Lords Liverpool and Castlereagh was then in power, and the young politician went into opposition as a member of the Whig party. His conscientiousness and talents, no less than the advantage of his birth, concurred to pave his way to the leadership of the Whigs. From the outset he energetically demanded parliamentary reform, and, after having forced the Tory government to make concession after concession, he, in 1830, entered office as paymaster of the forces in the Whig administration of Earl Grey, an administration which was pledged to carry parliamentary reform. Early in the year 1831 he introduced the Reform Bill to the house, and after a debate of almost unparalleled violence, its provisions were carried, on the second reading, by a majority of one; but upon the subsequent motion for going into committee, it was thrown out by a majority of eight. The ministry of Earl Grey thereupon appealed to the country, to which a most energetic and decided response was given. After the general election, a new parliament met, the Reform Bill was once more introduced, and was passed triumphantly. But now followed the opposition in the Lords. In that assembly it was thrown out by a majority of forty-one. The Commons responded by passing a vote of confidence with a majority of 131. The bill was, however, withdrawn, and underwent some slight modifications before it again made its appearance in the upper chamber, when, still meeting with a determined opposition to his measure, Earl Grey resolved to resign. The duke of Wellington came into power at the head of a Tory administration; but the nation was aroused, and loudly demanded the Reform Bill. The duke was forced to yield; the Whigs resumed the reins of government, and the Reform Bill passed. During this great crisis Lord John Russell conducted himself with much intrepidity, and won the most favourable opinions of the country at large. When the Whig cabinet of Lord Melbourne supplanted the Tory administration of Sir Robert Peel, in 1835, he became home secretary and ministerial leader of the House of Commons. His party remained in office until 1841, and Lord John Russell went into opposition to Sir Robert Peel's Conservative administration till 1846, when, upon the disruption of Sir Robert's party, mainly in consequence of their chief having abolished the corn laws, Lord John Russell succeeded to power. In 1851 his cabinet was weakened by the secession of Lord Palmerston, who, in the following year, defeated his former chief upon the Militia Bill. Lord John Russell thereupon resigned. In the coalition administration of Lord Aberdeen, he held the appointment of foreign secretary during a few months, when, resigning the post to Lord Clarendon, he remained out of office, but as a member of the cabinet. In 1854 he became lord president of the Council, and introduced his new Reform Bill, the consideration of which, however, gave way to the more pressing exigencies of the war in which England, allied with France, was engaged with Russia. As to the conduct of that war he disagreed with Lord Aberdeen, and, accordingly, withdrew from his administration. Upon the fall of the Aberdeen cabinet, in 1858, Lord Palmerston became premier, and Lord John took office under him as colonial secretary; but, at a later date, proceeded to the Vienna conference as British plenipotentiary. In 1855 he resigned, but subsequently rejoined Lord Palmerston as secretary of state for foreign affairs. He has distinguished himself in the world of letters as the author of a biography of his ancestor, Lord William Russell, and by an "Essay on the History of the English Government and Constitution, from the Reign of Henry VII. to the Present Time;" "Don Carlos, a tragedy;" the "Affairs of Europe from the Peace of Utrecht;" and memoirs of Fox and the poet Moore. B. in London, 1792.

RUSSELL, Lord William, an English politician. Having entered the House of Commons, and being zealous for the cause of Protestantism, he sided with the Whigs, and laboured with great earnestness for the exclusion of the duke of York from the succession to the throne. He afterwards appears to have taken part in some meetings at which the possibility of seizing the king's guard, and inciting the people to a general rising, were discussed; but there is no proof that he consented to either proposal. This scheme, which was called "the Rye-House Plot," having been discovered by his political opponents, he and other members of the Whig party, including Essex and Algernon Sidney, were brought to trial upon the charge of conspiring to attack the king as he returned from the races at Newmarket, and to place the duke of Monmouth upon the throne. He was condemned upon the most insufficient and contradictory evidence, and beheaded. His excellent wife, Lady Rachel Russell, attended him during his trial, and acted as his secretary. This admirable woman remained a widow during forty subsequent years, always mourning her husband's death. B. 1639; beheaded 1683.

RUSSELL, William Howard, a modern English littérateur, who received his education at the university of Dublin. In 1842 he repaired to London to seek employment as reporter for the daily press; but not meeting with success, he entered of the university of Cambridge, and supported himself by furnishing contributions to various periodicals. In 1845 he was engaged by the Times newspaper to attend and furnish a description of the monster meetings at that time taking place in Ireland. He next joined the staff of the Daily News, and afterwards that of the Morning Chronicle. He was, however, re-engaged by the Times in 1847, and was employed in making reports of various public events until the outbreak of the Russian war, when he was selected to proceed to the Crimea, and supply that journal with descriptions of the military operations. The result is well known. His brilliant and picturesque pen furnished the public with the most graphic accounts of what took place in camp, or in the field, while his quick-sightedness and fearless honesty led him to expose the defective arrangements, and the incompetence or inertness of those in command. In brief, he was a prime mover of that inquiry which resulted in improving the condition of the British army before Sebastopol. His valuable contributions were afterwards reprinted in two volumes. In 1856 he became LL.D. of the university of Dublin, and subsequently took the management of the Naval and Military Gazette. B. in Dublin, 1821.

RUSSIA, rus'-she-a, an empire which, in point of superficial extent, is the largest in the world, and stretches all along the north of the eastern hemisphere, from the Baltic in the west, to the Pacific in the east. But, according to the Almanach de Gotha, the superficial extent of the Russian empire in Europe is 96,411 geographical miles, in Asia 239,556 miles, in America 17,500 miles; making a gross total superficies of 353,467 geographical square miles. From north to south, its extent, though less, is still great, being from the 39th to the 70th, and in some parts to the 76th degree of N. lat., and presenting an average breadth of nearly 1,506 miles. Area. This is estimated at 7,612,874 square miles. Political Divisions. These consist of 51 provinces: Great Russia in the N. and centre, containing 19; Little Russia in the S.W., 4; the Baltic provinces, 5; S. or New Russia, 5; W. or Polish Russia, 8; Poland, 1; E. Russia, 9; comprising the former kingdoms of Kasan and Astrakhan. Seas, Gulfs, and Straits. The Baltic, the Arctic, the White, the Putrid, the Black, and the Caspian seas; the gulfs of Bothnia, Finland, Riga, Petchora, Kara, and Perekop; the straits of Yenikale and Vaigatz. Peninsulas. The Crimea. Islands. The principal are Nova Zembla, Spitzbergen, Vaigatz, Aland, and Oesel. Gen. Desc. European Russia is, in general, a level country, the only mountains of magnitude being those of Russian Lapland in the north, and of the Crimea in the south. A very different aspect is presented by the Oural mountains, which form part of the boundary between Europe and Asia, and stretch, under different denominations, from the Caspian in the south, to Nova Zembla in the north. Their elevation is from 6,000 to 7,000 feet. The northern parts of European Russia are too bleak for tillage, and the inhabitants live chiefly by hunting and fishing. Another region, almost equally bleak, is the north-west division, containing Finland and the adjacent country to the east. The country to the south of St. Petersburg, comprising the long range of the Valdai hills, has a more congenial climate. The south-west division of European Russia extends towards the Euxine, and is watered by the Dnieper and the Don. The south-east region, formed of the immense plains which are traversed by the Wolga in the lower part of its course, has a soil less fertile than might be supposed from its climate, being, in many parts, rendered unfit for vegetation by strong saline impregnations. Of these divisions, the warmest climate is that of the Crimea; but the great natural feature of European Russia is its steppes, which are vast plains, mostly of sand, and with little wood except stunted birches. Climate. Cold. In the N., winter is nine months long, and everywhere it is severe, with the exception of the Crimea. Corn crops cannot be at all depended on above 60°, nor is it till at or near lat. 50° that the fruits of temperate climates are generally raised. On the other hand, the summer heats are much greater than under the same parallels in the west of Europe. Rivers. The principal are the Wolga or Volga, the Oka, Kama, Oural, and Terek; the Dnieper, the Dniester, and Boug; the Don, the Dwina, the Duna, the Niemen, the Neva, the Volchov, the Msta, and the Petschora, all waters of considerable magnitude, and all navigable, in consequence of the general flatness of the country. The Volga is the largest river of Europe, and has a length of upwards of 2,000 miles, and is navigable almost to its source. The currents of all the Russian rivers are slow, therefore well adapted for commercial intercourse. Lakes. Russia does not abound in lakes, except in its north-west angle, where there are the great lakes of Ladoga and Onega, with others smaller. Marshes are more frequent. Most of the lakes in the N.W. have their waters discharged by the river Neva into the Gulf of Finland. Zoology. Goats are found in many provinces; and in the south the export of their skins forms a branch of commerce, being covered with a kind of silky hair, adapted to the manufacture of shawls. Hunting and fishing occupy a considerable proportion of the inhabitants of particular districts. The most profitable objects of chase are the beaver, the ermine, the martin, the musk deer, and the musk rat. Among the other wild animals are the chamois, the antelope, the elk, the wild goat, the reindeer, the bear, and sable. The polar bear and reindeer are found only in the N. Also wild sheep and boars, and wildfowl, especially the goose and the eider duck. Large quantities of feathers are annually exported. Forests. Extensive; occupying more than a third of the surface. Pro. Agriculture is in general in a very backward state. Rye, barley, and oats, are the principal grains of the northern provinces, wheat being cultivated only in the southern. Potatoes are found in the coldest districts. Hemp and flax are adapted to a great part of the empire. Among the products of the south are tobacco and maize, the latter chiefly in the Crimea. Grazing is a natural occupation in almost every province, and sheep and oxen are reared in immense numbers on the steppes. Not one-sixth of Russia is yet in cultivation. The rearing of bees is greatly attended to, it being not unusual for individuals to have as many as 100 hives in their gardens and 1,000 in the forest. Minerals. Iron, copper, salt, and marble. The most extensive mines are in the elevated region of the Oural and other mountains, which form the boundary between Europe and Asia; others, however, are less remote. Salt is found in great abundance in the S.E. Manf. The principal are linen, woollen, hardware, leather, soap, oil, potash, and mats. Most of the yarn employed in the cotton manufacture is imported from England. As to hardware, Tula, to the south of Moscow, is the Sheffield of Russia. Of woollens, the coarser qualities are made in various parts, the finer almost solely at Jamburg, in the province of St. Petersburg. Moscow contains some silk-works, and, along with Petersburg, the chief manufactures of the empire. Exp. The principal are hemp, flax, seeds, leather, tallow, potash, wax, soap, timber, pitch, tar, train-oil, linen, ropes, thread, peltry, and iron in bars. Imp. Sugar, coffee, cotton, and other colonial goods; superfine woollens, cotton cloths, silks, dye-stuffs, wine, and brandy. Inhabitants. The race is Sclavonic. In Finland and the provinces S. of the Gulf of Bothnia, the inhabitants are of Finnish extraction. The manners of the people are, in general,

Russia

Russia in America

far from cleanly. Drinking is a very common vice among them. Gambling is also prevalent. The nobility are the owners of the land: they live in the most sumptuous style, and support a very numerous establishment of servants. The Russian peasantry are in a very abject condition; and, morally speaking, the nobles are ignorant, proud, sensual, and generally devoid of principle. The lower orders are equally coarse in their appetites, and, in many situations, equally open to charges of deceit and falsehood. Rel. The established religion is that of the Greek church, with a free toleration, however, of all sects, even Mahometans, since the beginning of the 18th century. The superstition prevalent, however, is very great. According to the Almanach de Gotha for 1860, the total number of dissenters or schismatics in Russia is 9,344,000; including 2,750,000 Romanists, 14,000 Armenians, 380,000 "United Greeks," 2,000,000 Lutherans, 2,750,000 Mahomedans, 1,250,000 Jews, and 200,000 Buddhists. Education. Very deficient, but improving. Army, 600,000. The total force of the regular army (cavalry, infantry, and artillery) consists of 577,859 men; and there are also the irregular troops of Cossacks. Navy. The third in Europe. The fleet, in 1857, consisted of 85 sailing ships and 73 steamers; the former including 12 liners, 7 frigates, 7 corvettes, 7 brigs, and 11 schooners; the latter, 7 screw vessels, 11 screw frigates, and 12 screw corvettes. This is exclusive of the corps of artillery, pilots, and engineers of the fleet. Since 1857, however, according to the Almanach de Gotha, the fleet has been very considerably "developed." Rev. £18,000,000. Gov. An absolute monarchy. The sovereign is called emperor or czar, and, in official documents, is styled autocrat. Each of the great provinces has a civil and military governor. The former has a provincial council, a court of justice for civil, and another for criminal offences; a court also for financial matters, and another for petty questions. Each circle or division of a province has a court of justice of the second rank, exclusive of local jurisdictions, such as those of the magistrates in towns, and of the nobles or petty courts in the country. Pop. 79,000,000.—Soon after the war in the Crimea, a general census of the population was begun throughout the empire; and the following is the result. The number of females exceeds that of males by 1,750,000. The lower orders, serfs, petty traders, and artisans, form a total of 53,500,000; the nobles and the higher guilds of traders about 1,000,000. The nobles still possess 21,000,000 of serfs. The population of Siberia, including the wandering tribes of Kasan, Astrakhan, and Orenburg, is 4,000,000. Lat. between 38° 20′ and 71° 24′ N. Lon. from 190° E. to 167° 59′ W. The history of Russia, previous to the three last centuries, is obscure and uncertain. In 1682, Peter the Great ascended the throne, and laid the first foundation of its greatness. At his death, in 1725, he was succeeded by his wife, Catherine I., who reigned only two years, and her son, Peter II., reigned only three. Anne, a niece of Peter, came to the throne in 1730, and reigned until 1740. Ivan III., a child, bore the name of sovereign hardly two years; but the reign of Elizabeth, daughter of Peter I., who came to the throne in 1742, lasted 20 years, and proved a period of considerable splendour. Peter III., a great admirer of Frederick II., succeeded, but lost both his throne and his life in the first year of his reign. From that time the imperial power was vested in his widow, Catherine II.; under whose reign Russia was greatly aggrandised. She died in the end of 1796, leaving her throne to her son, the feeble and vacillating Paul I., who interfered in the affairs of Europe as an enemy of France; and, under Suwarrow, the Russian arms gained great fame. Paul, however, owing to his intolerable tyranny, was soon murdered; and his son Alexander succeeded him. On his death, the emperor Nicholas established himself permanently on the throne till 1855, when he was succeeded by the present emperor, Alexander II.

RUSSIA IN ASIA comprises Siberia and the whole of N. Asia E. of the principal crest of the Oural mountains and the region of the Caucasus, embracing the countries between the Black and the Caspian seas.

RUSSIA IN AMERICA comprises the whole of the continent of N.-W. America W. of lon. 141° W., and a strip on the coast, extending S. to lat. 55°. It embraces several island groups.

RUSSIA, RED, formerly an independent duchy, which belonged to Poland after 1396.

RUSSIA, WHITE, once a part of Lithuania, now forming the governments of Smolensk, Mohilev, and Vitepsk.

RUSSIAN POLAND comprises the kingdom of Poland and several other governments besides.

RUSSIAN TARTARY comprises the E. part of European and the W. part of Asiatic Russia.

RUSTSCHUK, rus'-tchuk, a fortified town of European Turkey, in Bulgaria, at the influx of the Cara Lom into the Danube, 40 miles from Nicopolis. It has a castle of considerable strength, with several mosques, baths, and other public buildings. Manf. Cotton, silk, linen, woollen, and tobacco. Pop. 24,000.

RUTH, ruth, a Moabitish woman, who married first Mahalon, son of Elimelech and Naomi, and afterwards Boaz, by whom she had Obed, the father of Jesse and grandfather of David. Her history forms a distinct and beautiful book in the sacred canon. It is supposed to have been written by Samuel.

RUTHERFORD, ruth'-er-ford, the name of two counties in the United States.—1. In North Carolina. Area, 859 square miles. Pop. 14,000.—2. In West Tennessee. Area, 431 square miles. Pop. 30,000.

RUTHERFORTH, Thomas, ruth'-er-forth, an English divine, who became fellow of St. John's College, Cambridge, and regius professor of divinity in the same university. He wrote a "System of Natural Philosophy," "Institutes of Natural Law," and other works. B. in Cambridgeshire, 1712; D. 1771.

RUTHERGLEN, or RUGLEN, ru'-ther-glen, a parish and royal burgh of Scotland, in Lanarkshire, 2½ miles above Glasgow. It was erected into a royal burgh by King David I. in the 12th century. It now consists of one principal street, nearly half a mile in length and upwards of 100 feet in breadth. It was noted for its ancient castle, which is now demolished. The principal industry consists of weaving and dyeing. Pop. 7,000.

RUTHIN, rith'-in, an ancient market-town of North Wales, in Denbighshire, 7 miles from Denbigh. It has a church, townhall, gaol, and various schools. Pop. 3,500.

RUTIGLIANO, roo'-tcel-ye-a'-no, a town of Italy, in Naples, 7 miles from Conversano. Pop. 4,300.

RUTILIUS, Numatianus Claudius, a Latin poet, who made a voyage from Rome to Gaul, and wrote an account of his progress in an Itinerary, in elegiac verse. Flourished at the commencement of the 5th century.

RUTILIUS-RUFUS, Publius, ru-til'-i-us, consul of Rome, 150 B.C. His love of justice gave such offence to some of the Roman knights, that they accused him of peculation, and he was banished. Upon his passage from Italy to Asia, all the cities he passed through showed him the greatest honours, so that his progress had more the appearance of a triumph than an exile. Sylla subsequently offered to recall him to Rome, but he refused, and died in exile at Smyrna.

RUTLAND, rut'-land, an inland county of England, bounded on the W. by Leicestershire, on the N. and E. by Lincolnshire, and on the S.E. and E. by Northamptonshire. Area, 152 square miles. Desc. The face of the country is, generally speaking, very beautiful, especially where well timbered, being much diversified by small and gently-rising hills, running E. and W., with valleys of about half a mile in width intersecting them; so that fresh views occur at the distance of every few miles. Rivers. The Welland and the Guash or Wash, the Chater, and the Little Eye. The climate has always been considered as mild, healthy, and pleasant. Pro. The soil is very various, but, on the whole, fertile. The usual crops are cultivated. Minerals. Limestone is found in various parts. Chalybeate springs also abound. Pop. 23,000.

RUTLAND, a small island near the W. coast of Ireland, in the county of Donegal.

RUTLAND, a county on the W. side of Vermont, U.S. Area, 948 square miles. Pop. 35,000. Also the name of several townships, none of them with a population above 4,000.

RUTNAGHERRY, root'-na-ger-re, a collectorate of India, in the presidency of Bombay. Area, 3,964 square miles. Pop. 670,000. Lat. between 15° 44′ and 18° 6′ N. Lon. between 73° 6′ and 73° 58′ E.

RUTTUNPOOR, root-toon-poor', a town of Hindostan, in the province of Gundwaneh. Pop. Unascertained. Lat. 22° 16′ N. Lon. 82° 35′ E.

RUVO, roo'-vo, a town of Naples, in the province of Bari, and 20 miles from the town of that name. Pop. 6,500.

RUYSDEKK, rois'-baik, a village of Belgium, 3½ miles from Brussels. Pop. 1,800. It has a station on the Paris and Brussels Railway.

RUYSCH, Frederic, roish, an eminent Dutch anatomist, who studied at Leyden, and after taking his doctor's degree, settled at Amsterdam. When the czar, Peter the Great, visited that city, he became his pupil, and purchased his collection of natural curiosities and preparations. Ruysch was a member of the Royal Society of London, the Academy of Sciences at Paris, and other learned bodies. He produced some anatomical works. B. at the Hague, 1638; D. 1731.

RUYSDAEL, or RUYSDAAL, Jacob rois'-dail, an eminent Dutch landscape-painter. His pictures, which exhibit nature with great force and clearness, are very valuable. B. at Haerlem, 1635; D. at the same place, 1681.

RUYSSELEDE, rois'-se-larde, a town of Belgium, 14 miles from Bruges. Pop. 6,000.

RUYTER, Michael Adrian, roo'-ter, roi'-ter, a brave Dutch admiral, who went to sea at an early age, and after passing through the different ranks of the service, became an admiral in 1641. Not long afterwards, he defeated the corsairs on the coast of Barbary. In 1653 he was second in command under Van Tromp, whom he ably supported against the English in three engagements. In 1659 he was sent to succour the king of Denmark against the Swedes, and for his services was ennobled by that monarch. After many gallant actions, he was killed on the coast of Sicily, in a desperate engagement with the French, in 1676. B. at Flessingen, 1607.

RYAN LOCH, ri'-an, a bay of Scotland, commencing at the entrance of the Firth of Clyde, nearly opposite the Mull of Kintyre. It forms a safe and commodious harbour, and has a breadth of above 2 miles.

RYCAUT. (See RICAUT, Sir Paul.)

RYDE, ride, a maritime town and watering-place on the coast of the Isle of Wight, 5 miles from Portsmouth. It is built on an acclivity, and has assembly-rooms, a modern Gothic church, and a theatre. Pop. 7,200.

RYE, ri, a regular and well-built market-town and borough of Sussex, and one of the Cinque ports, at the mouth of the Rother, 10 miles from Hastings. The parish church is reckoned one of the largest in the kingdom. It has, besides, a castle, now used as a gaol; market-house, town-hall, various schools, a public library, and a theatre. The herring and mackerel fisheries are prosecuted to a great extent, and the trawling for flat fish. Pop. 8,600.

RYEGATE. (See REIGATE.)

RYLAND, William Wynne, ri'-land, an eminent English engraver, who became an apprentice to a French engraver settled in London, and afterwards went abroad, and greatly improved himself in France and Italy. After his return to his native country, he introduced the art of engraving copper-plates so as to yield an impression resembling drawings in chalk. He was appointed engraver to George III., and had a salary of £200 a year conferred on him. Some of his first productions were a whole-length figure of the king, another of the queen, and one of Lord Bute. In 1782 he was found guilty of having committed a forgery on the East-India Company, for which he was tried and executed. B. in London, 1732; hanged, 1783.

RYLSK. (See RULSK.)

RYMER, Thomas, ri'-mer, a learned English antiquary and critic. He became historiographer royal in 1692, and formed an immense collection of public acts, treaties, conventions, and state letters, under the title of "Fœdera," published in London in 20 volumes folio. He was also the author of a "View of the Tragedies of the Last Age," in which he made an absurd attack upon Shakspere. B. in Yorkshire, 1639; D. in London, 1714.

RYSBRAECK, Peter, rise'-braik, an eminent Dutch landscape-painter, who was an imitator of Poussin, and became director of the academy of Antwerp. His figures and trees are well designed, and he painted expeditiously and with spirit. B. at Antwerp, 1657; D. at that city, 1716.

RYSBRAECK, Michael, an eminent Flemish sculptor, and son of the preceding, who had him educated under the sculptor Michael Vander Vorst. He repaired to London in 1720, and became extensively employed. He was a fine artist, and during his long residence in the English capital, greatly contributed to spread a taste for sculpture throughout the kingdom by his admirable works. His most celebrated works were the equestrian statue of William III., in Soho Square; the monument to Sir Isaac Newton, in Westminster Abbey; the statue of George II., for Greenwich Hospital; the monument to the duke and duchess of Marlborough, in the chapel at Blenheim; and those to Milton, Ben Jonson, Sir Godfrey Kneller, Gay, and Rowe, in Westminster Abbey. B. at Antwerp, 1693; D. in London, 1770.

RYSWYK, rise'-wik, rise'-vike, a town of the Netherlands, 2 miles from the Hague. Pop. 2,300. In 1697 a peace was here concluded between France on the one side, and Germany, England, Spain, and Holland, on the other. A monument commemorates the event.

RYTON, ri'-ton, the name of several parishes in England, none of them with a population above 4,000.

RZESZOW, rzes'-zow, a town of Austrian Poland, on the Wisloka, 43 miles from Tarnov. Manf. Woollen and linen goods. Pop. 8,000.

S.

SA DE MIRANDA, Francis, sa dai me-ran'-da, a Portuguese poet, whose works consist of satires, comedies, and pastorals. B. at Coimbra, 1595; D. 1658.

SAADE, sa-ad, a town of Arabia, in the mountainous district of Yemen, 368 miles from Mocha.

SAAD-EDDEEN, Mohammed, sa'-ad ed-deen', the most eminent of the Turkish historians, who was professor in the college attached to the mosque of St. Sophia, and subsequently became tutor to Mourad, the son of Selim II. When Mourad succeeded to the throne, in 1574, he was taken into the most intimate confidence, and, in 1598, became mufti, the highest ecclesiastical dignity in the state. His work is entitled "Tadj-al-Towarikh," or "Crown of Histories," and contains an account of the Turkish empire, from its establishment by Othman, in 1299, to the death of Selim I., in 1520. Of it Sir W. Jones says, that "for the beauty of its composition and the richness of its matter, it may be compared with the first historical pieces in the languages of Europe." He also produced a history of Selim I. This work has never been printed in its original condition, but an Italian translation was published in 1652. B. early in the 16th century; D. at Constantinople, 1599.

SAADI, sa'-a-de, an illustrious Persian poet, who, having quitted his native country when it was invaded by the Turks, proceeded to Palestine, where he was taken prisoner by the Crusaders, and compelled to labour on the fortifications of Tripoli. He was afterwards ransomed by a merchant of Aleppo, whose daughter he espoused with a dowry of a hundred pieces of gold. But the lady being of a capricious temper, the poet was unhappy in his marriage. "Once," he says, "she reproached me, crying, 'Art thou not he whom my father redeemed from captivity amongst the Franks for ten dinars?' I answered 'Yes, he ransomed me for ten dinars, and delivered me to you for a hundred.'" The poet spent thirty years as a traveller, or as a soldier; as many more were occupied in religious solitude; while the closing period of his life was devoted to the composition of his works. His works, which are highly esteemed, principally consist of "Gulistan; or, the Garden of Flowers," a collection of stories in prose, but interpolated with original or selected verses; "The Bostan, or Garden of Fruits," which is all in verse; and a collection of fragments and essays. The "Gulistan" has been translated into English by Gladwin, and published in 1808, and another edition was produced by Eastwick in 1852. B. at Shiraz, 1176; D. 1291.

SAALE, sa'-al, the name of three small rivers in Germany.

SAALFELD, sa'-al-feeld, a town of Germany, in the duchy of Saxe-Meiningen, 50 miles from Altenburg. Pop. 4,500.—Here, in 1806, Prince Louis Frederick of Prussia was defeated and killed by the French.

SAAR, sa-ar, a river of France and Prussia.

SAARBRUCK, sa-ar-brook, a town of the Prussian province of the Lower Rhine, on the Saar, 18 miles from Luxemburg. Manf. Woollen goods. Pop. 9,300. It has communication with Metz by railway.

SAAR-LOUIS, sa'-ar-loo'-is, a fortified town of the Prussian province of the Lower Rhine, 30 miles from Treves. It forms an important border fortress. Manf. Firearms. In the neighbourhood are both lead and iron mines. Pop. 7,000. Here Marshal Ney was born.

SAAR UNION, sa'-ar oo'-ne-awng, a town of France, in the department of the Lower Rhine, on the Saar, 45 miles from Nancy. Pop. 4,300.

SAATZ, sa'-atz, a town of Bohemia, on the Eger, 39 miles from Prague. It has a gymnasium, and a trade in wine and hops. Pop. 6,000.

SAAVEDRA, Miguel Cervantes de. (See CERVANTES.)

SABA, sa'-ba, an island in the West Indies, belonging to the Dutch, 15 miles from St. Eustatius, of which it is a dependency. Area, 15 square miles. Pop. about 2,000.

SABADELL, sa'-ba-del, a town of Spain, 10 miles from Barcelona. Manf. Woollens, muslins, and paper. Pop. 5,000.

SABARA, sa-ba'-ra, a city of Brazil, in the province of Minas Geraes, 40 miles from Ouro Preto. Pop. 8,000.

SABAS, sa'-bas, the founder of a sect called Messalians, who maintained that the Gospel was to be followed literally. In conformity with this rule, Sabas made himself a eunuch. This sect appeared about 310, but became extinct at the close of that century. There was a saint of this name who was superior of the monasteries in Palestine, and D. 531.

SABATEI-SEVI, sa-ba-te'-i se'-vi, a Jewish impostor, who declared himself to be the Messiah, and was acknowledged by several rabbins and other Jews, who sent letters to their dispersed brethren in all parts of the world, announcing the great event. Sabatei, however, was arrested at Constantinople, and sent to prison, whither the misguided Jews flocked in crowds, and bribed the governor by large presents for the privilege of kissing his chains. The sultan, Mahomet, having ordered him to be brought into his presence, demanded of him a miracle as a proof of his mission, which Sabatei declined to perform. Mahomet then gave him his choice, either to turn Mussulman or be put to death. The pretended prophet accepted the former condition, but was afterwards sent to prison, where he D. 1676. B. at Smyrna, 1625.

SABBATHIER, Peter, sab-ba'-te-ai, a Benedictine of St. Maur, who spent twenty years in editing a collection of the Latin versions of the Bible, which was published in 1743, under the title of "Bibliorum Sacrorum Latinæ Versiones antiquæ." B. at Poitiers, 1692; D. at Rheims, 1742.

SABBOE, sab-bö'(r), a town of Norway, 28 miles from Drontheim. It stands on the E. side of a lake which discharges its surplus waters by the Med into Drontheim Fiord.

SABELLIUS, sa-bel'-li-us, the founder of a religious sect called by his name. He maintained that there was no distinction of persons in the Trinity, and his followers became very numerous. The heresy was condemned by the council of Constantinople in 381. Flourished in the 3rd century.

SABINA, Julia, sa-bi'-na, the wife of the emperor Adrian, and celebrated for her private and public virtues. When Adrian found his end approaching, he compelled her to take poison, that she might not survive him, A.D. 138.

SABINUS, Aulus, sa-bi'-nus, a Roman poet, who composed elegant epistles in verse, which are lost. He was the contemporary and friend and imitator of Ovid. Flourished about the commencement of the 1st century.

SABINUS, Flavius, a brother of Vespasian, who was killed by the populace. He was a faithful adherent to the fortunes of Vitellius, and commanded the Roman legions during thirty-five years, and was governor of Rome for twelve.

SABINUS, Julius, a Roman officer, who proclaimed himself emperor at the commencement of the reign of Vespasian. He was soon afterwards defeated in battle, and, to escape from the conqueror, hid himself in a cave with two faithful domestics, and remained unseen during nine successive years. His wife having discovered his retreat, spent her time with him, until her frequent visits to the cave divulged the secret of her husband's concealment. Sabinus was dragged forth, and by Vespasian's order was put to death, although his wife showed him the twins whom she had brought forth in the subterraneous retreat.

SABIONETTA, sa-be-o-net'-ta, a town of Austrian Italy, 19 miles from Mantua. Pop. 7,000.—This place was the capital of a principality presented by Napoleon I. to his sister Pauline.

SABLE, sabl, a town of France, in the department of the Sarthe, at the junction of the rivers Sarthe and Erve, 26 miles from Le Mans. Manf. Gloves, and it has a trade in marble. Pop. 5,400.

SABLE, sai'-bel, an island in the N. Atlantic Ocean, 90 miles from Cape Breton. Lat. 43° 59′ N. Lon. 59° 46′ W.

SABLES D'OLONNE, LES, sabl-do'-lon, a seaport of France, in the department Vendée, 45 miles from Nantes. It has an active pilchard fishery. Pop. 6,000.

SABRAO, or ADENARA, sa'-bra-o, an island of the Asiatic archipelago, separated from Flores by the Strait of Flores. Ext. 40 miles long, with a breadth of 18 at its broadest point. Lat. 8° 17′ S. Lon. 123° E.

SABRES, sabr, a town of France, in the department of the Landes, 20 miles from Mont-de-Marsan. Pop. 2,600.

SACATEPEC, sa-ku-te-pek', a town of Central America, in the state of Guatamala. Pop. 8,600.

SACCATOO, or SAKATU, sak'-ka-too', a town of Central Africa.

SACCHETTI, Francis, sak-ket'-te, an eminent Italian novelist and poet, who was the contemporary of Boccaccio, to whom he was scarcely inferior. He came of a considerable family of Florence, and in 1383 acted as one of the Council of Eight, or magistrates of that republic. He was also chief magistrate of Bibbiena. His novels were printed for the first time in 1724. Flourished in the 14th century.

SACCHI, Andrea, sak'-ke, a celebrated Italian painter, and one of the great luminaries of the Roman school. He received his first instruction in the art from his father, and afterwards became the most skilful of all Albano's pupils. In 1623 he was commissioned to paint a large altar-piece for St. Peter's. He was an enthusiastic admirer of the works of Raffaelle, and being shown a design of his on one occasion, exclaimed, "What! they would make me believe that Raffaelle was a man!—no; he was an angel!" Among his most distinguished pupils were Nicholas Poussin and Carlo Maratta. St. Peter's, and various ecclesiastical edifices at Rome, are in possession of his finest paintings. B. near Rome, 1559; D. 1661.

SACCHINI, Antony Marie Gaspar, sak-ke'-ne, an eminent Italian composer, whose operas are composed in a fine style, and many of the best were executed by him in London; but they are now almost forgotten. B. at Naples, 1735; D. at Paris, 1786.

SACHEVERELL, Henry, sa-shev'-e-rel, a celebrated divine, who was educated at Magdalen College, Oxford, of which he became fellow, and proceeded to the degree of doctor in divinity, in 1709. He translated into English verse part of Virgil's first Georgic in Dryden's "Miscellanies," and Addison addressed to him the dedication to his "Farewell to the Muses;" but what has made his name remarkable was his trial by impeachment for two political sermons, the first preached at Derby, and the second before the lord mayor at St. Paul's, in 1709. In these sermons he held up the Whig party, which was then in power, to ridicule; and preached passive obedience to the regal authority. The trial occupied the public attention in an extraordinary manner; and though the doctor was suspended for three years, Queen Anne, who found his politics much to her taste, presented him, as soon as that period expired, to the valuable living of St. Andrew, Holborn. B. about 1672; D. 1724.

SACHS, Hans, saks, a German poetical writer, whose real name was Loutzdorffer. He embraced the principles of the reformed religion, which he defended in his writings. He had been apprenticed to the trade of a weaver, but, upon the expiration of his term, he commenced wandering over his native country, writing verses, and chanting them in the towns and cities on his way. In 1519 he married, and settled at Nuremberg, where he led a studious and retired life until his demise. He wrote upwards of six thousand different compositions. Göthe, in some portions of "Faust," imitated the manner of Hans Sachs, who is, moreover, eulogized "for the fidelity of colouring with which he exhibits the characters and times which he paints." Only a small portion of his writings are printed in an edition which appeared at Nuremberg in 1579. They are redolent of a native wit and shrewdness, but have little pretensions to be deemed refined and learned compositions. B. at Nuremberg, 1494; D. at the same city, 1578.

SACKET'S HARBOUR, sāk'-ets, a post-village and port of entry in Jefferson county, New York, U.S., at the east end of Lake Ontario. It is one of the best harbours in the state, and is strongly defended by forts and batteries. There are two sets of barracks, capable of accommodating 4,500 men. At the bottom of the harbour is the village. The works in different situations altogether render the place very secure, and capable of resisting a powerful attack. Pop. 2,000.

SACKVILLE, Thomas, Earl of Dorset. (See DORSET, Earl of.)

SACKVILLE, Edward, sāk'-vil, an English statesman, earl of Dorset, and grandson of the first earl. In 1613 he fought a desperate duel in Zealand with Lord Bruce, who was slain. He was one of the principal commanders sent in 1620 to assist Frederick, king of Bohemia, and was at the memorable battle of Prague in 1620. The year following he was sent as ambassador to the court of France. He was in great favour with King Charles, and became knight of the Garter, president of the council, and lord privy seal. B. 1590; D. 1652.

SACKVILLE, Charles, earl of Dorset, an English statesman, who, after concluding his travels, sat in parliament, and in the Dutch war of 1665 served as a volunteer under the duke of York, and the night before the sea engagement in which the enemy were defeated, wrote the famous song commencing "To all ye ladies now on land." He engaged early in the interest of the prince of Orange, and, upon the accession of William III., he was made a member of the privy council, lord chamberlain, and knight of the Garter. He was a patron of men of letters, particularly Prior, and wrote some poetical pieces of merit. B. 1637; D. at Bath, 1706.

SACKVILLE, George, Lord Viscount, was the third son of the first duke of Dorset. In 1737 he obtained a commission in the army, and served at the battles of Dettingen and Fontenoy. He was afterwards with the duke of Cumberland in Scotland, where he contributed to the quelling of the rebellion. In 1758 he was appointed lieutenant-general, and sworn a member of the privy council. In 1759 he went to Germany, where, at the battle of Minden, he commanded the British and Hanoverian horse. In the action he was ordered to charge with his cavalry, but took no notice of the command. He was, in consequence, severely censured, his name was struck out of the list of the privy council, and by court-martial dismissed from the service. On the accession of George III. he was restored to favour, and, in 1769, by the will of Lady Elizabeth Germaine, succeeded to her property; on which occasion he took her name. In 1775 he became secretary of state for the American colonies, and directed the American war, with what result is well known. B. 1716; D. 1785.

SACO, sai'-ko, a post-town and port of entry in York county, Maine, on the Saco, opposite Biddeford, with which it is connected by three bridges. It is a considerable town, favourably situate for trade and manufactures. Pop. 6,000.

SACO, a river rising in New Hampshire, U.S., and, after a course of 100 miles, falling into the Atlantic, below the town of Saco.

SACRAMENT, ST., or COLONIA, sāk'-ra-ment, a city and colony held by the Portuguese, opposite the city of Buenos Ayres, on the shore of the river Plata. It is now of little comparative importance.

SACRAMENTO, säk'-ra-men'-to, a county of the United States, in the centre of California. Area, 1,000 square miles. Pop. 13,000.

SACRAMENTO, a river of the United States, California, rising between the Rocky Mountains and a range running parallel to the coast, and, after a course of 180 miles, falling into the Bay of San Francisco.—Also a CITY in California, 100 miles from San Francisco. Pop. 12,000.

SACRO-BOSCO, Johannes de, sak'-kro bos'-ko, an English mathematician, who was contemporary with Roger Bacon. He wrote treatises in Latin upon arithmetic and the figure of the earth. He was chosen professor of mathematics at the University of Paris, in which city he principally resided. B. in England, at the close of the 12th century; D. at Paris, 1256.

SACY, Antony Isaac Silvester de, sa'-se, an eminent French orientalist. On account of his delicate health, he received his education under a private tutor. At a very early age he became proficient in the Greek and Latin languages, and, becoming acquainted, in his 12th year, with a learned Benedictine monk, he imbibed from that scholar a taste for the eastern tongues. He proceeded to study Hebrew, Arabic, Chaldee, Samaritan, Syriac, and Ethiopic, as well as English, Spanish, German, and Italian. To this vast store of knowledge he added the Persian and Turkish languages, and, in 1780, he being then only in his 23rd year, made some valuable Biblical researches notably in examining a Syriac manuscript of the Fourth Book of Kings, contained in the Bibliothèque Royale. In 1785 he contributed two memoirs to the "Transactions of the Academy of Inscriptions and Belles-Lettres," upon Arabian literature, and was employed to make extracts from the oriental MSS. in the royal library. At the outburst of the French revolution he retired from Paris, and while the storm of republicanism was raging, he employed himself with some profound researches in oriental literature. After the establishment of the imperial government, De Sacy was sent upon a mission to Genoa, the object of which was the examination of the Arabic MSS. preserved in the archives of that city, and in 1806 presented to the Academy a report of his labours. He was soon afterwards appointed professor of the Persian language and literature. Napoleon I. created him a baron of the empire; but, upon the restoration of the Bourbons, he gave his adherence to the new order of things, and was rewarded with the post of member of the Council for Public Instruction and the presidentship of the Asiatic Society of Paris, a learned body which he himself mainly contributed to found. Under the monarchy of Louis Philippe he became keeper of the Oriental manuscripts in the king's library, and perpetual secretary to the Academy of Inscriptions. This distinguished scholar produced, among other important works, an Arabic Grammar, the result of fifteen years' assiduous application; "Biographies of the Persian Poets;" "Principles of General Grammar;" "Chrestomathie Arabe," a selection of extracts in prose and verse from different Arabian authors; the Arabic text of the Fables of Pilpay; and some valuable memoirs upon the antiquities of Persia. At his suggestion, and under his direction, were established the professorships of Hindostanee, Sanskrit, and Chinese, at Paris, as well as the institutions formed for the study of the oriental languages in Russia and Prussia. His last great work was an "Exposition of the Religion of the Druses." B. at Paris, 1758; D. at the same city, 1838.

SADDLEWORTH, sad'-del-werth, a town of the West Riding of Yorkshire, 12 miles from Huddersfield Manf. Principally woollen goods. Pop. 18,000. It has a station on the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway.

SADI. (See SAADI.)

SADLER, Sir Ralph, säd'-ler, an English statesman, who was educated under Thomas Cromwell, earl of Essex, and became master of the royal wardrobe, and afterwards a member of the privy council under Henry VIII., which posts he again filled in the reign of Elizabeth. B. near London, 1507; D. in Hertfordshire, 1587.

SADO, sa-do', an island in the Sea of Japan, lying to the W. of Niphon. Area, estimated at 700 square miles. Fertile and populous.

SADOLETO, James, sad'-o-lai-to, a learned Italian writer. He became secretary to Leo X., who compelled him to accept the bishopric of Carpentras, which he would modestly have declined. Paul III. made him a cardinal, and appointed him legate to the court of France. His works, which are written in correct and beautiful Latin, are, Discourses, Epistles, Expositions of the Psalms and St. Paul's Epistles, and Poems. He was a man of unblemished character and unaffected piety. B. at Modena, 1477; D. at Carpentras, 1547.

SAFFI, saf'-fe, a seaport of Morocco, 106 miles from the town of that name. It has a very fine road, affording safe anchorage in every season, except in winter. It was long the centre of European commerce. Pop. about 12,000.

SAFFRON WALDEN, saf'-fron wal'-den, a market-town and parish of Essex, so named from the great quantities of saffron formerly cultivated in the vicinity. It is 24 miles from Chelmsford, and is irregularly built. The church is a spacious and very elegant pile of English architecture, chiefly of the age of Henry VII. and VIII. It has a considerable trade in malting. Fine yarn and sacks are also made. Pop. 6,000.

SAGALIN. (See AMOOR.)

SAGAN, sa'-gan, a town of Prussian Silesia, on the Bober, 83 miles from Breslau. Manf. Linen and woollen fabrics, sealing-wax and glass wares. Pop. 8,200.—It has a station on the railway from Berlin to Glogau.

SAGE, Alain René Le. (See LE SAGE.)

SAGHALIEN, or SAGALIN, sa-ha'-li-en, called also OKU JESSO, or UPPER JESSO, and by the natives Tchoka, a large peninsula, situate at the eastern extremity of Asia, immediately to the north of the large island of Jesso, or Matsmai. It is separated from the mainland by the gulfs of Tartary and Sagahn. Area. Estimated at 47,500 square miles. Desc. Mountainous; but its interior is little known. Pop. Unascertained. Lat. between 46° and 54° 30′ N. Lon. between 141° 50′ and 144° E.

SAG HARBOUR, sag, a post village and port of Suffolk county, New York, U.S., on the E. end of Long Island, and on the Atlantic. The inhabitants are mostly employed in the whale fishery and coasting trade. Pop. 4,000.

SAGRES, sa'-grais, a small fortified seaport-town of Portugal, 4 miles from Cape St. Vincent. It was founded by Prince Henriquez of Portugal, who here established a school of navigation, and fitted out discovery expeditions.

SAGUENAY, sag'-nai, a large river of Canada, one of the chief tributaries of the St. Lawrence, into which, after a course of 100 miles, it falls, on the west bank, at the town and harbour of Tadousac. Its current is broad, deep, and uncommonly rapid, liable to interruptions from rocks, and it is also of an extraordinary depth. At its discharge, attempts have been made to find the bottom with 500 fathoms of line, but without effect. It is ascended by large ships for 60 miles.

SAGY, sa'-zhe, a parish and market-town of France, in the department Seine-and-Loire. Pop. 3,000.

SAHARA, or the GREAT DESERT, sa-ha'-ra, or za'-ha-ra, an immense tract in Northern and Central Africa, interposed between the states of Barbary and Soudan, or the countries watered by the Niger. It presents, almost throughout, the appearance of a naked burning plain of sand, destitute alike of water or vegetation, with the exception of some spots, which are named oases; and the largest of which are called Gadanes and Tuat. In its greatest length it stretches nearly across the whole of Africa, from the Atlantic to the Nile, forming a space of 45° of longitude, or about 3,000 miles. Its breadth from Barbary to Soudan is not so great, and may be estimated at 15°, or 1,000 miles. It forms thus by much the most extensive desert to be found in any part of the world. Palm-trees grow on its borders, and the principal products of the oases are gums, dates, and salt. Its fauna comprise the camel, the gazelle, and the ostrich. Lat. between 16° and 23° N. Lon. between 17° W. and 23° 10′ E.

SAID, or SAHID, sa'-eed, a name applied to Upper Egypt, comprehending the territory extending along the Nile, from the vicinity of Cairo to the frontier of Nubia. The half of this region is now named Vostaric.

SAIDA, or SEIDA, si'-da, a seaport-town of Syria, built on the site of the ancient Sidon, 18 miles from Beyrout. This is celebrated as the most ancient of the Phœnician cities, preceding even Tyre. Like other Turkish towns, it is now dirty, ill-built, and full of modern ruins. The ground in the neighbourhood, however, is laid out in orchards and gardens, which appear very beautiful at a distance. The magnificent harbour, composed of vast moles stretching out into the sea, is now entirely destroyed. Its trade, however, is still considerable, being the emporium, not only of Damascus, but of the surrounding country. The exports consist of corn, silk, raw and spun cotton, particularly the last. Pop. 7,000. Lat. 33° 25′ N. Lon. 35° 1′ E. Sidon is mentioned in Scripture, and also by Homer. It was a place of consequence even long after the Christian era.

SAIGON, or LOOKNOVE, sai'-gon, a city and river-port of Anam, on the Dong-nai river, 35 miles from the China Sea. Pop. 200,000. Lat. 10° 46′ N. Lon. 106° 45′ E.

SAIMA, sai'-ma, a lake, or rather a succession of lakes, in European Russia, government of Finland, 30 miles from Wiborg. Ext. 145 miles long, with a breadth of 50. —It contains numerous islands.

SAINS, sä, a town of France, in the department of the Aisne, 20 miles from Laon. Pop. 2,100.

SAINT ALBANS, a town of the United States, in Vermont. Pop. 4,000.

SAINT ANDREW ăn'-dru ('a strong man') the Apostle, was born at Bethsaida, in Galilee, and with his brother Peter followed their father's trade of a fisherman till called by our Saviour. He had been the disciple of John the Baptist, whom he left to follow Jesus Christ. He is said to have preached the Gospel in Scythia, and to have been crucified on a cross shaped like the letter X. He is the tutelary saint of Scotland.

SAINT ANDREWS, a parish and seaport city of Scotland, in the county of Fife, situate near the verge of a precipice which overlooks a spacious bay, 40 miles from Edinburgh. Area of parish, 11,000 acres. The harbour is safe and commodious, though the entrance is narrow. The town consists of three principal streets, intersected by a few inconsiderable lanes. The parish church is a spacious structure, 162 feet in length, by 63 in breadth. Here is a lofty monument of white marble, erected to the memory of Archbishop Sharp, who, in 1679, was murdered by a party of Covenanters on Magus Moor, near the western extremity of the parish. A university was instituted in St. Andrews in 1413, by Bishop Wardlaw. It formerly consisted of three colleges,—St. Salvador's, St. Leonard's, and St. Mary's, of which the two former were united in 1748, and the buildings of St. Leonard's were alienated and converted into dwelling-houses. There is an educational institution called the Madras School, which was founded by a Dr. Bell, a native, who bequeathed the handsome sum of £45,000 for the noble purpose of affording free instruction to the poor. St. Andrews has a manufactory of sail-cloth and of golf-balls, 8,000 or 9,000 of which are annually made, and the half of that number exported for the game of golf, which here is much practised. Pop. about 7,000. Lat. 56° 19′ 33″ N. Lon. 2° 50′ W. St. Andrews, though decayed, still possesses some remains of its past consequence. It formerly had a magnificent cathedral, which was 160 years in building, and which was, in 1559, demolished in one day by a mob excited by one of the inspiring sermons of John Knox. It also had a castle founded in 1200, and which, in 1336, was garrisoned by Edward III. of England. Its picturesque ruins serve as a landmark. George Wishart, a preacher of the reformed doctrines, was burnt in 1545, and in 1546, the primate, Cardinal Beaton, was put to death by the Protestants in this city, with which many eminent men have been connected, either by birth, education, or residence.—It is a station on the Edinburgh and Dundee Railway.

SAINT-ARNAUD, Jacques Achille Leroy de, sănt-ar'-no, a French general and marshal of France. He entered the royal guards in his 16th year, and afterwards attained the grade of sub-lieutenant of infantry; but being of an erratic disposition, he quitted the army for the theatre, and during ten years followed the pursuit of a minor actor. After the revolution of 1830, his military predilections were reawakened, and in the following year he again joined the ranks of the army, and almost immediately obtained the grade of lieutenant. The partisans of the duchess de Berri having risen in insurrection in La Vendée, he was sent thither with his regiment, and after a campaign won the friendship of Marshal Bugeaud. He joined the army of Africa in 1836 as captain, and quickly made himself conspicuous as one of the most brilliant officers in Algeria. He won the decoration of the Legion of Honour, and by the year 1844 had risen by his valour to the rank of colonel of the 3rd regiment. His reputation was constantly on the increase during the three subsequent years, at the end of which time he was appointed commandant of the province of Constantina. In 1851 he completely subjugated the province of Kabylia, after a series of twenty-six desperate combats. This feat, generally believed to be one of the boldest and most skilfully conducted operations of the French army in Algeria, brought St. Arnaud under the notice of Louis Napoleon, then president of the republic. He was summoned to Paris, created general of division, given the command of the second division of the army of Paris, and finally appointed minister of war. He was taken into the confidence of the president, and intrusted with the execution of the coup d'état. That memorable task performed, honours were heaped upon him by Louis Napoleon, and at the outbreak of hostilities between England and France and Russia, he was given the command of the French army intended for the East. In 1854, although he could scarcely sit upon his horse, his energetic mind enabled him to conduct the successful attack of his army upon the Russians at the Alma; but his frame was totally worn out by the fatigues of his career, and with the greatest reluctance he was compelled to leave a command in which all his ambitious spirit was concentrated. He embarked on board the French steamer Berthollet, and two days afterwards breathed his last, on his passage to Constantinople. B. at Paris, 1798; D. 1854.

SAINT-CYR, Laurent Gouvion de, seer, a French general and marshal of France. He was the son of a tanner, but received a fair education, and after spending his early manhood successively as a teacher of drawing and as an actor, he entered the army in 1792, as a chasseur. He had a fine stature, and, having shown considerable alertness and bravery, was created captain in the following year. Having reached the grade of general of division, he served under Jourdan, and next under Moreau, and, in 1797, was chosen by the Directory to supersede Massena as commander-in-chief of the army of Rome. In the Prussian and Polish campaign he increased his reputation, and, in 1807, was appointed governor of Warsaw. Upon the invasion of Russia, in 1812, Napoleon I. placed him in command of the sixth corps of the grand army, and, having won a glorious battle over the Russians at Polotsk, he was immediately created a marshal, but, after the battle of Leipzig, he was forced to capitulate with 16,000 men. After the return of Napoleon from Elba, he remained inactive, and then joined the cause of the Bourbons, by whom he was loaded with honours, and appointed minister of war. He wrote a number of military works. B. 1764; D. at Paris, 1830.

SAINTE-BEUVE, Charles Augustin, bu(r)ve, a modern French poet and critic, who at first studied medicine, but subsequently turned his attention towards literature, for which he had a strong predilection from his earliest years. He commenced by writing articles on history, philosophy, and criticism for a French newspaper, and, in 1828, produced his "Historical and Critical Picture of the Poetry and Drama to the 16th Century," a work which was accepted as a choice specimen of criticism. Some poems followed, but were less favourably received. He next supplied papers to the Revue des Deux Mondes, to the National, and other important French organs; but his great work on the "History of Port Royal," which appeared between the years 1840-48, gave him the high position among French littérateurs which he from that period maintained. His remaining works were,—"Literary Portraits," several volumes of criticism and literary studies, and a great number of biographical and critical prefaces to classical authors. B. at Boulogne-sur-Mer, 1804.

Sainte-Claire Deville, Henry, de-veel', a modern French chemist, who, after completing his education at college, formed for himself a chemical laboratory, where, during nine years, he experimented in an elementary fashion at the outset, and subsequently upon abstruse theories. In 1845 he became professor at the Faculty of Sciences, Besançon, and, in 1851, succeeded M. Balard in the chemical professorship at the Normal school. After making many important researches in the department of the chemistry of mineral substances, he turned his attention towards the metal called aluminum, which Sir Humphrey Davy had supposed, and M. Woehler had proved to be obtainable from clay. The emperor of the French thereupon charged him to make researches with the view of producing the metal in quantities sufficiently large to become available in the arts. His efforts were crowned with success, and, in 1855, several bars of the new metal were shown at the Paris exhibition. It was found to bear a close resemblance to silver, and to be not heavier than an equal bulk of glass. Medals, brooches, bracelets, ear-rings, spectacles, and even helmets, have been made of it, its cost being less than an equal weight of silver. He has contributed many valuable papers on his favourite study to the French annals of chemistry and natural philosophy. B. at St. Thomas, in the Antilles, 1818.

Saint-Evremond. (See Evremond, Saint.)

Saint-Hilaire, Geoffroy-Etienne, he-lair', an eminent French naturalist, who was destined for the church; but having acquired a taste for the natural sciences while pursuing his education at the college of Navarre, he resolved to devote himself to experimental philosophy. After ardently prosecuting his studies at Paris, he, in 1793, obtained the posts of sub-curator and demonstrator of natural history in the Jardin des Plantes. At a later period he became professor of zoology, and gave lectures in conjunction with Cuvier. He proceeded to Egypt as a member of the French expedition of 1798, and subsequently received the appointment of professor of anatomy and physiology in the faculty of sciences. In 1808 he was dispatched upon a scientific expedition to Portugal, and, in 1815, he took his seat in the Chamber of Deputies, as a member for Etampes, his native city. Of that department of science entitled "Experimental Anatomy," which was first developed by the German naturalists, M. de Saint-Hilaire was a profound and brilliant expounder. The noble collection of the Jardin des Plantes furnished him with the means of prosecuting his invaluable researches. So great was the zeal, and so acute the power of analysis and generalization possessed by him, that the influence of his theories has been shown in almost every work upon zoology which has been published within the last quarter of a century. "The fundamental idea of this system," says a writer in the "English Cyclopædia," "is the unity of the composition of the various parts of an organic body, and that this unity is capable of expression in a few simple laws." Thus, amongst his other labours, he proved that the bones of the head of a fish, "and, by consequence, those of the higher animals, were transformations of the simple vertebræ; and that the laws of development which applied to the one applied to the other." He gave an exposition of these remarkable laws in his work entitled "Philosophie Anatomique," published in 1818; the same theories were supported in a small work which he produced in 1818, by way of introduction to the "Lectures on Natural History," given in the Jardin des Plantes, and which was called "On the Principle of the Unity of Organic Composition." He also gave to the world a great work upon the anatomical philosophy of human monsters. His complete works were published in 42 volumes, under the title of "Professional Studies of a Naturalist." B. at Etampes, France, 1772; D. at Paris, 1844.

Saint-Jago, or Santiago, sän'-tä-a'-go, an island near the coast of Africa, the largest of the group of the Cape de Verd Islands. Ext. 35 miles long and 12 broad. Desc. Mountainous, but fertile and well cultivated. It yields grain in abundance, also sugar, indigo, coffee of superior quality, orchilla-wood for dyeing, and most kinds of tropical fruits; as oranges, guavas, cocoa-nuts, limes, plantains, pineapples, tamarinds, and a species of apple called custard apple. Cotton is produced in great plenty, and manufactured throughout the island. Pop. 10,000. Lat. 15° N. Lon. 23° 40′ W.

Saint-Jago, or Ribeira Grande, ya'-go, a town of the island of St. Jago, formerly the capital, and containing the residence of the governor, 7 miles from Porto Prayo. Pop. Unascertained.—It has a large church and a convent with twenty-four Portuguese monks. A castle commands the town.

Saint-John, James Augustus, saint-jon', or sin'-gin, an English writer, who went to London in his 17th year, and obtained employment upon the newspaper press. He was subsequently the editor of a paper at Plymouth, and in 1820 produced his first work, entitled "Abdallah," an oriental poem. Not long afterwards he was appointed sub-editor of the "Oriental Herald," for which print he wrote a history of the rise and progress of British power in India. In 1829 he repaired to Normandy with his family, and published an account of his stay in that country, in a work entitled "Residence in Normandy." In 1832 he set out from Switzerland, where he was at the time living with his family, for an extensive tour in the East, and upon his return produced a description of Egypt and Nubia. Another important work was his "Manners and Customs of the Ancient Greeks," published in 1842. While engaged upon the latter part of this book, he became almost entirely blind, his son Bayle St. John acting as his amanuensis. The most successful of the remaining works of this laborious writer were "Tales of the Ramadhan;" "Isis, an Egyptian Pilgrimage;" "There and Back Again;" "Philosophy at the Foot of the Cross;" and a life of Napoleon III. He likewise edited the prose works of John Milton, Sir Thomas Moore's "Utopia," the "Religio Medici" of Sir Thomas Brown, and Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress." B. in Caermarthenshire, about the commencement of the present century.

Saint-John, Bayle, an English littérateur and son of the preceding. He wrote "Village Life in Egypt," "Two Years in a Levantine Family," "The Christian East;" produced an abridged translation of a French work, entitled "Travels of an Arab Merchant in the Soudan;" and also published a picture of manners in the French capital, under the title of "Purple Tints of Paris." Two of his latest and most valuable works were those entitled "Montaigne the Essayist," and an abridgment of the Memoirs of Saint-Simon. B. in London, about 1820; D. 1859.—Three other sons of James Augustus St. John,—Percy, Horace, and Vane, were engaged in literary occupations.

Saint-John. (See Bolingbroke, Viscount.)

Saint-Just, Antoine, zhoost, a notorious French democrat and the colleague of Robespierre. On leaving college, he became an enthusiastic adherent of the principles of the revolution, and was elected to represent the department of Aisne in the Convention. He made himself remarkable by the violence of his opinions, greatly contributing to the condemnation of Louis XVI., the establishment of the republic, and the concentration of absolute power in the Convention. He allied himself with Robespierre against the Girondins, was a member of the Committee of Public Safety, and was one of those who organized the reign of terror. He fell with his chief, Robespierre. He cultivated letters, and wrote some licentious verses. B. at Decize, in the Nivernais, 1769; guillotined, 1794.

Saint-Leonards, Edward Burtenshaw Sugden, len'-ards, Baron, a modern English lawyer, who was called to the bar at Lincoln's Inn in 1807. At the outset of his professional career he obtained a large amount of practice in consequence of the popularity of his "Concise and Practical Treatise of the Law of Vendors and Purchasers of Estates." Of this work he himself states, "it was certainly the foundation of my early success in life." Until the year 1817, he was mainly occupied as a conveyancer and chamber counsel, and in preparing for publication several works upon jurisprudence, which achieved the largest amount of success. One of these, that entitled "A Series of Letters to a man of property on Sales, Purchases, Mortgages, Leases, Settlements, and Devises of Estates," was republished in 1858, with additions, in a work called "A Handy Book of Property Law," in which form it attained a larger share of popularity than was ever before the case with respect to a treatise upon legal questions. In 1817 he devoted his time to the chancery bar, where he obtained very considerable practice. He was made king's counsel in 1822, and in 1828 entered the House of Commons as member for Weymouth. In the following year he was knighted and appointed solicitor-general, which office he vacated upon the retirement of the duke of Wellington's administration, in 1831. In 1835 he was appointed lord chancellor of Ireland under Sir Robert Peel, but held the office during only a short period. He resumed the Irish chancellorship in 1841, and held it until 1846. Under the administration of 1852 he was appointed lord chancellor of England, and was created a peer, with the title of Lord St. Leonards. He resigned this post with the retirement of the Conservative ministry at the close of the same year. Although not remarkable as a parliamentary debater, his profound acquaintance with the law made him an important member of the political party with which he acted. B. in London, 1781.

Saint-Lucia, lu'-she-a, or lu'-se, one of the smaller Cape de Verd Islands, between St. Nicholas and St. Antonio. Ext. 10 miles long, with a breadth of 3. Pop. small. Lat. 16° 49' N. Lon. 24° 47' W.

Saint-Martin, John Antony, mar'-tin, a learned French writer, who was a master of the Arabic and Armenian languages, and became superintendent of the Oriental department of the royal printing-office. In 1822 he was appointed editor of the Journal of the French Asiatic Society, but lost all his places at the revolution of 1830. He produced, among other important works, "Memoirs upon Armenia," "History of the Lower Empire," and "History of Palmyra." B. at Paris, 1791; D. at the same city, 1832.

Saint-Mawes, mawz, a small borough town of England, in the county of Cornwall, 2½ miles from Falmouth. The town is of very remote origin. St. Mawes Castle is nearly opposite that of Pendennis, which forms the chief defence of Falmouth harbour. Pop. 1,000.

Saint-Michael's, mi'-kels, an island of the Atlantic. (See Michael's, St.)

Saint-Pierre, Eustace de, pe'-air, a burgher of Calais, who signalized himself when that place was besieged by Edward III., king of England, in 1347. The brave resistance made by the inhabitants, so irritated the English monarch, that he is said to have demanded six of their principal citizens to be delivered up to him, that they might be put to death. St. Pierre offered himself for one, and was joined by the five others, who went out to the English camp in their shirts, with halters about their necks and bearing the keys of the city. At the entreaty of Queen Philippa, Edward pardoned these patriotic men, and dismissed them with presents. D. 1371.

Saint-Pierre, Charles Irenæus Castel de, a French ecclesiastic and politician, who accompanied Cardinal Polignac to the conference at Utrecht, and was also admitted a member of the French Academy; but after the death of Louis XIV. he was excluded for some political opinions which he had hazarded. His principal works were, "Project for a Universal Peace between the Powers of Europe," "Memoirs for Correcting the Police," and a series of "Reflections on Duelling, the Celibacy of the Priesthood, on Reforms of the French Tariffs, &c." Cardinal Dubois called his writings "the dreams of an honest man." B. in Normandy, 1658; D. 1743.

Saint-Pierre. (See Pierre, Bernardin Saint.)

Saint-Simon, se'-mawng, Louis de Rouvroi, Duke de, the writer of the famous "Memoirs of Saint-Simon." After serving in the army under Marshal Luxembourg, and signalizing himself at Namur, and at the battles of Fleurus and Nerwinden, he quitted the military profession, resolving to devote himself to the court and a diplomatic career. He was, however, little employed in state affairs under Louis XIV.; but in 1721 he went as ambassador to Spain to demand the infanta in marriage for Louis XV. After the death of the regent duke of Orleans, he lost the court favour; whereupon he retired to his estate, and there occupied himself with the composition of his memoirs. In this exceedingly interesting and valuable contribution to history, the author supplied the most curious and ample details of the court of Louis XIV. and during the subsequent regency. The best French edition is that of Paris, 1857, in 20 vols. An abridged translation of a portion of the work was made by Mr. Bayle St. John. B. at Paris, 1675; D. at the same city, 1755.

Saint-Simon, Claude Henry, Count de, a celebrated French social philosopher, and grandson of the preceding. After completing his education under D'Alembert and other eminent French professors, he repaired to America in 1777, as an officer in the expedition dispatched by Louis XVI. to assist the colonists in their struggle against Great Britain. After seeing some service under Washington, he made a tour in Mexico, and finally returned to his native country. He was appointed colonel in the French army, but took no active participation in military affairs, he having resolved to "study the march of human spirit, in order, eventually, to labour for the advancement of human civilization." In 1785 he set out upon a tour in Holland and Spain, in which latter country he suggested to the government several important social improvements. Returning to France just as the revolution was bursting forth, he warmly sympathized with the movement, which he regarded as a work of social regeneration; but he took no share in the subsequent events. He entered into partnership with a Prussian nobleman —the Count de Redern,—and bought a considerable quantity of confiscated land, with the view of establishing a large scientific and industrial school; but the scheme was a failure, and Saint-Simon retired from it after losing a vast sum of money. He had now attained his 38th year, and came to the resolution of devoting himself to what he termed a "physico-political" reformation. In order to qualify himself for the task, he took up his residence near the Ecole Polytechnique, where he gave his "whole attention during three years, according to his own methods, and with all the appliances which money could furnish, to the study of the physical sciences—mathematics, astronomy, general physics, and chemistry. In 1801 he removed to the neighbourhood of the Ecole Médecine, in order, in a similar manner, to add to his stock of ideas regarding all the general science attainable with respect to organized beings. Here he traversed the whole field of physiological science, and having imbibed all the contemporary scientific thought of France, it was necessary, according to his plan, that he should visit England and Germany, lest in either country any ideas should be lurking, of decided European value, though France had not recognized them. He next proceeded to make his "experimental education;" he married, and "continued to pursue his prescribed career." Balls and dinners followed each other in rapid succession; every new situation that money could create was devised and prepared,—good and evil were confounded; play, discussion, and debauch were alike gone into; the experience of years was crushed into a short space,—even old age was artificially realized by medicaments; and that the loathsome might not be wanting, this enthusiast for the universal would inoculate himself with contagious diseases. In 1807 his "experiments" ended. His marriage proved an unhappy one; and he was left so poor that he became a clerk in the Mont de Piété (government loan office), at a yearly salary of £40. In 1812, being then in his 52nd year, he considered it time to "establish his theories." He commenced the publication of a number of remarkable works, which, however impracticable and visionary in their character, attracted around their author a circle of enthusiastic disciples; among whom were Augustin Thierry the historian, and Comte, the future author of the "Positive Philosophy." His last efforts were directed towards the foundation of a new religion, which he called the "New Christianity;" one of the objects of which was "the most rapid possible amelioration, physical and moral, of the condition of the class the most numerous and poor. To attain this object, society was to be reorganized upon this formula:—to each man a vocation according to his capacity, and to each capacity a recompense according to its worth." Before breathing his last, this extraordinary man gave his final instructions to his chief disciples. His most important works were,—"Introduction to the Scientific Labours of the 19th Century;" "The Reorganization of European Society;" and "New Christianity." B. at Paris, 1760; D. 1825. After the death of its founder, "Saint-Simonism" experienced some curious mishaps. Several of its most enthusiastic followers established a little church, where a mystical theosophy was propounded. In 1830, a weekly journal was started in furtherance of the movement, which had now attracted numbers of the educated classes to embrace its dogmas; but a split occurred between the leaders of the sect—one party formed a kind of monastic community, which, after a short time, was suppressed by the government; M. Enfantin, the abbot, being sentenced to a term of imprisonment.

SAINTES, sänts, a town and parish of France, in the department of the Lower Charente, near the Charente, 38 miles from Rochelle. Its streets are narrow and winding, and its houses ill built; but it contains several ancient remains, such as a Roman amphitheatre, an aqueduct, and a triumphal arch of white marble. It has likewise an ancient cathedral, a library, and a college, with a trade in Cognac brandy. Pop. 12,000.—Here, in 1242, the English were defeated by St. Louis.

SAINTES, LES, some small islands of the French W. Indies, off the S. extremity of Guadaloupe. United area, 5 square miles. Pro. Cotton, tobacco, and potatoes. Pop. 1,200. They were discovered in 1195 by Columbus.

SAINTONGE, sänt'-awnge, an old province in the west of France, lying along the Atlantic, to the north of Guienne. It now forms the greater portion of the Lower Charente, and part of the Deux-Sèvres and Charente.

SAKARIA, sa'-ka-ra, a village of Upper Egypt, about 20 miles above Cairo. It has some remarkable pyramids.

SAKMARA, sak'-ma-ra, a river of Russia, rising in the Ural mountains, and, after a course of 350 miles, joining the Ural, 20 miles from Orenburg.

SALADIN, or SALAHEDDIN, sal'-a-din, a celebrated sultan of Egypt and Syria, who, in the time of the crusades, distinguished himself by his valour. He made great conquests in Syria, Arabia, Persia, and Mesopotamia; after which he defeated the Christians with great slaughter, near Tiberias, and took Guy de Lusignan, king of Jerusalem, prisoner. This was followed by the surrender of Jerusalem, where he behaved with great generosity to the Christians. In 1189 Richard Cœur-de-Lion, with his ally Philip Augustus, king of France, laid siege to Acre, which, after a two years' struggle, was taken by them. The crusaders subsequently took Cæsarea and Jaffa, and Richard Cœur-de-Lion advanced to within a short distance of Jerusalem; but a truce was afterwards concluded between Saladin and the Christians; soon after which the sultan died, broken down by his constant toil. B. 1137; D. at Damascus, 1192.

SALADO, sa-la'-do, a river of South America, in the province of Tucuman, rising in lat. 24° S., and, after a course of 1,000 miles, joining the Parana at Santa Fé, in lat. 31° 40' S.—Also the name of various rivers in South America.

SALAHIEH, sal'-la-he-a, a town on the eastern frontier of Egypt, 36 miles from Belbeis. It has a large mosque, and is surrounded with palm-trees. Pop. 6,000. In 1798 and in 1800 it was taken by the French.

SALAMANCA, sa-la-man'-ka, a town of Mexico, in the department of Guanaxuato, 5,500 feet above the level of the sea.

SALAMANCA, a city of Spain, on the ascent of three hills, with the river Tormes flowing at their base, 45 miles from Ciudad-Rodrigo. It is surrounded by a wall with thirteen gates, has several squares and fountains, and a number of massy buildings; but the streets are all on uneven ground. The principal square is extensive, with piazzas all around. The houses are uniform, and of a good height, with balconies in front; and one of the sides of the square is occupied by the town-house. The public buildings are the cathedral, the university, the churches, and the convents. The cathedral is a majestic Gothic edifice, entered by a fine gate, and admired in the interior for the boldness of the vaults and the finish of the sculpture. The churches are numerous. The university was founded in 1239, and, previous to the invasion of the French, had 25 colleges. It is still celebrated, Salamanca being the principal seat of learning in Spain. Manf. Hats, woollens, shoes, glue, starch, leather, and earthenware. Pop. 15,000. It is noted for the defeat of the French under Marmont, by Wellington, in 1812.

SALAMBRIA, or SALYMPRIA, sa-lam'-bre-a, the ancient Peneus, a considerable river in Thessaly, European Turkey, discharging itself into the Gulf of Salonica, after a course of 110 miles. It drains nearly the whole of Thessaly.

SALAMIS, sal'-a-mis, an island of Greece, in the Gulf of Ægina, 10 miles from Athens. Area, 30 square miles. Pop. 5,000. Solon and Euripides were natives of Salamis, near to which Themistocles gained a naval victory over the Persians in 480 B.C.

SALAMON ISLANDS. (See SOLOMON ISLANDS.)

SALANGORE, sa-lan-gor', a state of the Malay peninsula, running for 120 miles along its W. side. Pop. 12,000. Lat. between 2° 30' and 4° N. Lon. between 101° and 102° E.

SALAWATTY, sa-la-wat'-te, an island of the Eastern Archipelago off the W. coast of the island of Papua. Ext. 35 miles long, with a breadth of 25. Pop. Unascertained. Lat. 1° S. Lon. 130° E.

SALCITO, sal-che'-to, a town of Naples, on the Trigno, 15 miles from Campobasso. Pop. 3,000.

SALDANHA, Oliviera E. Duin Joao Carlos, Duke of, sal-dan'-a, a modern Portuguese marshal and statesman. He served with distinction in the Peninsular war while the Portuguese army was commanded by General Beresford. In 1814 he proceeded to England, whence he repaired to Brazil, where he signalized himself in both a military and a diplomatic capacity. He was governor of Oporto and minister for foreign affairs in 1826; but resigned these posts, and again retired to England, in the following year. The usurpation of Don Miguel recalled him to his native country, when, after experiencing some varieties of fortune, he became commander-in-chief of the constitutional army, and was created a marshal. In 1835 he became minister of war and president of the council, which posts he retained but for a short period, choosing rather to ally himself with the reactionary party. His political views again led to his being exiled; but after spending ten years in England and France, he returned to Portugal during the revolt of 1846. He held power under great difficulties until 1856, when the respect entertained by King Pedro II. for constitutional government led to his dismissing the old marshal, who afterwards assumed the leadership of the opposition. B. at Lisbon, 1790.

SALE, George, sail, a learned English orientalist, whose greatest work was an excellent translation of the Koran, to which he prefixed a curious dissertation. Mr. Sale was also one of the principal authors of the "Ancient Universal History." B. 1680; D. 1736.

SALE, Sir Robert Henry, an English general in the service of the East-India Company. He entered the army in 1795, being then in his 13th year, and after particularly distinguishing himself in Burmah, and at the taking of the Mauritius, he was, in 1838, appointed to the command of a brigade. In that capacity he participated in the storming of Ghuznee, and for his bravery was created K.C.B. and a major-general. In 1840 he commanded against Dost Mahomed, whom he totally defeated and took prisoner. He subsequently played a brilliant part in those operations which redeemed the British name in Affghanistan. He forced the Khoord Cabul and Jugdulluck passes; and, after being shut up in Jelalabad during several months, he led his weary soldiers to an attack upon their besiegers, under Akhbar Khan, who was completely routed. He afterwards took part in the capture of Cabul, and was created a G.C.B., and received the thanks of parliament. After enjoying a very brief repose, he was again called upon to serve his country, being appointed quartermaster-general to the army of the Sutlej. He was unfortunately killed at the battle of Moodkee, his left thigh being shattered by a grape-shot. B. 1782; killed, 1845.

SALEM, sal'-lem, a seaport city and capital of Essex county, Massachusetts, U.S., 14 miles from Boston. It is chiefly built on a tongue of land, formed by two inlets from the sea, called North and South rivers; over the former of which is a bridge, connecting Salem with Beverley; and the latter forms the harbour. It contains a court-house, a gaol, an almshouse, a market-house, custom-house, grammar-school, an orphan asylum, and churches for different sects. It has numerous public and private schools. The inhabitants are chiefly employed in trade and navigation. Pop. 25,000.—The name also of numerous townships, none of them with a population above 4,000.

SALEM, a county of New Jersey, U.S. Area, 320 square miles. Pop. 20,000.

SALEM, a district of British India, in the presidency of Madras. Area, 8,200 square miles. Desc. It lies high, and produces maize, cotton, rice, teak, sandal-wood, turmeric, and tamarinds. Minerals. Iron. Manf. Cotton fabrics. Pop. 1,196,000.—A TOWN, the capital of the district. Pop. 20,000. Lat. 11° 38′ N. Lon. 78° 12′ E.

SALEMBRIA. (See SALAMBRIA.)

SALEMI, sa-lai'-me, an inland town of Sicily, 15 miles from Mazzara. It has a number of churches and convents. Pop. 8,000.

SALERNO, sa-lair'-no, a city of Naples, on the N. shore of the Gulf of Salerno, 30 miles from Naples. Its streets are narrow and irregular, and have a gloomy appearance. There are in front of the cathedral twenty-eight ancient granite columns, with Corinthian capitals of good workmanship. There are a number of other churches and convents, hospitals, a theatre, bishop's palace, a lyceum, and a university. Pop. 16,000. Here, in 1860, Garibaldi, the liberator, landed in making his advance upon Naples.—The GULF is separated from the Bay of Naples by Cape Campanella. It has a breadth of 36 miles, and it receives the river Sale.

SALEYER, or SALAYER, sa-lai'-yer, an island of the Eastern Archipelago, off the southern extremity of the island of Celebes. Ext. 40 miles in length and 8 in breadth. Pop. 60,000. Lat. 6° S. Lon. 120° E.

SALFORD, sâl'-ford, the name of several parishes in England, none of them, however, with a population above 1,000.

SALFORD, a town and parish of Lancashire, lying immediately in the vicinity of Manchester, with which it communicates by six bridges across the Irwell. It is one of the principal seats of the cotton manufacture. Pop. of borough, 90,000. (See MANCHESTER.)

SALGADO, sal-ga'-do, a town of Brazil, in the province of Minas-Geraes, on the San Francisco. Pop. 4,000. Lat. 15° 20′ S.

SALIBADO, sa-le-ba'-bo, an island in the Asiatic Archipelago, separated from Tulour by a narrow strait about a mile wide. It has a circumference of 8 or 10 miles, and is well cultivated. Pop. Uncertain.

SALICETTO, sa-le-chet'-to, a town of Sardinia, Piedmont, 16 miles from Mondovi. Pop. 3,000.

SALIES, sa-lee', the name of two parishes and towns of France, neither with a population above 6,300.

SALINA, sa-li'-na, a township of New York, U.S., on the E. side of Lake Onondaga. It has celebrated salt-springs. Pop. 2,500.

SALINA, or SALINI, sa-le'-na, anciently Didyma, one of the Lipari islands, in the Mediterranean Sea. Ext. 5 miles long and 5 broad. Pop. Unascertained. —It is volcanic.

SALINE, sa-line', the name of two counties in the United States.—1. In Illinois. Area, 378 square miles. Pop. 5,600.—2. In Missouri. Area, 727 square miles. Pop. 9,000.

SALINO, sa-le'-no, a river of Naples, which, after a course of 32 miles, falls into the Gulf of Venice, 5 miles from Pescara.

SALINS, sa'-lin, a fortified town of France, in the department of the Jura, on the Furieuse, 20 miles from Besançon. It has a trade in wine and brandy, but the principal article of export is salt. Pop. 7,200.

SALISBURY, or NEW SARUM, salz'-ber-e, an ancient city of Wiltshire, in a vale on the Avon, here crossed by three bridges, 96 miles from London. The principal streets are laid out with great regularity. Five of them run from north to south, and other five cross these at right angles. This arrangement gives to the town an open and airy appearance. Each street also has a channel, through which runs a stream of water supplied from the river Avon. Numerous small bridges are erected over these rivulets; and hence this city has been compared to Venice. The principal public buildings are the cathedral, the bishop's palace, and the College of Matrons, the parish churches, the council-house, the infirmary, and the county gaol. The cathedral is justly regarded as one of the finest ecclesiastical buildings in Europe, and is a highly interesting specimen of the architecture of the 13th century. It is also remarkable for being the most uniform, regular, and systematic structure of the kind in England. The whole building may be viewed as composed of four distinct portions; viz., the church, the tower and spire, the cloister, and the chapter-house. It has a length of 474 feet, and a width at the transept of 210. The height of the spire is 404 feet. The bishop's palace, which stands near the south-east corner of the cathedral, is a large irregular building, bearing evidence of being the work of different and distant periods. The College of Matrons, erected by Bishop Ward, is a regular building, with commodious gardens. The parish churches, in the city, are St. Martin's, St. Thomas's, and St. Edmund's, none of which are particularly distinguished. The new council-house is of brick, with the angles of each front ornamented with rustic-work in stone. Courts of law occupy the left, and the council the right wing. There are, besides, the infirmary, assembly and concert rooms, a theatre, the grammar-school, at which the celebrated Addison was educated, two charity schools, and hospitals. In Catholic times, Salisbury appears to have contained a great variety of religious establishments, the remains of some of which are still in existence. Manf. Unimportant. A trade is carried on in agricultural produce. Pop. about 12,000. A parliament was summoned to meet here in the reign of Edward I., and another was held in 1328. It has a station on the South-Western Railway, and communicates by a branch with Southampton.

SALISBURY, the name of several townships in the United States, none of them with a population above 4,000.

SALISBURY PLAIN, an elevated undulating tract in Wiltshire, extending to the N. and S. of Salisbury. On it, about 6 miles from Salisbury, is Stonehenge, and there are many vestiges of British and Roman remains scattered over its surface.

SALLE, LA, sal, a town of France, in the department of the Gard, 18 miles from Vigan. Pop. 2,500.

SALLEE, or SLA, sal-lee', a seaport on the western coast of Morocco, at the mouth of the Bu-Regreb, 105 miles from Fez. It was formerly the great hold of Moorish piracy, and, from the depredations of former conspiracies, great interruptions of European commerce took place. It has still an immense and dreary dungeon, formed under ground, for the reception of unfortunate captives. The river, which formerly admitted large vessels, is now choked up with sand. On its opposite side stands Rabat, called often New Sallee, which is properly to be considered as another quarter of the same town. It has been chiefly frequented by Europeans, and formerly contained numerous factories belonging to them. It has now fallen to decay. Manf. Carpets, and has an export trade in wool. Pop. about 12,000. Lat. 34° 3′ N. Lon. 6° 40′ W.

SALLES, sal, the name of numerous parishes and villages of France, none of them with a population above 3,000.

SALLO, Denis de, sal'-lo, a learned French writer, who was counsellor in the parliament of Paris, and distinguished himself by his talents and the urbanity of his disposition. He formed the project of the "Journal des Savans," which was commenced in 1665, and was the first literary journal ever published in France. B. at Paris, 1626; D. 1669.

SALLUST, săl'-lust (Caius Sallustius Crispus), a Latin historian. He was educated under the grammarian Atteius Philologus, and after passing through different employments at Rome, became successively quæstor and tribune. His manners were depraved, and he was degraded from the rank of senator, but was restored by Cæsar, who gave him the government of Numidia, to repair his dissipated fortune. On his return to Rome, he built a superb palace, and spent the rest of his life in luxury and debauchery. It is surprising that such a man should spare time for literature; yet his talents were great, and his histories of Catiline's conspiracy, and of the Jugurthine wars, throw a veil over the defects of his moral character. The best editions of Sallust are the Elzevir, 1634, and that of Zurich, 1810. There is an English translation of his works by Sir Henry Stewart. B. at Amiternum, B.C. 86; D. at Rome, B.C. 34.

SALMANASAR, săl-ma-nai'-sar, king of Assyria, succeeded his father Tiglath-pileser, B.C. 724. He took Samaria, and carried the inhabitants into captivity, thereby putting an end to the kingdom of Israel. He was defeated at sea by the Tyrians, and died 712 B.C. He left his kingdom to his son Sennacherib.

SALMASIUS, or SAUMAISE, Claude, sol'-maisse, a learned French writer, who received his first education under his father, and afterwards studied at Paris and Heidelberg. Richelieu offered him a considerable pension on condition of settling in France, which Salmasius refused. The king, however, conferred on him the order of St. Michael and the brevet of a councillor of state. In 1649 he wrote an able defence of Charles I., king of England, which was replied to by Milton. The year following, he went to Sweden, on an invitation from Queen Christina. His principal works, which were written in Latin, were commentaries upon Florus, Polyhistor, Hippocrates, &c. B. near Semur, 1588; D. 1653.

SALO, sal'-lo, a town of Italy, 14 miles from Brescia. Manf. Linen, yarn, and thread. Pop. about 6,000.

SALOMON, John Peter, săl'-o-mon, a German violinist and composer, who went to London and became highly successful as an orchestral leader, and projector of "subscription concerts." Twelve grand symphonies by Haydn, the oratorio of the "Creation," and many other fine musical works, were first produced under his direction. B. at Bonn, 1745; D. in London, 1815.

SALON, sal'-lawng, a town of France, in the department of the Mouths-of-the-Rhone, 28 miles from Marseilles. Manf. Silk plush, hats, and soap. Pop. 6,600.

SALONA, sa-lo'-na, a town of European Turkey, at the foot of Mount Parnassus. It contains several well-built mosques and churches, as well as spacious and commodious baths. On its acropolis are picturesque ruins of its ancient citadel. Pop. 6,000.

SALONA, a ruined city of Dalmatia, 3 miles from Spalatro. Diocletian fortified this city, of which he was a native. It was destroyed by the Avars in the 7th century.

SALONICA, sa-lon-e'-ka, a city of European Turkey, in Romania, or Roumelia, at the northern extremity of the Bay of Salonica, 270 miles from Constantinople. It is built on the acclivity of a steep hill, which rises from the bay at its north-east extremity. The circumference of the walls is about 5 miles; and the domes and minarets of the mosques are seen rising from among the other buildings, environed by cypresses, and giving a general air of splendour to the place, which is more comfortable and cleanly than most Turkish towns. It is commanded by a large citadel, called the "Seven Towers," and has numerous remains. One of its gates was erected in honour of Augustus, after the battle of Philippi. Some of its mosques are extremely handsome, and the one dedicated to St. Sophia is a model of a similar one at Constantinople. In the centre of the city is the hippodrome, entered by a grand colonnade composed of five Corinthian pillars. Bazars are numerous, and there is a large trade done in British produce. Manf. Silk; but the exports consist of maize, wheat, barley, timber, tobacco, wool, sponges, wine, sesamum-seed, and staves. Pop. about 70,000. The orator Cicero took this city for his residence during a part of his exile.—The GULF of Salonica has a length of 70 miles, and a breadth of 30 at its entrance.

SALOP, or SHROPSHIRE. (See SHROPSHIRE.)

SALSETTE, sal'-set, an island on the W. coast of Hindostan, formerly separated from Bombay by a strait 200 yards wide, across which, in 1805, a causeway was carried. Ext. 18 miles long by 14 broad. Desc. It is well adapted for the cultivation of sugar, cotton, hemp, indigo, &c.; but it has hitherto been kept in a state of nature, for the purpose of supplying Bombay with wood, charcoal, and sea-salt, for which there is a manufactory. Salsette is remarkably rich in mythological antiquities; and the remains of reservoirs, with flights of stone steps round them, and the ruins of temples, &c., indicate a former state of prosperity and extensive population. Pop. 60,000. It is connected with the mainland by the Bombay and Callian Railway.

SALSO, sal'-so, the largest river of the island of Sicily, rising in the Madonian mountains, and, after a course of 70 miles, falling into the Mediterranean Sea at Alicata.

SALTA, or SAN MIGUEL DE SALTA, sal'-ta, a city and department of the Plata Confederation, in South America, in the beautiful valley of Lerma, through which passes a river, on whose shore the city stands, having a fine bridge over it. Pop. 9,000.—The DEPARTMENT has an area of 70,000 square miles. Pop. 55,000.

SALTASH, solt'-ăsh, a market-town and borough of England, in Cornwall, on the Tamar, 4 miles from Devonport. The houses rise above each other to the summit of a hill, near which stand the chapel dedicated to St. Nicholas, and the mayoralty-hall. A considerable traffic is carried on in malt and beer. Pop. 1,800. Here a tubular railway-bridge crosses the river, and is one of the greatest works of the engineering skill of modern times.

SALTCOATS, solt'-kotes, a seaport-town of Scotland, in Ayrshire, 24 miles from Glasgow. It has large saltworks, and exports quantities of coals. It is a cheerful place, and is much resorted to for sea-bathing. Pop. 4,500.

SALT CREEK, the name of several townships in the United States, none of them with a population above 2,000.

SALTILLO, sal-teel'-lo, a town of Mexico, in the department of Cohahuila, on the river Tigre. It has an extensive trade. Pop. 20,000.

SALT LAKE, GREAT, an inland lake of N. America, in the territory of Utah. Ext. 75 miles long, and from 15 to 30 broad. It contains several islands, and although it receives the Bear river and the Jordan, it has no visible outlet.—The CITY of the same name is the principal seat of the "Mormons," or "Latter-Day Saints," in America. Pop. 8,000. Lat. 40° 46′ N. Lon. 112° 6′ W.

Sanmicheli, Michael, san-me'-ke-le, a celebrated Italian civil and military architect, who studied at Rome, and was employed by the republic of Venice, in 1525, to erect fortifications at Verona, Dalmatia, Cyprus, and other places. In those works he was the first to make use of triangular and pentangular bastions. The emperor Charles V. made him flattering offers if he would take service under him; but these were refused. He was equally successful as the designer of palaces and churches, his best edifices being the Palazzi Cornaro and Grimani at Venice, and the Capella Pellegrini at Verona. B. at Verona, 1484; D. 1559.

Sannazaro, James, san-na-za'-ro, an eminent Italian poet. The most celebrated of his poems is his "Arcadia," printed first in 1502, in which, in the purest and most elegant Italian, he described the scenes and occupations of rural life. He also wrote some Latin poems, besides sonnets, madrigals, &c., in his native tongue. B. at Naples, 1458; D. at the same city, 1530.

San Paulo, pow'-lo, a maritime province of Brazil. Area, 191,012 square miles. Pop. 360,000. Lat. between 23° and 26° S. Lon. between 45° and 54° 40′ W.

San Pedro de Batopilas, pa'-dro, a town of the Mexican Confederation, formerly noted for its mines. Pop. 8,000.

San Pedro do Rio Grande, a maritime province of Brazil. Area, 60,120 square miles. Pop. 160,000. Lat. between 25° 30′ and 33° 30′ S. Lon. between 50° and 57° 20′ W.

San-Po, san-po', a large river of Tibet, rising in lat. 30° 40′ N., lon. 82° E., and receiving during its course numerous affluents, and believed to be continuous with the Dihong, a principal arm of the Brahmapootra.

Sanquhar, san'-quar, a parish and royal borough of Scotland, in Dumfriesshire, on the river Nith, 24 miles from Dumfries. It has only one principal street, a town- or council-house, with a schoolhouse and prison connected. It has, besides, a church, and several other places for the religious worship of various denominations. Manf. Woollen and cotton fabrics, hosiery, and muslins. Pop. of town 2,000, of parish 4,100. In the vicinity are coal-mines.

San Salvador, sal-va-dor', the capital of a province in Guatimala, 12 miles from the coast of the Pacific Ocean and 140 miles from Guatimala. It is a depôt for indigo and sugar. Manf. Cotton fabrics and iron wares. Pop. 16,000.

Sansanding, san-san-ding', a large town in Central Africa, on the Niger, the seat of a very considerable trade, particularly salt, 20 miles from Sago. The market-place is an extensive square, constantly crowded with people, where the different articles are exposed on stalls, shaded by mats from the heat of the sun. From this place Mungo Park embarked in his vessel to descend the river in 1805.

San Severo, sai-vai'-ro, a town of Naples, 16 miles from Foggia. It has a large trade in cattle. Pop. 18,000.

Sanson, Nicholas, san-sawng', a celebrated French geographer, who became engineer and geographer to Louis XIII. His maps, amounting in all to three hundred, are accurate and valuable. He wrote several learned and curious works on ancient geography, and is regarded as the founder of the geographical science in his native country. B. at Abbeville, 1600; D. 1667.

Sansovino, James, san-so-ve'-no, an eminent Italian sculptor and architect, who pursued his studies with Andrea del Sarto, and took lessons from Sansovino, whose name he assumed. He studied both architecture and sculpture at Rome, and in the latter department of the arts, produced three master-pieces,—a Bacchus, destroyed by fire at Florence in 1762, and two statues of Mars and Neptune, which are contained in the ducal palace at Venice. The mint, the library of St. Mark, and some portions of St. Mark's at Venice, are magnificent specimens of his skill. So highly were his merits appreciated by the republic, that when a tax was laid upon the inhabitants of Venice, Titian and himself were exempted. B. at Florence, 1479; D. at Venice, 1578.

Sansovino, Francis, a learned Italian printer, and son of the preceding. He took his degrees in law at Padua, but afterwards set up a printing-office at Venice. He published a translation of Plutarch, "Chronology of the World," "Annals of the Ottoman Empire," and a collection of novels, entitled "Cento Novelle scelti de' più Nobili Scrittori della Lingua Volgare." D. at Venice, 1586.

Santa, san'-ta, a prefix to numerous places in S. America and Italy, with populations varying between 2,000 and 10,000.

Santa Anna, Antonio Lopez de, an'-na, a Mexican general and statesman, who, at the outset of his career, served in the Spanish army, in which he attained the grade of lieutenant-colonel in 1821; but, in the following year, while stationed at Vera Cruz, he joined the movement inaugurated by Iturbide, which resulted in the total defeat of the Spanish forces, and the reduction of the whole of that province. He next turned his arms against and overthrew Iturbide, who had proclaimed himself emperor. The Mexican republic was shortly afterwards formed, and, from that period until the year 1833, when he succeeded in himself obtaining the presidentship of the republic, he was engaged in opposing or defending, at the head of the Mexican troops, the claims of rival chiefs. He maintained his position as president until 1836, when he was defeated and taken prisoner at San Jacinto, by his political opponents. Liberated in 1837, he participated in the repulse of the French troops at Vera Cruz, on which occasion he lost a leg. He was once more president, from 1841 until 1845, in which latter year he was deposed and banished for ten years; but was recalled soon afterwards, reinstated as president, and charged to defend Mexico against the United States army. He was defeated in several encounters by Generals Scott and Taylor, and finally, in 1848, was compelled to resign, Mexico having proclaimed peace with the United States, by the cession of California, and by submitting to the erection of Texas into an independent state. From the close of the year 1852 until the middle of 1855, he again held the reins of power, only to be driven into exile, however, at the latter date, by General Carrera, who had revolted against his rule. He retired beyond the frontiers of Mexico, and took no part in the troubles which distracted his country after his abdication. B. in the city of Talapa, 1798.

SANTA ANNA, a town of Central America, 11 miles from Salvador. In the neighbourhood, indigo and sugar are produced. Pop. 10,000.—Also a market-town of Brazil, 30 miles from Cuiaba. Pop. of DISTRICT, 4,000.

SAONE, UPPER, a department in the E. of France, including the N. part of Franche-Comté, and inclosed N. by the department of the Vosges, and E. by that of the Upper Rhine. Area, 1,792 square miles. Desc. Mountainous in the N.E., where it is covered by branches of the Vosges. Rivers. The principal rivers are the Saone, the Oignon, the Drugeon, and the Amance. Pro. Corn, wine, and timber. Minerals. Iron and coal. Manf. China, glass, cloth, straw hats, and kirchenwasser. Pop. 350,000.

SAPOR I., sai'-por, king of Persia, succeeded his father Artaxerxes about A.D. 238. He invaded Mesopotamia, Syria, and Cilicia, and in 260 made the emperor Valerian prisoner; but after being defeated by Odenatus, he was assassinated by his subjects, in 271.

SAPOR II. succeeded his father Hormisdas II. He was a warlike prince, and gained many advantages over the Romans, but tarnished his glory by a dreadful persecution of the Christians. D. 380.

SAPOR III. succeeded Artaxerxes II., and reigned from 384 to 389.

SAPOR, king of Armenia, was the son of Yezdedjerd I., king of Persia, and was proclaimed at the death of Khosrou III., to the prejudice of Varenes Sapor. He attempted in vain to detach his subjects from Christianity and from an alliance with the Romans. Whilst making a journey to Ctesiphon, in 420, an insurrection burst forth in Armenia, which resulted in his losing the crown. He was treacherously slain by his brother Behram V. in the same year.

SAPPHO, saf'-fo, a celebrated Greek poetess, who was the inventor of the "Sapphic verse." She excelled in lyric verse, and was held in such estimation by her countrymen, that they stamped her image on their coins. She was said to have fallen in love with a young man named Phaon, who slighted her; on which she threw herself into the sea from the Leucadian rock; but Müller declares this to be a mere fiction. Fragments of her poems are extant. B. at Lesbos, and flourished about 600 B.C.

SARAGOSSA, or ZARAGOZA, sa'-ra-gos'-sa (Sp. tha-ra-go'-tha), a city of Spain, the capital of the old kingdom of Aragon, on the Ebro, which is here about the middle of its course, and separates the city from its suburbs, 176 miles from Madrid. Without being regularly fortified, it is surrounded by an earthen wall, and is built throughout of bricks. The houses are seldom above three stories in height; the streets narrow and crooked, except one long and wide one, called the Cozo. Here are two bridges over the Ebro. The public buildings are numerous,—churches, convents, and a cathedral, celebrated throughout Spain for its sanctuary. The city has a university, founded in 1478; also an academy of fine arts, with schools for drawing, and other branches of education. Here are, also, two public libraries, but both on a small scale. Pop. about 63,000.—It is noted for the dreadful sieges which it sustained in 1808 and 1809. To the heroism displayed by the women of Saragossa in defending their city, Byron thus alludes in his "Childe Harold:"—

> "The Spanish maid, aroused,
> Hangs on the willow her unstrung guitar,
> And, all unsex'd, the anlace hath espoused,
> Sung the loud song, and dared the deed of war!
> And she whom once the semblance of a scar
> Appall'd, an owlet's larum chill'd with dread,
> Now views the column-scatt'ring bay'net jar,
> The falchion flash, and o'er the yet warm dead
> Stalks, with Minerva's step, where Mars might quake to tread."

SARAH, sai'-ra, the niece and wife of Abraham. She became the mother of Isaac at the age of 90 years, and caused Abraham to cast forth Hagar and Ishmael. She lived to the age of 127 years.

SARAUT, sa-raut', a village of Herat, in Persia, 66 miles from Hamadan.

SARAWAK, sa-ra-wak', a country of Borneo, on the N.E. coast of the island. Sir James Brooke was appointed its rajah, and did much to make it known. Pop. about 12,000. Lat. between 1° and 2° N. Lon. between 109° 40′ and 111° 40′ E. (See BROOKE.)

SARAWAN, sa-ra-wan', a province of Beloochistan. Area, 20,000 square miles. Pop. Unascertained. Lat. between 28° and 30° 20′ N. Lon. between 61° and 67° 40′ E.

SARBURG, sar'-boorg, a town of France, in the department of the Meurthe, on the Sarre. Pop. 1,500.

SARDAM. (See ZAANDAM.)

SARDANAPALUS, sar-da-na-pai'-lus, according to Greek and Roman historians, the last king of Assyria. He was a voluptuous prince. Arbaces, governor of Media, entering the royal palace, and seeing Sardanapalus dressed as a courtesan, surrounded by his eunuchs and mistresses, was so filled with indignation that he formed the design of conspiring against him. Belesis, a priest of Babylon, entered into his views, and a civil war commenced, in which the king was defeated and besieged in Nineveh, whereupon he set fire to his palace, and perished in the flames, according to some writers, 880, and to others 717 B.C.

SARDINIA, sar-din'-i-a (Ital. SARDEGNA, sar-dain'-ya), an island of the Mediterranean, situate to the south of Corsica, from which it is separated by the Strait of Bonifacio. The geographical division is into the two nearly equal parts of Capo di Cagliari and Capo di Sassari; the former being the southern, the latter the northern part of the island. Area, with the island of Capraia, 9,168 square miles. Desc. Generally mountainous, with Mount Genargentu rising, in its centre, to a height of 7,000 feet. In the W. there are extensive plains. Rivers. The Tirso is the largest. Climate. The heat and cold are less intense than are common in continental countries under the same parallels of latitude. Pro. The vine and the olive flourish; also the mulberry, the lemon, the orange, the fig, and in the warmest situations, the pomegranate and palm-tree. Sugar, cotton, coffee, and indigo might be cultivated in the warmer valleys; but all is backward, the interior containing extensive tracts of desert, and still more extensive forests of aged oak, chestnuts, and cork trees. Even horses range in a wild state in these unfrequented spots. Deer, wild boars, and foxes abound, and the skins of hares, rabbits, foxes, and martins, are exported. Minerals. Gold, silver, and lead. Commerce. Sardinia is very favourably situate for commercial intercourse, having a number of good harbours; such as Palmas, Nova, and Cagliari. It has no manufactures, except some coarse linens and woollens; no exports, unless rude produce; such as corn, cattle, salted provisions, the proceeds of the tunny fishery, hides and skins, fruit, some wine and brandy, but, above all, large quantities of salt. Pop. 550,000. Lat. between 38° 51′ 50″ and 41° 15′ 42″ N. Lon. between 8° 3′ 39″ and 9° 50′ 30″ E.—The Phœnicians and Greeks, who called this island Icanusa, first sent colonies to it, and erected several small states, as they had done in the south of Italy and Sicily. The Carthaginians succeeded them, and had the dominion nearly of the whole island. The Romans dispossessed the Carthaginians. The Saracens held it in the 9th century, as they did Naples and Sicily. The republics of Genoa and Pisa recovered part of the island from them. Pope Boniface took upon him to transfer it to the king of Aragon, who subdued the Genoese, Pisans, and the rest of the inhabitants, and annexed it to his own dominions. It remained united to the crown of Spain till the allies made a conquest of it, in 1708. It was allotted to the emperor at the peace of Utrecht, 1713. The Spaniards recovered it in 1717, but were obliged to abandon it about two years after; when it was conferred on the duke of Savoy, in lieu of the kingdom of Sicily, in 1719; and his descendants now enjoy the throne. From 1798 to 1814 it was the only portion of the Sardinian dominions left in the power of its sovereign, the French occupying the other portion of the kingdom. — For its late history, see CHARLES ALBERT, VICTOR EMMANUEL, &c.

SARDINIA, KINGDOM OF, a state in the south of Europe, composed in part of the island of Sardinia, but in a much greater proportion of Piedmont, Savoy, and the territory of Genoa. It takes its name from the island of Sardinia, and was, in 1860, enlarged by the annexation of Naples and other portions of Italy, noticed under their several heads, to its continental portion. Area. Previous to the events of 1860, this was estimated at 29,102 square miles. Desc. Mountainous, being covered on the N. and W. by the Alps, which culminate in Mont Blanc, Monte Rosa, and Mont Cervin. Rivers. The Rhone, Var, and Magra, which fall into the Mediterranean. Besides these, there are the Po and its affluents. Climate. Cold in the mountains, but warm in the valleys. Pro. Rice, wheat, maize, chestnuts, grapes, figs, olives, oranges, and citrons. The silk of Piedmont is the best in Italy, and mules are extensively reared. Exp. The principal are cattle, silk, olive-oil, flax, and iron. Pop. 4,010,000. Lat. —the continental portion, previous to the annexation of Naples, between 43° 39′ and 46° 24′ N. Lon. between 5° 38′ and 10° 7′ E —This kingdom originated in the duchy of Savoy, and has been successively enlarged by the annexation of Piedmont, Nice, and the island of Sardinia. From 1798 to 1814 its continental part formed a portion of the French empire, and in the following year it was enlarged by the addition of Genoa and the island of Capraia. In 1855 it took part with Britain and France against Russia, and while we write (1861) is still, in its continental part, being extended by the voluntary union of the Italian people under the sway of Victor Emmanuel, who, in 1861, assumed the title of King of Italy. (See ITALY, PIEDMONT, SARDINIA (ISLAND OF), SAVOY, &c.)

SAROS, or SCHAROS, sha'-rosh, a market-town of Hungary, 15 miles from Zemplin. It has a college and library. Pop. 5,500.

SAROS, GULF OF, sa'-ros, an inlet of the Ægean Sea, separated from the Hellespont by the peninsula of Gallipoli. Ext. 40 miles long and 20 broad. Near it are the islets of Saros.

SAROS-PATAK, pa-tak', a well-built town of Hungary, on the Bodrog, 14 miles from Tokey. It has a Catholic, a Calvinist, and a Greek church. Pop. 6,000.

SARPA, sar'-pa, a river of Russia, rising in the government of Astrakan, and, after a course of 200 miles, falling into the Volga, 15 miles from Tzartzin.

SARPI, Peter Paul, sar'-pe, commonly called "Father Paul," an eminent Italian historian, who became a member of the religious order of Servites, and while still a young man acquired a great reputation for his extensive learning and penetrating genius. Besides his acquaintance with ancient and modern languages, he was well versed in mathematics, theology, and medicine. In the disputes between the republic of Venice and Pope Paul V. he displayed so much ability in behalf of his country, that the pope ordered him to Rome, and on his refusal to go thither, excommunicated him. This did not abate the zeal of the virtuous citizen, who continued to vigorously maintain the rights of Venice against the pretended authority of the pope. An attempt was then made to murder him, and he was attacked on the bridge of St. Mark by five assassins, who left him pierced with wounds. This infamous deed roused the indignation of the senate, who offered large rewards for the apprehension of the assassins; but they were never discovered. Father Paul recovered from his wounds, but with ruined health. He wrote several esteemed works; the chief of which were, "The History of the Council of Trent," "Considerations on the Censures of Paul V. against the Republic of Venice," and "Tréatise concerning the Inquisition." B. at Venice, 1552; D. at the same city, 1623.

SARRE, or SAAR, sar, a river of Germany, rising in the Vosges, and, after a course of 150 miles, joining the Moselle 5 miles from Treves.

SARREBOURG, sar'-boorg, a town of France, in the department of the Meurthe, on the Sarre, 40 miles from Nancy. Manf. Cotton fabrics, woollen stuffs, paper, and porcelain. Pop. 2,600.

SART, sart, the modern name of Sardis.

SARTHE, sart, a river of France, rising in the department Orne, and joining the Mayenne 6 miles above Angers.

SARTHE, or SARTE, a department in the north-west of France, comprising the greater part of the ancient province of Maine, and bounded by the departments of the Orne, the Loir-and-Cher, and the Mayenne. Area, 2,470 square miles. Desc. Flat, and largely covered with forests. Rivers. The principal are the Sarthe, the Loire, and the Huine. Pro. Corn, grapes, cider, and perry. Manf. Woollen and cotton fabrics, and paper. Pop. 475,000.

SARTO, sar'-to, Andrea Vanucchi, usually styled del Sarto, a celebrated Italian painter, so named from being the son of a tailor. He was invited to Paris by Francis I., for whom he painted several fine pictures. Florence also contains some examples of his genius. His pictures are admirably designed, and are remarkable for the excellence of the draperies. B. at Florence, 1488; D. of the plague, at the same city, 1530.

SARUM, OLD, sal'-rum, an ancient and extinct borough of Wiltshire, 2 miles from Salisbury. This notorious rotten borough, although reduced to a single farm-house, sent two members to Parliament before the passing of the Reform Bill in 1832.

SARUN with CHUMPARUN, a district of British India, in the presidency of Bengal, having its centre about lat. 26° N., lon. 85° E. Area, 6,394 square miles. Pop. 1,700,000.

SARZANA, sar-za'-na, an ancient town in the Genoese territory, on the Magra, 45 miles from Genoa. It had formerly its own parliament. Pop. 3,600.

SARZEAU, sar'-zo, a parish and town of France, in the department of Morbihan, 10 miles from Vannes. Pop. 7,500.

SARZEDAS, sar'-ze-das, a market-town of Portugal, in the province of Beira, 10 miles from Castello-Branco. Pop. 2,500.

SASBACH, sas'-bak, a village of Baden, 17 miles from Strasburg. Pop. 1,400. Here Marshal Turenne fell by a random shot in 1675.

SASCACHEWAN, sis-kätch'-e-wan, a river of North America, rising in the Rocky Mountains, and, after a course of upwards of 1,000 miles, falling into Lake Winnipeg, in lat. 51° 45′ N.

SASIK, sa'-sik, a lake of Bessarabia, 35 miles from Akermann. Ext. 16 miles long, with a breadth of 6.

SASSANO, sas-sa'-no, two market-towns of Naples, neither with a population above 4,000.

SASSARI, sas'-sa-re, a well-built town of Sardinia, near the north-west coast, 60 miles from Cagliari. It is the seat of the provincial government and courts of justice, as well as of a university, erected in 1775. Here are also several lesser seminaries, a museum, library, and an hospital. Its churches are numerous, and there are several convents. Pop. 25,000. Lat. 40° 43′ 33″ N. Lon. 8° 35′ E.—The GULF has a length of 20 miles and a breadth of 35.

SASSERAM, sas'-se-ram, a town of British India, in the presidency of Bengal, 38 miles from BUXAR. In its neighbourhood is the sacred waterfall of Deocoond. Pop. 15,663.

SATALGE. (See PHARSALIA.)

SATALIA, or ANTALIA, sa-ta-le'-a, a city of Asia Minor, beautifully situate at the head of a gulf to which it gives name, round a small harbour, 50 miles from Cape Khelidonia. The streets appear to rise behind each other like the seats of a theatre. The city is inclosed by a ditch, a double wall, and a series of square towers, about 50 yards asunder. Pop. 8,000. Lat. 36° 50′ N. Lon. 30° 45′ E. This place is supposed to have been the ancient Olbia.

SATILLIEU, sa-teel'-yu(r), a town of France, in the department of the Ardèche, 12 miles from Tournon. Pop. 2,100.

SATORALLYA-UJHELY, sa-to-ral'-ya oo-je'-le, a market-town of Hungary, 8 miles from Zemplin. Pop. 7,600.

SATTARA, sat-ta-ra', a state of India, nearly inclosed by the territory of the Bombay presidency, to which it now belongs. Area, 16,222 square miles. Pop. 1,000,000. Lat. between 16° 22′ and 18° 32′ N. Lon. between 73° 30′ and 76° E.—The CAPITAL town, of the same name, is 58 miles from Poonah. Though a strong fortress, it surrendered to the British in 1818.

SATURN, sät'-urn (SATURNUS, sa-tur'-nus), a son of Coelus, or Uranus, and Terra. He obtained his father's kingdom by the consent of his brother Titan, provided he did not bring up any male children. Pursuant to this agreement, Saturn always devoured his sons as soon as born, till his wife Rhea concealed from him the birth of Jupiter, Neptune, and Pluto, giving him, instead of the children, large stones to eat. Titan afterwards made war against Saturn, and dethroned and imprisoned him. Jupiter, who was secretly educated in Crete, delivered his father; but Saturn, having conspired against Jupiter, he was banished from his throne, and fled into Italy. Janus, king of Italy, received Saturn, and made him his partner on the throne. Saturn employed himself in civilizing the barbarous manners of the people, and in teaching them agriculture. His reign was so beneficent that the poets have called it the "golden age." The god is generally represented as an old man, bent through age and infirmity; he holds a scythe in his right hand, with a serpent that bites its own tail; and in his left hand he holds a child, which he raises up as if about to devour it.

SATURNALIA, sät-ur-nai'-li-a, festivals in honour of Saturn, instituted, as is generally supposed, long before the foundation of Rome, in commemoration of the freedom and equality which prevailed on earth in the golden age of Saturn. The Saturnalia were originally celebrated for only one, but afterwards the solemnity continued for seven days. The celebration was remarkable for the liberty which universally prevailed; the slaves were permitted to ridicule their masters, and to speak with freedom upon every subject.

SATURNIN, ST., sa-toor'-nă, the name of several parishes and places in France, none of them with a population above 2,000.

SATYRS, sät'-irs (SATYRI, sät'-i-ri), rural demigods, who are represented like men, but with the feet and the legs of goats, short horns on the head, and the whole body covered with thick hair. They chiefly attended upon Bacchus, and rendered themselves known in his orgies by their lasciviousness. The first-fruits of everything were generally offered to them. The Romans also called them Fauni, Panes, and Sylvani.

SAUL, sawl, the first king of the Hebrews, was the son of Kish, of the tribe of Benjamin, and anointed king 1110 B.C. He obtained signal advantages over the Philistines and Amalekites; but having spared the spoil, contrary to the divine command, the prophet Samuel informed him the sceptre should depart from him. Being jealous of David, he endeavoured several times to take his life. After his defeat by the Philistines on Mount Gilboah, he slew himself, B.C. 1056.

SAULCY, Louis Félicien Joseph Caignart de, sole'-se, a modern French antiquarian, who was educated for the military profession, and was attached to the army as an artillery officer, but devoted his leisure to the study of archæology and numismatics. His early works upon those sciences obtained a great amount of success. In 1836 he gained a prize from the Institute for his work entitled "An Essay on the Classification of Byzantine Coins," and subsequently became professor of mechanics at the military school of Metz. Having been fortunate enough to secure the notice of the duke of Orleans, eldest son of Louis Philippe, he was appointed conservator of the Museum of Artillery at Paris, and was thus enabled to prosecute his studies under more favourable circumstances. In 1850 he set out for Palestine, with the view of making researches into the antiquities of the Holy Land. Upon his return to France he announced that he had discovered the site of the city of Sodom, and declared that he had ascertained the monuments known as the "Tombs of the Kings" to be, in reality, those of the kings of Judah. He, at the same time, presented to the Louvre a sarcophagus, which he supposed to be that of King David. These assertions provoked an animated discussion in the learned world, but he defended his views with the greatest warmth. About the same time he produced his work entitled "Travels upon the Shores of the Dead Sea and in the Biblical Countries," with maps and plates. He then resumed his archæological studies, and produced, among other valuable works, "Studies on Judaic Numismatics," and also contributed a number of learned papers to the French scientific journals. His latest work was a "History of Judaic Art, founded upon the Sacred and Profane Writings." In 1859 he was created a senator, having previously been elected a member of the Academy of Inscriptions and Belles-Lettres, as well as being created an officer of the Legion of Honour. B. at Lille, 1807.

SAULIEU, sole'-yu(r), a town of France, in the department of Côte-d'Or, 33 miles from Dijon. Manf. Woollens, lace, leather, and hardwares. Pop. 2,800.

SAUMAROIS, so-ma-rwaw', an old subdivision of France, now distributed among the departments Maine-and-Loire, Indre-and-Loire, and Vienne.

SAUMASE. (See SALMASIUS.)

SAUMUR, so'-moor, a town of France, in the department of the Maine-and-Loire, on the Loire, 38 miles from Tours. The principal street traverses the greater part of the town, and contains several elegant buildings, but part of it is not paved, and other parts are inconveniently steep. It has some interesting remains of Roman and Celtic antiquities, but its great attraction is the beauty of the surrounding scenery. Manf. Linens and cambrics. Pop. 14,500.

SAUNDERS'S ISLAND, saun'-ders, an island in the South Atlantic Ocean, so called by Captain Cook. Lat. 57° 49′ S. Lon. 26° 44′ W.

SAUNDERSON, Dr. Nicholas, saun'-der-son, an eminent English mathematician. He lost his sight when twelve months old, by the small-pox, but was sent to the free-school at Penniston, Yorkshire, where he acquired great proficiency in classical learning, though it is not mentioned by what means. At the age of 18 he was introduced to Mr. West, a gentleman of fortune, and a lover of the mathematics, who instructed him in algebra and geometry; and he made such progress that his friends sent him to Cambridge, where he delivered lectures on mathematics to crowded audiences. Having been created master of arts by royal mandate, he was appointed Lucasian professor of mathematics in 1711, and in 1728 he received the degree of doctor of laws, when George II. visited the university. His "Elements of Algebra" were printed at Cambridge in 1740, and his treatise on Fluxions was also printed after his death. B. at Thurleston, Yorkshire, 1682; D. 1739.

SAURIN, James, so'-rā, a celebrated French Protestant divine, who went with his father to Geneva, after the revocation of the edict of Nantes in 1685. In the 17th year of his age he quitted his studies to bear arms in the English service, but soon returned to Geneva. On finishing his education, he went to London, and preached among his fellow exiles for five years. About 1705 he went to Holland, where he became minister of the French church at the Hague. He was an eloquent and majestic preacher. His sermons, in 12 volumes, are impassioned and powerfully persuasive. They have been translated into English by Robinson and Hunter. But his greatest work is entitled "Discourses, Historical, Critical, and Moral, on the most Memorable Events of the Old and New Testament." B. at Nismes, 1677; D. at the Hague, 1730.

SAURIN, Bernard Joseph, a French dramatic poet, and son of the preceding. He was intimate with Voltaire, Montesquieu, and Helvetius, the latter of whom allowed him a pension. He wrote several plays of great merit; as "Spartacus," and "Blanche and Richard," tragedies; and the "Anglomania," a comedy. His dramatic works were printed in 1783. B. at Paris, 1706; D. 1781.

SAURIN, Joseph, a French mathematician, who entered the ministry of the Protestant church; but, in 1690, abjured that religion at Paris, obtained a pension from the government, and devoted himself to mathematical science. He became a member of the Academy of Sciences. John Baptist Rousseau, having been accused of writing some libellous verses against persons of distinction, falsely charged Saurin with being the author. Saurin was, however, acquitted, and his accuser banished. He contributed many valuable papers to the Journal des Savans, and to the Memoirs of the Academy of Sciences; and wrote his own life. B. at Courtaison, Vaucluse, 1659; D. at Paris, 1737.

SAUSMAREZ, James, Lord de, so'-ma-rez, a celebrated English admiral, who entered the royal navy in his 13th year. In 1775 he was promoted to the rank of lieutenant for his brave conduct at the attack upon Charlestown, in America, and became commander in 1781, in reward of his gallant behaviour during the action off the Dogger Bank, between the English fleet, under Sir Hyde Parker, and the Dutch, commanded by Admiral Zoutman. He next distinguished himself in the action wherein Admiral Rodney defeated the French fleet, under the Count de Grasse; and, peace being soon afterwards proclaimed, he returned to Guernsey, his native island. In 1793 hostilities again commenced between the English and the French republic, and Captain Sausmarez was appointed to the Crescent frigate, in which, after a desperate fight off Cherbourg, he captured the French frigate La Réunion. For this service he was knighted. In 1794 he saved a small force of three frigates which had been attacked in the English Channel by an enemy more than doubly superior in numbers. In the following year he signalized himself in the action under Lord Bridport; and, in 1797, he bore a gallant part in the defeat of the Spaniards off Cape St. Vincent. He was second in command at the battle of the Nile, where he was severely wounded. He became a rear-admiral in 1801, and was created a baronet. In the same year he made an attack upon a French and Spanish fleet of ten sail of the line and four frigates, with a force of less than half that number; but although, in consequence of the disabled condition of his vessels, he could not prevent the enemy from re-entering Cadiz, he caused them a loss of three ships and 3,000 men, blown up, killed, or taken prisoners. Hereupon, he was rewarded with the order of the Bath, and received the thanks of parliament, Lord Nelson declaring that "a greater action was never fought." After performing other distinguished services, he was, at the close of the war, in 1814, created full admiral, personally thanked by the allied sovereigns on their visit to England, and subsequently appointed vice-admiral of Great Britain. When William IV. ascended the throne, in 1831, he was created Lord de Sausmarez, of Sausmarez, in the island of Guernsey, and a general of marines. He spent the remainder of his life in quiet retirement upon his estate in Guernsey. The Memoirs and Correspondence of this brave and skilful English seaman have been published by Sir John Ross, and his gallant deeds are narrated in detail in the Naval History of James. B. at St. Peter-Port, Guernsey, 1757; D. in the same island, 1836.

SAUSSURE, Horace Benedict de, sosé'-soor, a celebrated Swiss naturalist, who received his education at the college of Geneva, of which learned establishment he was appointed professor, in his 22nd year. His life was spent in uninterrupted devotion to physical science, either as a teacher, writer, or adventurous explorer. He says, "I had a decided passion for mountains from my infancy. At the age of 18 I had already been several times over the mountains nearest to Geneva; but these were comparatively of little elevation, and by no means satisfied my curiosity. I felt an intense desire to view more closely the high Alps, which, as seen from the summits of these lower mountains, appear so majestic. At length, in 1760, alone and on foot, I visited the glacier of Chamouni, then little frequented, and the ascent of which was regarded not only as difficult but dangerous. I went there again the following year; and, from that time, I have not allowed a single year to elapse without making considerable excursions, and even long journeys, for the purpose of studying mountains. In the course of that period I have traversed the entire chain of the Alps fourteen times by different routes. I have made sixteen other excursions to the central parts of the mountain mass. I have gone over the Jura, the Vosges, the mountains of Switzerland and of part of Germany, those of England, of Italy, and of Sicily, and the adjacent islands. I have visited the ancient volcanoes of Auvergne, a part of the Vivarais, several of the mountains of Forez, of Dauphiny, and of Burgundy. All these journeys I have made with the mineralogist's hammer in my hand, and with no other aim than the study of natural phenomena, clambering up to every accessible summit that promised anything of interest, and always returning with specimens of the minerals and mountains, especially such as afforded confirmations or contradictions of any theory, in order that I might examine and study them at my leisure. I also imposed upon myself the severe task of always making notes upon the spot, and, whenever it was practicable, of writing out my observations in full within the twenty-four hours." This virtuous man and indefatigable philosopher resigned his professorship in 1786, and subsequently became a member of the council of Two Hundred, and later still, when Geneva was united to the French republic, a member of the National Assembly. But the Revolution robbed him of nearly all his property, which had been invested in the public funds. Geology, mineralogy, chemistry, electricity, meteorology, were all advanced by the observations of this original and adventurous mind. He was also the inventor of a thermometer for ascertaining the temperature of water at all depths, an electrometer for showing the electrical condition of the atmosphere, and other valuable philosophical apparatus. His most important works were,—"Essays on Hygrometry," "Dissertatio Physica de Igne," and his invaluable "Travels in the Alps," in 4 volumes. B. at Geneva, 1740; D. at the same place, 1799.

SAUVAGES, Francis Boissier de, so'-vagé', an eminent French physician, who became royal professor of medicine and botany at Montpellier, member of the Royal Society of London, and of several other learned bodies. He was called the Boerhaave of Languedoc, and during thirty years laboured at a work in which he sought to classify diseases in a methodical system. His most important works were "Medical Nosology" (in Latin), "Methodus Foliorum," and a translation of Hale's "Statistical Essays," from the English. B. at Alais, Lower Languedoc, 1706; D. 1767.

SAUVAL, Henry, so'-val, an eminent French historian, who, after a laborious study of the archives and maps relating to the city of Paris, produced a learned and voluminous work, entitled "History and Researches relative to Paris." This monument of patient labour and erudition was published after the author's death, in 1724, with notes and illustrations by de Launoy, A. Galland, and others. B. at Paris, 1620; D. 1670.

SAUVES, Charlotte de Beaune-Semblancay, Baroness de, sove, a French lady, who was equally distinguished for her beauty and wit. She was one of the attendants upon Catherine de' Medici, and was beloved by the king of Navarre, afterwards Henry IV., over whom she, for a long time, held considerable ascendancy. She was subsequently married to the marquis de Noirmoutiers. B. 1551; D. 1617.

SAUVETERRE, sove'-tair', the name of several parishes and towns of France, none with a population above 2,500.

SAUVEUR, Joseph, so'-vu(r), an eminent French mathematician, who was dumb till he was seven years of age and even then his organs of speech were so imperfect that he was never able to speak distinctly. From an early age he evinced a capacity for the study of mathematics, which he cultivated at the Jesuits' college, Paris, and at the age of 20 had Prince Eugene for a pupil. In 1686 he was appointed mathematical professor of the Royal College. He wrote a treatise on fortification, and another on music, besides several papers in the Memoirs of the Academy of Sciences, of which he was a member. B. at La Flèche, 1653; D. 1716.

SAVAGE, Richard, sav'-aj, an English poet, who was the natural son of the countess of Macclesfield, by Earl Rivers. This unnatural woman caused him to be brought up without a knowledge of his origin, and framed a story of his death, to prevent his father from leaving him a proper support. After the death of his nurse, he found some papers which disclosed the secret of his birth; but every effort made by him to gain his mother's favour was ineffectual. Having the misfortune to kill a man in a tavern broil, his mother devised every possible means to get him executed; and when he was condemned, she endeavoured to prevent his receiving a royal pardon. His friends, however, procured him a reprieve, and Lord Tyrconnel took him into his family. But the temper and conduct of Savage were most unfortunate: he quarrelled with his patron and was discarded. Queen Caroline allowed him a pension of £50, which he lost at her death, and was reduced to great distress. Savage had considerable genius, but it was uncultivated. He wrote some plays and poetical pieces, the best of which is the poem entitled "The Bastard." Dr. Johnson, who, at the outset of his career, was the companion of the poet's distress, wrote his biography, which is the best piece in the "Lives of the Poets." B. 1698; D. in the debtors' prison, Bristol, 1743.

SAVAGE ISLANDS, a group in the South Pacific Ocean. The largest is 33 miles in circumference. Lat. 19° 1′ S. Lon. 169° 37′ W.

SAVANNAH, sa-văn'-na, a river of the United States, which is formed by the union of the Tugalo and Keowee, 100 miles above Augusta. It separates South Carolina from Georgia, and runs south-east into the Atlantic. It is navigable for large vessels to the town of Savannah, and for boats to Augusta, 340 miles above Savannah. Total course, about 500 miles.

SAVANNAH, a city and port of entry of the United States, in Chatham county, Georgia, on the Savannah, 17 miles from its mouth, and 85 from Charlestown. It contains a court-house, a gaol, an almshouse, hospitals, a theatre, public library, academies, exchange, and churches for different sects. A large proportion of the houses are handsomely built of brick. The city is regularly laid out, and the squares and public walks are planted with China trees, which contribute much to the ornament, comfort, and salubrity of the place. It is the great emporium of the state, and is a place of much trade. On the east side of the city is Fort Wayne; at Five-Fathom Hole is Fort Jackson; and on Tybee Island, near the mouth of the river, is a lighthouse. Pop. 25,000. Lat. 32° 8′ N. Lon. 81° 10′ W.

SAVARIN, Anthelme BRILLAT-, săv'-ra-răn, an eminent French writer upon gastronomy, who at first pursued the profession of an advocate, and was afterwards deputy to the Constituent Assembly, and member of the Court of Cassation. He emigrated to America in 1793, but returned to his native country three years afterwards, and resumed his functions at the Court of Cassation. He produced some minor pieces relative to his profession, but the work which has rendered his name famous is the "Physiologie du Goût," a philosophical treatise upon gastronomy and "good living," abounding in wit and epigram. B. at Belley, 1755; D. 1826.

SAVARY, Anne Jean Marie, duke of Rovigo, sa'-va-re, a celebrated French general, who entered the army in 1789, and in four years became a captain. At the battle of Marengo, in 1800, he was aide-de-camp to General Desaix, and, upon the death of that commander, was attached to the person of Bonaparte in the same capacity. In 1802 the first consul appointed him head of the secret police, and while holding that post, he had the superintendence of the Duke d'Enghien's execution. In 1805 he was created general of division, and, after distinguishing himself at Austerlitz, Eylau, Ostrolenka, and Friedland, he received the title of duke of Rovigo, and was nominated governor of Prussia. He was, in 1808, appointed to the command-in-chief of the army of Spain, and retained it until the arrival of Joseph Bonaparte. In 1810 he succeeded the duke of Otranto as minister of general police, and although he failed to discover the plot of General Mallet before it had almost attained to maturity, he succeeded in justifying himself with the emperor, who, on hearing of the conspiracy, had hastily returned from Russia. In 1815 his devotion to the fortunes of Napoleon caused him to follow the deposed potentate to Rochfort, and he even requested to be allowed to accompany him to St. Helena, but was refused permission by the British government. His unpopularity with his countrymen was very great, and he only emerged from obscurity on two subsequent occasions—in 1823, when he attempted to vindicate his conduct in the execution of the Duke d'Enghien, but only drew upon himself greater discredit, before which he was compelled to leave France; and again in 1831-33, when he held the command in Algeria. B. at Mans, 1774; D. 1833.

SAVARY, James, a French merchant, who acquired a fortune by commerce, after which he became secretary to the king. He wrote the "Complete Merchant," which passed through many editions. He also had a principal share in the drawing up of the commercial code known as the "Code Savary." B. at Douay, 1622; D. 1690. His sons, James and Philemon, published their father's work, under the title of a "Universal Dictionary of Commerce."

SAVARY, Nicholas, an eminent French traveller, who, in 1776, went to Egypt; whence he travelled through Greece and the islands of the Archipelago. On his return to France, about 1781, he published the "Koran," translated from the Arabic; "Letters on Egypt;" and "Letters on Greece." B. at Vitré, 1750; D. 1788.

SAVE, sav, a river of the Austrian empire, rising in Illyria, and, after a course of 550 miles, joining the Danube between Semlin and Belgrade.

SAVENDROOG, sa'-ven-droog, a fortress of the south of India, in the province of Mysore, 20 miles from Bangalore. Lat. 12° 56′ N. Lon. 77° 29′ E.—This place, in 1791, was captured by the British without the loss of a man.

SAVERNE, sa'-vairn, a well-built town of France, in the department of the Lower Rhine, 22 miles from Strasburg. Manf. Woollen fabrics, hosiery, and hardware goods. Pop. 6,500.

SAVEUR, St., sa'-vu(r'), the name of numerous parishes and places in France, none of them with a population above 3,000.

SAVIGLIANO, sa'-veel-ye-a'-no, a fortified town of Sardinia, 9 miles from Saluzzo. It has several convents and a Benedictine abbey. Manf. Woollens, silks, and linens. Pop. 19,000.—Here the French defeated the Austrians, in 1799.

SAVIGNANO, sa-veen-ya'-no, the name of two market-towns in Italy, neither with a population above 4,200.

SAVIGNY, sa-veen'-ye, the name of numerous parishes and places in France, with populations not above 3,000.

SAVIGNY, Frederick Charles Von, an eminent German jurist, who was, in 1808, appointed professor of law in the university of Landshut, Bavaria, and subsequently fulfilled similar functions in the university of Berlin. His works upon jurisprudence take the highest rank, the principal being,—"History of the Roman Law in the Middle Ages;" "Legal History of Nobility in Modern Europe;" and "The System of Modern Roman Law." B. at Frankfort-on-the Maine, 1770.

SAVILE, George. (See HALIFAX, Marquis of.)

SAVILE, Sir Henry, săv'-il, a learned English mathematician, who became fellow and warden of Merton College, Oxford, and provost of Eton college. James I., on his accession, conferred on him the honour of knighthood. He was a munificent patron of learning, and founded two professorships at Oxford, one of astronomy and the other of geometry. He published editions of St. Chrysostom's works, translated part of Tacitus, and wrote a treatise on Military Affairs, or the Roman warfare, &c. B. near Halifax, 1549; D. at Eton, 1622.

SAVILE, Sir George, a public-spirited and patriotic English senator, who distinguished himself by his opposition to the American war, and by bringing in the bill for repealing the penal statutes against the Roman Catholics; for which his house was destroyed in the memorable riots of June, 1780. B. 1725; D. 1784.

SAVIN, ST, sa'-vă, the name of several parishes and places in France, none with a population above 3,000.

SAVIO, sa'-be-o, a river of Italy, in the States of the Church, entering the Adriatic after a course of 50 miles.

SAVOCA, sa-vo'-ka, a town of the island of Sicily, 8 miles from Taormina. Pop. 3,000.

SAVONA, sa-vo'-na, a well-built maritime town of Sardinia, in the Genoese territory, 25 miles from Genoa. It had formerly two harbours; but one of these, spacious and secure, was filled up by the Genoese. It was once a place of great trade, but in 1648, an explosion of 1,000 barrels of gunpowder, deposited in the citadel, destroyed the half of the houses. Manf. The principal are silk goods, wool, and heavy iron ware. Pop. 12,000.

SAVONAROLA, sa-vo-na-ro'-la, an Italian monk, of the order of Dominicans, who became a celebrated preacher at Florence, where he publicly declaimed against the vices of the priests and the corruptions of the Roman church, for which he was excommunicated by the pope, and condemned to the flames; which sentence was executed in 1498. He wrote Sermons, a treatise entitled "The Triumph of the Cross," and other works. D. at Ferara, 1452.

SAVOY, sa-voi', a duchy in the S. of Europe, formerly the N.W. part of the continental states of the kingdom of Sardinia. It is bounded W. by France and E. by Piedmont. Area, 4,270 square miles. Desc. In the highest degree bleak and rugged: mountains, rocks, precipices, forests, and roaring waters,—all the materials of the sublime, are its characteristic features. It is the region of Mont Blanc, Mont St. Bernard, Mont Cenis, Mont Iseran, Mont Valaison, and Mont Toumet, all connected together, and forming a stupendous barrier between Savoy and Piedmont. The plough is of use only in the valleys. The high grounds are, however, cultivated with great industry; and, by various ingenious contrivances, are made productive. Rivers. The Rhone, Arne, Drause, and Isère. Lakes. The principal are Annecy and Bourget. Pro. Wheat, oats, barley, rye, and hemp. The slopes of the mountains are covered with pasture, and, in favourable situations, with vines. Minerals. Iron, copper, silver, lead, coal, and salt. The forests supply fuel, both for working these and for domestic purposes. Pop. 620,000. The revolutionary war brought Savoy under subjection to France as early as the close of 1792, and so it remained above 21 years. In 1815, the king of Sardinia took part with the allies, and obtained the restoration of the country of his ancestors, with the exception of a small district. Under Napoleon I. it formed the department Mont Blanc, and part of that of Leman. In 1860 this duchy was ceded, along with Nice, to Napoleon III., by Victor Emmanuel, as a requital for the military services rendered to Sardinia by France.

SAVU, sa-voo', an island of the Asiatic archipelago, subordinate to the Dutch. Ext. 25 miles long and 8 broad. It is beautiful and fertile. Pop. 35,000. Lat. 10° 35′ S. Lon. 122° 30′ E.

SAWUNT WARREE, sa-woont' war-re', a state of India, in the presidency of Bombay. Area, 800 square miles. Pop. 145,000. Lat. between 15° 38′ and 16° 15′ N. Lon. between 73° 40′ and 74° 22′ E.

SAX, sax, a town of Spain, 27 miles from Alicante. Manf. Flour, with numerous distilleries. Pop. 2,200.

SAXBY, sax'-be, the name of several parishes in England, none of them with a population above 500.

SAXE, sax, a prefix to the names of several German states.

SAXE, Marshal (Count Maurice of Saxony), was the natural son of Frederick Augustus I., elector of Saxony and king of Poland, and of the countess of Koniugsmark. From his childhood he evinced proofs of a martial spirit. In 1709 he served with Prince Eugene and Marlborough in the Netherlands. He next displayed great valour under his father, in the war against the Swedes, particularly at the siege of Stralsund. In 1717 he was with Prince Eugene in Hungary, where he raised the siege of Belgrade, and contributed to the defeat of the Turks. After the peace of Utrecht he went to France, where the duke of Orleans, at that time regent, gave him the rank of Marechal-de-camp. Having obtained a regiment, he employed himself in improving military tactics, and introducing a new system of manœuvres. In 1726 the States of Courland elected him their sovereign, on which Poland and Russia joined against him, and, after a brave defence, the count was obliged to quit the government and the country. He then returned to France, where he applied to the study of the mathematics, and wrote his Reveries. On the death of his father, in 1733, war was rekindled between France and Austria, and the elector of Saxony, his brother, offered him the command of his forces, which he declined, giving the preference to the French service. He then joined marshal the duke of Berwick on the Rhine, and displayed great skill and bravery at the siege of Philipsburg, for which he was made lieutenant-general. In 1741 the count took Prague, which was followed by the capture of Egra. In 1744 he was made marshal of France, and commander-in-chief in Flanders. The next year he gained the battle of Fontenoy, though he was so ill as to be carried on a litter. This victory was followed by the fall of several strong towns, particularly Brussels. In 1746 he gained the battle of Rocoux, and the same year was appointed marshal of all the French armies, governor of all the places conquered in the Low Countries, and loaded with honours by Louis XV. Marshal Saxe was a ripe and good soldier both theoretically and practically, though his literary acquirements were of a mean order; but his work upon military matters nevertheless contains much that is valuable. It was translated into English by Sir William Fawcett, under the title of "The Reveries, or Memoirs upon the Art of War, by Field-Marshal Count Saxe." He was a man of great size and extraordinary personal strength—one of his feats was the breaking in two of a French coin of about an equal size with an English crown-piece. B. at Dresden, 1696; D. in France, 1750.

SAXE-ALTENBURG, al'-ten-boorg, a duchy of Central Germany, in the old district of Saxony, inclosed by the Prussian states. Area, 510 square miles. Pop. 140,000.

SAXE-COBURG-GOTHA, ko'-boorg-go'-ta, a duchy of Central Germany, in the old district of Saxony, inclosed by Prussia, Bavaria, Saxony, Saxe-Meiningen, and Weimar. Area, 799 square miles. Pop. 160,000.

SAXE-MEININGEN-HILDBURGHAUSEN, mi'-ning-en hild-boorg-how'-sen, a duchy of central Germany, surrounded by various Prussian states, with Bavaria on the S. Area, 970 square miles. Pop. 170,000.

SAXE-WEIMAR-EISENACH, vi'-mar i'-sen-ak, a grand-duchy of central Germany, and the largest of the Saxon principalities. It consists of three detached portions of territory,—the principality of Weimar, that of Eisenach, and the circle of Neustadt, with several small territories in other states. Prussia, Bavaria, and other Saxon duchies, inclose it. Area, 1,418 square miles. Pop. 250,000.

SAXLINGHAM, sax'-ling-ham, the name of several parishes in England, none with a population above 700.

SAXO, sax'-o, surnamed "Grammaticus," a Danish historian, who went to Paris in 1177, and became a member of the religious order of St. Geneviève. He wrote the "History of the Northern Nations," founded upon the popular traditions; the "Icelandic Sagas;" and the "Songs of the Scalds." B. in Denmark; D. about 1204.

SAXONY, KINGDOM OF, sax'-o-ne, is situate towards the N.E. of Germany, and is bounded S. by Bohemia and N. by the Prussian states. Political Divisions. These consist of four circles, namely, Dresden, Leipzig, Zwickau, and Bautzen. Area, 6,777 square miles. Desc. In shape Saxony resembles a triangle, of which the longest line is the frontier on the side of Bohemia, formed by a range of mountains, extending in a long line from south-west to north-east. In the southern and mountainous parts, the valleys only are well cultivated; but in the level districts in the north, tillage is general. The mean elevation of the country is about 1,100 feet. Rivers. The principal are the Elbe, the two Elsters, the two Muldas, the Queiss, and the Saale Pro. Wheat, barley, oats, and other grain; also tobacco and hops; and in a few situations of favourable exposure, vines. Fruit is extensively cultivated, and a fourth of the surface is covered with excellent timber The breed of the Merino sheep is celebrated, and yields valuable wool, and the cattle are of a superior kind Horses are not extensively reared. Minerals. Few countries equal Saxony in mineral riches, and in none has this department of natural history been more fully described. The topaz is frequently found, also chrysolites, amethysts, chalcedonies, cornelians, agates, jasper, garnets, and tourmalins; and among the coarser stones, serpentine, asbest, amianthus, barytes, and fluates of lime. The porcelain clay in the neighbourhood of Meissen is well known; here are also fullers'-earth, terra-sigillata, and other minerals with an argillaceous base: petrifactions are very common. The lofty primitive mountains abound in iron; the secondary in copper and lead. Next to these are arsenic, cobalt, antimony, manganese, zinc, sulphur, alum, vitriol, and borax. The salt mines and springs of Saxony are included in the districts ceded in 1815 to Prussia. There are also a few silver-mines. Manf. These comprise linen and woollen goods, stockings, fine porcelain called Dresden china, cotton-spinning and silks. Tanneries are general, and paper manufactories are numerous. Every town of consequence has breweries and distilleries. At Dresden, also, there are foundries of cannon and balls. Exp. These comprise minerals, linen, yarn, woollens, and lace. Imp. Silk, flax, cotton, coffee, sugar, wine, and, in certain seasons, corn. Education. Good; public instruction being well developed, and the university of Leipzig is one of the best in Germany. Gov. An hereditary limited monarchy. Army, 26,000. Pop. about 2,000,000. Lat. between 50° 10′ and 51° 28′ N. Lon. between 11° 35′ and 15° 3′ E. After being, during many centuries, an electorate, Saxony was formed, in 1806, into a kingdom, in consequence of the occupancy of Prussia by Napoleon I. The king of Saxony, as a member of the Germanic confederation, has the fourth rank in the smaller, and four votes at the larger assembly.

Say, John Baptist, sai, an eminent French writer upon pohtical economy, who was among the first to popularize that study in his native country. His chief works were, a treatise and a Catechism of Political Economy, and "Letters to Malthus upon various Questions in Political Economy." B. at Lyons, 1767; D. at Paris, 1832.

Scævola. (See Mutius.)

Scala, Bartholomew, skal'-la, an Italian statesman, who was held in great esteem by Cosmo, duke of Tuscany, and obtained several honourable appointments in his native country. He wrote a "History of Florence" in Latin; "Letters," and other works. B. at Florence, about 1424; D. 1497.

Scala Nova, no'-va, a well-built seaport-town of Asia Minor, 40 miles from Smyrna. It stands on a slope rising from the sea, and has mosques and public baths. Pop. 20,000.

Scalfa, skal'-fa, the name of two small islands of the Hebrides, neither with a population above 300.

Scaliger, Julius Cæsar, skal'-e-jer, a learned Italian writer, who in his youth became page to the emperor Maximilian, and afterwards served in the army, which he quitted to study Greek and Latin, and the science of medicine. He accompanied the bishop of Agen to France, as physician, in 1525, and remained there till his death. He was a man of extraordinary acquirements, both in science and in the learned languages; but it is as a commentator upon the Greek and Latin writers that his fame chiefly rests. His most important works were a "Treatise on the Art of Poetry," "Exercitations against Cardan," "Commentaries on Aristotle's History of Animals," "Notes, Dissertations, and Commentaries upon the Greek and Latin Classics," and Latin poems. B. in Italy, 1481; D. at Agen, 1558.

Scaliger, Joseph Justus, a distinguished French scholar, who was son of the preceding. He studied at the college of Bordeaux, and afterwards at Paris. Becoming a Calvinist, he, in 1593, removed to Leyden, and obtained a professorship. Scaliger was a man of the most extensive learning, but petulant and illiberal. His principal works are, "De Emendatione Temporum," in which he established a sound system of chronology; Latin epistles, commentaries, and annotations upon ancient classics, and Latin poems. B. at Agen, France, 1540; D. at Leyden, 1609

Scamander, or Xanthus, ska-man'-der, a river of the plain of Troy, in Asia Minor, rising immediately beneath the site of old Troy, and falling into the Ægean Sea.

Scamozzi, Vincent, ska-mot'-se, a celebrated Italian architect, whose principal works are at Venice, and the most remarkable is the citadel of Palma. He composed a treatise on his art, of great merit, entitled "Architettura Universale." B. at Vicenza, 1552; D. at Venice, 1616.

Scandaretta, or Scanderoon. (See Alexandretta.)

Scander-Beg, or George Castriota, skan-der-beg', a prince of Albania. He was given by his father, John Castriota, with his three brothers, as hostages to Amurath II., who caused him to be educated as a Mussulman, and placed him in command of 5,000 cavalry. On the death of his father, in 1432, he formed the design of recovering the throne of his ancestors; and being sent against Hungary, he entered into a secret treaty with Humades Corvinus, king of that country, seized the sultan's secretary, and compelled him to write and seal an order to the governor of Albania, commanding him to deliver the capital to Scander-Beg. He then repaired thither, and ascended the throne in 1443. Amurath led siege to Croia, the capital of Albania, but was twice defeated. The war was continued by his successor, Mahomet II., till 1461, when the independence of the country was settled by treaty. Scander-Beg afterwards went to Italy, to assist Ferdinand, king of Aragon, who was closely besieged in Bari. The Albanian hero relieved the place, and contributed to the defeat of the count of Anjou. B. 1404; D. in the states of Venice, 1467.

Scandiana, skan-de-a'-na, a market-town of N. Italy, 12 miles from Modena. Pop. 2,500.

Scandinavia, skan'-di-nai'-vi-a, a general name given by the ancients to the great tract of country lying to the north of Germany, comprising Denmark, Norway, and Sweden. (See Norway and Sweden.)

Scania, or Schonen, ska'-ne-a, an old province of Sweden, in South Gothland, now divided into the districts Malmoë and Christianstad.

Scapula, John, skà'-pu-la, a learned lexicographer, who completed his education at Lausanne, after which he was employed in the printing-office of Henri Etienne, or Stephens, at Paris, and while engaged in correcting the famous "Thesaurus Linguæ Græcæ," Scapula made a secret abridgment, which was printed in 1580, under the title of a Greek Lexicon, and proved the ruin of Etienne, whose work was expensive. B. probably at Lausanne, about 1540; D. at Paris, about 1600.

Scarba, skar'-ba, a small island of the Hebrides, separated from the north end of Jura by a narrow sound. Ext. About 3 miles long and 3 broad. It has a height of about 1,500 feet above the level of the sea.

Scarborough, skar'-bur-o, a market and seaport-town of the North Riding of Yorkshire, 37 miles from York. It stands in the recess of a beautiful bay, on the borders of the German Ocean, and rising from the shore in the form of an amphitheatre. The principal streets are spacious and well paved. The buildings on the cliff stand almost unrivalled in respect of situation, having in front a beautiful terrace, nearly 100 feet above the level of the sands, and commanding a variety of delightful prospects. The public buildings are a town-hall, Trinity-house, an hospital, a theatre, the Cliff bridge, a philosophical society, and a museum. The parish church formerly belonged to a Cistercian monastery, and there are various other places of worship for different denominations of Christians. The ruins of the ancient castle form a very picturesque object, and great ornament to the town. The promontory on which they stand rises nearly 300 feet above the level of the sea, which washes the bottom of it on the north-east and south sides. This fortress was built about the year 1136, and became the scene of many important transactions in English history. The harbour is the only haven of consequence on the eastern coast, between the Humber and Tynemouth; hence it is much resorted to during the violent easterly storms which often prevail here. It is extensive and commodious, of easy access, and has been much improved by extensive works erected at different times. Scarborough is a great public resort in summer. Pop. 13,000.—It has a station on the North Midland Railway. As no mention of Scarborough is made in the Doomsday-book, it is supposed not to have existed before the Norman conquest.

SCARBOROUGH, the principal town of the British W. India island of Tobago, on its E. coast. Pop. Unascertained. Lat. 11° 6′ N. Lon. 60° 30′ W.

SCARLATTI, Alexander, skar-lat'-te, an eminent Italian composer, who was the founder of the Neapolitan school of music. He is said to have written two hundred masses, a hundred operas, and three thousand cantatas. His writings, although they produced a revolution in the style of operatic music, are almost all completely forgotten. B. at Naples, 1650; D. in Sweden, 1735.

SCARLATTI, Domenico, an eminent Italian composer, and the son of the preceding, who made the acquaintance, at Venice, of Handel, to whom he was ardently attached, and followed to Rome. In 1735 he was appointed master of the royal chapel at Madrid, and teacher to the queen of Spain. He wrote several operas, and a collection of pieces for the harpsichord, which were once highly popular. B. 1683; D. at Madrid, 1751.

SCARLETT, James. (See ABINGER, Lord.)

SCARPA, Antonio, skar'-pa, a celebrated Italian physician and writer upon medicine, who was born of parents in very humble circumstances, but was, through the liberality of a distant relation, enabled to pursue his studies at the university of Padua, where he distinguished himself by his assiduity. In 1772 he was invited to fulfil the professorship of anatomy at the university of Modena, and subsequently became surgeon-in-chief to the military hospital of the same city. After visiting France and England, in both of which countries he made the acquaintance of the most illustrious physicians of the time, he, in 1783, became professor of anatomy in the university of Pavia. In 1814 he was appointed director of the Medical Faculty of Pavia. A simple enumeration of the titles of the various works of this great physician would occupy almost a column of this dictionary; but there was not one of them that had not a practical value. He wrote upon the anatomy of the organs of smell; of hearing; upon the cure of aneurism, hernia, the diseases of the eye; on the operation for the stone; and decided in the affirmative the question whether the heart was supplied with nerves, a disputed point until his time. Indeed there was scarcely a department of medical science which did not engross his attention or was not illuminated by his valuable writings. B. at La Motta, Friuli, 1748; D. at Pavia, 1832.

SCARPANTO, or KOJE, skar-pan'-to, the ancient Carpathos, a small island in the Mediterranean, between Candia and Rhodes, 28 miles from Rhodes. Ext. 30 miles long, with a breadth of 8. It has several harbours, and at its N.W. extremity a village of the same name.

SCARRON, Paul, skar'-rawng, a celebrated French burlesque writer. In order to propitiate his father, a wealthy counsellor of the parliament, he entered into the ecclesiastical state, and obtained a canonry at Mans; but his conduct was characterized by the utmost license. Once during the carnival, he and three of his companions daubed their bodies with honey, and afterwards rolled in feathers. Thus plumed, they went forth; but the people attacked them, and, to escape from their assailants, they hid themselves in the rushes on the banks of the river Sarthe. Scarron alone survived the cold and exposure to which the unfeathered bipeds had been subjected, but at the cost of remaining a cripple for life. He subsequently removed to Paris, where he found employment as a playwright, and obtained a pension of 500 crowns from Anne of Austria. In 1652 he married Mademoiselle d'Aubigné, afterwards the famous Madame de Maintenon; and thenceforth he passed his days as the head of a witty and brilliant society which made his home its rendezvous. Scarron, who was a man of infinite humour, maintained his cheerfulness, and indeed made a joke of his sufferings, throughout his life. He wrote a number of comedies; a travesty of Virgil's "Æneid;" several poems; and the "Roman Comique," which has been translated into English by Oliver Goldsmith. The best edition of his work is that of Paris, 1786. D. at Paris, about 1610; D. at the same city, 1660.

SCHADOW, Johann Gottfried, sha'-dow, an eminent German sculptor, who studied at Rome, and, upon returning to Berlin in 1788, obtained ample employment. His finest works are, the monument to Count Von der Mark; the equestrian statues of Frederick the Great and of Field-Marshal Blucher; and the sculpture on the mint at Berlin. He was professor, and afterwards director, of the Academy of the Fine Arts at Berlin. His writings upon art were valuable; the most important of them being, "Polyklet, or the Groups of Mankind, according to their Races and Periods;" and "National Physiognomy, or Observations upon the Distinction of the Features, and of the External Form of Human Heads." B. at Berlin, 1764; D. at the same city, 1850.—Two of his sons, Rudolph and Frederick William, became distinguished as artists; the first as sculptor, and the latter as an historical painter. Rudolph D. at Rome, in his 37th year, 1822.

SCHÆSBURG, or SCHASSBURG, shass'-boorg, a town of Transylvania, near the Great Kockel, 120 miles from Temesvar. It is divided into an Upper and a Lower town. Pop. 6,000.

SCHAFFHAUSEN, shaf-how'-sen, one of the best towns in the N. of Switzerland, near the frontiers of Suabia, on the Rhine, 23 miles from Zurich. It is a place of antiquity, and has a large parish church, an academy, town library, town-hall, and market-house. Manf. Cotton, silk, and leather, and it exports the wine raised in the neighbourhood. A wooden bridge, of very ingenious construction, is here thrown across the Rhine, and forms a channel of communication between this town and the rest of Switzerland. Pop. 8,000.—The FALL OF SCHAFFHAUSEN is a cataract of the Rhine, 3 miles from the town, and has a descent of about 100 feet. It is one of the most striking waterfalls in Europe.

SCHAFFHAUSEN, a canton in the N. of Switzerland, separated by the Rhine from the cantons of Zurich and Thurgau. Area, 116 square miles. Desc. Undulating, with a fertile soil. Pop. about 35,000, mostly Protestants.

SCHALCKEN, Godfrey, shal'-ken, an eminent Dutch painter, who was a disciple of Gerard Douw, and resided for some time in London, where he painted a remarkable portrait of William III. by candlelight, the king himself holding the candle. B. at Dort, 1643; D. at the Hague, 1706.

SCHAMYL, sha'-mil, the prophet and supreme military chieftain of the Circassians, who commenced his warlike career in 1824, by ardently throwing himself into the struggle which Kasi-Mollah, the supreme chief of his country at that period, had commenced against the Russians. Until the year 1831 the Circassians successfully maintained themselves against their enemies; but, at that date, General Rosen, with a formidable army, drove them from all their positions, and besieged them in the stronghold of Himry, in the north of Daghestan, which place was taken, though with great loss to the Russians. Kasi-Mollah and nearly all his followers perished, and Schamyl was left for dead upon the sanguinary field. When he re-appeared, it was thought he had risen from death, and he found his fellow-countrymen acting under another chief, whose commands he himself prepared to obey implicitly. This chief was, however, shortly afterwards slain with all his bodyguard, of which Schamyl was one, although he once more escaped as if by a miracle. From this time he came to be regarded as their born leader by the Circassians, who, moreover, so great was his character for piety, began to look upon him as a prophet. In 1836 he preached a holy war against the Russians, which he sustained during nearly a quarter of a century, keeping large armies in check with a mere handful of men, defending step by step his native fastnesses, and, by a mixture of skill and audacity, drawing his antagonists into ambuscades, or compelling them to beat disastrous retreats. In 1859, however, he found himself deserted by many of the native chieftains, whose co-operation was necessary to enable him to maintain the struggle against the power and resources of Russia. He and his son were taken prisoners, and Russia became mistress of a territory which she had so long coveted, and for which she had lavished so much blood and treasure. Schamyl might be termed not alone the Abd-el-Kader, but also the Mahomet of the Caucasus. B. at the village of Himry, Daghestan, 1797.

SCHAUMBURG-LIPPE, shoum'-boorg lip'-pe, a principality of Germany, with an area of 207 square miles and a population of about 30,000.

SCHEELE, Charles William, shal'-le(r), a celebrated Prussian chemist, who was at first an apprentice and assistant to an apothecary at Gottenburg, but afterwards set up in business on his own account at Upsal. With the exception of Priestley, no person made so many discoveries in chemistry as Scheele. He made known oxygen gas, chlorine, tartaric acid, fluoric acid, barytes, and the arsenite of copper, or mineral green, &c.; he was also one of the founders of organic chemistry. His treatises and memoirs, contributed to the Transactions of the Royal Academy of Stockholm, of which he was a member, were republished, under the title of "Collection of Researches made by C. W. Scheele into Natural Philosophy and Chemistry;" Berlin, 1793. Another important work of his was the "Chemical Observations and Experiments on Air and Fire." B. at Stralsund, Pomerania, 1742; D. at Köping, near Stockholm, 1786.

SCHEEMAKERS, Peter, shal'-ma-kers, an eminent Flemish sculptor, who took up his residence in England, and became the rival of Roubillac and Rysbrack. His best works are the monuments to Shakspere, Dryden, and the duke of Albemarle, in Westminster Abbey; the bronze statue of Guy in Guy's Hospital; and those of Major Lawrence and Lord Clive in the old India-House. In 1770 he returned to Antwerp. B. at Antwerp, 1691; D. at the same city, about 1773.

SCHEFFER, Ary, shef'-fer, an eminent French historical painter, who, after studying in Holland, went to Paris, where he finished his artistic education under Baron Guerin. In 1812 he exhibited his first picture at the Paris Exhibition, and from that time rose rapidly to the highest position both as an historical and genre painter. His manner partook of the lofty and devotional character of the modern German school, combined with a certain Gallic style of colour and effect. As a portrait-painter he was likewise eminently successful, his best works in this line of art being the portrait of Charles Dickens, exhibited at the Royal Academy in 1856; Talleyrand, Lamartine, and the exqueen of the French. Many of his finest productions have been made familiar to the English public through the medium of the engraver's art; as for example, the reproductions of his "Faust," "Mignon," "Francesa da Rimini and her Lover meeting Dante and Virgil in Hell," and Byron's "Giaour." Some critics have desired more colour, movement, and vigour in his paintings; but, as a distinguished French writer observes, "The materialist brilliancy of colour would add too much of the substantial to the charming effects of his brush, which he himself chose rather to give just so much of life as was necessary to the expression of the finest shades of sentiment." He was an officer of the Legion of Honour, and received many other acknowledgments from the different continental governments, of his genius as an artist. B. 1795; D. 1858.

SCHEFFER, Arnold, a modern French writer, and brother of the preceding, who produced a "History of Germany," "The English Nation and Government," and other historical works. As a political writer he was one of the most determined opponents of the government of Louis Philippe. B. 1796; D. 1853.

SCHEFFER, Henry, a modern French painter, and brother of the preceding, who became chevalier of the Legion of Honour, and produced some fine works, the best of which were "Joan of Arc on her way to Execution," and "Charlotte Corday removed from the Corpse of Marat." B. 1799.

SCHELDT, or SCHELDE, shelt, a river of France and the Netherlands, rising in the French department of the Aisne, and flowing in a northerly direction past Cambray, Bouchain, and Denain, to Valenciennes, where it becomes navigable. It passes Conde, Tournay, and Oudenarde, and, reaching Ghent, is joined by the Lys. From Ghent it winds its course to Antwerp, where it is divided into the two branches of East and West Scheldt, both of which discharge themselves into the German Ocean. Total course about 200 miles.

SCHELFSTADT, shelf'-stat, a parish and town of France, in the department of the Lower Rhine, on a canal that communicates with the Ille, 26 miles from Strasburg. Manf. Tobacco, caps, stockings, saltpetre, potash, soap, and earthenware. Pop. 10,500.—It has a station on the Strasburg and Basil Railway.

SCHELLING, Frederick Augustus, shel'-ling, a German novelist, who at first served in the army, and attained the grade of captain of artillery in 1807, but retired shortly afterwards, and took up his residence at Dresden, where he composed a great number of romances, which were highly popular in Germany. He also wrote a drama entitled "Elise de Colmar." B. at Dresden, 1766; D. at the same city, 1839.

SCHELLING, Frederick William Joseph, an eminent German metaphysician, who succeeded Fichte as professor of philosophy in the university of Jena. At first an ardent advocate for the theories of the latter philosopher, he gradually drew away from them, until, in 1802, he established a new set of philosophical ideas, an account of which was given to the German public in a work entitled "Essay upon the Difference in the Systems of Schelling and Fichte." In time these new philosophical ideas superseded those of Fichte, just as Schelling's theories were at a later period supplanted by the Hegelian philosophy. In 1841 he became professor at the university of Berlin, in which city he continued to reside until his death. His most important works were,—"On the System of Transcendental Idealism;" "Discourse on the Philosophy of Art" (translated into English); and "The Philosophy of Nature." B. at Leonberg, Würtemburg, 1775; D. at Berlin, 1854.

SCHEMNITZ, or SELMECZ-BANJA, shem-nitz', a royal free mining-town in the north-west of Hungary, in the midst of the most picturesque scenery, near the Raab, 45 miles from Gran. It is irregularly built, on account of the unevenness of the surface. The mines of Schemnitz are the most extensive in Hungary, and are hardly surpassed by any in Europe. The chief metals are gold, silver, and lead, combined with copper and arsenic. Pop., with suburbs, 20,000, mostly employed in the mines. Below the mines is the adit constructed by Joseph II., which can be used both as a canal and a railway, and which is considered a magnificent work of engineering skill.

SCHENECTADY, she'-nek-ta-de, a county of New York, U.S., on the Mohawk. Area, 186 square miles. Pop. 22,000.

SCHENECTADY, a post-township and capital of Schenectady county, New York, U.S., on the Mohawk, 15 miles from Albany. It is regularly laid out, and contains a court-house, a gaol, a college, an academy for young ladies, several churches, and schools. Manf. Cotton fabrics, tobacco, carpets, paper, machinery, leather, iron, and brass goods. Pop. 10,000.

SCHEVENINGEN, shkev'-en-ing-en, a watering-place of the Netherlands, in South Holland, 2 miles from Hague. From here, William, prince of Orange, sailed. Pop. 5,000.

SCHIEDAM, shke'-dam, a town of the Netherlands, in South Holland, 4 miles from Rotterdam. It has numerous churches, a chamber of commerce, and a Latin school. It is the chief seat for the manufacture of "Hollands," or Dutch gin. Pop. 13,000.

SCHIERLING, she'-er-ling, a town of Germany, in Bavaria, 11 miles from Ratisbon. Pop. 1,200.—In its vicinity the Austrians were defeated by the French in 1809.

SCHILLER, Frederick, shil'-ler, a celebrated German poet and dramatist, who was the son of an army surgeon, and at first studied the law, which he exchanged for medicine, and, after taking his degree, became physician to a regiment stationed at Stuttgardt. Meanwhile his leisure had been given to the study of the poets and dramatists of England and Germany; and in secret he composed his tragedy of "The Robbers," which was produced at Mannheim in 1782. The tragedy obtained an immense success; but the author having ventured to go without leave to the theatre at Mannheim, he was, for that offence, put under arrest. Soon afterwards he fled to Mannheim, where he obtained employment as dramatist to the theatre, produced two tragedies, "Fiesco" and "Intrigue and Love," and translated Shakspere's "Macbeth." In 1785 he went to Leipzig, afterwards to Dresden, and in 1789 he settled at Jena, where he had been appointed professor of history. It was here that he married and wrote his "History of the Thirty Years' War," and some essays upon the Kantian philosophy. In 1799 he produced his play of "Wallenstein," well known to the English reader through the fine translation by Coleridge. Shortly afterwards he once more changed his abode, and went to Weimar, where he became the intimate friend of Göthe, and his fellow superintendent of the theatre there. His "Mary Stuart" appeared in 1800; and in the following year "The Maid of Orleans." "The Bride of Messina" was produced in 1803, with less success than his previous works; but "William Tell," which came out in the following year, redeemed the comparative failure of its predecessor. Of this play, Carlyle says, it "is one of Schiller's very finest dramas; it exhibits some of the highest triumphs which his genius, combined with his art, ever realized." In 1805 he was attacked by a fatal illness. As his end approached, he was asked how he felt, and answered "Calmer and calmer;" and, just before breathing his last, said, "Many things were growing clear and plain to him." His poems of the lyrical order have always been held in the most enthusiastic admiration in Germany, where they are quoted by every one. These compositions are also more popular in England than the dramas, which fall immeasurably short of the works of the greatest English poets; but, although they contain many defects,—principally in construction, or of imperfectly-defined individuality of character,—they are so full of the finest spirit of poetry, so redolent of the most exalted sentiments, that they are worthy of the honour in which Germany holds them. A translation of the lyrical poems of Schiller has been made by Sir Edward Bulwer-Lytton, Mr. Bowring, and others. His plays have likewise been reproduced in an English form by various authors. B. at Marbach, 1759; D. at Weimar, 1805.

SCHIMMELPENNINCK, Rutger John, shim'-mel-pen'-sink, an eminent Dutch statesman, who was educated for, and exercised the profession of advocate, and, in 1785-86, played a distinguished part in the efforts made by the United Provinces to accomplish a wise and moderate revolution. In 1795 he displayed great eloquence at the National Batavian Convention. He was afterwards ambassador at Paris, plenipotentiary at the congress of Amiens (1802), and finally ambassador at London. During fifteen months (1805-6) he governed Holland with the greatest success as grand-pensionary. Whilst Louis Bonaparte reigned in his native country, he lived in retirement, but was, nevertheless, frequently consulted on matters of state. When Holland was incorporated with the empire, he became a member of the "Sénate Conservateur" of France. B. 1761; D. 1825.

SCHINZNACH, shinz'-nak, a village of Switzerland, in the canton of Aargau, 4 miles from Brugg. It is celebrated for its baths, and is much frequented by the French. Pop. 1,500.

SCHIO, she'-o, a town of Lombardy, 15 miles from Vicenza. Manf. Woollen goods; and near it are lead-mines. Pop. 6,800.

SCHLEGEL, John Elias, shlai'-gel, a German writer, who became professor of modern history at the academy of Soroe. He wrote some dramas, and a number of poetical pieces of merit. B. at Meissen, 1718; D. at Soroe, 1749.—His two brothers, John Adolphus and John Heinrich, also distinguished themselves in literature.

SCHLEGEL, Augustus William von, a celebrated German poet and critic. He studied at Gottingen under Heyne, who had so high an opinion of his classical attainments that he allowed him to make an index to his edition of "Virgil." He was afterwards a lecturer at the same university, and commenced his poetical career with some poems and translations of Dante, which secured him a high place among the writers of his country. He began his celebrated translation of Shakspere in 1797, and, in the same year, was appointed to a professorship at Jena. In 1805 he became acquainted with Madame de Staël-Holstein, whom he accompanied upon a journey through several countries. The influence of this learned and cultivated lady upon his mode of thought was very great, and it was through her writings that he became known in France. In 1808 he commenced the delivery of his famous lectures on dramatic art; having previously produced some poems, criticisms upon the literature and fine arts, which were received with applause. After the fall of Paris he went to reside at the country seat of Madame de Staël, and remained with her until her death, in 1818. In the following year he was nominated professor of history in the university of Bonn, and, after devoting himself assiduously to the study of Sanskrit, he established, at his own cost, a printing-office at Bonn, for the production of works in that ancient language. He also founded a review for the discussion of Indian literature; and gave Latin translations of the "Ramayana" and the "Bhagavad-Gita," two classics of the Sanskrit tongue. His last work was his "Essays, Literary and Historical," which appeared in 1842. The most important works of this distinguished scholar, critic, and poet, were,—"Lectures on Dramatic Art and Literature," a translation of which forms a volume of Bohn's Standard Library; the translation of "Shakspere;" an edition of the "Niebelungen;" and a collection of poems. B. at Hanover, 1767; D. at Bonn, 1845.

SCHLEGEL, Frederick Charles William von, a distinguished German critic, philosopher, and philologist. He was the younger brother of the preceding, and was designed for commercial pursuits; but his disposition was so strongly inclined towards literature, that his father sent him to the university of Gottingen, where he devoted himself to the study of philology. He afterwards went to Leipzig, and, in 1798, produced a portion of a History of Greece and Rome, as well as a fragment of a German translation of Plato. He had been previously engaged with his brother in editing a literary journal called the Athenæum, the influence of which print upon the contemporary literature of Germany was enormous, although the paper did not appear after the conclusion of the third volume. His next great undertaking was the delivering of a course of lectures upon philosophy at Jena, in 1800; his tragedy of "Alarkas" appeared two years later; and, in 1808, he produced a fine work upon the literature of India. Some excellent poems followed in the course of the two subsequent years. In 1809 he was appointed imperial secretary to the Archduke Charles, and while holding that office, he produced a series of proclamations against France, of the most patriotic and spirit-stirring character. His later years were chiefly spent as a diplomatic official under Metternich, who was his constant patron, as the editor of some Vienna periodicals, or in the composition and delivering of lectures upon modern history, ancient and modern literature, and the philosophy of history and of language. Translations of many of his lectures upon the philosophy of history, life, language, and literature, were published in 4 volumes of Bohn's Standard Library. A complete edition of his works, in 15 volumes, was produced at Vienna. B. at Hanover, 1772; D. 1829.

SCHLEIERMACHER, Frederick Ernest Daniel, shlī'-er-ma'-ker, a celebrated German theologian and philologist, who received his earliest education under the Moravians, his parents having belonged to that religious sect; but, at 18, he quitted that body, and went to the university of Halle, where he devoted himself with the utmost assiduity to theology and philology. In 1790 he was engaged as tutor in the family of a nobleman, after which he became a preacher at Berlin. While thus engaged, he assisted in producing a German translation of Blair's Sermons, and those of Fawcett also. His first original works were some contributions to the Athenæum, a literary paper conducted by the brothers Schlegel. After a distinguished career as a preacher, and as commentator upon the ancient classics, he was, in 1802, appointed professor of theology and philosophy in the university of Halle. When, in 1806, Halle was incorporated in the new kingdom of Westphalia, he repaired to Berlin, where he was engaged in delivering lectures upon theological questions; and he never lost an opportunity to denounce from his pulpit the French oppressors of Prussia. He was subsequently nominated professor of theology in the Berlin university, which he retained with a constantly increasing reputation until his death. Schleiermacher was distinguished no less for his oratorical powers than for his profound erudition. He produced the best translation of Plato, a series of eloquent discourses on religion, and a variety of learned works, embracing philology, philosophy, and classical criticism. B. at Breslau, 1768; D. at Berlin, 1834.

SCHLEITZ, shlītze, a town of Saxony, in the county of Reuss, 25 miles from Jena. Manf. Cotton and woollen fabrics, leather, and beer. Pop. 5,000.

SCHLESWIG. (See SLESWIG.)

SCHLIENGEN, shlē'-eng-en, a town of Baden, 4 miles from Mullheim. Pop. 1,200.—Here the archduke Charles of Austria defeated the French, in 1796.

SCHLOSSER, Frederick Christopher, shlos'-ser, an eminent German historian, who concluded his education at the university of Gottingen, after which he became private tutor in a nobleman's family, and later, a school teacher. But he devoted all his leisure to the study of history, in which he had greatly distinguished himself while a student, and, in 1812, gave to the world his "History of the Iconoclast Emperors," which enhanced his reputation for learning, and also gained for him the appointment of professor in the Lyceum at Frankfort. In 1817 he obtained the professorship of history at Heidelberg. Between the years 1823-46 he published his great work entitled "The History of the Eighteenth and Nineteenth Centuries." "A History of the Ancient World and its Civilization," "Critical Examination of Napoleon," and some minor historical pieces, were his latest works. His "History of the Eighteenth and Nineteenth Centuries" has been translated into English. B. at Jever, in the lordship of Kniphausen, 1776.

SCHLÖZER, Augustus Ludwig von, shlō'-zer, an eminent German historian and political writer. After completing his education at Gottingen, he became tutor in a Swedish family, and proceeded to Stockholm, where he produced his first work, a "History of Commerce." Having a great proficiency in the Eastern languages, he was offered the post of literary assistant by Müller, the historiographer of the Russian empire. He accepted that offer, and proceeded to St. Petersburg, where he made such rapid progress in the study of the Russian language and history as to excite the jealousy of his superior. He then left Müller, and became a public teacher, and, in 1764, was offered a professorship of Gottingen; but Müller succeeded in preventing his obtaining leave to quit Russia. In the following year, however, he was compensated for his enforced residence in Russia by being appointed professor of Russian history in the Academy of St. Petersburg. In 1767 he was permitted to leave the country, and he became professor of political science at Gottingen. In 1804 he was raised to noble rank by the emperor of Russia, and created privy councillor of justice. His most important works were "General History of the North," "Picture of the History of Russia," and "Researches into the Fundamental Laws of Russia." He also edited some of the old Russian chronicles. B. at Jagstadt, in the principality of Hohenloe-Kirchberg, 1737; D. 1809.

SCHLUSSELBURG, shloos'-sel-boorg, a town and fortress of European Russia, on the Neva, where it issues from the lake Ladoga, 20 miles from St. Petersburg. Manf. Cotton goods and porcelain. Pop. 5,000.

SCHMALKALDEN, shmal'-kal-den, a town of Germany, on the Fulda, 12 miles from Meiningen. It has three suburbs, two castles, and several churches. Manf. Hosiery, white lead, and paper. Pop. 5,500.

SCHMOLLN, shmol'-len, a town of Germany, in the principality of Altenburg, 7 miles from Altenburg. Manf. Woollen cloth. Pop. 6,200.

SCHMOLNITZ, shmol'-nitz, a mining town of Hungary, in a valley among the Carpathians, 20 miles from Leutschau. It has mines of silver, copper, iron, and sulphur. Pop. 5,500.

SCHNEEBERG, shnā'-berg, a town of Saxony, 53 miles from Dresden. Manf. Cotton fabrics, gold and silver lace, and chemical apparatus. Pop. 7,600.

SCHNEIDEMUHL, shnī'-de(r)-mool, a town of Prussian Poland, 54 miles from Bromberg. Manf. Woollen cloth, hosiery, and leather. Pop. 6,000.

SCHNEIDER, Conrad Victor, shnī'-der, a German physician, who became professor of medicine at Wirtemberg, and physician to the elector of Saxony. The membrane lining the cavities of the nose was first described by him, and is called after his name. He wrote a work called "De Catarrhis," in which he refuted some of the old fallacies relative to that disease. B. at Bitterfield, Saxony, 1610; D. at Würtemberg, 1680.

SCHNEIDER, Johann Gottlieb, a German philologer and naturalist, who, after completing his studies at Leipzig, was engaged by Brunck to assist in producing an edition of the Greek poets. He subsequently devoted himself to the study of the natural sciences, with the view of qualifying himself for the elucidation of the ancient writers upon that department of knowledge. During thirty-four years he held the professorship of philology at the university of Frankfort, and was finally appointed chief librarian to the same seat of learning after it had been transferred to Breslau. His works were very numerous both in philology and natural history; the most important of them being, an edition of Aristotle's "Natural History;" a Greek Dictionary; an edition of the works of Xenophon; and several works elucidatory of the natural history of the ancient writers. B. near Wurzen, Saxony, 1750; D. at Breslau, 1822.

SCHNORR, Von Karolsfeld Julius, shnor, an eminent German artist, who received his first instructions in drawing from his father, Hans Schnorr Von Karolsfeld, who was director of the Art Academy at Leipzig. His parent, however, designed him for some other profession; but his earliest efforts were so successful, and the young man evinced so much enthusiasm for art, that he was permitted to follow the bent of his genius. After studying for a time at Vienna, he, in 1815, repaired to Rome, where he became a member of that society of young German painters at whose head were Cornelius and Overbeck. He soon obtained a foremost position in that artistic community, and was engaged with his great compatriots to embellish the walls of the Villa Massimi at Rome, with designs in fresco, the subjects being chosen from the works of Dante, Ariosto, and Petrarch. Some scriptural works also employed his brush while at Rome; the chief of which were,—"Ruth in the field of Boaz," "Flight into Egypt," and "Jacob and Rachel." When King Louis of Bavaria resolved to embellish Munich with architectural and pictorial masterpieces, Schnorr was invited, with other celebrated German artists, to carry out the royal patron's ideas. In 1827 he was nominated professor of historical painting in the Academy of Fine Arts at Munich. In that city he remained until the year 1846, when he removed to Dresden, on being appointed director of the picture-gallery, and professor in the Academy of Fine Arts there. Meanwhile, he had decorated the state apartments of the new palace at Munich with a series of magnificent frescoes illustrative of the history of Charlemagne, Frederick Barbarossa, and Rudolph of Hapsburg, and likewise of the national poem of the "Niebelungen-lied." He also produced some fine designs, which have been engraved on wood, and which exhibit copious and vigorous imaginative power, correct drawing, and an abundant variety of composition and impressive effect. The most important of these wood-blocks are,—a series for an edition of the "Niebelungen-lied;" another entitled "Die Bibel in Bildern,"—"Bible Pictures;" and finally the extensive series for the edition of the holy writings entitled "Beeton's Illuminated Family Bible." B. at Leipzig, 1794; D. at Dresden, 1853.

SCHNURRER, Christian Frederick, shnoor'-er, a learned German orientalist, who produced a "Bibliotheca Arabica," and other important works in theology and in Eastern literature. B. 1742; D. 1822.

SCHŒLCHER, Victor, shel'-sher, a French littérateur and democratic politician, who, after quitting college, joined the ultra party which was opposed to the Restoration. Until the revolution of 1830 he was engaged as a journalist and art critic. He had visited the United States, Mexico, and Cuba, and had returned to France a determined advocate for the abolition of slavery. Devoting himself to that as a special question, he published a number of works thereupon, all of them pleading eloquently for the emancipation of the black populations. Egypt, the coast of Africa, and other parts, were subsequently visited, for the purpose of making himself acquainted with the condition of the servile races. In 1848 he returned to Paris, and was at once appointed to a post in the ministry of marine. In that capacity he drew up a proclamation for the immediate emancipation of the black population of the French colonies, and also promulgated a decree by which flogging in the navy was abolished. Subsequently he, as journalist, member of the Legislative Assembly, and vice-president of the "Mountain," or ultra-democratic party, defended the views of that section of French politicians. This line of conduct caused him to become one of the victims of the coup d'état of 1851. Expelled from his native country on that occasion, he repaired to England, where he produced several works, the most important of which was a complete and careful biography of the great musician Handel, which was published in English, having been translated from the author's MS. His writings, chiefly political, are to be found in the columns of the best democratic journals of France, to which he was for a long period an eloquent and enlightened contributor. B. at Paris, 1804.

SCHOFFER, Peter, shof'-fer, one of the improvers of the art of printing, who appears to have been at first a copyist at Paris, but was afterwards employed in the establishment of Guttenberg and Faust, at Mainz. By one account he is said to have discovered the more easy method of casting the types. When Faust and Guttenberg separated, in 1455, he became the partner of the former; after whose death he printed many works alone. His three sons also became eminent as printers. D. about 1502.

SCHOHARIE, a post-township and capital of Schoharie county, New York, U.S., 30 miles from Albany. It is situate on Schoharie Flats, and contains the county buildings, two churches, and a number of elegant houses. Pop. 3,000.

SCHOLEFIELD, Rev. James, skole'-feeld, a learned English divine, who received his education at Trinity College, Cambridge, of which he became fellow in 1815, and, in 1825, was elected regius professor of Greek at the same university. His principal works were a new edition of the four tragedies of Euripides, "Hints for an improved translation of the New Testament," and an edition of the New Testament. B. at Henley-on-Thames, 1789; D. at Hastings, 1853.

SCHOLZ, Johann Matthias August, sholz, a learned German philologist, who, after completing his studies at the university of Breslau, devoted himself to the production of an improved edition of the text of the New Testament. With this object, he visited London, Paris, Vienna, Italy, Egypt, and Palestine. He was professor of theology at Bonn. His most important publications were, "Handbook of Biblical Archæology;" the text of the New Testament, under the title of "Novum Testamentum Græce;" and an account of his travels in the East. B. at Kapsdorf, near Breslau, 1794; D. 1852.

SCHOMBERG, shom'-berg, a town of Silesia, 51 miles from Breslau. Manf. Woollen, cotton, and linen goods. Pop. 2,300.—The name of several other towns with small populations.

SCHOMBERG, Armand Frederic de, a distinguished soldier, who fought under Frederick Henry, prince of Orange, and his son William; but, in 1650, passed into the French service, and obtained the governorship of Gravelines and Furnes. In 1661 he was sent to Portugal, where he commanded with such success as to force Spain to make a peace. He rose to the rank of marshal; but, upon the revocation of the edict of Nantes, he left France and went to Brandenburg, the elector of which made him minister of state. He accompanied the prince of Orange to England at the revolution of 1688; was created a peer, made knight of the Garter, and had a large sum voted him by parliament. In 1689 he went with William to Ireland, and was shot by mistake, as he was crossing the Boyne, by the French refugees of his own regiment. B. about 1619.

SCHOMBERG, Henry Count de, marshal of France, who was descended of a German family. He served in 1617 in Piedmont under Marshal d'Estrées, and afterwards against the Huguenots in the civil wars. In 1625 he was made field-marshal, and, two years afterwards, defeated the English at the isle of Rhé. In 1632 he defeated the rebels in Languedoc, at the famous battle of Castelnaudari, for which he was made governor of that province. B. at Paris, 1583; D. 1632.

SCHOMBURGK, Sir Robert Hermann, an eminent modern traveller and naturalist, and the discoverer of the "Victoria regia." In 1835 he undertook an exploratory journey into the interior of Guiana, under the auspices of the Royal Geographical Society, and, while ascending the Berbice river, first met with the magnificent aquatic plant afterwards named the Victoria regia water-lily. He subsequently published a work of great value upon British Guiana, of which country he was, in 1840, employed to make a survey. For his successful accomplishment of this mission he received the honour of knighthood, and his distinguished services as a traveller and naturalist have been acknowledged by various European courts and learned bodies. In 1840 he was nominated British consul to the republic of Saint Domingo. His most important works are—a History of Barbadoes, an account of the peninsula and bay of Samana, in the Dominican republic, and the account of British Guiana cited above. B. 1804.

SCHONAU, shon'-ou, the name of several towns in Germany, none of them with a population above 2,500.

SCHONBERG, shon'-bairg, a town of Silesia, 47 miles from Leignitz. Manf. Woollen, cotton, and linen fabrics. Pop. 1,300.

SCHÖNBRUNN, she(r)n'-broon, a village, where is a palace belonging to the emperor of Austria, 3 miles from Vienna.

SCHONEBECK, shon'-bek, a town of Prussian Saxony, on the Elbe, 9 miles from Magdeburg. Manf. Salt, chemicals, leather, and tobacco. Pop. 8,500.—It is connected with Magdeburg by railway.

SCHONHAUSEN, shon-how'-sen, a village, 4 miles from Berlin, with which it is connected by a road lined with lime-trees. It is a summer residence of the king of Prussia.

SCHONLINDE, shon-lin'-de(r), a market-town of Austria, 33 miles from Leitmeritz. Manf. Cotton and linen fabrics. Pop. 4,500.

SCHOOLCRAFT, Henry Rowe, skool'-kraft, an eminent American philologist and traveller, whose youth was devoted to the study of the natural sciences and to the acquisition of languages. In 1817 he commenced that career in which he subsequently earned a high reputation, by making a journey of exploration through Missouri; whence he returned to Washington, with a valuable mass of notes and mineralogical specimens. His "Mines and Mineral Resources of Missouri," published in 1819, met with the most decided success, and obtained for its author the post of geologist to the exploring expedition dispatched to the sources of the Mississippi in the following year. The Journal and Report which he produced at the termination of this mission greatly enhanced his reputation. He was chosen to fulfil, in succession, posts of great responsibility and distinction. In 1821 he acted as secretary to an Indian conference at Chicago. In the following year he was acting as agent for Indian affairs in the north-western provinces, and while discharging these duties he became acquainted with Miss Johnston, a young lady who had received a high education in Europe, but was the child of an Irish gentleman married to the daughter of an Indian chief. From this lady, who became his wife, he received the most valuable assistance in prosecuting that course of research into the languages, traditions, and antiquities of the Indian tribes, which, even from his earliest youth, it had been his ambition to pursue. In 1832 he was charged with the conduct of an expedition to the Upper Mississippi and beyond St. Anthony's Falls. Of that mission he produced an account, in his "Expedition to Itasca Lake," a work in which he showed that he had succeeded in tracing the Mississippi up to its ultimate forks, and to its actual source in Itasca Lake. He was afterwards described as "the only man in America who had seen the Mississippi from its source to its mouth in the Gulf of Mexico." He subsequently acted as commissioner to the Indians for the purchase of territory upon the north-western frontier; as superintendent of Indian affairs; and in capacities of a like nature. In 1841 he took up his residence at New York, afterwards making a philological and archæological tour in Europe and Canada. At a later period he devoted himself to the task of arranging and publishing his vast stores of information upon Indian language, antiquities, and ethnology, which he had spent thirty years in collecting. An enumeration of several of this learned gentleman's most important publications will afford a notion of the great services he performed relative to the aboriginal history of his native land. His greatest work was entitled "Historical and Statistical Information respecting the History, Condition, and Prospects of the Indian Tribes of the United States;" and of scarcely less value are—"American Indians, their History, Condition, and Prospects;" "Personal Memoirs of a Residence of Thirty Years with the Indian Tribes on the American Frontiers;" "The Myth of Hiawatha and other Oral Legends of the North-American Indians" (from this work Mr. Longfellow derived the legend of his poem of Hiawatha); "A Complete Lexicon of the Algonquin Language, the most primitive and widely-diffused aboriginal language;" and "Algic Researches." Mr. Schoolcraft was a member of the chief European and American literary and learned societies. B. at Hamilton, New York, 1793.

Schorel, John, sko'-rel, a Dutch painter, who studied under Albert Durer, after which he went to the Holy Land, where he made a large collection of sketches. On his return to Europe, he was appointed by Pope Adrian VI. superintendent of the buildings at Belvedere. He was also a poet and musician. B. at Schorel, Holland, 1495; D. at Utrecht, 1562.

Schott, Andrew, shot, a learned German classicist, who became professor of elocution at Rome, and afterwards taught Greek at Toledo. He produced, among many other learned works, "Hispania Illustrata," the Lives of Francis Borgia, Ferdinand Nunez, and also edited several of the Latin classics. B. at Antwerp, 1552; D. at the same city, 1629.

Schreckhorn, shrek'-horn, 'peak of terror,' one of the loftiest of the Swiss Alps, ascended in 1842 by Agassiz and Desor. Height, 13,492 feet. Lat. 46° 35′ 26″ N. Lon. 7° 21′ E.

Schrevelius, Cornelius, shre-re'-li-us, a Dutch lexicographer, who published editions of Homer and Hesiod; but his principal work was his "Lexicon," Greek and Latin, which was extensively used in England. B. at Haerlem, about 1615; D. at Leyden, 1664.

Schuja, shoo-ja', a town of Russia, 60 miles from Vladimir. Manf. Woollens, linens, and soap. Pop. 10,000.

Schulembourg, Matthias John, Count, shoo'-lemboorg, a German general, who was first in the Polish service, and, with a small army, repelled several attacks made by the Swedes under Charles XII. In 1708 he was at the battle of Malplaquet, where his conduct gained him the esteem of Prince Eugene. In 1711 he entered the Venetian service, and compelled the Turks to raise the siege of Corfu. In 1726 he went to England on a visit to his sister, the countess of Kendal, but afterwards returned to Venice. B. near Magdeburg, 1661; D. at Venice, 1747.

Schultens, Albert, shool'-tens, a learned German divine and Orientalist, who became professor of the Oriental languages, first at Franeker and afterwards at Leyden. His principal works are, a "Commentary upon Job," "Commentary on the Proverbs," the "Life of Saladin," translated from the Arabic; a Hebrew and an Arabic Grammar. B. at Groningen, 1686; D. at Leyden, 1750.—His son John Jacob was also a learned professor, and succeeded him in the chair of Oriental languages at Leyden. His grandson, Henry Albert, became professor of Oriental languages at Amsterdam, and produced a Latin translation of the fables of Pilpay and other learned works. D. 1793.

Schultze, Benjamin, shooltz, a learned German philologist, who produced, among other important works, one in German, entitled "The Master of the Eastern and Western languages," which contained one hundred alphabets. B. 1761; D. 1833.

Schumacher, Henry Christian, shoo'-ma-ker, an eminent modern Danish astronomer, who was selected by the Danish government to measure the degrees of longitude from Copenhagen to the west coast of Jutland, and, in 1821, was appointed by the Royal Scientific Society of Copenhagen to direct the survey of Holstein and Lauenberg. He was subsequently engaged, in conjunction with the English Board of Longitude, in ascertaining the differences between the observatories of Greenwich and Altona. His afterlife was spent as astronomer to the king of Denmark. He published many valuable works upon the science to which he devoted himself. B. 1780; D. at Altona, 1850.

Schumann, Robert, shoo'-man, a German musical composer, whose works are very popular in his native country; but the only production by him which became successful in England, was a cantata entitled "Paradise and the Peri," the words of which were translated from Moore's poem. B. in Germany, about 1815; D. 1856.

Schumla, shoom'-la, a large fortified town of European Turkey, on the great road leading from Constantinople to Wallachia, about 56 miles from Silistria. It contains several handsome mosques, baths, a castle, and is one of the keys to the Turkish capital. Manf. Tin and copper wares, leather, and silk goods. Pop. 25,000. The Russians have made several attempts to take it, but failed.

Schurman, Anna Maria de, shoor'-man, a learned German lady, who understood the Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, and was acquainted with several modern languages. She applied to music, painting, and engraving with great success, and her penmanship was remarkable for its beauty. In 1650 she became a disciple of the enthusiast Labadie, after whose death she retired from the world. Her Opuscula, or pieces in Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, were printed in 1652. She also wrote Latin poems, and a "Defence of Female Study." B. at Cologne, 1607; D. 1678.

Schutt, shoot, two islands in W. Hungary, formed by the arms of the Danube. The largest has a length of 53 miles and a breadth of 16; the smaller, a length of 28 miles and a breadth of 7.—They are both inhabited, and have large cultivated tracts.

Schuylkill, skool'-kil, a river of the United States, breaking through the Blue Mountains, and, after a course of 110 miles, running into the Delaware, 6 miles below Philadelphia.

Schwabach, shwa'-bak, a town of Bavarian Franconia, on a river of the same name, which divides it into two parts, 9 miles from Nurnberg. Manf. Cotton and woollen fabrics, hosiery, gold and silver lace, paper, soap, and tobacco. Pop. 10,000.

SCHWANTALER, Louis Michael, shwan-ta'-ler, an eminent German sculptor, whose ancestors had been of the same profession during some generations. He received his artistic education at the Munich Academy of the Fine Arts, and subsequently repaired to Rome, where he gained the friendship of Thorwaldsen, who aided him with some valuable advice. His first successes in his profession were due to the patronage of King Louis of Bavaria, who employed the young sculptor in carving a statue of Shakspere for the theatre at Munich, and afterwards in executing the sculpturesque decorations for the fine architectural works with which that art-loving monarch was adorning his capital city. He continued to labour with unceasing zeal until he became the acknowledged head of the Munich school of sculpture. In 1835 he was appointed professor of sculpture; but although his health began to decline about this time, his energy was scarcely less ardent than formerly. His grandest work was the colossal statue of Bavaria which occupies the centre of the Bavarian Hall of Fame, and is about 60 feet in height. His colossal statues of St. Peter, St. Paul, Count Tilly, and monumental statues of Göthe, Jean Paul Richter, and Mozart, are noble productions. The new palace of King Louis of Bavaria, the Walhalla of Ratisbon, and, indeed, many of the finest art-collections throughout Germany and in England, are enriched by his splendid works. At his death he bequeathed his studio, together with models of his most important works, to the Fine Arts Academy of Munich; and in the same city there is a street named in his honour. Casts of the head of his "Bavaria," of the "Shield of Hercules," and of other of his productions, are contained in the Crystal Palace at Sydenham. B. at Munich, 1802; D. at the same city, 1848.

SCHWARTZ, Berthold, shwartz, a German monk, who is said to have been of the order of the Cordeliers. According to one statement, he was the discoverer of gunpowder, which he obtained while making some experiments with sulphur, charcoal, and saltpetre. Another account gives to Roger Bacon the discovery; but the compound appears, in reality, to have been known at a more remote date. Schwartz lived about the beginning of the 14th century.

SCHWARTZ, Christian Frederick, an eminent Prussian missionary, who, in 1750, left London for the East Indies, where, during almost half a century, he laboured zealously in the conversion of the Hindoos to Christianity. He earned and received the warm support of the British throughout his honourable career, and when, in 1787, the rajah of Tanjore was dying, he intrusted to him his youthful successor, saying, "He is not my son, but yours: into your hands I deliver him." Bishop Heber spoke of Schwartz as an "extraordinary man;" and, at his death, the East-India directors erected a monument to his memory in St. Mary's Church, at Madras. B. in Prussia, 1726; D. in the East Indies, 1798.

SCHWARTZBURG, SONDERSHAUSEN, shwartz'-boorg, a district or principality of Germany, divided into two parts. One of these divisions adjoins Saxe-Gotha; the other, considerably farther to the south, is near the Russian province of Erfurt. Area, 327 square miles. Pop. 65,000.

SCHWARTZBURG-RUDOLSTADT, a small principality of Germany, inclosed by the territories of Saxe-Weimar, Coburg, and Meiningen. Area, 331 square miles. Pop. 70,000.

SCHWARTZENBERG, Charles Philip, Prince von, shwartz'-en-bairg, an Austrian general, whose signal services in the campaigns against the Turks in 1789, and in the subsequent engagements with the armies of the French republic, gained for him, in 1797, the rank of major-general. In 1799 he raised a regiment of Hulans at his own expense; he afterwards fought at Hohenlinden, at Austerlitz, and at Wagram. When Napoleon I. invaded Russia, in 1812, he commanded the auxiliary force of Austria, then an ally of France; but showed so much reluctance to obey the orders of the French emperor, that strong representations were on that account made to his monarch. Shortly afterwards he was appointed to the command-in-chief of the armies allied against Napoleon, and was present at the battle of Leipzig, where the French army was almost annihilated. In 1814 he entered France, and marched into Paris, upon the capitulation of the city by Marmont. His subsequent career was less active; but he was loaded with honours by the emperor of Austria. At his death he was a field-marshal of the Austrian armies. B. at Vienna, 1771; D. 1820.

SCHWARZA, shwartz'-a, the name of several small rivers in Germany.

SCHWARZRNBACH, shwartz'-en-bak, two market-towns of Bavaria, neither with a population above 2,000.

SCHWAZ, shwaz, a well-built town of the Austrian states, in Tyrol, on the Inn, 56 miles from Munich. In the neighbourhood are mines of copper and silver. Pop. 5,000.

SCHWEDT, shwet, a town of Prussia, on the Oder, 28 miles from Stettin. It has a royal palace and several churches. Manf. Tobacco, leather, and starch. Pop. 7,000.

SCHWEIDNITZ, shwide'-nitz, a fortified town of Prussian Silesia, 30 miles from Breslau. It has several churches, a large barrack, and hospitals. Manf. Woollen and cotton goods. Pop. 14,000.—It has a station on the railway to Freiberg.

SCHWEIGHÆUSER, John, shwi'-qai-oo'-ser, a learned French philologist, who was proficient in Arabic, Syriac, Hebrew, and other languages, the knowledge of which he gained in his native country, in England, and in Germany. He was appointed professor of philosophy at Strasburg in 1770, and was subsequently chosen to occupy the chair of Greek. He produced editions of Suidas, Herodotus, Seneca, and Epictetus. B. at Strasburg, 1742; D. at the same city, 1830.

SCHWEINFURT, shwine'-foort, a town of Bavarian Franconia, on the Main, 23 miles from Wurzburg. It has several churches, a gymnasium, and a high school, founded by Gustavus Adolphus, king of Sweden. Manf. Woollen goods and leather. Pop. 7,500.

SCHWEIZ, shwitze, the German name of Switzerland.

SCHWENCKFELD, Gaspar von, shwenk'-felt, a German divine, who founded a sect which still exists in small numbers in Silesia. He was one of the first followers of Luther, but subsequently separated from him, and commenced preaching some entirely new doctrines. He declared that the Scriptures were not to be held as inspired, and that mankind should await without discussion until the true revelations should emanate from heaven. He likewise wrote in favour of the reuniting of the Roman Catholics and the followers of the reformed doctrines. He wrote upwards of eighty dissertations upon theology. B. in Silesia, 1490; D. at Ulm, 1561.

SCHWERIN, shvee'-rin, the capital of the grand-duchy of Mecklenburg-Schwerin, in the north of Germany, on the Lake of Schwerin, 35 miles from Lubeck. It is divided into an old and new town, and has a grand-ducal palace on an island in the lake. The chief buildings and institutions are the high church, formerly a cathedral, other Lutheran churches, a Catholic church, a poor-house, an orphan-house, an infirmary, and a synagogue. It has, besides, government offices, a gymnasium, and a veterinary school. Manf. Woollen cloths, tobacco, and vinegar. Pop. 20,000.—The LAKE has a length of 14 miles and a breadth of 3.

SCHWERIN, or SCHWIERZYNA, a town of Prussian Poland, 55 miles from Posen. It has both Lutheran and Catholic churches. Manf. Woollen goods, tanneries, and breweries. Pop. 5,500.

SCHWERIN, Christopher, Count, a general and field-marshal in the Prussian service. He entered the army at an early age, and distinguished himself on many occasions. In 1741 he gained the battle of Molwitz at the moment when the Prussians thought themselves lost. The king of Prussia erected a statue to his honour, as did the emperor of Germany a monument on the spot where he was slain. B. 1684; killed at the battle of Prague, 1757.

SCHWIEBUS, shwe'-ai-boos, a town of Prussia, 41 miles from Frankfort. Manf. Woollen cloths. Pop. 12,000.

SCHWITZ, or SCHWYTZ, shwitze, a canton of Switzerland, lying contiguous to the lakes of Zug and Lucerne. Area, 339 square miles. Pop. 45,000.—This is one of the cantons which formed the nucleus of the Swiss Confederation, in 1307.

SCHWITZ, the chief town of the above canton, situate in a valley, 26 miles from Zurich. Pop. 5,500.

SCIACCA, or XACCA, shak'-ka, a seaport on the south-west coast of Sicily, in the Val di Mazzara, 30 miles from Girgenti. It is defended by the castle of Luna, and has churches, convents, and magazines, with subterranean granaries, under the direction of government, for warehousing corn for export. Pop. 12,600. —This is the birthplace of Agathocles, tyrant of Syracuse, and of Fazzello, the historian. In its neighbourhood are some grottos, cut in a rock, and attributed to Dædalus.

SCICLI, she'-kle, a town of the island of Sicily, 6 miles from Modica. Manf. Woollen goods. Pop. 9,700.

SCILLA, or SCIGLIO, sil'-la, a maritime town of Naples, nearly opposite the rock of Scylla, at the entrance of the Strait of Messina. Pop. 5,000, mostly engaged in a seafaring life.

SCILLY ISLANDS, sil'-le, a group situate at the western extremity of the English Channel, about 30 miles westward of the Land's End, and included in, or belonging to, the county of Cornwall. They consist of about 140 islets and rocks, the principal of the former being St. Mary's, Trescau, St. Martin's, St. Agnes, Sampson, and Brehar. Area, about 5,770 acres. Desc. Fertile in some parts, with a mild and healthy climate. Pro. Barley, pease, and oats, with a small proportion of wheat. Cattle are fed in most of the islands; but they are neither numerous nor remarkable for size. The inhabitants are chiefly engaged in agriculture, in fishing, and in the manufacture of kelp. Pop. about 3,000, of which St. Mary's contains 1,270. This is the largest, the most important, and best cultivated of the whole group. It possesses three towns, a pier, a garrison, custom-house, and other public buildings. Packets from Penzance communicate with the islands. In 1707 three line-of-battle ships, under Sir Cloudesley Shovel, were here shipwrecked and lost. They have been considered the Cassiterides of the ancients.

SCILLY ISLANDS, a group in the Pacific. Lat. 16° 28′ S. Lon. 156° 10′ W.

SCINDE. (See SINDE.)

SCIO, she'-o or si'-o. (See CHIOS.)

SCIOPPIUS, Gaspar, si-op'-pi-us, a learned German philologist, who wrote an abusive satire on the pretensions of Joseph Scaliger to be considered of noble descent, and attacked James I. of England and the Jesuits with great asperity. At the close of his life he employed himself in explaining the Apocalypse. His learning was extensive and profound, and he produced more than a hundred works upon the authors of antiquity. B. at Neumark, in the Palatinate, 1576; D. at Padua, 1619.

SCIOTO, si-o'-to, a river of the United States, rising in the state of Ohio, and, after a course of 170 miles, falling into the Ohio, 352 miles below Pittsburg, in lat. 38° 34′ N. It is navigable for 130 miles, and has the Whetstone for its principal affluent.

SCIOTO, a county in the state of Ohio, U.S., situate on both sides of the river of the same name. Area, 504 square miles. Pop. 20,000.

SCIPIO, sip'-i-o, the name of an illustrious Roman family, the most celebrated members of which were:—

SCIPIO, Publius Cornelius, surnamed Africanus, a celebrated Roman general. He is said to have made his first campaign at the age of 17, under his father, and to have saved his parent's life in the battle of Ticinus, B.C. 218. After the battle of Cannæ, he prevented the Roman officers from abandoning their country as they had intended, out of despair of saving it. Scipio was elected ædile at the age of 21. His father and uncle having fallen in battle, he obtained the command in Spain, where he defeated the enemy and took New Carthage. He put an end to the war in that country by a decisive battle, and then crossed over into Africa, where he defeated Hasdrubal and Syphax, B.C. 203. He afterwards gained the battle of Zama, which victory produced peace between Rome and Carthage. Scipio obtained a triumph and the appellation of Africanus for these brilliant services. He was also twice honoured with the consular dignity; but envy of his glory brought upon him a charge of taking bribes. Scipio appeared before the people; and only saved himself by recalling to them his victory at Zama. The affair, however, was again brought before the tribunes; but he had retired to his villa near Liternum, where he continued to reside until his death. The virtues and generosity of Scipio, especially to his captives, were as distinguished as his valour and prudence; while, as a general, he was only second to Hannibal. B. 235 B.C.; D. about 183 B.C.

SCIPIO, Lucius Cornelius, surnamed Asiaticus, was brother of the preceding, with whom he served in Spain and Africa. In reward of his services, he obtained the consulate, B.C. 190. He afterwards conducted the war in Asia against Antiochus, over whom he gained a great victory on the plains of Magnesia. For this he was honoured with a triumph and the appellation of Asiaticus. Cato the censor, however, preferred a charge against him of peculation, and his estates were sold to pay the supposed debt he owed to the republic.

SCIPIO, Publius Æmilianus, was the son of Æmilius Paullus, and was adopted by the son of Scipio Africanus. He was called Africanus the Younger, in consequence of his victories over the Carthaginians. He served the office of ædile, and afterwards of consul, in which capacity he laid siege to, and succeeded in taking Carthage, B.C. 146, which, according to a decree of the senate, was razed to the ground. For this he was chosen consul a second time, and took Numantia, B.C. 133, whence he acquired the surname of Numantinus. He was assassinated in his bed, B.C. 129, as is supposed by the direction of the triumvirs, who suspected him of aspiring to the dictatorship.

SCIPIO-NASICA was the cousin of the preceding, whom he defended with great eloquence before the people. He was refused the consulship at first, but afterwards obtained that dignity. In 171 B.C. he pleaded the cause of the Spanish people against their Roman governors before the senate.

SCIPIO, Publius, father-in-law of Pompey. After the battle of Pharsalia, he retired to Africa with the remains of the vanquished army, and having joined the troops of Juba, king of Mauritania, was for some time successful; but he was defeated by Cæsar at Thapsus, and fell in battle.

SCLATER, William, sklai'-ter, an English divine, who wrote elegies and epitaphs, under the title of "Threnodia Britannica;" "Palæ-Albion; or, the History of Great Britain to the Reign of James I.," folio, in Latin and English verse; and a genealogy of James I. from Adam. D. in Kent, 1647.

SCLAVONIA, or SLAVONIA, KINGDOM OF, sla-vo'-ni-a, a frontier province in the south of the Austrian empire, officially included in the kingdom of Hungary. Its shape is long and narrow, the Drave and Danube running along its northern frontier and separating it from Hungary; while the Save, also a great river, extends along its southern confines and divides it from Turkey. Area of Civil Sclavonia, 3,643 square miles. The other portion is called Military Sclavonia, for which see MILITARY FRONTIER. Desc. It is divided throughout almost its whole length by a chain of lofty mountains, extending from east to west, and covered with forests. The rest of the country consists of fine plains, with a fertile soil, and a climate almost as mild as that of Italy. The mountainous tracts are barren in dry years, and in the low grounds there are many districts too marshy for cultivation. Zoology. Of wild animals, the bear, the wolf, the fox, the polecat, and the vulture are common. The domestic animals are horses, cattle, and sheep, which are numerous: of hogs, vast numbers are reared in the woods. Pro. The greatest part of the country being well adapted for tillage, wheat, barley, maize, flax, hemp, and madder are produced. The fruits are chestnuts, plums, and grapes; also figs, almonds, and other products of a warm climate. The forests contain the finest oak. Minerals. Limestone, sulphur, coal, salt, and some ferruginous substances. Manf. Mostly domestic. Pop. 465,000.

SCOON, or SCONE, skoon, a parish and village of Scotland, in Perthshire, on the Tay, 2½ miles from Perth. It is noted for its palace, anciently the residence of the Scots kings, the place of their coronation, and the scene of many great actions. Its famous stone, upon which the ancient Scottish kings were crowned, is now in Westminster Abbey. Pop. of parish, 2,400.

SCOPAS, sko'-pas, an architect and sculptor of the isle of Paros, who built the famous mausoleum for Artemisia, in honour of her husband; but his chief work was a statue of Venus, which was esteemed as equal to that of Praxiteles. Lived about 350 B.C.

SCOPIA, or USKUP, sko'-pe-a, a town of European Turkey, in Macedonia, 105 miles from Salonica. It contains several mosques, has a fortified castle, an aqueduct, and other remains of antiquity. Pop. 10,000.

SCORESBY, William, skors'-be, an Arctic navigator and whaling captain, who was the son of a small farmer in Yorkshire, and himself followed agricultural occupations until he had reached early manhood, when he determined to pursue a seafaring life. In 1780 he sailed from Whitby; but, having excited the jealousy of his officers through displaying greater nautical skill, he was compelled to leave the vessel and enter an ordnance armed store-ship, in which he was captured by the Spaniards. He effected his escape, however, and returned to his father's farm; but, after an interval of about three years, he again took to the sea, having entered a whale-ship as a common seaman. After making a number of voyages, he rose to the command of the vessel, and subsequently became the most successful whaling captain of his time. After making thirty voyages, he, in 1823, retired from active life with an ample competency. He was the inventor of the "round top-gallant crow's-nest," which was stated to be one of the greatest boons given to modern Arctic voyagers. In his retirement he occupied himself with various schemes of social improvement, and in 1826 published an "Essay on the Improvement of the Town and Harbour of Whitby, with its Streets and Neighbouring Highways." B. at Cropton, near Whitby, 1760; D. 1829.

SCORESBY, Rev. William, an eminent Arctic navigator, who was the son of the preceding, under whom he acquired his earliest knowledge of nautical matters. He joined his father's vessel in his 10th year, and afterwards rose to the post of chief mate. In 1806 he, with his father, reached a higher latitude than had been heretofore gained, viz., to within 510 miles of the North Pole. On attaining his 21st year, his father resigned the command of the vessel to him. In 1817 Sir Joseph Banks endeavoured to obtain for him the commission of proceeding upon a voyage of exploration towards the North Pole; but the Board of Admiralty, in conformity with a rule of the service, selected an officer of the royal navy to carry out the enterprise. In 1820, after having made seventeen whaling voyages, he produced a most valuable work, entitled, "An Account of the Arctic Regions, with a History and Description of the Northern Whale Fishery." Two years later he published a second remarkable work, entitled, "Journal of a Voyage to the Northern Whale Fishery, including Researches and Discoveries on the Eastern Coast of West Greenland." He quitted the service at that time, and was shortly afterwards elected a fellow of the Royal Societies of London and Edinburgh. Always deeply impressed with a sense of religious duty, he next resolved to qualify himself for holy orders. He entered as student of Queen's College, Cambridge; and, after being ordained, became chaplain of the mariners' church at Liverpool. He subsequently removed to a living at Exeter; but at a later period he became vicar of Bradford, in Yorkshire. He wrote several valuable papers upon practical magnetism and its relations to navigation, for the Transactions of the Royal Society of Edinburgh; and likewise put forth some important pieces elucidatory of the magnetism of iron ships. Some of his other works were, "Memorials of the Sea," "Discourses to Seamen," "Sabbaths in the Arctic Regions," and "Records of the Adventurous Life of the late William Scoresby." His great love for scientific research, particularly in the question of the magnetism of iron ships, induced him to make a voyage to Australia in the Royal Charter, from which he returned in 1856. B. 1790; D. at Torquay, 1857.

SCOTFORTH, skot'-forth, a town of Lancashire, 2 miles from Lancaster. Pop. 7,000.

SCOTLAND, skot'-land, the northern portion of Great Britain, united with England and Wales, and bounded on the W. by the Atlantic Ocean, N. by the Deucaledonian or North Sea, E. by the German Ocean, S.E. by England, S. by the Solway Firth, and S.W. by that part of the Irish Sea called the North Channel. Coastline. Few countries in Europe display a greater extent of seacoast, its aggregate length being about 2,506 miles. Inlets, Firths, Bays. These are, on the E., the firths of Forth, Tay, Murray, Dornoch, and Cromarty; on the W. is the Firth of Clyde and Loch Ryan; on the N., the Pentland Firth, and Lochs Broom, Eil, Fyne, and Linnhe; on the S., the Solway Firth, Luce Bay, and Wigton Bay. Besides these, there are the Minch, the Little Minch, and the North Channel. Capes. Numerous: the principal are St. Abb's Head, Fife Ness, Buchan Ness, Kinnaird's Head, Tarbet Ness, Duncansby Head, Dunnet Head, and Cape Wrath; the Mull of Cantire, the Mull of Galloway, and Burrow Head. These are all on the mainland. Islands. The principal groups are the Orkneys, the Shetlands, and the Hebrides; besides Arran and Bute. Divisions. Scotland is divided into thirty-three counties; viz.,—Berwick, Roxburgh, Selkirk, Dumfries, Kirkcudbright, Wigton, Ayr, Renfrew, Lanark, Peebles, Haddington, Edinburgh, Linlithgow, Stirling, Dumbarton, Clackmannan, Kinross, Fife, Forfar, Perth, Argyle, Kincardine, Aberdeen, Banff, Elgin, Nairn, Inverness, Ross, Sutherland, Caithness, Cromarty, Orkney Islands, and Bute. Ext. Its greatest extent from N. to S. is 276 miles; but a direct line from Carlisle northward to the Moray Firth does not exceed 180 miles. From the Mull of Cantire the western coast stretches 230 miles in a straight line to Cape Wrath. The breadth under different parallels is various, from 147 to 70, and even 30 miles. Area, islands inclusive, 28,896 square miles, besides 638 square miles occupied by lakes and rivers. Desc. Greatly diversified with hill and dale. In the northern parts it is mostly mountainous and barren; while, towards the south, it is covered with fertile plains. It has been separated into the two great divisions of the Highlands and the Lowlands, and also into the Northern, the Middle, and the Southern. The first, or Northern division, is cut off from the Middle by the chain of lakes which stretch from the Moray Firth to Loch Linnhe. The second, or Middle division, is separated from the Southern by the firths of Forth and Clyde and the Great Canal. The Northern division consists generally of an assemblage of vast mountains, here and there intersected by fertile valleys, chiefly towards the south and east coasts. A portion of them is clothed with green herbage, more especially where sheep-farming prevails; but, in general, they are covered with heath, growing upon peat, rock, or gravel; and they frequently terminate in mountain-caps of solid rock, or in vast heaps or cairns of bare and weatherbeaten stones. The Middle division is also mountainous, the Grampian ranges intersecting this district, and extending from the eastern to the western sea, and occupying a breadth of from 40 to 60 miles. The western parts of Argyleshire, which are also included in this district, are rugged, mountainous, and deeply indented by inlets of the ocean. In these two divisions, which comprehend more than two-thirds of Scotland, the arable ground consists of but a small proportion to the mountainous regions. On the eastern coast, however, the proportion of the cultivated to the uncultivated land is much greater. In the Southern division every variety of aspect is found: verdant plains, watered by copious streams, and covered with innumerable cattle; gently-rising hills and bending vales, fertile in corn, waving with wood, and interspersed with meadows; lofty mountains, craggy rocks, deep narrow dells, and tumbling torrents; nor are there wanting, as a contrast, barren moors and wild uncultivated heaths. In this district are the different ranges of the Cheviot Hills; the Sidlaw Hills, terminating at Perth; the Ochil Hills, forming the middle division; and the hills of Kilsyth and Campsey. Between the Sidlaw ridge and the Grampian Mountains lies the extensive and fruitful valley of Strathmore, stretching from Stirling to Stonehaven. Another strath or valley, called Glenmore, runs across the country from Loch Eil to the Murray Firth. This strath, in different parts, has particular names. Rivers. Numerous. In the Northern division, the principal are the Beauly, Naver, Conon, &c.; in the Middle division, the Spey, the Dee, the Don, and the North and the South Esk: about 30 miles farther south is the Tay, one of the largest rivers in Britain. In the Southern district are the Forth, the Clyde, and the Tweed, and the numerous rivers which empty themselves into the Irish Sea and the Solway Firth; the Ayr, the Girvan, the Southern Dee, the Nith, the Annan, and the Liddal. Lakes or Lochs. Numerous and extensive. The principal are Loch Lomond, Awe, Ness, Spin, Maree, Tay, Arkeig, Shiel, Lochie, and Katrine. Climate. Extremely variable. From its insular situation, however, the cold in winter is not so intense, nor the heat in summer so great, as in similar latitudes on the continent; and although the range of the thermometer is considerable, it seldom maintains an extreme for any length of time. The annual average temperature may be estimated at from 45° to 47°. Zoology. The wild animals are the fox, the badger, the otter, the wild cat, the hedgehog (these are now becoming scarce), the stag, the wild roe, the hare, the rabbit, the weasel, the mole, and other small quadrupeds. The domestic animals are the same as those of England; but the native breed of black-cattle and sheep is smaller in size, but reputed to afford more delicious food. Of the feathered tribes, pheasants are to be found in the woods, though scarce; also ptarmigan, black game, and grouse, and, in the low grounds, partridges, snipes, and plovers. Scotland has also most of the English singing-birds, except the nightingale. The aquatic fowls are numerous in the islands. Pro. Wheat, rye, barley, oats, pease, beans, hay, potatoes, turnips, flax and hemp, and, in general, all the sorts of crops which are raised in the southern part of the island. Horticulture has made rapid progress in every part. Apples and other fruits are produced in abundance. Many extensive tracts of waste land have been planted with wood, and the alga marina, or seaweed, which grows in great luxuriance on the rocky coasts, constitutes a valuable article of commerce, from the burning of it into kelp. Minerals. Ironstone, iron ore, lead, and septaria ironstone, are abundant. Copper has been discovered in many places. The other metallic substances are, cobalt, bismuth, manganese, wolfram, plumbago, and mercury; the latter in very small quantities. Coal is abundant in the Southern and Middle districts. Limestone, freestone, or sandstone, and slate, are found in every district. Marbles are also found. Most of the gems and precious stones have been found among the mountains of Scotland, the diamond excepted. Jasper is found in great variety, and rock-crystal, commonly denominated cairn-gorum, from the mountain of that name in Banffshire. Chalcedony is also found. Manf. Flax and hemp are made into a variety of fabrics; such as sheetings, osnaburghs, bagging, and canvas. The cotton manufacture has been carried, by means of machinery, to an astonishing degree of extent and perfection. Muslins and other fabrics are executed in great perfection. To these may be added brocades, lappets of all sorts, imitation shawls, gauzes, cambrics, shirtings, sheetings, tweels, stripes, checks, pullicates, ginghams, shawls, thread; and calico-printing is pursued in all its branches. Iron goods of every description, such as anchors, bolts, waggon-axles, sugar-mill gudgeons, wedges, and various articles of mill and steam-engine work, with domestic utensils of every kind, as well as hoes, axes, adzes, hammers, and similar tools. Almost all kinds of articles into which timber is manufactured are produced in great plenty and perfection. Coach-making, musical-instrument making, &c., are carried on in all the principal towns; shipbuilding also forms a most important branch of national industry, and dockyards for building and repairing vessels are established in the different seaports. There are, besides, manufactories of glass for all the different sorts of bottle, window, and flint glass; also of soap, candles, and starch; salt, tanning, brewing, distilling; and almost all articles of ordinary use are manufactured in Scotland. The different fisheries have been prosecuted with great industry and success. The whale-fishery to Davis' Straits and Greenland employs a great number of ships, and the white fishery is also prosecuted with great industry along the Moray Firth, Shetland, and the Western Islands, which bring profitable returns. The herring-fishery is carried on along the whole coast of the kingdom, as also the salmon-fishery in all the different rivers. Imp. These principally consist of cotton, flax, hemp, yarn, linen, iron, corn, wood, tallow, timber, tea, sugar, and other colonial produce; woollen cloth, hardware, and cutlery. Exp. Cotton and linen goods, sailcloth, sheep, black-cattle, coal, iron, and fish. The chief shipping ports are Leith, Dundee, Arbroath, Montrose, Aberdeen, Peterhead, Banff, and Inverness. Inhabitants. These may be divided into two great classes, viz., Highlanders and Lowlanders. The language, dress, and customs of these two classes are very different. The language of the Highlanders is that species of the Celtic called in Scotland Gaelic or Earse. The ancient dress of the Highlanders is fast giving way to a more modern costume, although it is still retained in many places, and often worn by gentlemen on particular occasions. The language of the low country is English, with a mixture of the Scotch, which, however, in the ordinary dialect of the better classes, is fast giving place to the English. Education. Excellent; perhaps in no country is there such ample provision for education as in Scotland. An act, passed in the reign of William and Mary, ordains that there shall be a school and a schoolmaster in every parish. These establishments, in which are taught reading, writing, arithmetic, and also Latin and Greek, have been attended with the happiest results. There are five universities; namely, at Edinburgh, St. Andrews, Glasgow, Aberdeen, and Old Aberdeen. Religion. Presbyterianism, established by act of parliament, in 1696, and afterwards secured in the treaty of Union. The system is founded on a parity of ecclesiastical authority among all its presbyters, excluding all pre-eminence of order, all its ministers being held equal in rank and power. It is also exceedingly simple in its forms, admitting of no outward splendour or ceremony, nor of any of those aids to devotion which are supposed to be derived from painting or music. Besides Presbyterianism, there are numerous dissenters; such as Episcopalians, Burghers, and Antiburghers, Quakers, Bereans, and Baptists. There are Catholic churches in the principal towns, and in the northern parts this religion has not been entirely superseded by the Reformation. Gov. The ancient constitution of Scotland was superseded at the time of the union with England. In the parliament of England, the Scots nobility are represented by 16 peers. Pop. about 3,000,000. Lat. of the mainland, between 54° 38′ and 58° 41′ N. Lon. between 1° 45′ and 6° 14′ W. Islands included, it extends to lat. 60° 50′ N., and to lon. 8° 35′ W.—Scotland was first visited by the Roman troops under Agricola, who penetrated to the foot of the Grampian Mountains. It was afterwards exposed to the ravages of the Norwegians and Danes, with whom many bloody battles were fought. Various contests were also maintained with the kings of England. Robert Bruce, however, secured the independence of the country and his title to the throne, by the decisive battle of Bannockburn, in 1314. He was succeeded by his nephew, Robert Stewart, and he by his eldest son, Robert. He being a weak prince, the reins of government were seized by the duke of Albany, who stoned to death the eldest son of the king. James, his second son, to escape a similar fate, fled to France; in the year 1424 he returned to Scotland, and having excited the jealousy of the nobility, he was assassinated in a monastery near Perth. James II., his son, an infant prince, succeeded him in 1437. He was killed by the bursting of a cannon at the siege of the castle of Roxburgh. James III. ascended the throne at the age of seven years. His reign was weak and inglorious, and he was murdered in the house of a miller, whither he had fled for protection. James IV., a generous and brave prince, began his reign in 1488. He was slain at the battle of Flodden. James V., an infant of less than two years of age, succeeded to the crown. He died in 1542, and was succeeded by his daughter, the celebrated Queen Mary, whose history and tragical end are well known. She was succeeded by her son James, who, in 1603, ascended the throne of England, vacant by the death of Queen Elizabeth, when the two kingdoms were united into one great monarchy. (See BRITAIN.)

SCOTT, skot, the name of several counties of the United States.—1. In the north part of Kentucky. Area, 213 square miles. Pop. 15,000.—2. In the south-west part of Virginia. Area, 718 square miles. Pop. 9,000.—3. In Indiana. Area, 175 square miles. Pop. 6,000.—4. In Iowa. Area, 445 square miles. Pop. Unascertained.—5. In Illinois. Area, 261 square miles. Pop. 8,000.

Scott, Daniel, a learned writer, who published an essay towards a demonstration of the Scripture Trinity; in 1741 he printed a new version of St. Matthew's Gospel, with critical notes; and, in 1745, an appendix to Stephens's Greek Lexicon. D. 1759.

Scott, David, a Scottish historian, who was several times imprisoned on account of his attachment to the house of Stuart. He was the author of a History of Scotland. B. in East Lothian, 1675; D. 1742.

Scott, Reginald, a learned English writer, who produced "A Perfect Platform of a Hop-Garden;" "The Discovery of Witchcraft;" "Discourse upon Devils and Spirits." In the two last he combats the absurdities of witchcraft and incantations with great success. James I., in his "Demonology," attempted to refute his opinions. B. in Kent, early in the 16th century; D. 1599.

Scott, George Gilbert, an eminent modern architect, who, at the conclusion of his apprenticeship, entered into partnership with Mr. Moffatt, a fellow-pupil. While in partnership, Mr. Scott designed, among other works, the beautiful cross at Oxford known as the "Martyrs' Memorial;" and the handsome parish church at Camberwell. In 1845 he quitted Mr. Moffatt, and soon afterwards carried off, in competition with the best architects in Europe, the first prize for erecting the church of St. Nicholas at Hamburg. In 1855 he again defeated the leading architects, both English and continental, in the design for the Hôtel-de-Ville of the same city. These, and many other works executed in England, placed him in the foremost rank as a Gothic architect. His principal works were, the restoration of the choir of Ely Cathedral; the new chapel, library, and other buildings at Exeter College, Oxford; and the restoration of Hereford cathedral and St. Michael's church, Cornhill. In 1849 he became architect to the dean and chapter of Westminster Abbey, and was employed in designing the new abbey gate-house, and in making some restorations and improvements. He became an associate of the Royal Academy in 1855, and, in 1859, was appointed architect to the new Foreign Office, in conjunction with Mr. Digby Wyatt. His last work was the "Westminster Memorial to Lord Raglan." He wrote several pamphlets on Gothic architecture. B. at Gawcott, near Buckingham, 1811.

Scott, Sir Michael, a learned Scotchman, who is assumed to be the heir of his grandfather, Sir Richard Balweary. He is believed to have studied at Paris, and to have subsequently visited the court of the emperor Frederick II. Returning to his native country, he is supposed to have been employed in various important services by Alexander III., who knighted him after the battle of Largo. His skill in chemistry and mathematics caused him to be regarded as a magician. Fragments of his works on natural history, mathematics, and philosophy remain. Dante speaks of him as a magician, in the "Inferno," and frequent allusion is made to him by Boccaccio and other Italian writers. B. in Scotland, early in the 13th century; supposed to have D. 1291.

Scott, Wingfield, a modern American general. He was the son of a Scotch gentleman, who emigrated to America after the battle of Culloden. He was educated for the law, but quitted that profession for a military career. In 1812 he fought against the English, and was taken prisoner at the battle of Queenstown, in Canada. After obtaining his exchange, he signalized himself by taking Fort George, for which he was created general of brigade. Severely wounded at the battle of Niagara, in 1814, he, at the conclusion of the war, repaired to Europe for the recovery of his health; and while at Paris, devoted himself to the study of French military tactics. Named commander-in-chief of the American army in the war with Mexico in 1847, he, in a single campaign, defeated Santa Anna in several engagements, took Vera Cruz and Xalapa, and marching into the city of Mexico, compelled the enemy to sign a treaty of peace. Notwithstanding his brilliant services, General Scott was twice an unsuccessful candidate for the presidentship. At the outbreak of the dispute between the United States and the Secessionists, General Scott was appointed commander-in-chief of the Federalist forces. B. in Virginia, 1786.

Scott, Sir Walter, an illustrious Scotch author. In his earliest years he was afflicted with more than the ordinary ailments of childhood. When scarcely two years of age, his right leg was found to have become suddenly powerless, and the previously healthy boy was pronounced as lame for life. In his eighth year he appeared to have gained an accession of strength, and was sent to the High School of Edinburgh; but, in a few months, he was once more prostrated upon a sick couch. This happened at the close of the year 1781, and Sir Walter thus speaks of the event:—"My indisposition arose, in part at least, from my having broken a blood-vessel, and motion and speech were for a long time pronounced positively dangerous. For several weeks I was confined strictly to my bed, during which time I was not allowed to speak above a whisper, to eat more than a spoonful or two of boiled rice, or to have more covering than a counterpane." His naturally strong constitution triumphed over this, almost the last attack made upon it by disease, and, in 1786, he was sufficiently recovered to be apprenticed to his father, a writer to the Signet. This took place when he was in his 15th year; but the youthful invalid had, meanwhile, been accumulating knowledge and arranging ideas, had been feeding an imagination stimulated by sickness, with stores which, though not likely ever to be utilized in his practice as a lawyer, were to prove of the most essential service to him in his career as an author. Circumstances combined to give to his awaking intellect that bent which was to conduct the Scotch lawyer's son to greatness. His grandfather at Sandy Knowe, on the Tweed, and a maiden aunt, who for a time had charge of him, were able to narrate to him those legendary tales upon which his mind longed to dwell. In his second illness, too, he was permitted to devour the contents of a circulating library, rich "in the romances of chivalry and the ponderous folios of Cyrus and Cassandra, down to the most approved works of modern times;" and he afterwards said, "I believe I read almost all the romances, old plays, and epic poetry, in that formidable collection." As he grew older and stronger, he took long rambles on foot or on horseback through the Highland and border counties, during which he was continually making additions to his stores of legendary tales, or marking character, or observing nature. He made acquaintance with the "Reliques of Ancient Poetry," while upon a visit to an uncle who resided near Kelso. He says, "In early youth I had been an eager student of ballad poetry, and the tree is still in my recollection beneath which I lay and first entered upon the enchanting perusal of Percy's 'Reliques of Ancient Poetry,' although it has long perished in the general blight which affected the whole race of Oriental platanus to which it belonged." The perusal of this, and the kindred works of Herd and Evans, led him towards philological and antiquarian research, and while attending the lectures of Dugald Stewart, in 1790, upon moral philosophy, he wrote an essay upon the "Manners and Customs of the Northern Nations of Europe," which, together with others on the origin of the Feudal System, the Scandinavian Mythology, and the authenticity of Ossian's Poems, subsequently composed, he read to the Speculative Society in 1792-3. He was called to the bar in 1792; in 1799 he received the appointment of sheriff of Selkirkshire, and, in 1806, he became one of the principal clerks of the Court of Session. To these sources of income were added a small property inherited from an uncle, and a moderate fortune received with his wife, Miss Carpenter, whom he married in 1797. His circumstances were, accordingly, favourable towards his following that career of literature to which his inclination and ambition invited him. He had long been addicted to verse-making, and had published, in 1796, a translation of Bürger's "Lenora" and the "Wild Huntsman," which marked the commencement of the poetical or first phase of his literary career. In 1799, Göthe's "Götz of Berlichingen," the ballad of "Glenfinlas," and "The Eve of St. John," followed; and when, in 1805, he gave to the public the "Lay of the Last Minstrel," he became the greatest poetical favourite of the day. "Marmion," the "Lady of the Lake," "Don Roderick," "Rokeby," the "Lord of the Isles," the "Bridal of Triermain," and "Harold the Daunt less," followed in rapid succession. The comparative failure of the two last works, which were published anonymously, seems to have decided Scott to abandon verse for prose. The second great epoch of his literary life may be said to have commenced with the anonymous publication of "Waverley," in 1814. In four years it had for successors "Guy Mannering," the "Antiquary," the "Black Dwarf," "Old Mortality," "Rob Roy," and the "Heart of Mid-Lothian." His name was not placed upon these productions; but, although the secret of their authorship was well kept by his printer and publisher, the public began to regard Scott, the poet, as the "Great Unknown." But his active pen was not alone engaged upon the fine novels which he continued to throw off with so much facility. He was secretly in partnership with Ballantyne, his printer, and had many transactions with Constable, the Edinburgh publisher. He was thus connected with many publications, either as editor or contributor. He assisted to establish the "Quarterly Review;" he wrote the Life of Dryden and of Swift, the biographical and critical prefaces to a collection of the English novelists, and furnished notes to Sadler's Correspondence, and works of a kindred style. In this way he was engaged between the years 1796—1826. His novels and poems had made him famous, and had, moreover, raised him to apparent affluence. His fine manly character caused him to be beloved by a large and distinguished circle of acquaintances. The magnificence of his disposition incited him to enact the rôle of one of those great feudal chiefs which his pen so picturesquely portrayed. In the presumption of his fertile genius, he became the proprietor of Abbotsford, where, in the intervals of literary composition, he dispensed the hospitalities of a prince. In brief, the interval 1820-26 may be described as one gorgeous dream. But the commercial crisis of the latter year made bankrupts of Constable & Co. and Ballantyne & Co. "A state of affairs," according to the Scotch term, was drawn up, and, in consequence of his connection with those firms, he was found to be liable for a sum of about £147,000. Yet he was undaunted before this fearful load of debt. "Gentlemen," he said to his creditors, "time and I against any two. Let me take this good ally into my company, and I believe I shall be able to pay you every farthing." He gave up all his property, proposed to lodge the receipts of his literary labours in the hands of trustees for the payment of his creditors, retired into modest lodgings, and went resolutely to work to wipe off his liabilities. "It is very hard," he said, "thus to lose all the labours of a lifetime, and be made a poor man at last, when I ought to have been otherwise. But, if God grant me life and strength for a few years longer, I have no doubt that I shall redeem it all." This last unfortunate period, during which a noble mind was struggling to accomplish a Herculean task, endured from 1826 to 1832. "The History of Napoleon," "The Letters on Demonology and Witchcraft," and such works, were produced to aid the good cause he had at heart; but although he did not shrink from the responsibilities which lay upon him, his overtaxed faculties gave way beneath the excessive mental toil to which they were subjected. The great object of this, the dark and closing period of his life, was, however, attained. Before his death, he had materially decreased the load of debt, and, after that unhappy event, the profits of his writings wiped away the whole. It would be unnecessary to append a complete list of his works: they are too well known, and, fortunately, too easily accessible to the whole reading community, to need it. "Time alone," says an eminent authority, "can decide how much of his writings will survive, and what place they will permanently occupy in the literary world. Of this, however, there can be no doubt, that in Scott a healthy intellect was engrafted on a powerful will; that he had a natural and easy play of humour, with no inconsiderable portion of poetical imagination, and a large share of that power of apprehending and portraying character which is the great charm of Fielding. A great part of his life he indulged in a dream-world of his own; but when rudely awakened by adversity, he submitted to the consequences with heroic submission. He was a great and good man." His house and estate at Abbotsford became the property of J. R. Hope, Esq., the husband of his grand-daughter, Charlotte Harriet Jane Lockhart, daughter of Scott's eldest daughter Sophia and J. G. Lockhart, Esq. B. at Edinburgh, 1771; D. at Abbotsford, 1832.

SCRIBE, Augustin Eugène, skreeb, an eminent French dramatic author, who was the son of a merchant, and was designed for the legal profession; but, after the death of his parents, he so much neglected his studies, and at the same time evinced so strong a predilection for dramatic composition, that his guardian, the celebrated advocate Bonnet, advised him to abandon jurisprudence for the drama. Accordingly, in 1811, he, in conjunction with Germain Delavigne, an old schoolfellow, produced his first piece, entitled "The Dervish," which was unsuccessful. A similarly unfortunate reception greeted several of his after-efforts; but the young playwright persevered undauntedly, and, in 1812, produced a drama, which was received with the greatest applause. From that time until his death he continued to compose plays and operatic libretti with a rapidity truly astonishing. His power of constructing plots, delineating character, and composing witty and pointed dialogue, appeared to be inexhaustible. He wrote about four hundred pieces of various kinds; and both the French and the English stage (for which latter his best works have been freely adapted) owe to his fertile invention many of their greatest triumphs. The most popular of his operas are "The Prophet," "The Crown Diamonds," "Fra Diavolo," and "Robert le Diable." The list of even his best plays is too long to be admitted into this notice. B. at Paris, 1791; D. 1860.

SCRIBONIUS-LARGUS, skri-bo'-ni-us, a Roman physician in the time of Claudius, whom he accompanied to Britain. Some of his works are extant, and were printed at Basil in 1529. Flourished early in the 1st century.

SCRIVEN, skriv'-en, a county of Georgia, U.S. Area, 718 square miles. Pop. 7,000.

SCRIVERIUS, Peter Schryver called in Latin, skre'-ver, a Dutch writer, who produced "Batavia Illustrata," the chronicles of Holland, Zealand, Utrecht, &c. He also published editions of Vegetius, and other writers on military affairs. D. at Haerlem, 1576; D. 1660.

SCUDERI, George de, skoo'-de-re, a French poet and dramatist, who was intended and educated for the military profession, but quitted it for dramatic composition. Richelieu gave him a small fort on a rock near Marseilles for a residence; but he soon left it to return to Paris; and it was said of him, that he had shut up the fort, returned to Paris by the coach, and, for fifteen years, carried the keys in his pocket. B. at Havre-de-Grace, 1601; D. at Paris, 1667.

SCUDERI, Magdalen de, a French romancist, and sister of the preceding. She wrote a large number of works, which were once highly popular, notwithstanding their great length. The chief of these were, "Clelia," in 10 vols.; "Artamenes, or the Grand Cyrus," in 10 vols.; "Ibrahim, or the Illustrious Bassa;" "Conversations and Discourses;" "A Discourse on Glory," &c. She was admitted a member of the academy of Ricovrati at Padua, and had pensions from Cardinal Mazarin and Louis XIV. B. 1607; D. 1701.

SCULCOATS, skul'-kotes, a parish of the E. Riding of Yorkshire, included within the municipal boundary of Hull. Pop. 23,000.

SCUTARI, skoo'-ta-re, a lake in the west of European Turkey, in Albania. Ext. 20 miles long, with an average breadth of 6.

SCUTARI, a large fortified town of European Turkey, in Albania, on the river Boyana, at the S.E. extremity of Lake Scutari. Its position is very favourable for defence, and its highest point is crowned by a castle. The town consists of four quarters, and has several mosques and Greek churches. Pop. 40,000.

SCUTARI, or ISKUDAR, a city of Asia Minor, on the Bosphorus, immediately opposite to Constantinople, of which it is considered a suburb. Its site is one of the most beautiful imaginable. The minarets of Scutari, and the hills above it, afford the most brilliant views of Constantinople and the surrounding scenery. It has a palace and gardens belonging to the sultan, a college of dervishes, barracks, public baths, and an extensive cemetery. It carries on a considerable trade, being a rendezvous for the caravans which come from the interior of Asia. Pop. 60,000.—Here, in 325, the troops of Constantine the Great finally defeated those of Licinius.

SCYLAX, sil'-lax, a geographer, mathematician, and musician of Caria, near Halicarnassus, who was employed by Darius, son of Hystaspes, in making discoveries in India. Some attribute to him the invention of geographical tables. His "Periplus of the Inhabited World" was published in the "Minor Greek Geographers" of Gail, 1826. Flourished about 510 B.C.

SCYLLA, sil'-la, a well-known promontory and current of the Mediterranean, in the Strait of Messina, which separates Sicily from the Neapolitan territory. Height, about 200 feet.

SCYLLA, a daughter of Nisus, king of Megara, who became enamoured of Minos. She informed him that she would deliver Megara into his hands, if he consented to marry her. Minos did so, and as the fate of Megara depended on a golden hair on the head of Nisus, Scylla cut it off, and the enemy easily became master of the place. Minos afterwards treated her with so much disdain, that she threw herself into the sea, or, according to other accounts, she was changed into a lark by the gods, and her father into a hawk.—A daughter of Typhon, or of Phorcys, who was beloved by Glaucus, one of the deities of the sea. Glaucus, in order to render her favourable to his suit, applied to Circe, whose knowledge of herbs and incantations was universally known. Circe herself became enamoured of him, and attempted to make him forget Scylla, but in vain. To punish her rival, Circe poured the juice of some poisonous herbs into the waters of the fountain where Scylla bathed, and no sooner had the nymph touched the water, than she found every part of her body below the waist, changed into frightful monsters like dogs, which never ceased barking. This sudden metamorphosis so terrified her, that she threw herself into that part of the sea which separates the coast of Italy and Sicily, where she was changed into rocks, which continued to bear her name, and which, as well as the whirlpool of Charybdis, on the coast of Sicily, were universally deemed very dangerous to navigators.

SCYROS. (See SKYROS.)

SE, a prefix to numerous cities in China.

SEARA. (See CEARA.)

SEATON, se'-ton, the name of several parishes in England, none of them with a population above 2,200.

SEATON CAREW, a township on the seacoast of Durham, 2½ miles from Hartlepool. It is a sea-bathing place. Pop. 1,000. It has a station on the Clarence and Hartlepool Railway.

SEBA, Albert, seb'-a, a Dutch naturalist, who produced a beautifully-printed and illustrated work upon natural history, at Amsterdam, in 1734. The explanations are in Latin and French. B. 1665; D. 1736.

SEBASTIAN, Dom, se-bās'-ti-an, king of Portugal, was the posthumous son of the Infant John, by a daughter of the emperor Charles V., and succeeded John III. in 1557, he being then only in his third year. He engaged in an unsuccessful war with the Moors in 1574, and in 1578 he went in person to assist Muley Mohammed, son of Abdalla, sultan of Morocco, against his uncle, the rightful heir to the throne; but, in a battle fought near Tangiers, Sebastian was slain.

SEBASTIAN DEL PIOMBO. (See PIOMBO, Sebastian del.)

SEBASTIAN, ST. (See SAN SEBASTIAN.)

SEBASTIANI, Horace Francis, Count, se-bas'-te-a'-ne, a French general, who was about to enter the priesthood when the revolution caused him to join the army. After distinguishing himself in Italy and under General Moreau, he obtained the command of a regiment of dragoons, at the head of which he assisted Bonaparte to carry into effect his coup d'état of the 18th Brumaire. His after-career was marked with the greatest success, both as a soldier and as a diplomatist. He signalized himself at the battle of Austerlitz, and, on being appointed to a command in Spain, in 1809, he defeated the Spaniards in several encounters. He next obtained from Napoleon I. a command in the grand army prepared for the invasion of Russia; and, after the battles of Smolensko and Moskwa, entered the Russian capital with the advance-guard. He received a wound at the battle of Leipzig in 1813, and was subsequently posted at Cologne to defend the left bank of the Rhine; but, although forced to fall back, he distinguished himself by his skill and bravery in command of some regiments of cavalry of the Imperial Guard. He retired from active life at the abdication of the emperor, but was a member of the deputation which waited upon the allied monarchs subsequently to the disaster of Waterloo. He was a member of the Chamber of Deputies during the restoration; and, upon the accession of Louis Philippe, became minister of marine, and afterwards minister of foreign affairs. He was ambassador in London in 1835, and five years later received the marshal's bâton. Soon after the murder of his daughter, the duchess de Praslin, by her husband, in 1847, his health became so seriously affected that he was compelled to retire into private life. After his demise, his body was buried in the church of the Invalides, upon which occasion the building narrowly escaped destruction by fire. Although not as brilliant in the field as the best of Napoleon's marshals, he everywhere displayed the greatest bravery and the most complete knowledge of the principles of strategy. As a diplomatist, he obtained several important advantages for his master. He is also declared to have advised Napoleon to winter in Lithuania during the invasion of Russia; which counsel, if heeded, might have averted the catastrophe which cost Napoleon his throne. B. in Corsica, 1770; D. 1851.

SEBASTOPOL. (See SEVASTOPOL.)

SEBENICO, sai-bai-ne'-ko, a well-built town of Austrian Dalmatia, near the mouth of the Kerka, 42 miles from Zara. It is defended by several forts, and has a cathedral and other public buildings of Venetian architecture. It has also an excellent harbour. Pop. 7,000.—It is the birthplace of the philosopher Tommasseo, and of the painter Andrea Schiavoni.

SEBNITZ, seb'-nitz, a town of Germany, in Saxony, 22 miles from Dresden. Manf. Linen and paper. Pop. 4,000.

SEBOO, se-boo', a considerable river of Morocco, which falls into the sea near Algiers.

SEBUS, se'-bus, a river of Africa, in the kingdom of Fez. After a course of 210 miles, it enters the Atlantic at Mehadia.

SEBUSTIEH, se-bus'-te-ai, a village of Palestine, in the pashalic of Acre, 6 miles from Nablous. It has a church, reputed as the burial-place of John the Baptist, and several remains of antiquity. It is the ancient Samaria, which was founded by Omri 925 B.C., and from that time till the captivity, 720 B.C., it continued to be the capital of the ten tribes of Israel.

SECHELLES, or SEYCHELLES, sai-shel', a cluster of small islands in the Indian Ocean, only three of which are inhabited.

SECHSZEHN STADTE, sek'-zain, the sixteen crown villages of Hungary, scattered through the county Zips. Each has its own peculiar laws. United Pop. 50,000.

SE-CHUEN, se-choo-en', a province of China, having Tibet on the W., and on the other sides it is inclosed by other Chinese provinces. Area, 166,800 square miles. Desc. Mountainous and well watered. Pro. Silk, sugar, rhubarb, oranges, drugs, and musk. It also produces some metals. Pop. 21,435,680. Lat. between 26° and 33° N. Lon. between 101° and 110° E.

SECHURA, se-choo'-ra, a town of Peru, on the Piura, about 3 miles from the coast of the Pacific. Pop. Unascertained.

SECKENDORF, Guy Louis de, sek'-en-dorf, a German historian, who became privy counsellor to the elector of Brandenburg, and chancellor of the university of Halle. He wrote, in Latin, "A Compendium of Ecclesiastical History," "State of the Princes of Germany," and "A Description of the Germanic Empire." B. in Franconia, 1626; D. at Halle, 1692.

SECKER, Thomas, sek'-er, a learned and pious English prelate, who, upon entering into orders, became chaplain to Bishop Talbot, and, in 1733, was instituted to the rectory of St. James, Westminster, and appointed king's chaplain. The year following he was consecrated bishop of Bristol, and, in 1737, translated to Oxford. In 1750 he obtained the deanery of St. Paul's, and, in 1758, was advanced to the archbishopric of Canterbury. The sermons, charges, and lectures of this excellent prelate are distinguished by their perspicuity and eloquence. B. at Sibthorpe, Notts, 1693; D. in London, 1768.

SECONDIGLIANO, sek'-on-deel-ye-a'-no, a town of Naples, 3 miles from Naples. Pop. 4,800.

SECOUSSE, Denis Francis, sek'-oosse, a French writer, who was educated under Rollin, after which he became an advocate, but quitted the law for literature. He was employed by the chancellor D'Aguesseau as censor-royal, and in other public services, until he became blind. He published "A Collection of Royal Ordonnances," "Memoirs for a History of Charles the Bad," and several dissertations in the Memoirs of the Academy of Inscriptions. B. at Paris, 1691; D. 1754.

SECUNDERABAD, se-koon'-de-ra-bad', a British military cantonment in India, 398 miles from Madras. Pop. 35,000.

SECUNDUS, Johannes, se-kun'-dus, a Dutch poet, who wrote in Latin, and whose family name was Everts, which he altered to the Latin one by which he is known. He studied law under Alciatus, and afterwards became secretary to the archbishop of Toledo. His poems, which are of the amatory order, and modelled after Catullus, are various and excellent. The most celebrated are the "Basia," or the Kisses, which have been translated into several languages. B. at the Hague, 1511; D. at Tournai, 1536.

SEDAINE, Michael John, se-dain', an eminent French dramatic writer. After the death of his father, an architect, he became so reduced in circumstances as to take up the trade of a stonemason; but was noticed by his master, who gave him a share in the business. A taste for the drama, however, induced him to quit his trade, and to write comic operas and plays, which possess considerable merit, and some of which have been translated into English; as, "Richard Cœur-de-Lion" (for which Gretry wrote the music) and "Blue-Beard." He was a member of the French Academy, and secretary of that of Architecture. B. at Paris, 1719; D. at Paris, 1797.

SEDAN, se-da', a strongly-fortified town of France, in the department of the Ardennes, on the Maese, 10 miles from Mezières. The town is divided into Upper and Lower. It has a large arsenal, and a monument to Turenne, who was born here. Manf. Woollen goods, of which it is the centre; hosiery, leather, arms, hardwares, and linen yarn. Pop. 17,000.—This place was long an independent principality, and was united to France under Louis XIII.

SEDBERGH, sed'-berg, a market-town of the W. Riding of Yorkshire, 65 miles from York. Manf. Cotton goods. Pop. 5,000.

SEDGEMOOR, sedj'-moor, a wild tract of Somersetshire, between Bridgewater and King's Weston, where, in 1685, the troops of James II. defeated those of the duke of Monmouth.

SEDGLEY, sedj'-le, a parish of Staffordshire, 3 miles from Wolverhampton. It has coal- and limestone-works. Pop. 30,000.

SEDGWICK, Miss Catherine Maria, sedj'-wik, a popular American authoress, who was the daughter of an American judge and member of the House of Representatives. She commenced her literary career in 1822, with the publication of a work of fiction, entitled "A New-England Tale." Among the most successful of her after-productions, were "Redwood," a novel; "Hope Leslie, or Early Times in America;" "The Linwoods;" "Letters from Abroad to Kindred at Home;" and a work for juvenile perusal, called "The Rich Poor Man and the Poor Rich Man." She also contributed largely to the American literary journals. B. at Stockbridge, Massachusetts, 1790.

SEDGWICK, Rev. Adam, an eminent modern geologist, who was educated at the university of Cambridge, where he became fellow of Trinity College in 1808. Ten years later he was chosen to fill the chair of geology founded by Dr. Woodward. As a geologist, he principally directed his attention to the study of the crystalline rocks. His literary contributions to science were principally furnished to the Transactions of the Cambridge Philosophical Society and of the Geological Society, to the Reports of the British Association, the "Annals of Philosophy," and the "Edinburgh New Philosophical Journal." He was also the reputed author of the celebrated reply to the "Vestiges of the Natural History of Creation," in the "Edinburgh Review." One of the most important of his few separate works was that entitled "A Discourse on the Studies of the University of Cambridge," in which he enunciated his views relative to the bearings of physical philosophy upon the Christian religion. He was corresponding member of the French Institute and fellow of the Royal and Geological societies. B. at Dent, Yorkshire, about 1786.

SEDLEY, Sir Charles, sed'-le, an English poet, who was one of the wits of the court of Charles II. His daughter became mistress to James II., who created her countess of Dorchester; but Sir Charles was zealous for the revolution, and being asked the reason, answered, "From a principle of gratitude; for since his majesty has made my daughter a countess, it is fit I should do all I can to make his daughter a queen." His poems are licentious, but are written in an elegant style; he also wrote some plays, which are remarkable for little else than their loose tone of morality. B. at Aylesford, Kent, 1639; D. 1701.

SEDLITZ, sed'-litz, a village of Bohemia, 17 miles from Leutmeritz, noted for its mineral waters.—Also a village of Germany, in Saxony, 2 miles from Pirna.

SEDULIUS, Cœlius, se-du'-li-us, a Roman ecclesiastic and poet, who wrote a poem on the life of Christ, entitled "Paschale Carmen." It was published by Aldus in 1502. Supposed to have flourished in the 5th century.

SEELAND. (See ZEALAND.)

SÉEZ, sai'-ez, an old town of France, in the department Orne, 13 miles from Alençon. Manf. Woollens, cottons, fustians, and stockings. Pop. 5,000.

SEFFIN, sef'-fin, a small town of Asiatic Turkey, to the N. of Rakka. In the 7th century, in 90 battles, 70,000 Mahometans are supposed to have perished.

SEGNERI, Paul, sain'-yair-e, an eminent Italian preacher, whose eloquence occasioned his being appointed chaplain to Pope Innocent XII. His works are, Sermons; "The Unbeliever without Excuse;" "The Pastor Instructed;" "The Illusions of the Quietists," &c. B. near Rome, 1624; D. at Rome, 1694.

SEGO, se'-go, a large city, capital of the kingdom of Bambarra, in Central Africa, first visited by Park. It is divided into four distinct towns, two of which are on the northern, and two on the southern bank of the Joliba (Niger). These towns are surrounded with high mud walls; the houses are built of clay, of a square form, with flat roofs; some of them have two stories, and many of them are whitewashed. Moorish mosques are also seen in every quarter. Pop. 30,000. Lat. 14° 10′ N. Lon. 2° 30′ W.

SEGORBE, sai-gor'-bai, a town of Spain, in Valencia, on the Murviedro, 34 miles from Valencia. It has a cathedral, in which are some good paintings. Manf. Paper, starch, and pottery. Pop. 6,000.

SEGOVIA, sai-go'-ve-a, a city of Spain, on a rocky eminence between two deep valleys, the one watered by the river Eresma, the other by a brook, 47 miles from Madrid. It is surrounded by a wall in the Moorish style, crowned at intervals with turrets. The streets are narrow, crooked, and, in several parts, steep: the suburbs are built on more even ground. It contains a number of convents and churches, of which the most remarkable is the cathedral, a large pile, partly Grecian, partly Gothic, erected in the 16th century. The Alcazar, or ancient palace, is a Moorish building. The most remarkable monument of Segovia is the aqueduct, a Roman work, supposed to have been built by Trajan. It is built of freestone without cement, and contains in all 161 arches, supported on pillars, some of which are 80 feet in height. Manf. Woollen goods, paper, pottery, and glass. Pop. 14,000.—The French held this place from 1808 to 1814.

SEGRAIS, John Regnauld de, seg'-rai, a French poet, who was educated for the priesthood, which profession he declined. Mademoiselle, daughter of Gaston, duke of Orleans, appointed him her gentleman in ordinary, and he was afterwards patronized by Madame de la Fayette. He was a member of the French Academy. He wrote some elegant eclogues, and translated the "Georgics" and "Æneid" of Virgil into French verse. His prose works are, a collection of novels, and "Segraisiana; or, a Miscellany of History and Literature." B. at Caen, 1624; D. 1701.

SEGUIER, John Francis, seg'-e-ai, an eminent French botanist, who was educated for the legal profession, but renounced it to follow the pursuit of science. He accompanied the Marquis Scipio Maffei on his travels in France, England, Holland, and Germany; and, on his return to his own country, became principal of the academy of Nismes. His principal works are, "Bibliotheca Botanica," "Plantæ Veronenses," and a translation of the works of Maffei. B. at Nismes, 1703; D. 1784.

SEGUIER, Antony Louis, an eminent French lawyer, who became advocate-general of the Parisian parliament. Upon the dissolution of that body in 1790, he was offered the post of mayor of Paris, which he declined, choosing rather to live in retirement during the revolutionary storm; but a pamphlet appearing under the title of "Seguier treated as he deserves," he deemed it prudent to quit his native country. B. at Paris, 1726; D. 1792.

SEGUIER, Peter, an eminent French lawyer, who, in 1564, was nominated president à mortier, the highest functionary but one in the Parisian parliament. In that office he boldly and successfully argued against the introduction of the Inquisition into France. He left six sons, all of whom fulfilled the highest legal functions. B. at Paris, 1504; D. 1580.

SEGUR, Louis Philippe, Count de, sai'-goor, a French diplomatist and historical writer, who fought against the English in America, in the service of the Americans, until the termination of the struggle; after which he returned to France. He was subsequently appointed ambassador to Russia, and became a favourite with Catherine II., whom he accompanied in her tour to the Crimea in 1787. During the Revolution he narrowly escaped persecution. He afterwards devoted himself to literature, and produced a great number of works. B. 1753; D. 1830.

SEGUR, Philip Henry, Marquis de, a French general, who served with distinction in Italy and Bohemia, and particularly at the battle of Prague. He was created a marshal by Louis XVI. in 1783, having previously been nominated minister of war. During the Revolution he was imprisoned in La Force, but was subsequently liberated by Napoleon when first consul, and also granted a pension of 4,000 francs. B. 1724; D. at Paris, 1801.

SEGURA, sai-goo'-ra, a river of Spain, in Murcia, which, after a course of 180 miles, enters the Mediterranean at Guardamar.

SEGURA, the name of several towns in Spain, none of them with a population above 3,000.

SEHWAN, sai-wan', a town of Scinde, standing on the right bank of the Arul. Manf. Shoes, caps, and silks. Pop. 10,000. Lat. 26° 24′ N. Lon. 67° 55′ E.—Here is the tomb of Lal Shah Baz, with gates of wrought silver.

SEIK STATES. (See SIKHIND.)

SEILLE, sail, the name of three small rivers of France, one falling into the Saone, the others into the Mosello.

SEINE, sain, a river of France, rising in the mountains of Burgundy, running northwards through Champagne to Troyes, where it receives the Aube, and, turning to the west, is joined by the Yonne, and, before reaching Paris, by the Marne, a larger stream, flowing from the west. At Paris the Seine varies from 300 to 500 feet in width, and it soon after receives an addition by the influx of the Oise, when, pursuing a winding course to the north-west, it passes Rouen, and discharges itself into the sea at Havre-de-Grace. Length, 414 miles, for 350 of which it is navigable.

SEINE, a department in the N. of France, of which Paris is the capital. Area, 181 square miles. Desc. It is covered with towns, villages, and manufactories, and is traversed by the Seine. Its industry is concentrated in the capital, which it supplies with vegetables, peaches, strawberries, and melons. Pop. 1,423,000. It is traversed by several railways, and the canals of St. Denis and St. Martin.

SEINE, LOWER, a maritime department in the N. of France, comprising the N.E. part of the old province of Normandy, and bounded on the N. and W. by the English Channel. Area, 2,300 square miles. Desc. Fertile, and watered by the Seine. An eighth part of the surface is covered with wood. Pro. Corn, hemp, lint, hops, and fruits. Manf. Important: Rouen is noted for its cotton and Elbœuf for its woollen fabrics.

SEINE-AND-MARNE, a department in the N.E. of France, occupying a portion of the old province of Ile-de-France. Area, 2,335 square miles. Desc. Undulating, and traversed by the Seine, the Marne, the Morin, and Yeres. One sixth of the department is covered with forests; amongst which is that of Fontainebleau. Pro. Corn, cattle, and wine. In Provins, roses are cultivated, to be employed in medicine and perfumery. Pop. 763,000.

SEINE-AND-OISE, a department of the N.E. of France, adjacent to that of the Oise, and to that of the Seine-and-Marne. Area, 2,253 square miles. Desc. Undulating, with a generally infertile soil. Rivers. The principal are the Seine, the Marne, and the Oise. Pro. Corn, wine, fruits, vegetables, and cattle. The wine, however, is mostly of inferior quality, and has its place supplied by beer and cider. Manf. Important, comprising Sèvres porcelain, leather, chemicals, printed fabrics, hardwares, and woollen cloths. Pop. 472,000.

SEISTAN, or SEGESTAN, seg-es-tan', a province of Afghanistan, in the east of Persia, lying between Candahar and Korassan on the north, Mekran and Belouchistan on the south, and containing the Hamoun morass. Desc. It is nothing more than a mountain-basin, encompassed by deserts, fertile only on the banks of rivers, and unhealthy. Pop. Perhaps 50,000. Lat. between 30° 30′ and 32° N. Lon. between 61° and 62° 30′ E.—It was devastated by Timour in 1383.

SEJANUS, Lucius Ælius, se-jai'-nus, a celebrated Roman, was the son of Seius Strabo, a Roman knight. He first ingratiated himself into favour with Caius Cæsar, the grandson of Augustus, but afterwards attached himself to Tiberius, who made him his confidant. He also contrived, by his pliability of temper and insinuating address, to gain the affections of the people, the soldiers, and the senate. He was appointed commander of the prætorian guards, and had the disposal of all places of trust and honour, which he gave to his own creatures. Inflamed by ambition, he aspired to the imperial throne, and, to gain his end, murdered Drusus, the son of the emperor; after which he declared his intention of marrying Livia, the widow of Drusus; but this was opposed by Tiberius. The emperor at length perceiving the real views of his favourite, caused him to be accused before the senate; on which he was deserted by his friends and sent to prison, where he was strangled, A.D. 31. His body, after being dragged about the streets, was thrown into the Tiber.

SELBOE, sel'-be(r), an island off the W. coast of Norway, 28 miles from Bergen.—Also a LAKE, 25 miles from Trondhjem, which receives the Nea, and communicates with Trondhjem-fiord. Ext. 20 miles long, by 3 broad.

SELBY, sel'-be, a market-town of the West Riding of Yorkshire, on the Ouse, 13 miles from York. It has a town-hall and a grammar and bluecoat schools. Pop. 5,400.—Selby is a place of great antiquity, and is noted as the birthplace of Henry I., son of William the Conqueror. William had, in 1070, erected a monastery here, of which the abbey church seems to have been a very spacious and elegant structure. It communicates by railway with Hull and Leeds.

SELDEN, John, sel'-den, a learned English lawyer and writer. After receiving his education at the university of Oxford, he, in 1604, took up his residence in the Inner Temple, where he was called to the bar, and became distinguished as a profound lawyer and antiquary. At the age of 22 he drew up a treatise on the Civil Government of England before the Conquest, which gained him great reputation. In 1644 he published his "Titles of Honour," and in 1618 his "History of Tithes," which gave great alarm to the clergy, and was answered by several writers. Being prosecuted in the High Commission court, he made an apology for having questioned the divine right of the clergy to receive tithes. In 1621 he was committed to custody as the principal promoter of the protest made by the Commons respecting their privileges. In 1623 he was chosen member of parliament for Lancaster, and in 1625 he was returned for Great Bedwin, in Wiltshire. He afterwards again represented Lancaster, and was appointed one of the managers of the prosecution of the duke of Buckingham, and had also a principal share in drawing up the Petition of Rights. For his opposition to the court he was, in 1629, sent to the Tower, whence he was removed to the King's Bench, and in 1634 admitted to bail. From this period he took a less active part against the king. In 1636 he published his "Defence of the King's Dominion over the British Seas," in answer to Grotius. In 1642 he was offered the great seal, which he refused. Though he took the Covenant, and was appointed keeper of the records, as also a member of the Assembly of Divines, he refused to write a reply to the "Eikon Basilike," which he had been requested to do by Cromwell. B. in Sussex, 1584; D. in London, 1654.

SELE, sai'-lai, a river of Italy, rising 12 miles from Policastro, and, after a course of 60 miles, falling into the Gulf of Salerno.

SELEFKEH, se-lef'-kai, a town of Asia Minor, near the mouth of a river called Ghiuk Sooyoo, the ancient Calicadnus, 8 miles from its mouth in the Mediterranean. It is chiefly distinguished by being on the site of the ancient Seleucia, considerable vestiges of which are still discovered. Pop. small. Lat. 36° 20′ N. Lon. 33° 55′ E.

SELENGA, se-len'-ga, a river of Siberia, rising in the Tang-nou Mountains, and, after a course of 500 miles, falling by three mouths into the lake Baikal.

SELEUCIDÆ, se-lu'-si-de, the name of a Greek dynasty in Asia, founded, after the death of Alexander the Great, by Seleucus, one of the most distinguished generals of the Macedonian king. The era of the Seleucidæ begins with the taking of Babylon by Seleucus, B.C. 312, and ends with the conquest of Syria by Pompey, B.C. 65.

SELEUCUS, se-lu'-kus, surnamed Nicator, or Victorious. After Alexander's death, he received Babylon as his province. When he had strengthened himself in his empire, Seleucus imitated the example of the rest of the generals of Alexander, and assumed the title of independent monarch. He founded no less than thirty-four cities in different parts of his empire, which he peopled with Greek colonies, whose national industry, learning, &c., were communicated to the indolent inhabitants of Asia. Seleucus was murdered 280 B.C., in the 82nd year of his age. He was succeeded by Antiochus Soter.

SELEUCUS II., surnamed Callinicus, succeeded his father, Antiochus Theus, on the throne of Syria, B.C. 246. After he had been a prisoner for some time in Parthia, he died of a fall from his horse, B.C. 226.

SELEUCUS III. succeeded his father Seleucus II. on the throne of Syria, and received the surname of Ceraunus. He was a very weak, timid monarch, and was murdered by his officers after a reign of three years, B.C. 223. His brother Antiochus, though only 15 years old, ascended the throne, and rendered himself so celebrated that he acquired the name of the Great.

SELEUCUS IV. succeeded his father Antiochus the Great, B.C. 187. He was surnamed Philopator, or, according to Josephus, Soter. He was poisoned after a reign of twelve years, B.C. 175.

SELEUCUS V. succeeded his father Demetrius Nicator, on the throne of Syria, in the 20th year of his age, B.C. 124. He was put to death in the first year of his reign, by Cleopatra, his mother.

SELEUCUS VI., the last of the name, was the son of Antiochus Grypus. He was banished from his kingdom by Antiochus Eusebes, and fled to Cilicia, where he was burnt in a palace, by the inhabitants, B.C. 95.

SELIGHNSTADT, sel'-i-gen-stat, a town of Germany, on the Maine, 17 miles from Frankfort. Manf. Woollen cloth, linen, and hosiery. Pop 3,400.

SELIGHER, sel'-i-ger, a lake of Russia in the governments of Tver and Novgorod. Ext. 30 miles long and 10 broad.

SELIM I., se'-lim, emperor of the Turks, was the second son of Bajazet II., whom he dethroned and put to death, as he did his two brothers subsequently. Having secured the throne by these crimes, he turned his arms with success against Egypt and Persia. The former country he completely conquered, and put an end to the dominion of the Mamelukes, which had lasted above 260 years. B. 1467; D. 1520.

SELIM II., grandson of the above, succeeded his father Solyman II. in 1566. In 1570 he broke the treaty which his father had made with the Venetians, and took the island of Cyprus; but, the year following, he lost the battle of Lepanto, where his navy was almost wholly destroyed. This disaster obliged him to sue for peace. D. 1574.

SELIM III., younger son of Mustapha and brother of Abdul-Hamid, whom he succeeded in 1789. He was one of the most enlightened men of his country, and formed the idea of regenerating the Turkish empire. The commencement of his reign was, however, very much troubled. His army was defeated by the allied Austrians and Russians, the latter taking Bender and Ismail. In 1792 he lost the Crimea, which was incorporated with Russia. The French subsequently invaded Egypt, and his army was annihilated by Bonaparte: the province was, however, retaken by the English, who restored it to the Porte. Having purchased a peace at the price of conceding territory to Russia, he commenced his cherished plans of reform. He remodelled his army after the European plan, introduced new modes of raising the taxes, and sought to introduce European civilization into his empire; but a fresh war breaking out, in which he was defeated by the Russians and English, his army became dissatisfied. The Janissaries also rose in insurrection and deposed Selim, placing his nephew, Mustapha IV., upon the throne. He was at first placed in confinement, but was, in 1808, strangled by order of Mustapha.

SELIMNO, se-lim'-no, a walled town of European Turkey, 65 miles from Adrianople. Manf. Woollen goods, attar of roses, and gun-locks. Pop. 15,000.

SELIS, Nicolas Joseph, sai'-le, a French poet, who became professor of the belles-lettres in the central school of the Pantheon, and a member of the National Institute. His most important works are, a translation of Persius, with notes; "Relation of the Disorder, Confession, and Death of M. de Voltaire;" and "Epistles in Verse." B. at Paris, 1737; D. 1802.

SELKIRK, sel'-kirk, a royal burgh of Scotland, and chief town of the county to which it gives name, situate on a commanding eminence below the confluence of the Yarrow and the Ettrick, near the borders of Roxburghshire, 38 miles from Edinburgh. The town has been greatly improved. It has a town-house, containing apartments for the town and sheriff-courts, and a library with a handsome spire and clock. There are, besides, monuments to Sir Walter Scott and Mungo Park, who was a native of the neighbourhood. Manf. Woollen goods. Pop. of burgh, 3,400.—Of 100 citizens who followed James IV., and distinguished themselves at the battle of Flodden, a few only returned. The corporation of weavers still preserve a standard taken from the enemy by a member of that body. The sword of William Brydone, the town-clerk, who led the citizens to the battle, and was knighted for his valour, also remains in the possession of a citizen of Selkirk, his lineal descendant. Adjacent to the town, General Leslie, in 1645, defeated the marquis of Montrose. Abbotsford, the seat of Sir Walter Scott, is 4 miles from the town.

SELKIRK, Alexander, a Scotch adventurer. He was a skilful seaman, and made several voyages to the South Sea; in one of which, having quarrelled with his commander, he was put ashore on the island of Juan Fernandez, with a few necessaries, a fowling-piece, gunpowder, and shot. Here he lived alone during four years and four months, and was then rescued by Captain Woods Rogers. During the time of his remaining on the island he had nearly forgotten his native language. He returned to England in 1711, and is said to have given his papers to Defoe, who took from them his story of "Robinson Crusoe;" but there is little doubt that the latter was indebted to Selkirk for nothing more than the main idea of the work. B. at Largo, Fife, 1676.

SELKIRKSHIRE, sel'-kirk-sheer, a county in the south of Scotland, of a singularly irregular figure, and bounded W. and N. by Peeblesshire and Mid-Lothian, E. and S.E. by Roxburghshire, and S. by the county of Dumfries. Area, 265 square miles. Desc. Generally consisting of a continued succession of mountains, gradually rising one above another in loftiness, very different in shape and magnitude, mostly green and bare, though several are heathy, and one or two partly covered with trees. Between the hills there are narrow and well-watered valleys everywhere interspersed. Rivers. The principal are the Tweed, the Ettrick, and Yarrow, two pastoral streams, the beauties of which are celebrated in Scottish song, and the Gala. Pro. Barley, oats, turnips, and clover. Large herds and flocks are reared, and are of excellent quality. Manf. The chief are woollen cloth, stockings, tanned leather, and different implements of husbandry. Pop. 10,000.

SELLES, sel, the name of several towns of France, none of them with a population above 4,500.

SELLON, Priscilla Lydia, sel'-lon, a philanthropic English lady, who, in conjunction with Dr. Pusey, founded, at Devonport, a community of religious ladies, called the Protestant Sisters of Mercy, whose duties were to visit and nurse the sick, to educate the children of the poor, and other charitable offices. Similar establishments were subsequently formed in London and Bristol. During the Crimean war, many of the sisterhood nobly exerted themselves in attending to the wounded and sick soldiers of the English army. B. about 1820.

SELSEA, sel'-se, a parish of Sussex, on a peninsula formed by an inlet of the sea, called Selsea Harbour, 7 miles from Chichester. Pop. 1,000.—SELSEA BILL is the S. point of the Selsea peninsula, a large level tract between the English Channel and Chichester harbour.

SELTERS, or LOWER SELTERS, sel'-ters, two villages of Germany, 24 miles from Mayence, noted for one of the most celebrated mineral springs in Europe. Of their waters about 2,000,000 of bottles are annually exported.

SEMAO, sem'-a-o, an island of the Eastern archipelago, separated by a narrow strait from the island of Timor. Ext. 20 miles long, and from 6 to 10 broad. Pop. Unascertained. It exports edible birdsnests, wax, and sandal-wood.

SEMELE, sem'-e-le, a daughter of Cadmus by Hermione, was beloved by Jupiter; but Juno, determining to punish her rival, visited the house of Semele in the guise of her nurse, and persuaded her to entreat her lover to come to her with the same majesty as he approached Juno. Jupiter had sworn by the Styx to grant Semele whatever she required: he therefore came attended by the clouds, the lightning, and thunderbolts. Semele, unable to endure so much majesty, was instantly consumed with fire. Her child was, however, saved from the flames by Mercury. This child was called Bacchus, or Dionysius.

SEMENDRIA, se-men'-dri-a, a town of Servia, on the Danube, 20 miles from Belgrade. It has a citadel. Pop. about 10,000.

SEMIPALATINSK, sem-i-pa-la-tinsk, 'the seven palaces,' a fortified town of Siberia, in the government of Tomsk. It has Russian government establishments, and took its name from some buildings found there. Pop. Unascertained.

SEMIRAMIS, se-mir'-a-mis, a celebrated queen of Assyria, who married Onnes, the governor of Nineveh, and accompanied him to the siege of Bactra, where, by her prudent directions, the king's operations were hastened, and the city taken. These eminent services, but chiefly her uncommon beauty, endeared her to king Ninus, who asked her of her husband, who, when Ninus added threats to entreaties, hanged himself. Semiramis married Ninus, by whom she had a son, called Ninyas. Ninus was so fond of Semiramis, that, at her request, he resigned the crown to her, and commanded her to be proclaimed queen and sole empress of Assyria. Semiramis then put him to death, the better to establish herself on the throne; and when she had no enemies to fear at home, she began to repair Babylon, which became one of the most superb cities in the world. She reigned, according to one account, 2000 years B.C. Her name is given in the cuneiform inscriptions placed in the British Museum, and which are being deciphered by Sir Henry Rawlinson.

SEMLER, John Solomon, sem'-ler, an eminent German Protestant theologian, who was educated in the doctrines of the Pietists, but afterwards abandoned those views, and became one of the most eloquent supporters of rationalism. The Rationalists denied the divine origin of the Scriptures, but admitted the doctrines to be true and according to reason. In 1751 he was nominated professor of theology at Halle; but was removed from that and other posts by the minister Zedlitz, in 1779. His writings consist of dissertations upon the doctrines of rationalism, and argumentative essays against the Deists. He likewise produced a sort of autobiography of himself, and several works upon philology, ecclesiastical history, &c. B. at Saalfeld, 1725; D. 1794.

SEMLIN, sem'-lin, a fortified town of Sclavonia, separated from Belgrade by the Save, 40 miles from Peterwardein. It has a German theatre, schools, a quarantine establishment, and is the principal entrepôt of the trade between Austria and Turkey. Pop. 13,000.

SEMPACH, sem'-pak, a small town of Switzerland, on Lake Sempach, 24 miles from Zurich. Pop. 1,000. Here the Austrians were defeated by the Swiss, in 1386, when Arnold von Winkelreid fell. His heroic death is still commemorated by an annual festival.—The LAKE has a length of 4 miles and a breadth of 1. and is the source of the Suren, an affluent of the Aar.

SEMPRONIUS, sem-pro'-ni-us, a name common to many eminent Romans, the most celebrated of whom were—Sempronius Atratinus, a senator who opposed the agrarian law, which was proposed by the consul Cassius, soon after the election of the tribunes.—P. Tuditanus, a legionary tribune, who led away from Cannæ the remaining part of the soldiers who had not been killed by the Carthaginians. He was afterwards consul, and fought against Hannibal with great success. He was killed in Spain.—Tiberius Gracchus, a consul, who defeated the Carthaginians and the Campanians. He was subsequently betrayed by Fulvius, a Lucanian, into the hands of the Carthaginians, and was killed, after he had made a long and bloody resistance against the enemy. Hannibal showed great honour to his remains, a funeral pile was raised at the head of the camp, and the enemy's cavalry walked round it in solemn procession.

SEMUR, sai'-moor, a town of France, 34 miles from Dijon. Manf. Woollen goods, yarns, and tanning. Pop. 4,000.—A parliament was held here until Henry IV. removed it to Dijon, during the troubles of the League.

SENA, or SENNA, sen'-na, a Portuguese settlement in Eastern Africa, about 247 miles up the river Zambezi, or 110 miles from Quilimane. It is a mere collection of huts, interspersed with some European houses. Pop. Unascertained.

SENAC, John, sen'-ak, a French physician, who cured Marshal Saxe of a dangerous malady, and became first physician to Louis XV., and superintendent-general of the mineral waters of the kingdom. His principal works were,—translation of Heister's "Anatomy;" with "Physical Essays on the Use of the Parts of the Human Body;" "Treatise on the Plague;" "On the Structure of the Heart;" "Reflections on Drowned Persons;" &c. B. at Lombez, 1693; D. at Paris, 1770.

SENAULT, John Francis, sen'-olte, a Roman Catholic divine, who was a member of the Congregation of the Oratory, and a celebrated preacher. He wrote, among other works, a treatise on the Passions, which has been translated into English; a "Paraphrase on Job;" "The Christian Man and the Criminal Man;" and "The Duties of a Sovereign." B. at Antwerp, 1599; D. at Paris, 1672.

SENECA, Marcus Annæus, sen'-e-ka, a celebrated orator, who settled at Rome, where he was greatly distinguished as a pleader. His declamations are printed with the works of his son. B. at Cordova, Spain, about 58 B.C.; D. about A.D. 32.

SENECA, Lucius Annæus, a celebrated philosopher, who was son of the preceding. He received a liberal education at Rome, where he applied himself to elocution, and displayed great abilities as an advocate; but, being afraid of exciting the jealousy of Caligula, who aspired to the glory of eloquence, he relinquished that profession, obtained the office of quæstor, and rose to distinction, but was subsequently banished to Corsica, in consequence, it is supposed, of having had an intrigue with Julia, daughter of Germanicus. While in exile he wrote his Epistles, and treatise on Consolation. After some years he was recalled by Agrippina, wife of the emperor Claudius, and appointed tutor to her son Nero. This office Seneca discharged with great honour, and was bountifully rewarded; but, when his pupil came to the throne, Seneca, who was aware of his avaricious disposition, solicited him to accept the villas and vast riches which he had amassed, that he might retire to a life of study and solitude. This the emperor refused, but soon found an opportunity of destroying his preceptor. When the conspiracy of Piso was discovered, Seneca was declared to be implicated, and orders were sent to him to put an end to himself. The philosopher, without expressing any concern, took poison, which had no effect; he then had his veins opened; but the blood flowed so slowly, that he was removed into a hot bath, and thence to a stove, where he was suffocated. His wife, Paulina, resolving to die with him, also had her veins opened; but Nero, fearful that this would excite general indignation against himself, commanded that the blood should be stopped and her life preserved. His works consist of epistles, various moral treatises, and ten tragedies (his authorship of which has been doubted, but, according to the best authorities, without reason). The editions of these works are numerous; one of the best and most recent is that of C. F. Fickert, Leipzig, 1845. Several of the tragedies have been translated into English. B. at Cordova, Spain, about 3 B.C.; D. 65 A.D.

SENECA, the name of two counties of the United States.—1. In New York. Area, 308 square miles. Pop. 26,000.—2. In Ohio. Area, 540 square miles. Pop. 28,000.

SENECA, a township of New York, U.S., comprising the village of Geneva. Pop. 9,000.

SENECA FALLS, a township in the county of Seneca, situate at the outlet of Seneca Lake. Pop. 4,500.

SENECA LAKE, a lake of New York, U.S., between Crooked and Cayuga lakes. Ext. 35 miles long and from 2 to 4 broad. Steamers ply upon its waters.

SENECA RIVER, a river of New York, U.S., which flows from Seneca Lake, N.E., into the Oswego. It also connects several other lakes with Lake Ontario.

SENEFELDER, or SENNEFELDER, Alois, sen'-e'-fel-der, the inventor of the art of lithography, was the son of an actor in the theatre at Munich. He was designed for the legal profession, but had a strong predilection for the stage, as well as for dramatic composition. At the death of his father, he was left without pecuniary means, and, after making some unsuccessful attempts as an actor, he resolved to devote himself to writing for the stage. Being too poor to pay for the printing of his works, he resolved to make himself acquainted with some cheap substitute for typography. He tried etching on copper plates, which finding too expensive, he had recourse to slabs of fine Kellheim stone. He also invented an ink for writing upon these slabs. But the great step in the discovery was made through accident. He had occasion to make a memorandum, but found himself without either paper or ink; he had, however, before him, one of his prepared stone slabs, and, with the intention of afterwards wiping it off the stone, he wrote upon it with his printing-ink. It subsequently occurred to him that he might etch his writing upon the stone in sufficient relief to print from. He succeeded, and, after a long course of experimentation, conducted under the greatest difficulties, he brought his invention into a practical form. He afterwards visited London and Paris, for the purpose of deriving advantage from his process, but met with little success. In 1809, however, he was rewarded for his early trials, in being appointed inspector of the royal lithographic establishment of Bavaria. Thus, placed in easy circumstances, he was enabled to make improvements in his process, which caused it to become valuable, and universally appreciated. In 1819 he received the gold medal of the London Society for the Encouragement of the Arts, and, about the same time, published an account of his invention, in a work entitled "A Complete Course of Lithography, &c." B. at Munich, about 1772; D. at the same city, 1834.

SENEFFE, se-nef', a town of Belgium, in the province of Hainault, 12 miles from Charleroi. It was the scene of a sanguinary battle, in August, 1674, between the prince of Orange, afterwards William III. of England, and the French under the prince of Condé. Pop. 3,000.

SENEGAL, sen'-e-gawl', a large river of Africa, having its source in the great range of mountains which traverses Mandingo and Jallonkadoo, and from the other side of which the Niger (Joliba) takes its rise. From these descend a succession of rivers, the principal of which, called on the spot the Ba-Fing, or Black River, is considered as the principal branch of the Senegal. Its source may be fixed pretty nearly in lat. 10° 30′ N., and lon. 10° 40′ W. The Faleme and the Ba-Lee, or Kokoro, are also great streams, which joining the Senegal in the kingdom of Gallam, render it a river of the first magnitude. After passing Gallam, the Senegal rolls over a level plain; and, about 120 miles from its mouth, the level is so complete that the river does not descend in that space more than two feet and a half. It is bordered by vast woods, obstructed by thick underwood, filled with numberless species of birds. The different kinds of monkeys and parrots, in particular, are exhibited in great variety. Crocodiles, and other species of amphibia, abound in the upper part of the river. The Senegal, in this level part of its course, separates into branches, in which there are several large islands. Its entrance is obstructed by a very formidable bar, consisting of a ridge of sand, stretching across its mouth at a little distance under water. After an estimated course of 1,000 miles, it enters the Atlantic Ocean, in lat. 16° N., and lon. 16° 33′ W.

SENEGAL, GOVERNMENT OF, the name given by the French to their African settlement, situate at the mouth of the above river, which was begun in 1637. St. Louis, the capital of the French settlements on the Senegal, the Gambia, Goree, and other parts S. of Cape Verd, is situate on an island in the middle of the river, which is here of considerable breadth. The governor, the military, naval, and civil officers, and all the European servants, reside here. The most important branch of commerce consists in procuring gum-Senegal, which has been ascertained by experiment to be much superior to all the eastern kinds of the same article, and even to that of Arabia. The other exports consist of hides, wax, ivory, cabinet woods, and gold-dust. Imp. Manufactured goods, wines, spirits, and provisions. Pop. with dependencies, about 12,000.—In 1756 this country yielded to Britain, and was ceded to it at the peace of 1763. The French retook it in 1779, and retained it by the peace of 1783. They lost it again in the revolutionary war; but, on the restoration of the Bourbons, in 1814, it was anew ceded to them.

SENEGAMBIA, sen'-e-gām'-bi-a, an extensive region of W. Africa, bounded on the E. by Nigritia proper, W. by the Atlantic, S. by Guinea, and on the N. by the Sahara. Area. Unascertained. Desc. Mountainous in the interior, but level along the coast. Rivers. The principal are the Senegal and the Gambia. The heat of the climate is intense, and unhealthy for Europeans. Pop. Unascertained; mostly negroes. Lat. between 8° and 17° N. Lon. between 4° and 17° 30′ W.

SENIOR, Nassau William, se'-ni-or, an English political economist, who was nominated professor of that science at the university of Oxford, in 1826. He wrote extensively upon the same subject, and was a contributor to the "Encyclopædia Metropolitana," and other works. Educated for the legal profession, he obtained a mastership in chancery, which office he retained until 1853. In 1859 he published a valuable work, called "Journal kept in Turkey and Greece in 1857-58." B. at Uffington, Berkshire, 1790.

SENJEN, sen'-yen, one of the largest of the Lofloden Islands, off the N.W. coast of Norway. Ext. 15 miles long and 30 broad. Desc. Mountainous, with deeply-indented shores. Pop. 3,000.

SENLIS, sān'-le, a town of France, in the department of the Oise, 30 miles from Paris. It has a cathedral, much admired on account of its architecture; a college, public library, and a theatre. Manf. Chicory and starch. Pop. 6,000.

SENNA. (See SENA.)

SENNAAR, sen-nar', a country of Eastern Africa, forming the S. portion of Nubia. It has Abyssinia on the E., Darfur on the W., and lies mostly between the

Bahr-el-Abiad and Bahr-el-Azrek, which unite to form the Nile. Desc. For several miles from the banks of the Nile it is of remarkable fertility. At the time, also, of the rains, which take place about the end of August and in the beginning of September, it assumes a most delightful appearance, the river then running through its immense plain above a mile broad, full to the very brim, but never overflowing. Soon after, however, the rains cease, the dhourra ripens, the leaves turn yellow and rot, the lakes putrefy, smell, and are full of vermin; all the beauty disappears, and Nubia reappears with all its terrors of poisonous winds and moving sands, glowing and ventilated with sultry blasts. Sennaar produces within itself few commodities fit for trade; and the trade which it carries on, consists chiefly in exchanging the productions of interior Africa with those of Egypt and Arabia. The most extensive communication is with Suakin and Jidda, by Shendi, and thence across the tract extending from the Nile to the Red Sea. With Egypt the intercourse is conducted by two different routes. The commodities drawn from interior Africa, for export to Egypt and Arabia, are gold-dust, ivory, civet, rhinoceros-horns, and slaves. The foreign commodity chiefly sought after is blue cotton cloth from Surat; also spices, hardware, and toys, particularly a species of black beads made at Venice. (See NUBIA.)

SENNAAR, a city, the capital of the above, is situate on the shore of the Bahr-el-Azrek, a river of Abyssinia, 155 miles from Khartoom. It stands on ground merely high enough to secure it against the rise which takes place during the rainy season. The city is large, though the houses are, in general, poorly built. They have flat roofs, which form agreeable terraces. Manf. Mats, leather, sandals, arms, iron-ware and jewellery. Pop. Unascertained. Lat. 13° 34′ 36″ N. Lon. 33° 30′ 30″ E.

SENNACHERIB, sen-năk-e-rib, king of Syria, succeeded his father Salmanasar, B.C. 712. Hezekiah, king of Judah, having refused to pay him tribute, he entered his country, where he took several fortresses, and laid siege to Jerusalem; but his army being slain in the night by the destroying angel, he was obliged to return to his own country, where he was killed by his two sons, in the temple, B.C. 707.

SENNE, sen, a river of Belgium, watering Hainault and Brabant, and, after a course of 55 miles, joining the Dyle 3 miles from Mechlin.

SENNERTUS, Daniel, sen-ner′-tus, a learned German physician, who became professor of physic at Wirtemberg. He sought to reconcile the theories of Paracelsus with those of Galen. His works were printed at Venice in 1640, in 3 vols. folio, and at Lyons in 1676, in 6 vols. B. 1572; D. 1637.

SENS, sănz, a town of France, in the department of the Yonne, 60 miles from Paris. Its cathedral is admired both for its exterior and interior. Manf. Woollens, velvets, stockings, gloves, and leather. Pop. 11,000. It has a station on the railway to Paris and Lyons.

SEPEY, sep′-ai, a village of Switzerland, 5 miles from Aigle. It stands on a road which connects the great route over the Simplon with one into the S. part of the canton of Berne.

SEPINO, sai-pe′-no, a town of Italy, in Naples, 9 miles from Campobasso. Manf. Paper and woollen goods. Pop. 4,000.—Not far from it are the remains of the ancient Sepinus, a chief town of the Samnites.

SEPPINGS, Sir Robert, sep′-pings, an eminent English naval architect, who, during 50 years, fulfilled the duties of master-shipwright assistant at Plymouth, and master-shipwright at Chatham dockyards, and, finally became surveyor of the navy. To him are due the invention of the system of "diagonal bracing" in shipbuilding, and the substitution of round for flat sterns to vessels of war. His improvements met with much opposition when they were first broached; but, Sir John Barrow and other eminent men giving him their powerful advocacy, he was enabled to triumph over the prejudices of the older shipwrights, as well as those of naval commanders who were opposed to any innovations. His great merits as a naval architect were acknowledged by his being created a knight and elected a fellow of the Royal Society, whose Copley medal was voted him. He was awarded the sum of £1,000 by the Admiralty, and both houses of parliament gave a marked approbation to his labours. Accounts of his inventions were inserted in the Transactions of the Royal Society, and in the works of Dr. Young. B. 1768; D. in Somersetshire, 1840.

SEPT-ILES, set-eel, a group belonging to France, off the N. coast of Brittany, 10 miles from Lannion. Only one of them is inhabited.

SEPULVEDA, John de, sai-pool-vai′-da, a Spanish historian. He became chaplain and historiographer to Charles V., who also appointed him tutor to his son, afterwards Philip II. He wrote, among other learned works, the histories of the reign of Charles V. and Philip II., and of the Spanish conquests in Mexico. B. near Cordova, 1490; D. 1574.

SERAIEVO. (See BOSNA-SERAJO.)

SERAING, se-răng′, a large village of Belgium, on the Maese, 3 miles from Liege. It is famous for its machinery-works and the spindles invented by Cockerel. Pop. 5,000.

SERAMPORE, se-ram-por′, a town of British India, in the presidency of Bengal, formerly belonging to the Danes, on the Hoogly river, 12 miles N. of Calcutta. The houses are built of brick, plastered with mortar, and have flat roofs, with balconies and Venetian windows; but few of them are more than two stories high. Manf. Paper. Pop. 13,000. This town was purchased by the British from the Danes in 1845.

SERANGANI, sai-ran-ga′-ne, a cluster of small islands in the Asiatic Archipelago, about 15 miles from Mindanao, between the 5th and 6th degrees of N. lat.

SERAPION, se-rai′-pi-on, an Arabian physician, commonly called Serapion Junior. He wrote a treatise upon medicine, which has been declared to be one of the most important works in Arabic medical literature. There is a manuscript copy of it in Arabic in the Bodlcian library at Oxford. Flourished about the 11th century.

SERAPION THE SENIOR, a Syrian physician, who produced a collection of all that had been written upon the treatment of diseases by the Greek and Arabic physicians. A full account of his opinions is to be found in Sprengel's "History of Medicine." Flourished in the 9th century.

SERAPIS, se-rai′-pis, one of the Egyptian deities, supposed to be the same as Osiris. There was a magnificent temple erected in his honour at Memphis, another at Alexandria, and a third at Canopus. The worship of Serapis was introduced at Rome by the emperor Antoninus Pius, A.D. 146; but, on account of its licentiousness, it was soon abolished.

SERCQ, or SARK. (See SARK.)

SERENUS SAMONICUS, se-re′-nus, a physician, who was preceptor to Gordian the younger. He wrote a Latin poem on the treatment of diseases. His father, of the same name, wrote some Latin verses. He was put to death by Caracalla. Both flourished in the 3rd century.

SERES, or SIRUS, se′-res, a tolerably well-built town of European Turkey, in Romania, 45 miles from Salonica. It has a number of handsome mosques, baths, and other public edifices. Manf. Towels and other kinds of strong linen cloth, which are the most noted in the Levant; and those of cotton stuffs are very extensive. Pop. Perhaps 25,000.

SERETH, se′-reth, a river of European Turkey, rising 42 miles from Czernowitz, and, after a course of 270 miles, falling into the Danube 5 miles from Galacz.

SERETH, a town of Austrian Galicia, on the Sereth, 80 miles from Jassy. Pop. 4,000.

SERGIPE DEL REY, sair′-zhe-pai dail rai, a maritime province of Brazil. Area. Estimated at 18,000 square miles. Desc. Fertile and mountainous in the centre. Rivers. The principal is the Vazabarris. Pro. Manioc, millet, cotton, tobacco, and sugar. In the W. cattle-rearing is extensively pursued. Pop. 180,000, Lat. between 9° 15′ and 11° 27′ S. Lon. between 36° 20′ and 39° 15′ W.

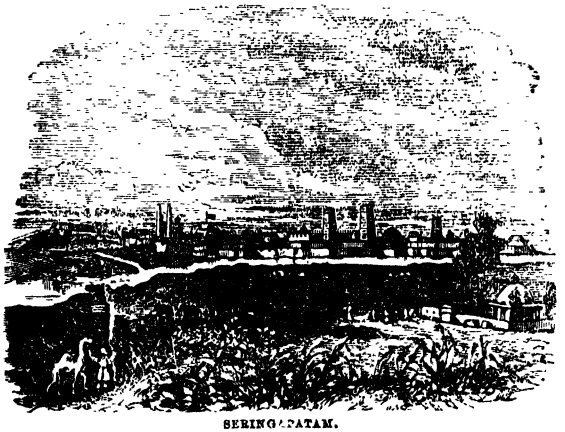
SERGIUS, ser′-ji-us, patriarch of Constantinople in 610, was a native of Syria, and the chief of the sect of Monothelites, the principle of which was, that there are only one will and one operation in Christ. This heresy was condemned in the council of Constantinople. D. 639.

SERGIUS I., Pope, and the successor of Conon, in

687. He baptized Cedwalla, king of the West Saxons, who had made a journey to Rome for that purpose. He opposed the canons of the council of Constantinople; whereupon Justinian II. sent his general-in-chief to arrest Sergius; but the exarch of Ravenna protected the pope, who humanely interposed to save the life of Justinian's envoy. He instituted several ceremonies, and established various churches of Rome. B. in Syria, about 630; D. at Rome, 701.

SERGIUS II. succeeded Gregory IV. in 844. He was elected without the authorization of the emperor Lotharius, who dispatched an army into Italy, under the command of his son Louis. But the pope succeeded in inducing that prince to retire, after having crowned him king of Italy. Shortly afterwards, the Saracens from Africa ascended the Tiber, and ravaged the environs of Rome, but were prevented from gaining an entrance into the city itself, in consequence of the defence offered by the walls which surrounded it. Sergius was a native of Rome, and D. 847.



SERGIUS III. became pope in 904, through the influence of the marquis of Tuscany and of the notorious Roman lady Marozia. These personages were at the head of a powerful party which had deposed Christopher. A son of Sergius, by Marozia, afterwards became pope by the title of John X. The character of this pontiff has been variously represented; but he appears to have been an able but profligate man. His successor was Anastasius IV. Sergius D. 913.

SERGIUS IV. was elected, in succession to John XVIII., in 1009. Under his rule, and in consequence of his exhortation, the Italian princes combined to drive out the Saracens from the country. In his time, also, the Normans began to enter Italy. His successor was Benedict VIII. B. 1012.

SERINAGUR, or GURWALL, se-rin'-a-gur', a town of British India, nearly destroyed by an earthquake in 1803. Pop. 3,000. Lat. 30° 13′ N. Lon. 78° 49′ E.

SERINAGUR, the capital of Cashmere, formerly possessed of a large population, but now greatly reduced. It stands on the banks of the Jhelum, or Behut, and has a governor's residence, and on the N. a hill crowned by a fort, capable of being rendered impregnable. It has some remains of its former grandeur, but all its manufacturing industry has disappeared. Pop. Perhaps 50,000. Lat. 34° 5′ N. Lon. 74° 57′ E.—The Shahlimar Gardens, celebrated by Moore in "Lalla Rookh," border a lake to the E. of this city.

SERINGAPATAM, se-ring'-ga-pa-tam', 'city of Vishnu,' a celebrated city of the south of India, and for a considerable period the capital of the province of Mysore,

SERINGAPATAM.

9 miles from Mysore. It is situate at the upper end of an island of four miles in length by one and a half in breadth, in the river Cauvery, and is an ancient fortress; but was not distinguished for splendour till the reigns of Hyder Ali and his son Tippoo Sultan. Its fortifications were of great strength; but the place is ill-built. It has a mausoleum of Hyder Ali and Tippoo. Pop. Unascertained. Lat. 12° 25′ N. Lon. 76° 48′ E.—In 1792 it was invested by the British and allied armies, under the command of Lord Cornwallis; on which Tippoo Sultan acceded to the terms of peace proposed to him. In 1790, a war having again broken out between the British and Mysore, Seringapatam was stormed, when Tippoo Sultan was killed, and the whole of his family and treasures taken by the conquerors.

SERINGHAM, se-ring'-gam, an island of British India, in the presidency of Madras, situate in the river Cauvery, and celebrated for its Hindoo temples.

SERINO, sai-re'-no, a town of Naples, 6 miles from Avellino. In its neighbourhood are the remains of ancient Sebastia. Pop. 8,000.

SERLIO, Sebastian, sair'-le-o, a celebrated Italian architect. Francis I. invited him to France, where he improved and ornamented the royal palaces, particularly Fontainebleau. He wrote a "Treatise on Architecture," and other works. B. at Bologna, 1475; D. 1552.

SERMIDE, sair'-me-dai, a town of Italy, on the Po, 35 miles from Mantua. Pop. 5,000.

SERMIONE, sair-me-o'-nai, a town of Austrian Italy, on the Lake of Garda, 16 miles from Verona. Pop. 1,800.

SEROHEE, ser-o-he', a state of Rajpootana, India. Area, 3,000 square miles. Desc. Mountainous. Pop. Unascertained. Lat. between 24° 23′ and 25° 16′ N. Lon. between 72° 10′ and 73° 12′ E.

SERPA, sair'-pa, a strong frontier town of Portugal, in the province of Alentejo, 16 miles from Beja. Pop. 6,000.

SERPENTARIA, ser-pen-tai'-re-a, an islet off the S.E. coast of Sardinia, in the Mediterranean.

SERPENTS, ISLES OF, in the Black Sea, are opposite the mouths of the Danube.

SERPHANTO, or SERPHO, sair-fan'-to, an island of the Grecian Archipelago, 25 miles from Syra. Pop. 600, who live chiefly in the small town of Serphanto, and are employed in fishing and cattle-rearing.

SERPUCHOV, ser'-poo-chof, a town of European Russia, government of Moscow, on the Oka, 60 miles from Moscow. It contains numerous churches or chapels, a citadel, and has a large suburb. Manf. Woollen, linen, and cotton fabrics. It has also large magazines. Pop. 13,000.

SERRA, sair'-ra, two towns of Naples, neither with a population above 4,000.

SERRAVALLE, sair'-ra-val'-lai, the name of several towns of Italy, none of them with a population above 5,500.

SERRE, sair, a river of France, in the department of the Ardennes. After a course of 50 miles, it joins the Oise, near La Fère.

SERRE, a town of Naples, 24 miles from Salerno. Pop. 1,600.

SERRES, or SERRANUS, John de, sair, a French Protestant divine, who escaped with difficulty from the massacre of St. Bartholomew, and became pastor at Nismes in 1582. He was taken into confidence by Henry IV., who employed him in several affairs, and subsequently appointed him historiographer. He wrote a treatise entitled "De Fide Catholica," the object of which was to reconcile Catholics and Protestants; and the consequence was, that the author was disliked by both. His other works were an edition of Plato in Greek and Latin, "Treatise on the Immortality of the Soul," "Catalogue of the History of France," "Memoirs of the Third Civil War," "History of Five Kings of France." B. at Rhodez, 1540; D. 1598.

SERRES, Oliver de, brother of the preceding, and called the "father of French agriculture." Henry IV.

employed him in the improvement of his plantations. He was the first who introduced the culture of the white mulberry-tree into France, on which he wrote a treatise. His "Theatre of Agriculture" was long held as an esteemed authority upon the subject. B. 1539; D. 1619.

SERTORIUS, Quintus, ser-tor'-i-us, a Roman general, who made his first campaign under Marius, against the Cimbri and Teutones. He afterwards accompanied Marius and Cinna, when they entered Rome and slew their enemies. On being proscribed by Sylla, he fled to Spain, where he put himself at the head of the other exiles, and was regarded as a prince in that country, which he governed with great wisdom and moderation. He repulsed several armies that were sent against him, defeating both Pompey and Metellus. He entered into a treaty with Mithridates, who sent him money and ships, and sought to establish a new Roman republic in Spain. His soldiers followed him with the most blind devotion, believing him to be favoured by the gods. Plutarch wrote his life. Assassinated by Perperna, one of his generals, B.C. 72.

SERVAN, St., sair'-va, a tolerably well-built town of France, in the department of the Ille-and-Vilaine, at the mouth of the river Rance, about a mile to the south of St. Malo, from which it is separated by a narrow arm of the sea, dry at low water. It has two harbours, one adapted for frigates, and the other appropriated to commerce. They are separated from each other by the rock and castle of Solidor, founded by William the Conqueror. Manf. Linen, sailcloth, soap, and tobacco. Pop. 10,500.

SERVANDONI, John Jerome, sair'-van-do'-ne, an Italian architect and painter, who resided during the greatest part of his life at Paris, where he had the management of the scenery belonging to the theatre. In 1749 he went to London, to design the edifice on Tower Hill, erected for the display of fireworks to celebrate the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle. His "Descent of Æneas into Hell" was his best performance as a painter; the portal of St. Sulpice, at Paris, being his masterpiece in architecture. B. at Florence, 1695; D. at Paris, 1766.

SERVETUS, Michael, ser-ve'-tus, a celebrated theologian and physician, who was educated for the profession of an advocate, at Toulouse, but afterwards studied physic at Paris, where he took his doctor's degree. Having embraced the Arian doctrine, he held a correspondence with Calvin on the subject, and many letters passed between them, which only irritated them against each other. Servetus, who was settled at Vienne, in Dauphiny, published a book in favour of his notions, entitled "Christianismi Restitutio;" but he avoided putting his name to it. The authorship was, however, discovered by Calvin, who gave information of it to the magistrates of Vienne, by whom Servetus was banished, and his effigy and book burnt at the gallows. He then formed the design of going to Naples to practise as a physician; but imprudently passing through Geneva in disguise, he was detected by Calvin, by whose means he was apprehended. Through Calvin, also, who acted as informer, prosecutor, and judge, Servetus was, contrary to law, condemned to be slowly burnt to death, which act of barbarity was carried into effect. He wrote several books on the Trinity, a translation of Ptolemy's Geography, and some medical treatises. Having shown that he was acquainted with the pulmonary circulation, some writers have endeavoured to ascribe to him the discovery of the circulation of the blood; to which, however, he had no claim. B. at Villanueva, Aragon, 1509; burnt at the stake, at Geneva, 1553.

SERVIA, ser'-vi-a, a state of Europe, in the north of European Turkey, corresponding to the Mœsia Superior of the Romans. It is separated from Hungary, on the N. by the Danube, and has on the E. Bulgaria and Wallachia, W. Bosnia and Albania, and S. Macedonia. Area. Estimated at 12,000 square miles. Desc. Very uneven and mountainous, its surface containing a number of extensive forests, and large uncultivated heaths. Rivers. The principal are the Save and the Danube on the north, the Morava on its eastern, and the Drina on its western boundary, both tributaries of the Danube. Climate. Temperate, but less mild than might be expected in lat. 43° and 44° N., the winter being of considerable length, and spring not beginning till April. Pro. The soil being in general fertile, the cultivated tracts produce abundant crops; but a small proportion of the country is as yet under tillage. The most common crops are wheat, barley, oats, rice, hemp, flax, and tobacco; also vines, and fruits of various kinds. Cotton is raised in the valleys and other warm spots. Timber is abundant, and, with the aid of water communication, would form a great article of export. Minerals. Mines of iron have been discovered in several parts; but, like the mines of salt and other minerals, they are almost entirely neglected. Manf. Unimportant; the principal are, woollen, cotton, and hardware, the whole for home consumption. Pop. about 1,000,000. Lat. between 42° 21′ and 45° N. Lon. between 19° 10′ and 22° 45′ E.—Servia was occupied by the Turks in 1365. In 1801 an insurrection took place against their authority, under the standard of Czerni Georges, previously known only as the head of a band of robbers, but then honoured with the name of avenger of his country. Under his authority, it remained independent from 1806 till 1814, when he withdrew into Russia. By a convention concluded between his country and the Porte in 1815, the Servians acknowledged the sovereignty of the Sultan, but preserved the free exercise of their religion, as well as their civil rights. In 1834 its independence, under certain conditions, was recognized.

SERVIUS, Maurus Honoratus, ser'-vi-us, a Latin grammarian, who left learned commentaries upon Virgil, printed by Stephens in 1532. One of the best modern editions is that of Burmann. Flourished towards the close of the 4th century.

SERVIUS TULLIUS, the sixth king of Rome, who, according to the legend (which is, however, allowed to have some historical foundation), was son of Ocrisia, a slave of Corniculum, by Tullius, a man slain in the defence of his country against the Romans. Ocrisia was given by Tarquin to his wife Tanaquil, who brought up the youth with her family, and added the name of "Servius" to that which he had inherited from his father, to denote his being born of a slave. He was educated in the palace with great care, and obtained the daughter of Tarquin in marriage. His own private virtues recommended him to the notice of the people and of the soldiers; and by his liberality and complaisance he easily gained the throne on the death of his father-in-law. He endeared himself to his subjects as a warrior and a legislator; defeated the Veientines and Tuscans; established the census, which showed that Rome contained about 84,000 inhabitants; increased the number of the tribes, beautified the city, and enlarged its boundaries by taking within its walls the hills Quirinalis, Viminalis, and Esquilinus. He also divided the Roman people into tribes. Servius married his two daughters to the grandsons of his father-in-law; the elder to Tarquin, and the younger to Aruns. In this union he was unhappily deceived. The wife of Aruns murdered her own husband to unite herself to Tarquin, who had likewise assassinated his wife. Servius was next murdered by his son-in-law and his daughter Tullia, who cruelly ordered her chariot to be driven over the mangled body of her father, B.C. 534.

SESIA, sai'-se-a, a river of Northern Italy, rising near Monte Rosa, and, after a course of 85 miles, joining the Po between Casal and Valenza.

SESOSTRIS, se-sos'-tris, the most celebrated of the early kings of Egypt. According to the legend, which evidently confounds the military exploits of several monarchs, he, upon succeeding to the throne, became ambitious of military fame, and marched at the head of a numerous army to make the conquest of the world. Libya, Æthiopia, Arabia, with all the islands of the Red Sea, were conquered; and the victorious monarch marched through Asia, and penetrated farther into the East than the conqueror of Darius. He also invaded Europe, defeated the Thracians, and placed columns in the several provinces he had subdued, bearing the pompous inscription, "Sesostris, the king of kings, has conquered this territory by his arms." After his return, he employed himself in encouraging the fine arts, and in improving the revenues of his kingdom. In his old age, Sesostris, grown infirm and blind, destroyed himself. The age of Sesostris is so remote from every authentic record, that the actions and conquests ascribed to him, may be set down as totally fabulous. Said to have flourished B.C. 1500.

SESSA, sais'-sa, a town of Naples, in the Terra di Lavoro, 29 miles from Naples. It has many benevolent institutions. Pop. 4,500.

SESSE, or SEZZA, sait'-sa, a town of Italy, in the States of the Church, situate on an eminence near the Pontine Marshes, 35 miles from Rome. It has the remains of a temple of Saturn. Pop. 9,000.

SESTINI, Dominico, sais-te'-ne, an eminent Italian numismatist, who was at first librarian to the prince of Biscari, in Sicily, and afterwards became tutor to the sons of the Neapolitan ambassador at Constantinople. In 1810 he was appointed antiquarian at Florence to the Grand-duchess Eliza, sister of Napoleon I., and subsequently fulfilled the same functions under Leopold II., the grand-duke of Tuscany. His works are very valuable and numerous; the most important of them being, "System of Numismatics," letters upon the same science, and dissertations upon the Coins of the Ptolemies, the Macedonian kings, &c. B. at Florence, about 1750; D. at Florence, 1832.

SESTO, sais'-to, the name of several towns of Italy, none of them with a population above 2,200.

SESTRABEK, ses'-tra-bek, a town of European Russia, in the south of Finland, at the mouth of the Sestra, 23 miles from St. Petersburg. It has a manufactory of arms of different kinds, also of anchors and other instruments. Pop. 1,600.—It was founded by Peter the Great.

SETTE-COMUNI, set'-tai co'-moo-ne, a mountainous district of Austria, between the Brenta and the Astico. Area, 100 square miles. Pop. 30,000.

SETEEF, or SETIF, se-teef', a town of Algeria, the ancient Sitipha, distinguished by the obstinate resistance it made against the Saracens. The old city is now in a state of complete ruin, 80 miles from Constantina. Pop. 300.—In 1853 the French government granted a quantity of land to a Genoese company in the neighbourhood of Seteef, on which ten villages are to be erected. In 1855 some of these had been built.

SETTLE, Elkanah, set'-tel, an English poet, who wrote the tragedies of "Cambyses, King of Persia," "The Empress of Morocco," and "Fatal Love;" also poems, particularly "The Medal Reversed," and "Azariah and Hushai," both against Dryden; but, although he was for a time patronized by Rochester and the court party, he soon sank into insignificance before his great rival. D. at Dunstable, Bedfordshire, 1648: D. in London, 1723.

SETUBAL, or ST. UBES, sai-too'-bal, a town of Portugal, on a bay of the Atlantic, at the mouth of the Sado, 16 miles from Lisbon. In the earthquake of 1755 it was almost entirely levelled with the ground, but was soon rebuilt in a better style. It now contains several churches, monasteries, an hospital, and an arsenal, and exports lemons, olives, oil, wine, and bay-salt. Pop. 15,000.

SEVAJEE, sev-a-je', the founder of the Mahratta power in India. He commenced his career by dispossessing his father of Poonah; after which he continued to make acquisitions of territory, until, in 1658, the Bejapoor monarchy, whose vassal he was, sent a powerful force against him. He assassinated, by treachery, the general of the Bejapoor army, which he afterwards defeated and dispersed. He next surprised and plundered Surat; but, deeming it prudent to avoid hostilities with the powerful Aurungzebe, he made his submission to that potentate, and for some time acted as his ally. In 1670 he found himself sufficiently secure in his possessions to enter into hostilities with the Moguls. He again plundered Surat, and in 1672 totally defeated a Mogul force which had been sent against him. Two years later he was crowned at Rayghur, and soon afterwards he took some strong positions between Madras and Pondicherry, and then overran Mysore. In 1678 he again met the troops of Aurungzebe, this time in Golconda. He drove the Moguls before him; after which he became the greatest potentate in Southern India, having all the country between the Toombuddra and the Kistna ceded to him. But his ambitious career was soon brought to a termination by a sudden illness, which caused his death. Elphinstone declares "that Sevajee left a character which has never been equalled or approached by any of his countrymen." He was succeeded by his son Sambajee, who was, however, not equal to his father, and was defeated and slain in 1689. Sevajee D. 1680.

SEVAN. (See GOUKEKA.)

SEVASTOPOL, or SEBASTOPOL, se-vas'-to-pol, or se-vas-to'-pol, a town and naval arsenal of the south of European Russia, in the Crimea, on a small bay of the Euxine, 38 miles from Simferopol. Its increase was rapid after it came into the possession of Russia, when it was made the station of a part of the Russian fleet, and had several large establishments, such as hospitals, docks, and dockyards, barracks, an arsenal, a lazaretto, a market-place, &c. The harbour is excellent, and was strongly defended by various forts faced with granite and porphyry. In 1854 the Anglo-French army commenced the bombardment of the city, and in the following year reduced it to ruins. Pop. Perhaps about 30,000. (See CRIMEA.)

SEVEN ISLANDS, a cluster of small islands in the English Channel, near the coast of France.—The name of various other small clusters in the Eastern seas and other parts.

SEVENNES. (See CEVENNES.)

SEVENOAKS, sev'-en-okes, a well-built market-town of Kent, so named from seven large oak-trees which stood near it when first built. It is situate near the river Darent, 6 miles from Tunbridge. The town consists chiefly of two wide streets, in one of which stands an ancient market-house. The principal public building is the church, which forms a conspicuous object for several miles round the country. Here is also an hospital for the maintenance of aged people, with a free school. Pop. 5,000.

SEVER, ST., sev'-air, a town of France, on the Adour, 73 miles from Bordeaux. It has a trade in corn, wine, and brandy. Pop. 4,300.

SEVERINO, Marcus Aurelius, sai-vai-ve'-no, a celebrated Neapolitan physician. Through his mode of practice, no less than by his writings, the science of medicine was advanced in Italy. He became professor of anatomy and medicine at the university of Naples. He wrote against the doctrines of Aristotle, and left some works on medicine. B. in Calabria, 1580; D. 1656.

SEVERN, sev'-ern, an important river of England, second only to the Thames, and also the principal river of Wales. It rises in Plinlimmon Hill, on the borders of Montgomery and Cardigan shires, not far from the coast of Cardigan Bay, and after a circuitous course of upwards of 200 miles, passing through Montgomeryshire, Shropshire, Worcestershire, and Gloucestershire, loses itself in the Bristol Channel, 12 miles from Bristol. It assumes its proper name of the Severn at Newtown.

SEVERN, the name of three rivers in the United States.—1. In Maryland, which runs into the Chesapeake.—2. Running into Hudson's Bay.—3. In Virginia, which runs into the Chesapeake Bay, near Annapolis.

SEVERUS, Lucius Septimus, se-ve'-rus, a Roman emperor. He passed through various offices of the state, and was distinguished for his ambition, activity, and avarice. After the murder of Pertinax, he caused himself to be proclaimed emperor by the army in Germany, and at once advanced upon Rome to secure his title. His reception at Rome was gratifying to his vanity; but he was opposed by Pescennius Niger, who had a numerous army in the East. Many battles were fought between them; but at length Niger was destroyed, and his head sent to Severus, who behaved with the utmost cruelty to all the partisans of his unfortunate rival. Elated with this success, he pillaged Byzantium, and attempted to put away, by assassination, Albinus, whom he had previously accepted as his colleague in the empire; but being foiled, he had recourse to arms. Albinus was defeated and slain in Gaul, his family and adherents sharing his fate. Severus, on his return to Rome, put to death the wealthiest citizens, that he might possess himself of their property. Tired of an inactive life, he marched into the East, where he made numerous conquests. In 208 he set out upon his British campaign, accompanied by his two sons, Caracalla and Geta; and having reduced the island, he built a wall across the northern part, to defend the Roman possessions from the invasions of the Caledonians. Severus, worn out with a complication of disorders, died at York, 211. He was one of the most learned men of his time, and, were it not for his inexorable cruelty, might be placed among the most distinguished of the Roman emperors. B. in Africa, 146.

SEVERUS, Marcus Aurelius Alexander, a Roman emperor. He was the cousin of the emperor Heliogabalus, at whose death he was proclaimed emperor, 222. Towards the close of his reign, the peace of the empire was disturbed by the incursions of the Persians. Alexander marched into the East; but is said to have suffered defeat. The revolt of the Germans subsequently called him from the capital. His expedition in Germany was attended with some success; but his soldiers were undisciplined and turbulent; their clamours were fomented by the artifice of Maximinus, and Alexander was murdered in his tent, in the midst of his camp, after a reign of thirteen years. His mother Julia Mammæa shared his fate, with all his friends. Severus possessed many virtues, was a patron of literature, and dedicated the hours of relaxation to the study of the best Greek and Latin historians, orators, and poets. B. in Phœnicia, 208; killed, 235.

SEVERUS, a heretic, who maintained that there are two opposite principles, the one good and the other evil, by which man was originally created, and by which he continues to be governed. Flourished in the 2nd century.

SEVERUS, Alexandrinus, a Greek rhetorician, who wrote, among other works, some "Ethopœia," or imitations of speeches adapted to the character and to the supposed persons. They contain, among others, the supposed speeches of Æschines upon going into banishment, and that of Menelaus upon the abduction of Helen by Paris. Flourished about 470.

SEVERUS, Cassius, a Roman orator, who was banished into Crete by Augustus for his satirical language. He was distinguished for his eloquence; but it was of a more fervid than prudent character. His declamations were ordered to be destroyed by the senate. Flourished about 10 B.C.

SEVERUS, Lucius Cornelius, a Latin poet in the reign of Augustus, who wrote poems upon the death of Cicero, the Sicilian war, &c. Flourished about 30 B.C.

SEVERUS, Sulpitius, an ecclesiastical historian, and surnamed the Christian Sallust. The best of his works is his "Historia Sacra," which extends from the creation to A.D. 400. D. 420.

SÉVIGNÉ, Marie de Rabutin Chantal, Marchioness de, se-veen'-yai, a celebrated letter-writer. She was the daughter of the Baron de Chantal, who lost his life in defending the Isle of Rhé against the English. After receiving a most careful education under her maternal uncle, she espoused, at the age of 18, the Marquis de Sévigné, who fell in a duel in 1651, leaving her with one son and a daughter, to whose education she paid strict attention. The daughter married, in 1669, the Count de Grignan, commandant in Provence; and it was on a visit to her that the marchioness caught a fever, of which she died. Her letters are unequalled examples of the epistolary style, being elegant, picturesque, and animated. B. in Burgundy, 1627; D. in Provence, 1696. The best French critics aver that her style is too subtly elegant to be appreciated. "The letters of Madame de Sévigné are the book of all hours,—of the town, of the country, on travel. They are the conversation of a most agreeable woman, to which one need contribute nothing of one's own, which is a great charm to an idle person. . . . Madame de Sévigné tells a story excellently; the most perfect models of narrative are to be found in her letters. Nothing comes up to the liveliness of her turns and the happiness of her expressions; for she is always touched by what she relates. She paints things as if she saw them, and the reader believes that he sees what she paints. She had a most active and versatile imagination, which laid hold of all objects in succession."—Her son Charles, Marquis de Sévigné, was one of the admirers of Ninon de l'Enclos, and had a dispute with Madame Dacier respecting the sense of a passage in Horace. D. 1713.

SEVILLE, or SEVILLA, sev'-il (Sp. sai-veel'-ya), a large city of Spain, and once its capital, 60 miles from Cadiz. It stands in a fine plain on the left bank of the Guadalquivir, which is here a great river, and is crossed by a bridge of boats communicating with the suburb Triana. It is surrounded by an old wall of considerable height, in circuit between 5 and 6 miles, entered by numerous gates, and containing 166 turrets. The interior is built mostly in the Moorish style, the streets being often extremely narrow, and, in general, badly paved. The squares are neither numerous nor spacious; but most of them have a fountain in the centre. There are here several beautiful public walks; one, in particular, on the banks of the Guadalquivir, which is frequented by the higher classes. The churches, convents, and hospitals, great and small, are exceedingly numerous. The cathedral is a large and magnificent Gothic pile, built in the 15th century, and containing a prodigious number of altars. Its tower, 337 feet in height, is reckoned the finest in Spain. It is surmounted by a colossal bronze statue of Faith. Of the other churches and convents, several are elegant; but their chief attraction consists in their paintings. Of the edifices not ecclesiastical, the most conspicuous are the Alcazar or palace, the Lonja or exchange, the artillery school, and the mint. The Alcazar is a Moorish building, built in imitation of the Alhambra at Granada. Though the outside is mean, the inside is very different, containing the Court of Lions, halls of ambassadors, royal apartments, with fountains, galleries, and baths. The garden has also its fountains, evergreens, and walks paved with marble. Seville, being one of the most ancient cities of Spain, contains several interesting remains of antiquity, Roman as well as Moorish. It had an academy and public library in the time of the Moors, and at present it has an academy for the physical sciences, another for the fine arts, and a medical society: to these is to be added a university, founded in 1502. There is a public library in the cathedral, and another in the archbishop's palace. Manf. Silk, woollens of the coarser kind, leather, hats, soap, combs, earthenware, and tobacco, and snuff on account of government. Among the exports are wool, the skins of goats and kids, fruit, and, in a small quantity, oil and silk. The imports are various manufactures from England, Nuremberg wares from Germany, iron from Bilboa, and colonial produce from America. Pop. 85,000. Lat. 37° 23′ 44″ N. Lon. 6° 0′ 59″ W.—Seville stands on the site of the Hispalis of the Romans. The date of its foundation is unknown; but it opened its gates to the Moors in 711. It was retaken by the Christians in 1247. In the autumn of 1800 it suffered from the pestilential fever which caused such mortality at Cadiz. It was occupied by the French in 1810, and remained in their hands till 1812, after their defeat at Salamanca. In 1823 it was again in possession of the French. Not far from it is the village of Santa Pouce, the ancient Italica, where the emperors Trajan, Hadrian, and Theodosius the Great were born, and where are, also, some antiquarian remains.

SEVIN, Francis, sev'-ă, a learned French philologist, who became a member of the Academy of the Belles-Lettres, and keeper of the manuscripts in the library of the king of France. By order of Louis XV., he proceeded to Constantinople with the Abbé Fourmont, in search of manuscripts, of which they procured about 600. He afterwards wrote an account of his travels, in letters. He also wrote a dissertation on the first king of Egypt, the histories of Assyria and Lydia, and several other curious discourses. B. 1682; D. 1741.

SÈVRE NANTAISE and SÈVRE NOIRTAISE, two rivers in the N.W. of France, in the department of the Two Sèvres. Neither has a length above 70 miles.

SÈVRES, saivr, a town of France, 4 miles from Paris. It is famous for its porcelain manufacture. Pop. 4,800.

SÈVRES, DEPARTMENT OF THE TWO, a department in the N.W. of France, comprising about a third of the old province of Poitou, and bounded by the departments of the Maine-and-Loire, the Charente, and the Vendée. Area, 2,267 square miles. Desc. Mountainous in the N.W. and level in the S.W. Rivers. The two Sèvres, the Dive, the Loire, the Thoue, and a number of inferior streams. Pro. The usual cerealia, and cattle, horses, mules, and asses. Game is abundant, and the rivers are well supplied with fish. Manf. Leather, gloves, woollens, linens, cottons, and beet-root sugar. Minerals. Iron, marble, and granite. Pop. 324,000.

SEWARD, Anna, su'-ard, an English authoress. She was the daughter of a divine of the established church, who had himself written poems, besides editing Beaumont and Fletcher. Miss Seward was enabled, early in life, to profit by the society of several distinguished men who visited her father's residence, and among whom was Dr. Johnson. In 1782 she commenced her literary career, with the publication of a poetical novel, entitled "Louisa," which was so favourably received as to run through four editions. A collection of sonnets, and the "Life of Dr. Darwin," were her next publications; but although they met with some success, they were too slight in substance and too affected in style to attain a permanent reputation. She bequeathed her unpublished works and letters to Sir Walter Scott, and to the publisher, Mr. Constable. These performances were produced after her death; but although they had the advantage of a biographical preface, written by the great novelist, they soon sank into oblivion. B. 1747; D. 1809.

SEWARD, William, an English compiler, who published five volumes of anecdotes of distinguished persons, extracted from curious old books, to which he afterwards added a supplement, under the title of "Biographiana." B. in London, 1747; D. 1799.

SEWARD, William Henry, a modern American statesman, who was educated for the law, which profession he practised during several years. After visiting Europe, he was, in 1838, elected governor of the state of New York, which position he retained until 1842. In 1849 he was returned to Congress, where he made himself remarkable for his speeches against slavery. In 1853 he published an edition of his speeches, state papers, and miscellaneous works. Upon the election of Mr. Lincoln to the presidentship, he became secretary of state; and, being a well-known orator and politician, was generally regarded as the spokesman of the republican party. When the secession began, the republican and democrat parties entered into a cordial alliance, both being resolved to maintain the union by force, if necessary. More demonstrative in speech than his chief, Mr. Seward has become the mouthpiece of the federalists. B. at Florida, New York, 1801.

SEWELL, William, su'-el, an English historian, who was the author of the "History of Quakers," and of a Dictionary, Dutch and English. He practised as a surgeon at Amsterdam. D. 1720.

SEWELL, George, an English poet and physician, who wrote a tragedy, entitled "Tragedy of Sir Walter Raleigh," acted at the theatre in Lincoln's-Inn Fields; a "Vindication of the English Stage;" the "Life of John Philips;" and some poems. D. at Hampstead, 1726.

SEWESTAN, se-wes-tan', a province of Beloochistan, consisting of a flat dry plain of hardened clay, and fertile only near the rivers. Lat. between 29° 30′ and 30° 30′ N. Lon. between 67° and 70° E.

SEXTUS-EMPIRICUS, sex'-tus, a Greek philosopher of the Pyrrhonian sect, and a physician of that of the Empyrics, or those who guided their practice wholly after experience. Of his works there are extant—three books, called the "Pyrrhonian Hypotyposes," in which he gives all the arguments of the Sceptics, and a large treatise upon the impossibility of admitting any science. The best edition of this author is that of Fabricius: Leipsic, 1718. Flourished about 200.

SEYCHELLES. (See SECHELLES.)

SEYMOUR, Lady Jane, se'-mor, the third wife of Henry VIII., and the mother of Edward VI. She was at first maid of honour to Anne Boleyn, whom she supplanted in 1536. She died in 1537, a few days after giving birth to her son.

SEYMOUR, Sir Michael, a modern English admiral, who entered the navy in 1813, on board the Hannibal, commanded by his father. He became a post-captain in 1826, and after seeing some service in the Mediterranean and on the South American station, he was appointed inspector-general of docks at Devonport. During the Russian war he acted as flag-captain to Sir Charles Napier in the Baltic. In 1855 he was promoted to the rank of rear-admiral, and was soon afterwards appointed second in command to Sir David Dundas, who had succeeded Sir Charles Napier in the command of the Baltic fleet. In the following year he went out to the Chinese station as commander-in-chief. In that capacity he demanded of the authorities at Canton reparation for the insults offered to the English flag; but, not obtaining a fitting response, he opened fire upon the forts which defended the city. These forts were taken. B. near Plymouth, 1802.

SEYMOUR, Sir George Hamilton, a modern English diplomatist, who, after completing his education at the university of Oxford, commenced public life in 1817. In the interval 1819-21 he was employed in the Foreign-office; but, in the following year, he accompanied the duke of Wellington to the congress of Verona. He afterwards served as a subordinate to the British representatives at Frankfort, Berlin, Constantinople, Tuscany, and Belgium. He was British minister at Lisbon in 1846, and was in 1851 removed to St. Petersburg. In that capacity he held with the emperor Nicholas those famous secret interviews, during which the czar declared the condition of Turkey to be that of "a sick man," whose inheritance he offered to divide between Russia and England. A few weeks before the declaration of war between Russia and Great Britain, he found it necessary to quit St. Petersburg; and, towards the close of the year 1855, he was appointed the successor to the earl of Westmoreland at Vienna. His diplomatic services were rewarded by his being created G.C.B. and G.C.H. In 1858 he retired from public service. B. 1797.

SEYMOUR, Edward, brother of Lady Jane Seymour, and uncle of Edward VI., was created Viscount Beauchamp and duke of Somerset. On the accession of his nephew to the throne, Seymour became his guardian, and protector of the kingdom. He was accused of abusing his high trust by the earl of Warwick and other courtiers, and was beheaded in 1552.

SEYMOUR, Thomas, admiral of England, brother of the preceding, by whom he was brought to the scaffold, on a pretended charge of treason, in 1549.

SEYMOUR, Anne, Margaret, and Jane, daughters of the duke of Somerset, were distinguished for their poetical talents. They composed Latin distichs on the death of Margaret de Valois, queen of France, which were translated into French, Greek, and Italian, and printed at Paris in 1551. Anne, the eldest of these ladies, married first the earl of Warwick, and afterwards Sir Edward Hunton. Jane was maid of honour to Queen Elizabeth.
